God (Q): and as Abraham was returning from the war, he presented him with a bread and wine (R); that is, made him the usual presents of meats and drinks to refresh him, and received from him tythes of all (S); having blessed him in the name of the most high God, possessor, or creator of heaven and earth. The king of Sodom was at this remarkable interview, and seems to have acted a very generous and modest part, claiming nothing of all that Abraham had re-taken from the enemy, except the persons of his subjects, leaving the rest to his disposal and discretion. But he met with as generous a return from Abraham, who, so far as in him lay, made him ample restitution of all that belonged to him, whether of persons or goods; whilst Aner, Eschol, and Mamre, his Canaanitish confederates, who were all three Amorites, were left to do as they pleased; and how far they followed Abraham's example, is not said<sup>1</sup>.

Sodom, &c.
destroyed.

Year of the
Flood, 1101.
Year before
Christ, 1898.

Now for fifteen years there is a dead silence as to the affairs of this people; but about this time a severe judgment was executed on the inhabitants of the vale of Siddim. Living in great ease and affluence, they were grown to such a height of impiety, that there was no room for mercy on them; which, if it could have been obtained by the intercession of Abraham, they had been spared from the wrath of God now, as by his arms before, they were snatched out of the hands of their enemies. The sin they suffered for was that unnatural end<sup>2</sup>, which from the chief city of that vale, Sodom, has since born the name of Sodomy. The particulars of this catastrophe we have already given<sup>3</sup> in speaking of Lot; and shall now only say<sup>4</sup> that the four cities of this fertile and pleasant spot, Sodom, Gomorrab, Admah, and Zebbijm, were destroyed by a rain of brimstone and fire, or thunder and lightning,, from the Lord out of heaven, and that the whole vale was consumed<sup>5</sup>; and became thenceforward the dead or salt-sea, or lake Asphaltites (T). Thus perished a branch of the Canaanites with their whole territory; all, saving the city of Bela, henceforward called Zoar<sup>6</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> Gen. xiv.

<sup>2</sup> Gen. xix.

<sup>3</sup> See before.

<sup>4</sup> Gen. ubi sup. Deut. xxix. 23.

<sup>5</sup> See before, p. 283.

<sup>6</sup> said that Levi paid him tithes in the loins of Abraham; but it would be as true that he received tithes in the loins of Shem. For, according to this interpretation, he was in the loins both of him that received tithes, and of him that paid them; and so the whole argumentation of the apostle falls to the ground. But setting aside these, and other Christian reasons, there is no cause, that we can discern, why Moses should call Shem (whom he so often mentions) by any other name than his own; nor is it likely that Shem reigned in the land of Canaan, which now was in the possession of his brother's son. Nor could Abram be said to sojourn there as in a strange country, if his noble ancestor Shem had been king there<sup>7</sup> (24). These arguments must be allowed to be very strong, and it is pretty clear that the notion which obtains among the Jewish writers, is of no very ancient date. Josephus expressly calls Melchisedec a potentate of the Canaanites (25). The Arabians deduce him from Pelegr (26). To pass over some notions of the church, and of some hereticks concerning him, which are pretty wide from our present purpose; he was both a king and a priest; which offices were anciently joined in one person, of which several instances are observed in ancient writers, both Greek and Roman.

(Q) Salem is by Josephus (27) called Solyma; who also says, that Melchisedec was the first founder of it; that he erected a temple in it, and officiated as a priest, calling it Jerusalem; whereas its former name was Solyma. But what he says in this case has no weight with the most accurate and learned of the Christian writers, who, for the most part have a different notion. There is a Salem mentioned in the New Testament (28); which is supposed to have been the same where Melchisedec reigned (29). The Arabians will have it, that Jerusalem was built by twelve neighbouring kings, who, touched with a deep veneration for Melchisedec, built it in honour of him, or for his convenience; which when they had done, he called it Jerusalem (30).

(R) As he is generally acknowledged to have been a type of Christ, so some have discovered in this bread and wine, a near relation to the sacrament of the Lord's supper: but this is a pious mistake; the words of Moses mean what Josephus (31) explains; it was no more than a refreshment of meats and drinks which he offered to Abraham, according to the hospitality of those times; eating of bread, in the scripture phrase, is feasting.

(S) It is remarked (32), that the words of the text itself are so ambiguous, that there would have been no knowing whether it was Abraham or Melchisedec that gave these tithes, had not the apostle (33) explained it: whence Eusebius thought Melchisedec had bestowed gifts upon Abraham. Of what kind the tithes were that Melchisedec received from Abram, is not known; but we may enlarge on this in the life of Abraham.

(T) How this terrible subversion was effected, is thus accounted for. The vale being full of slime-pits (34), or places whence Naphtha and Bitumen were extracted, is supposed to have been universally impregnated with igneous matter, and the lightning darting upon it, or flashing along the surface of it, kindled the combustible parts (35), which had the fearful effect of turning this once enchanting paradise into a loathsome lake. But we shall speak of this lake hereafter in the geography of this country, as it was under the Jews.

(24) See PATRICK upon Gen. vii. 6.

(25) De Bell. Judaic. l. 7. c. 18.

(26) HOTTING.

Smeg. Orient. p. 256, 260, 306.

(27) Idem ubi sup.

(28) John iii. 23.

(29) See PATRICK ubi sup.

(30) EUSEBIUS. Annal. p. 67.

(31) Antiq. l. 1. c. 10.

(32) See PATRICK ubi sup. ver. 19.

(33) Heb. vii. 2.

(34) Gen. xvi. 10.

(35) Vide CARRIE.

Dissertat. de Sodom. subversum, § 4.

- a THE Hittites after this treated with Abraham, who desired to purchase the cave of Mach-pelab, for a burial-place; and their behaviour towards that incomparable patriarch deserves well a place here. In a public assembly they offered him the choicest of their sepulchres to deposite his dead in, and that in the most respectful terms. But, when he signified his desire to have a separate place for his family, and had cast his eye upon the cave of Mach-pelab, belonging to one of their tribe, called Ephron the son of Zobar, with whom he desired them to intercede in his behalf: Ephron himself, who is supposed to have presided in this assembly, generously offered to make him a present of not only the cave he wanted to purchase, but of the ground or field also where it stood, and pressed him much to accept of it; b but by the noble spirit of Abraham he was disappointed so far as to be obliged to sell the field and the cave to him for four hundred shekels, which he looked upon as a trifle between Abraham and him; so great was his desire of retaining the favour and friendship of that patriarch.

NOTHING occurs after this that we can take notice of here for the space of about one hundred and twenty-eight years. At this time reigned Hamor in Shechem, a poor kingdom and weak; though Hamor himself seems to have been worthy of a better dominion, and a better chance than befel him. He sold a piece of ground to Jacob * near Shechem, where it happened that Dinab the daughter of Jacob coming to see and converse with the daughters of the land, was observed by Shechem the son of Hamor. Shechem was so violently smitten with a liking to her, that he instantly forced and deflowered her; but having a real passion for her, and being sensibly affected with the wrong he had done her, he would have pacified and persuaded her to consent to marry him. He spake of it to his father Hamor, and entreated him to use his endeavours that he might have Dinab for his wife. Accordingly Hamor went to Jacob to communicate the ardent inclinations his son had for Dinab, and to ask his consent. But the injury and affront was stily insisted on by Jacob's sons, who were present, as was also Shechem himself. This last finding that the others were highly exasperated at the violence he had committed on their sister, proffered all the satisfaction their hearts could wish, if they would but forgive him, and permit him to marry her. Shechem thought he had gained his point upon the answer he received from them; which was, That if he and all of his tribe, or city, would consent to be circumcised, he should have his suit granted. Shechem willingly submitted to this painful proposal, and so did his father Hamor for his sake; for he had an especial love for him above all his other children. Wherefore returning to the city, they assembled the people in the gate, and bespoke them to this effect: That seeing that Jacob and his family dwelt with them in great harmony, and that their was full room enough for them all, it would be very prudent to unite with them by reciprocal marriages; that indeed there was a pretty hard condition insisted on; which was, that they should all be circumcised; but that the pain thereof would be amply compensated by such an accession of wealth as must flow in upon them by Jacob's becoming one people with them. The men of the city, partly out of affection to Hamor and Shechem, we may suppose, and partly upon the last consideration, declared they were ready to be circumcised. They were so accordingly, but while they laboured under the sores and inconveniencies of this compliance (U), upon the third day they were all suddenly cut off by two of Jacob's sons at the head of their servants. Every one of them perished by the edge of the sword, and their wives, and children, and cattle, and household-goods, and all belonging to them fell a prey to the treacherous Simeon and Levi, who had perpetrated so horrid a violence upon a parcel of helpless, and to all appearance, innocent people †.

HITHERTO we have been obliged to give the history of this people by incoherent pieces, and so we must continue to do: there is no connection, no successive train of events to be expected here. When Moses drew towards the skirts of the promised land, for the first time, the Canaanites in the south-eastern parts of the country were joined by the Amalekites ‡, who we may suppose, were eager to take

* Gen. xxiii.

* Gen. xxxiii. 18, & seq.

† Gen. xxxiv.

‡ Deut. iii. 5.

(U) (36) * And began to be a little feverish: * indeed Hippocrates says the same of all wounds
* For the greatest pain and anguish the Jews ob- * and ulcers, that they are then most inflamed by * served, was upon the third day after circumcision, * a conflux of sharp humours to them.
* which very much indisposed them (37). And their revenge upon the Israelites *. These understanding that spies had been sent <sup>a</sup> by Moses to view the land, drew towards the frontiers; and the Israelites attempting to enter their territory against the express decree of God, were by them repulsed with a great slaughter, quite to Hornab *.

(36) PATRICK upon Gen. xxiii. 25. (37) ELIEN. Pirke, c. 29. & VORSTI. Annotat. p. 95.

WHETHER before or after this, is not precisely known, Sibon king of the Amorites invaded the children of Moab and Ammon, and dispossessed them of their country on the other side Jordan, and the dead Sea *: this conquest is celebrated by the most ancient poem * that is extant among prophane writers.

Arad. ARAD (W) was a king in the south-east of Canaan, when Moses had a second time reached the skirts of the promised land; and being informed of their coming by the Way of spies (X), he went out and attacked them, and took several of them <sup>b</sup> prisoners; but fortune changed countenance on him, and he was vanquished by them, and his country doomed to utter destruction *.

Sihon. SIBON the Amorite soon after this residing in the ancient country of the Moabites and Ammonites, was entreated by messengers from Moses for a free passage through his country, in his way to Canaan. This request he arrogantly rejected; and, having raised an army, marched out against him; but it was a very unfortunate expedition. He was defeated at Jaazer with a total overthrow, which was ensued by the entire loss of all he had, to Moses and his people.

Og. OG king of Basban is reckoned a king of the Amorites †, and was of the race of the giants, or Rephaim, and the very last of them. His iron bedstead of nine cubits in length we have already mentioned *. He was a dreadful enemy *. His whole kingdom took its name from the hill of Basban, which is compared to God's hill <sup>b</sup>, and has since been called Batanea. In it were no less than sixty walled towns, besides villages *. This country afforded an excellent breed of cattle * and stately oaks *. In short, it was a plentiful and populous territory. Og's residence was at Ahtaroth † (Y) and at Edrei, at or near which place he was vanquished, as he was espousing the cause of Sibon, and attempting to stop the progress of Moses and his people. He fell in battle, he, and all that belonged to him, and his whole kingdom, and all therein was transferred to the Israelites under Moses *.

THE news of what Moses had done on the other side Jordan to Sibon and Og, <sup>d</sup> kings of the Amorites, was matter of astonishment we may suppose to the Canaanites of every denomination; but when they also heard how the waters of that river had been divided to give the Israelites a passage through it, their hearts melted, and their spirits failed them. Jericho was the first place that felt the fury of the approaching excision, being dismantled by the shouts of the Israelites, the sound of seven rams-horns, and the circumvection of the ark of the covenant; and in it no soul was spared but the harlot Rabab and her family, who had been instrumental in saving the spies that had been sent by Joshua into this city, which was now turned into a heap of ashes and rubbish, being burnt with fire; and the man cursed that should ever attempt to rebuild it *.

The king of Ai. THE news of this soon roused up the little state of Ai, whose king, on the first <sup>e</sup> skirmish, gained some small advantage against Joshua; the occasion of which shall be related in its proper place. But he soon perceived that the war was not likely to be decided by so slight a favour of fortune on his side, and therefore sent to the men of Beth-el, who were his subjects, and owed him homage, to repair to * See before, p. 320. † Deut. ubi supr. p. 287, 294. * See before. * Numb. xxi. 27.

 † Ibid. ver. 1, 2. † Deut. iii. 8. and ver. 11. * See before, p. 293. * Vide JOSEPH.
 Antiq. l. 4. c. 5. † Psal. lxxviii. 15. † Deut. iii. 4, 5. Josh. xiii. 30. JOSEPH. Antiq.
 ubi supr. † Ibid. xxii. 14. Psal. xxii. 12. † Ezek. xxv. 6. † Josh. xii. 4.
 † Numb. xxi. 33, 35. † Josh. vi.

(W) It is doubted whether this be the name of the king himself, or of his city. There was indeed a city, and one of Canaan's sons of that name, according to the LXX and the Vulgate, who so translate the Hebrew of Arvad; who therefore may have given his name to this country, and the city may have been called after him (38).

(X) This is supposed to be a road or a way, so called from the spies who entered the country formerly eight and thirty years before. Some understand it, that the king heard spies were coming into his country. The Hebrew word here rendered spies, is בִּיתְרֵי baathbarim; which the LXX have retained as the name of the place, and call it Αδαμ.

(Y) This city being elsewhere called Ahtaroth-Karnaim (39), or the two horns, has given room to suppose it derived its name from the goddess Astarte. But, as is observed, that place may as well be supposed to have been built in the shape of a half-moon (40).

(38) Vide PATRICK & CLERIC. in Numb. xxi. 1. (39) Gen. xiv. 5. (40) See PATRICK

a him, that they might strengthen his arms against the enemy. It was not long ere he had advice that Joshua was moving towards him. In general, he apprehended Joshua's intent was to besiege him; but he knew nothing of a stratagem that was formed, and of ambuscades that were laid to ruin him, and destroy his city. He saw Joshua appear before his walls with no very formidable force, and at once resolved to fight him; which he no sooner offered to do, than the Israelites faced about and fled; which when he saw, he ordered every body to come out of the city and help to pursue the enemy that feigned only to run from him. By this means his city was left destitute of all defence, every body being at the heels of the Israelites; which, when it was known to a party who lay in ambush, they b rose up, seized upon the city, and set the out-skirts of it on fire. The king of Ai turning his head backwards, saw the smoke of his city ascending up to heaven; and in the midst of his consternation he saw also the enemy stop short, shout, and face about upon him. His return to the city was intercepted by those who had set it on fire, and were now advancing to assist in cutting him off. The men of Ai perceiving therefore that their city must perish without resource, and that they were to be attacked as it were on all sides, their hearts sunk within them, and they all fell by the edge of the sword, except their king, who was taken alive and led to Joshua. After this defeat of their army, the city was entered and burnt by the victors; and all that was found in, or about it, was put to the sword. There fell c in the whole about twelve thousand souls; the city was reduced into a ruinous heap, and continued so ever after. The captive king was hanged on a tree till even-tide, when he was taken down, and buried in one of the gates of the city, under a heap of stones which was thrown over him<sup>1</sup>.

THE sad catastrophe of those two kingdoms, made all the neighbouring ones rise up in arms against Joshua. Gibeon, a city of the Hivites<sup>2</sup>, but far stronger and more considerable than Ai, both for counsel and valour of its inhabitants<sup>3</sup>, was the only one that chose to avert the impending ruin by stratagem, rather than by joining with the united forces of their neighbours. After the best consultation they could take on so immergent a juncture, they came to a resolution to send some d ambassadors to Joshua, dressed in old tattered garments, with clouted shoes, dry and mouldy bread, and with such a worn-out equipage, as might make them appear like men really come from some far distant country. In this sordid guise they set out for Joshua's camp in Gilgal; where being arrived, they told him they were come from afar off to seek his friendship; and being questioned as to their sincerity, they answered equivocally, and being still further pressed upon the point, they replied with great submission, That they were actually of a very far distant country; and that the fame of the LORD GOD, and what he had done for Israel in Egypt; and since then, by the destruction of Sidon and Og, those mighty kings, had been the inducements which had brought them so far from home, being sent by e the unanimous vote of all their countrymen, that they might make their homage, and desire to be accepted into a league with Israel; and as a proof that in all they had said they had confined themselves to strict truth, they produced their dry and mouldy bread, which they averred they had taken out of their houses the day they set out: our bottles of wine, said they, were new, and see how they are rent; our garments and shoes were the same, but they are worn out by reason of our very long journey. In all this they acted their parts with the utmost cunning and prevarication, and being too easily believed, gained their point, and prevailed on Joshua and the Israelites to make a league with them. Thus did they over-reach their enemies, and thereby save their lives. At the end of three days their whole artifice was f discovered, when it was too late to look back, they having brought the Israelites under a solemn engagement to protect them as friends: but in the conclusion they fared not so well as they, perhaps, expected, being condemned to be hewers of wood and drawers of water; that is, to be slaves, or very little better<sup>4</sup>.

WHEN Adonizedek king of Jerusalem heard how Jericho and Ai had been utterly destroyed, and what was worse to the common cause, that the Gibeonites had submitted to Joshua, he was divided between disdain and fear. But resolving to make an example of the Gibeonites, thereby to deter others from following so cowardly and dangerous a precedent, he called in Hobam king of Hebron, Piram king of Jarmuth, Japhia king of Lachish, and Debir king of Eglon, to join him to fight against Gibeon; and accordingly they all went against it, and besieged it. The their revenge upon the Israelites *. These understanding that spies had been sent a by Moses to view the land, drew towards the frontiers; and the Israelites attempting to enter their territory against the express decree of God, were by them repulsed with a great slaughter, quite to Hormab †.

<sup>1</sup> Josh. vii, viii.<sup>2</sup> Ibid. ix. compare ver. 3. with ver. 7.<sup>3</sup> Ibid. x. 2.<sup>4</sup> Ibid. ix.

WHETHER before or after this, is not precisely known, Sibon king of the Amorites invaded the children of Moab and Ammon, and dispossessed them of their country on the other side Jordan, and the dead Sea ‡: this conquest is celebrated by the most ancient poem § that is extant among prophane writers.

Arad. ARAD (W) was a king in the south-east of Canaan, when Moses had a second time reached the skirts of the promised land; and being informed of their coming by the Way of spies (X), he went out and attacked them, and took several of them † prisoners; but fortune changed countenance on him, and he was vanquished by them, and his country doomed to utter destruction ‡.

Sibon. SIBON the Amorite soon after this residing in the ancient country of the Moabites and Ammonites, was entreated by messengers from Moses for a free passage through his country, in his way to Canaan. This request he arrogantly rejected; and, having raised an army, marched out against him; but it was a very unfortunate expedition. He was defeated at Jaazer with a total overthrow, which was ensued by the entire loss of all he had, to Moses and his people.

Og. OG king of Bashan is reckoned a king of the Amorites †, and was of the race of the giants, or Rephaim, and the very last of them. His iron bed-stead of nine cubits in length we have already mentioned ‡. He was a dreadful enemy †. His whole kingdom took its name from the hill of Bashan, which is compared to God's hill ‡, and has since been called Batanea. In it were no less than sixty walled towns besides villages †. This country afforded an excellent breed of cattle † and stags †. In short, it was a plentiful and populous territory. Og's residence was at Ahtaroth † (Y) and at Edrei, at or near which place he was vanquished, as † espousing the cause of Sibon, and attempting to stop the progress of Moses and his people. He fell in battle, he, and all that belonged to him, and his whole kingdom, and all therein was transferred to the Israelites under Moses ‡.

THE news of what Moses had done on the other side Jordan to Sibon and the kings of the Amorites, was matter of astonishment we may suppose to the kings of every denomination; but when they also heard how the waters of Jordan had been divided to give the Israelites a passage through it, their hearts failed them. Jericho was the first place that felt the approaching excision, being dismantled by the shouts of the Israelites and the seven rams-horns, and the circumvection of the ark of the covenant. The only soul was spared but the harlot Rahab and her family, who † in saving the spies that had been sent by Joshua into this city, were turned into a heap of ashes and rubbish, being burnt with fire †. It was cursed that should ever attempt to rebuild it ‡.

The king of Ai.

THE news of this soon roused up the little state of Ai. A skirmish, gained some small advantage against Joshua; but he soon perceived that he was to be decided by so slight a favour of fortune on the side of the men of Beth-el, who were his subjects, and overcame them †.

* See before, p. 320. † Deut. ubi supr. p. 287, 294.
 ‡ Ibid. ver. 1, 2. † Deut. iii. 8. and ver. 11.
 Antiq. l. 4. c. 5. † Psal. lxxiii. 15. † Deut. ubi supr.
 † Ibid. xxxii. 14. † Psal. xxii. 12.
 † Numb. xxi. 33, 35. † Josh. vi.

(W) It is doubted whether this be the name of the king himself, or of his city. There was indeed a city, and one of Canaan's sons of that name, according to the LXX and the Vulgate, who for translate the Hebrew of Arvad; who therefore may have given his name to this country, and the city may have been called after him (38).

(X) This is supposed to be a road or a way called from the spies who entered the country formerly eight and thirty years before. Some understand it, that the king heard that the spies were

perfed
of the ites, as became otent, and the remain-athe, while d be regulatinvaded again

r respective lots.
by the tribes of ng thus routed in the king of that th all men, for his aving taken seventy
, and made them rene city itfelf was now out to the fword, which t-bezek himfelf was in the was fince overtaken in his juft requital, as he himfelf was undeservedly fpared, he that city had been taken and ne tribe of Judab now†; is not the notes; p. 247. † Jofh. ubi fupr.

mentators imagined that the Ifraelites held the and the Jebufites the fortrefs of Zion ever rwards, Josephus (42) plainly enough tells us, ey had both the fort and the city when David ave them their fatal blow; and, confidering the temper and infolence of the Jebufites, it is not likely, that while they poffeffed the citadel, they would fuffer the Ifraelites to live quietly in the town. Upon the whole, though the place may have been reduced by Jofhua, and re-poffeffed by the Jebufites again, and reduced a fecond time by the tribe of Judab now, yet it is likely there were always difputes between the Jebufites and the If- raelites, and that thefe were driven out by thofe a fecond time; and that in the days of David the Jebufites had both the city and fortrefs in their own hands, as Josephus affures us above. It is probably upon this account that he tells us elfe-where,

† Numb. xiii. ver. ult. (42) JOSEPH. l. 6. c. 7.

P P P P

IMME-

inhabitants in this distress dispatched notice to Joshua of what was befallen them, and begged his speedy succour to rescue them from their enraged countrymen. They were accordingly relieved on the very next day by their generous ally, who, after a long night's march, fell suddenly on them, and forced them to raise the siege in the utmost confusion. As they were flying away, and had almost reached Beth-boron, there came down a dreadful tempest of hail-stones, of such enormous size, that they knocked them on the head, and did more execution among them than the sword of Joshua. Thus persecuted by the heavens above, and pressed by the Israelites in the rear, they fled, as chance directed them, without knowing whither. By so general a dispersion it is possible that many of them might have come off with life, had not the sun, at the command of Joshua, miraculously stopped his career, that the Israelites might see to overtake and destroy the scattered multitude. And now the five kings, seeing nothing but sure destruction before their eyes, made the best of their way to a cave near the city of Makkedab, the only glimpse of hope they had left. Happily, as they thought, they reached this asylum, but were soon after discovered there; and information thereof being carried to Joshua, they quickly saw the mouth of their cave stopped up with great stones. Under this dismal confinement they remained till the action of this miraculous day was concluded, when being taken out, and brought before the congregation of Israel, the chiefs of whom trod on their necks: which done, they were all five put to death, and their dead bodies were hung, each on a tree, till the setting sun, when they were taken down and thrown into the mouth of the cave, which was again filled up with great stones, as a monument of their unhappy end. This was the fate of the five confederate kings, while some of their subjects were so fortunate as to get into certain fenced cities, and so escape for the present *.

Jabin.

JABIN king of Hazor, when he heard this, and that moreover Makkedab, Libnah, Lachish, Eglon, Hebron and Debir had been subverted, and all their inhabitants put to the sword, and that not a soul had been left alive in one of them: and again, that Horam king of Gezer, and his whole force, had perished in attempting to relieve Lachish: Such a crowd of calamities together made him resolve to raise all the tribes of the Canaanites to withstand the destruction which so imminently threatened them all. He sent therefore to Jobab, king of Madon, to the king of Schimron, to the king of Ashdaph, to the kings on the north of the mountains, to those in the plains south of Cinneroth, and in the valley, and on the borders of Dor on the west, and to the Canaanites, peculiarly so called, on the east and west, and to the Amorite, and the Hittite, and the Perizzite, and the Jebusite in the mountains, and to the Hivite under Herman, in the land of Mizpeb. These all confederated together against Israel; they were as the sand on the sea-shore for multitude, and were very strong in horse and chariots (Z), a dreadful enemy for Joshua and his people to deal with, who were utterly unprovided of both. Being thus united, they encamped near the waters of Merom, since called the lake Samachonitis. Here, as they lay consulting together, they were assaulted by surprize, driven out of their camp, and broken into as many distinct bodies, perhaps, as they were tribes, each tending homewards. But the main body of them seem to have fled with their faces towards the great Zidon, westward, and Mizrephoth-maim; while another multitude scoured towards the valley of Mizpeb eastward. But they were every where so furiously and effectually pursued, that most of them fell by the way. Jabin himself had the luck to escape for the present, but he perished with his city soon afterwards; for Hazor was soon after taken, her inhabitants all cut off to a man, and the place burnt down to the ground. It was reckoned as the chief of all the cities belonging to the kings of this confederacy, and therefore was treated with the greater rigour; f

* Josh. x.

(Z) This is all the account the text gives us of this numerous army. Josephus adds, that it consisted of 300,000 foot, 10,000 horse, and 20,000 armed chariots †. That of Joshua was not only vastly inferior in number, but was destitute of chariots and horses; so that his success was chiefly owing to the suddenness with which he fell upon them, before they could post themselves to the best advantage. For it is said that he came in sight of them in five days, though Gilgal, whence he set out, was at least sixty miles off, and the country very rocky and mountainous.

And here the Jewish general seems to have had some doubt of success at the sight of so prodigious an host, till God was pleased to promise him a complete victory over them, or as the text has it, that he should totally cut off man and horse, and burn their chariots with fire *.

† Antiq. l. 5. c. 1.* Josh. x. 6.

but

a but the rest of the cities of these princes, which also fell into the hands of Joshua, were suffered to stand, though none of the inhabitants were spared in any of them<sup>a</sup>.

No losses, though ever so grievous, could for a considerable while break the spirits of the Canaanites; they stood their ground, and rose up so thick and so fast one after another, that they kept Joshua employed six years<sup>b</sup>. In the end, great numbers are supposed to have left their country; and travelling towards Afric, to have settled themselves there at last, erecting a monument in memory of the calamities which had driven them from their native place, and inveighing against Joshua by a very injurious appellation, as will be observed hereafter in the history of that continent. In their way thither they are supposed to have seized on the lower Egypt, where they erected a monarchy, which subsisted under several of their own kings; but being at last overpowered, were forced, some of them, farther westward into Afric: and thus are they made out to have been the Phœnician shepherds, who lorded it so long, and so rigorously over Egypt<sup>c</sup>.

AFTER the Canaanites had been successively defeated, and at length dispersed and reduced, the Anakims<sup>d</sup> (Z), who also inhabited some of the mountains of the land, a fierce and barbarous race, and of an origin distinct from the Canaanites, as is thought, were invaded and cut off; and thus by degrees the Israelites became masters of the greatest part of the land of Canaan.

BUT still the Canaanites of several denominations were strong and potent, and held no mean share of the country; and, for nineteen or twenty years, the remainder of Joshua's days, they were very little molested; being suffered to breathe, while the important business of dividing their country by the conqueror could be regulated and adjusted.

THIS division being marked out, the Canaanites were on all sides invaded again by the tribes of Israel, who wanted each to drive them out of their respective lots. The Canaanites and Perizzites in Bezek were accordingly invaded by the tribes of Simeon and Judab, and there fell of them ten thousand men. Being thus routed in the field, they retreated to the city of Bezek, where Adoni-bezek, the king of that place, as his name imports, resided. This king is infamous with all men, for his singular cruelty and insolence; for, by his own confession, having taken seventy kings captive, he cut off the thumbs and great toes of each, and made them receive their meat under his table, like so many dogs. The city itself was now assaulted and carried; and all those within the walls were put to the sword, which may be called the second slaughter of this dispute. Adoni-bezek himself was in the city at this time, though he, it seems had escaped, but was since overtaken in his flight, and his thumbs and great toes were cut off; a just requital, as he himself acknowledged, for his former cruelty; but his life was undeservedly spared, he being carried alive to Jerusalem, where he died; for that city had been taken and burnt before; but whether by Joshua formerly, or the tribe of Judab now<sup>e</sup>, is not very clear (A).

<sup>a</sup> Josh. xi.
<sup>b</sup> Judg. i. 3—8.

<sup>c</sup> USHER. Annal.

<sup>d</sup> See before in the notes; p. 247.

<sup>e</sup> Josh. ubi supr.

(Z) These are held to have been what we call giants, and are derived from one Arba, who seized on the city of Hebron, from whom it was called Kirjath Arba, the city of Arba. From Arba descended Anak (41), who, it seems, had three sons, whom we shall mention hereafter. From Anak the Anakims derive their name; but whether they were only a more numerous and stout people, or really men of a larger stature, has been disputed, though, we think, without reason, if we believe the description given by the spies sent by Moses to view the land†. As for the various etymons of their name, they are too uncertain and far-fetch'd to deserve a place here.

(A) Jerusalem is mentioned as taken by Joshua; but, as may be observed, the Canaanites hid hands again on several places which Joshua had torn from them; and the same may have happened at Jerusalem; for, though it is by most commentators imagined that the Israelites held the town, and the Jebusites the fortress of Zion ever afterwards, Josephus (42) plainly enough tells us, they had both the fort and the city when David gave them their fatal blow; and, considering the temper and insolence of the Jebusites, it is not likely, that while they possessed the citadel, they would suffer the Israelites to live quietly in the town. Upon the whole, though the place may have been reduced by Joshua, and re-possessed by the Jebusites again, and reduced a second time by the tribe of Judab now, yet it is likely there were always disputes between the Jebusites and the Israelites, and that these were driven out by those a second time; and that in the days of David the Jebusites had both the city and fortress in their own hands, as Josephus assures us above. It is probably upon this account that he tells us elsewhere, (41) Josh. xiv. 15. Ibid. xv. 13, 14.

† Numb. xiii. ver. ult.

(42) JOSEPH. l. 6. c. 7.

IMMEDIATELY after this the Canaanites were invaded in several other parts, <sup>a</sup> and particularly in Hebron and Debir, two cities which had formerly been destroyed by Joshua, but were now in the hands of the Canaanites again, an instance, among many others of the same kind, of the resolution of this people, and their reluctance to quit their possessions. And, in general, the Canaanites in the highlands or mountains were reduced; but those in the low-country were better able to keep their ground, by the help of their iron chariots. Hebron was by this war put into the hands of Caleb, who thence expelled the three sons of Anak <sup>(B)</sup>.

THE other tribes made also some vigorous, but unsuccessful attempts against those cities that had fallen to their lot; as Benjamin on the Jebusites; Manasseh against Beth-shean, Taanach, Dor, Ibleam, and Megiddo; Ephraim against Gezer; <sup>b</sup> Zebulun against Kibron and Nabalol; Naphthali against Beth-sheMesh and Beth-anath. Joseph was indeed more successful against Beth-el, which was betrayed to them, and taken by surprise. Asher, on the contrary, was so far from gaining any advantage against those of Accho, Zidon, Ablab, Acchib, &c. that its settlement amongst them seems rather to have been confined to such places, and were granted only on some conditions imposed by the old inhabitants. That of Dan was no less oppressed by the Amorites, who kept them to bleach on the tops of their mountains, without suffering them to come down into the lower and more fertile lands. It is moreover observed, that those of Ajalon and Sbaalim still kept the mountain of Heres in their own hand. But the Danites being in time assisted by the house <sup>c</sup> of Joseph, brought them at length under tribute, enlarged their own territories, and fixed those of their oppressive neighbours from the going up to Akrabbim from the rock, and upwards, as the text has it <sup>(C)</sup>.

THUS upon the division of their country, and the attempts made by the several tribes to drive them out, the whole land was in a ferment of war, which ended with no great success on either side; and the adverse parties seem to have been pretty equally matched. So that although it is certain that multitudes of this people were slain in the wars with Joshua, and that, as is very rationally supposed, many of them fled the land in quest of more sure and quiet abodes, twenty years before; yet such was their remaining number, valour, or superior skill in war, <sup>d</sup> that after all their calamities, take them which way you will, they seem to have been but little inferior to the Israelites. Nor after this do we miss one tribe of them, except the Girgashites <sup>(D)</sup>.

THE Canaanites, the Sidonians, and the Hivites of mount Lebanon, from Baal-hermon to Hamath were left to prove Israel, to exercise them with temptation to idolatry and sin <sup>(E)</sup>, and the more immediately devoted nations, the Canaanites, where (43), that the tribe of Judah did now attack Jerusalem, but did not succeed in their attempt.

<sup>a</sup> Judg. i. 9—20.

<sup>b</sup> Ibid. ver. 21—36.

(B) The names of these sons of Anak are Abimman, Shebhai, and Talmi (44); concerning whom we shall only remark what Bochart has fancied, as to the import of their names. To begin with their father Anak, his name he makes to square with the Latin name Torquatus. The eldest, or first of the brother's name Abimman, that is, who is my brother, or my equal. By the name of Shebhai the second, he supposes him to have been six cubits high, as Goliath is said to have been. Talmi, the name of the third, he derives from talam a furrow *; as if he seemed in length equal to the furrow of a field. This is an ingenious thought, some may say, and some may think it a little presumptuous. Josephus (45), as his custom too frequently is, gives us a fearful account of these inhabitants of Hebron, 'Among the slain, says he, 'were found some gigantic forms, who 'not only exceeded the ordinary size of men, but 'differed also from them in aspect and voice, — 'Some of their bones are exposed as a prodigy to 'this day.'

(C) For want of knowing the exact situation

of the places here mentioned, we are at a loss to understand whether the Amorites were left masters of a small or large territory. Obscurities of the same kind there are many; but our reader, we hope, will upon this occasion, and all of alike nature, pass or to come, excuse our want of presumption; or that we do not pretend to shew him the exact situations of places, which, from the best light we have, can hardly be guessed at; and must for ever, it is likely, remain a dispute among such as have time to waste, and little else to do or think of.

(D) We are positively told they fled into Afric (46), where they fixed their seat; whence their being omitted is very rationally accounted for; and though it were difficult to think that none belonging to the other tribes accompanied them, or trod afterwards in their foot-steps; yet may we hence conclude that the Girgashites were the chief of the fugitives from this country, which we shall resume when we come to Afric.

(E) Here we see a remarkable distinction made between the Canaanites of Joshua's conquest, and those who were not so; as if these, who were only their borderers, were more proper, or more

(43) Antiq. l. 5. c. 2. (44) Numb. xiii. 22.
(45) Gemar. Hierosolymit. ad tit. Shebitib, c. 6.

* Canaan. lib. 1. c. 1.

(46) Ubi supr.

a Hittites, Amorites, Perizzites, Hivites, and Jebusites, dwelt, as it were, in common with the children of Israel in their promised land. Being thus blended together, they in time wrought so upon the unstable minds of the Israelites, as to persuade them to intermarry with them, and serve their gods<sup>a</sup>, thereby captivating their minds, as they afterwards did their bodies.

For in a very few years, nine or ten, or thereabout, Jabin, whom we may reckon the second of the name, seeing he resided at the very same place with the former, was permitted by God to deal with the Israelites, as the instrument of his wrath. This prince, it is likely, rebuilt Hazor (F), which had been destroyed with such rigour by Joshua, re-established the royal seat there, was master of nine hundred chariots of iron (G), which, and the rest of his host, were under the command of Sisera, who dwelt in Hazor bet of the Gentiles (H). Jabin therefore reduced the Israelites to a state of slavery, and mightily did he oppress them for twenty years. But whether he held them in general under subjection, or the northern tribes only, is a matter of uncertainty. But whether his dominion over them was total or partial, it expired at the end of twenty years, as we have said. News was brought to Sisera; that the Israelites had been stirred up to rebellion, and that they were actually in arms; consulting together how they might shake off his master's yoke. Whereupon he prepared the nine hundred chariots of iron, and issued a proclamation, requiring the men of war to assemble together, to march out against the Israelites, who were but ten thousand strong, with Deborah and Barak at their head. They came to a battle; and Sisera was beaten, and irretrievably routed, and a general slaughter was made of his army, quite to the gates of Hazor bet of the Gentiles: and being himself in great danger of the pursuers, he quitted his chariot, and trusted to his feet (I), directing his steps to the tent of Heber the more likely to tempt the Israelites than those who were actually inmates with them. Whence, whether we are to conclude, that the idolatry of the former was more enchanting than that of the latter, or their luxury more enticing, or whether, at all, there was any real difference between them, we leave the reader to fancy. Both religious and political reasons have been assigned for this mercy towards the Canaanites; of the former is, That the Israelites might not grow sluggish for want of some to waken and stir up their courage, and to keep up martial discipline among them; and that they might always be in a more immediate state of dependance on God, or look constantly up to him for succour (47). Of the latter, That no part of the country, which was too extensive to be thoroughly inhabited by the Israelites, might lie desolate, so as to be left for a harbour to wild beasts, who might by their encrease prove a more dreadful and pernicious enemy than the Canaanites (48).

<sup>a</sup> Judg. ii. 21—23.

Ibid. iii. 1—7.

(F) We think with those, who suppose this Jabin to have descended from the other, who fell by the hands of Joshua; and that he now seized on the spot where Hazor formerly stood, and rebuilt that city; which, seeing he was so powerful a prince, is no unlikely matter, though some make a scruple of it. Whether Jabin was an appellation common to all the kings of Hazor, we cannot affirm from positive authority; though it seems to have been a common custom in these parts for kings to succeed each other under the same appellation, as Pharaoh in Egypt, Agag in Amalekites, &c. He is in the text called king of Canaan; which, whether it refers to the Canaanites, peculiarly so called, or to the whole body of the Canaanites in general, we take not on us to say.

(G) The number of these chariots, which are all along taken for the scythed sort, is much wondered at by the learned. Whether he had such a multitude of them before he warred upon Israel; or whether, by reducing them, he at once enlarged his empire, and augmented his forces, is not said; though it is probable he had not so many before. But what shall we say to the extravagant account which Josephus gives us of these armies (49); hinted in a late note? If Bochart wonders, as he does, at the nine hundred chariots the scripture gives him; observing that Mithridates had but one hundred in his army, and Darius but two hundred (50); what must he have thought of Josephus's three thousand? Indeed, not only in the number of the chariots, but in that also of the horse and foot, he is too large to be easily credited. Nor is it, perhaps, safe to trust too far to that historian, who, though on this side so vastly exceeding what the scripture seems to intend, he agrees therewith in the number of the Israelites, who rose up to recover their rights, reckoning them at only ten thousand (51). What authority he had for this prodigious disparity, we know not: but his view may have been to do honour in this example, as in others, to his countrymen and fore-fathers, with the Romans, who gloried chiefly in their military exploits, and in what their fathers had done before them that way.

(H) If Hazor was not rebuilt, then Hazor bet of the Gentiles bids fair to have been the royal seat. It is called of the Gentiles, as is supposed, from a confluence of all sorts, who came now to put themselves under the protection of Jabin's growing empire. Both cities were situate on the lake Smachon, or Samechon, through which the Jordan takes its course, and near the place where Selucia was since built*.

(I) The particulars of the battle are not recorded in the sacred text; but thence it very plainly

(47) See PATRICK upon Judg. iii. 2. (48) See Exod. xiii. 29. and Deut. vi. 22. (49) Antiq. lib. 5. c. 6. (50) Hieronic. part I. lib. 2. cap. 9. (51) JOSEPHUS ubi supr.

EUSEB. loc. Habr.

* Vide

Kenite, who was at amity with Jabin. He found Jael, Heber's wife, in the tent a door, who perceiving the hurry and disorder he was in, entreated him to step in, and fear nothing; which he did, and she covered him with a rug, or some such thing, so as not to be seen, or to prevent his taking any harm while he reposed himself after the fatigue of the battle and flight. He had not lain long ere he complained of being very thirsty, and begged a draught of water; instead whereof his kind hostess presented him with a bowl of new milk, of which when he had drank his fill, she covered him up again. Then he called out, and bad her, if any one came to enquire if she had any man within, to answer no, and to stand at the tent-door for that purpose. And now being greatly fatigued, he fell into a deep sleep, and Jael taking one of the tent-nails and a hammer, trod softly up b to him, and drove the nail into his temples, and so killed him. By this time Barak had reached the tent in quest of Sisera; and Jael with a triumphant air went out to him, and invited him to the sight of the man he sought, whom he here saw dead with the nail smitten into his temples. So fell Sisera; and with him Jabin's glory and oppression, which gave the Israelites a forty years peaceful respite * (K).

Now what the Canaanites did, or what was done against them after this, for a long series of years, we cannot say. Thus much appears, they had been able to maintain their ground in several parts, and particularly in Jerusalem, till the time that David was king of Israel. When the Jebusites, who held that city, or at least the fortress of Zion, saw David actually advancing up to them to besiege them, c they posted their lame and their blind (L) to defend them, saying they were enough to keep off so mean an invader, relying wholly on the strength of their walls and situation. They were however disappointed, and the place was carried plainly appears, that there was something miraculous and extraordinary in this defeat of Jabin's host, thunders, lightnings, and frightful sounds rumbling in their ears, so that the heavens had the principal share in this overthrow. And Josephus, that we may not wonder at the ruin of so mighty a power by so contemptible a handful of the Israelites, tells us very circumstantially, that the armies were no sooner engaged, than there arose a furious wind, which drove such a tempest of hail and rain into the faces of the Canaanites, as stifled and blinded them, and benumbed their fingers to that degree that they were in all respects disabled from action; so that they were easily broken and dispersed, and trampled to death by the horse, and torn to pieces by their own chariots; which, together with the execution made on them by the Israelites, quite dissipated this mighty multitude, and reduced them to nothing (52).

* Judg. iv.

(K) Josephus gives us the particulars of his downfall. Jabin met Barak as he was in full march against Hazor, and was encountered by him and slain; and Hazor, the seat of his empire, was laid level with the ground: and thus fell the empire of the Jabins in Hazor a second time (53), according to this historian.

(L) Who or what these lame and blind were, is made a doubt; it is disputed whether we must, with Josephus (54), understand them to have been persons actually labouring under the infirmities of lameness and blindness; or whether something else is here to be understood, as others think. Bochart (55) deems this so plain a case, that he wonders how some great men had puzzled their brains with finding out a solution of it; and holds it past dispute, that this was a flourish of thrausonism in the Jebusites, who planted their lame and their blind, that is, their most infirm and unfit people to defend them; while our own Dr. Gregory (56), who has a whole dissertation about it, understands them to have been the gods of this people, who, as the Psalmist expresses it, had eyes, and saw not, and feet, and walked not (57); and this opinion is supported by these very plausible arguments: 1. How could David distinguish the halt, or the lame, or the blind from able men, when posted upon lofty walls, since those infirmities are not discernable but near at hand? 2. How can it be supposed there was such a number of these unfortunate persons in so small a city as might serve such a purpose? 3. And why should David say, as he does, that his soul hated them; when it would have been but natural in him to have commiserated their unhappy condition? From these arguments it is concluded, that it was not the lame and the blind of the city, whom the Jebusites relied on, but their idols, which, in the Psalms, are described in the sarcastical words we have inserted above, and which they planted upon their walls, by their power or influence to keep off the enemy; which they hoped would have been so efficacious a means of preserving them, that they trusted David would be unable to prevail against their super-natural operations. And here a parallel case is drawn in reference to the Palladium, the city of Troy being supposed to be impregnable while that remained with them: and some such, or the same notion may have obtained among the Jebusites now, touching their god or gods (58). To this we shall add one chimerical notion of a Jewish Rabbi upon this event. He pretends, that when Abraham bought the cave of Machpelah of the children of Heb, he formally covenanted with them, that when his posterity should come to be possessors of the land (which they had a fore-sight of) they should not touch the city of Jebus; and that now they engraved this covenant upon brazen statues, a by storm (M); but as to the circumstances of this siege, and how it fared with the conquered, we are wholly in the dark <sup>a</sup>.

(52) JOSEPHUS ubi supr. (53) Idem ibid. (54) Ibid. lib. 7. c. 2. (55) Phalag. l. 4. c. 36. (56) In PATRICK'S Commentary upon this passage. (57) Psal. cxxv. (58) Vide CLERIC, in 2 Sam. v. 6.

THIS was doubtless a very severe blow upon the Canaanites in general; and must have perplexed them much: and they must again have been deeply humbled when they were invaded in Gezer by Pharaoh; upon what provocation given by them, or whether any, is utterly unknown (N); and their city burnt, and themselves put to the sword. This city was afterwards rebuilt or repaired by Solomon, he receiving it in right of his wife, Pharaoh's daughter <sup>b</sup>.

THUS oppressed by the Israelites on the one hand, and by the mighty power of Egypt on the other; and the glory of Solomon arising towards its meridian, the remnant of the Amorites, Hittites, Perizzites, Hivites, and Jebusites were reduced to the grievous state of bondage and slavery; whence it is gathered, that they were now brought to so low an ebb as to be unable to answer the demands of a tribute; wherefore being admitted into a covenant, as is very rationally supposed, with king Solomon, he would not cut them off, but employed them in the heavy labour of carrying on his vast and sumptuous works. And this servility was entailed on their posterity <sup>c</sup>; for, although it is apparently certain, that they upon their first reduction became profelytes to the Jewish religion, yet, it is thought, they were distinguished from the Jews, and reckoned of a more ignoble blood, and as born to drudgery. This is supposed to have been their fate, and thus are they thought to have been blended with the Jews; though it is far from being positively known (O). And now it remains only for us to observe, that among the tribes of the Canaanites, enumerated above, to have been laden with the yoke of Solomon, the Canaanites, peculiarly so called, as we have hitherto spoken, are

<sup>a</sup> 2 Sam. v. 6—9.
and Nehem. xi. 3.

<sup>b</sup> 1 Kings ix. 16.

<sup>c</sup> See ver. 20, 21. See also Ezra xi. 55, 58.

Statues, and planted them upon their walls, pretending that David could not attempt them, but by the breach of the covenant his forefather Abraham had made with them (59).

(M) We have already observed that, according to Josephus (60), the Jebusites were in possession both of the city of Jerusalem and the fortress of Zion; to which he adds, that the lower town was easily carried by an assault, with David at the head of it; but that the castle or fortress held out till Joab succeeded in the important service of assaulting that.

(N) A late commentator is of opinion, that Pharaoh attacked the Canaanites at this place, out of complaisance to Solomon, who had married his daughter; for, apprehending the Jews to be very little acquainted with the arts of conducting a siege, he supposes they were not able to master this city of Gezer (61); which, how it came to be so much stronger than Jerusalem, and the fortress of Zion, and many other places by them subdued, we cannot see. This Pharaoh is by a learned chronologer, who takes this to have been the first expedition the Egyptians made out of their own country, called Ramesses Miamun (62).

(O) We will give you the most obvious texts of scripture which relate to this matter. It is first said, And all the people that were left of the Amorites, Hittites, Perizzites, Hivites, and Jebusites, which were not of the children of Israel, their children that were left after them in the land, whom the children of Israel also were not able to destroy, upon those did Solomon levy a tribute of bond-service unto this day (63). And at the return from captivity, there is mention made of the children of Solomon's servants — And all the Netbinims, and the children of Solomon's servants were three hundred ninety-two (64): And elsewhere are the

Netbinims and the children of Solomon's servants mentioned together (65); and in these last texts our translators refer us back to the first, as if they were the children of the Canaanites on whom Solomon imposed a tribute of bond-service. But there is a difficulty to account for the smallness of the number; so that commentators are willing to deduce these mentioned upon the return from Babylon, from some other origin. Perhaps we shall find some traces of them in Josephus; who, with some variation from scripture, having acquainted us, That Solomon reduced a stubborn remnant of the Canaanites, inhabiting between mount Libanus and Hamath, made them his tributaries, they paying their tribute in servile works and labour; to which purpose they were to furnish Solomon with a certain number of slaves, agreed on, who were to till the ground, and go through other sorts of drudgery; and over these, says he, were six hundred officers appointed to set them their tasks, and keep them to their work (66). Afterwards, enumerating those who returned from Babylon, he reckons up six hundred and fifty who passed for Israelites, but could not make out their extraction: others of uncertain genealogy there were five hundred twenty-five; and of servants that attended upon the whole multitude, seven thousand three hundred thirty-seven (67). These three numbers making eight thousand five hundred and twelve, may, it is likely, have been Canaanites; but still the number is too small, except we suppose that the far greatest part of the better sort were blended with the Jews so intricately, that there was no distinguishing between the pretensions of each; or, which is still more probable, that much greater multitudes of them remained behind in the place of their captivity.

(59) ELIEZER Pirke Abboth; cap. 36. (60) Ubi supr. (61) Vide CLERIC. in 1 Reg. ix. 16. (62) MARSH. Can. Chron. ad Sac. 13, 14. (63) 1 Kings ix. 20, 21. (64) Exr. ii. 55, 58. (65) Nehem. xi. 3. (66) JOSEPH. Antiq. lib. 8. c. 2. (67) Idem ibid. lib. 11. cap. 4.

omitted: these therefore, we may conclude, bore none of the burthen, but remained whole and independent in their possessions on the sea-coast, and sprung afterwards to a great height of fame; continually improving themselves in navigation, commerce, and the useful arts; and becoming comprehended under the famous appellation of Phœnicians.

S E C T. VII.

The History of the Philistines.

Their Origin. WE have already observed that this people descended from the Casubim partly, and partly from the Caphthorim<sup>a</sup>, both from the loins of Mizraim, the son of Ham, the son of Noah. This is their origin; whence it appears, that Egypt was their first seat: nor have we ought to add concerning the origin of this people, except we acquaint you more particularly than we have already<sup>b</sup> with the improbable notions, as we think them, of some of the learned concerning the Casubim and Caphthorim (A). But we have, as much as possible, forbore to perplex our reader with what can afford no solid fruit. All that we can say further, with any certainty, is what Moses tells us elsewhere<sup>c</sup>, viz. That they drove out the Avim, or Avites which dwelt in Hazerim, even unto Azzab, or Gaza, and settled there. When this expulsion happened is not to be guessed at; but, upon the whole, it is plain that the Casubim, and Caphthorim, from whom the Philistines are descended, came originally from Egypt; and having settled themselves in this country, gave their name to it. We shall therefore proceed to give the best account we can of this rich and pleasant spot of ground.

Their Country. THE land or country of the Philistines, known to the ancient Greeks and Romans under the name of Palestine, grew in time to such a height of note as to communicate its name to the whole region, of which it was only a part; so that all the land of Promise became comprehended under this name, which is most commonly used, even in our days, in the same extent, it having prevailed always among the Christians of the Greek and Roman churches, from whom we have received it. d This celebrated name is very apparently derived from Philistine, which the Greeks altered into Palestine; though some pretend to derive it from the Greek it self (B), but therein they are certainly mistaken. Dismissing this obscurity, we shall proceed to mark out the boundaries of this country; which from what we have said above, may be aptly stiled the proper Palestine. It was a slip of land stretching along the sea-side; bounded on the east by the tribes of Judab and Simeon; on the south by Amalekitis, and partly, but very little, perhaps, by Edom; on the west by the Mediterranean or midland-sea; and towards the north it interfered with the tribe of Dan. It was a country much longer than broad, but neither way considerable for its dimensions, being scarce forty English miles in length; but what e it wanted in extent it made up in fertility of soil. Towards the sea it is a plain country, but three or four miles up it begins to swell into hills and mountains; whence it is most beautifully diversified with hill and dale, mountain and valley, productive of the most luxuriant gifts of nature, and rich in prospects, which way soever the eye be turned. Rivers in this country there are none to speak of; but that defect is supplied by exuberant springs, and brooks, and rills, down the sides of the mountains. The temper of the climate, nature of the seasons, and natural history of this delicious spot, we dwell not on here, referring our reader to the geography of the land of Promise, of which it was a part, and a very noble one.

BUT we cannot so pass over the cities of this country, which we will here enumerate and describe as well as we can, beginning from the southermost. Gaza the

<sup>a</sup> See before, p. 165, 166.

<sup>b</sup> See before, ubi supr.

<sup>c</sup> Deut. ii. 23.

(A) As that the Casubim were the ancient Colchi described by Herodotus, and the Caphthorim the Cappadocians in Asia minor; which though we have rejected already (68), we may have occasion to resume hereafter.

(B) Deriving it from Pelusium, the famous Egyptian city of that name; from whence this people are supposed to have come; which name they deduce from a Greek word signifying dirt; but of this more hereafter.

(68) See before, p. 165.

a most renowned of them all, stood upon the skirts of the desert which led to Egypt, and was built within two or three miles of the sea, as, from the most authentic accounts, is gathered. What it was in its first days cannot be known; but in time it became considerable for strength, beauty and extent. In the Hebrew it is called Azab, or rather Hazab, and by the Syrians Aza, which some pretend was since altered into Gaza, signifying a treasury in the Persic; because Cambyses, in his war against Egypt, had made a magazine of it<sup>d</sup>. But this is justly rejected as a wild conclusion, nothing being more uncertain than inferences drawn from the similitude of names. And it is much more probable that the Septuagint were the first who called it by that name, they frequently using the Gimel where the Hebrew has the Aleph.

b In latter times it was also called Ione and Minoa<sup>e</sup>; and the sea which washed along the shore from Gaza to Egypt was called, say they, the Ionian sea, Gaza being called after Io<sup>f</sup>. This city is placed at one of the four corners of the land of Promise by Moses<sup>g</sup>, and was in the lot of the tribe of Judab, according to the division Joshua made of the whole land<sup>h</sup>. But, though it was attempted, and carried, yet the Philistines possessed it again, and kept it<sup>i</sup>. Whether or not it had originally the same situation which it appears now to have had, cannot be known; but it is probable that it from the beginning stood upon, or near the same spot, which was an eminence about three miles from the sea, as we have said, and was of very difficult access for the depth of the sands which surrounded it<sup>k</sup>. But by another author we understand it to have been scarce a mile distant from the shore<sup>l</sup>, a difference we shall not take on us to reconcile. If a well-esteemed traveller of our own nation be not mistaken in the place, it is now upon a hill, surrounded by delicious vales, and those again enclosed with a chain of hills<sup>m</sup>; but he mentions not a word of deep sands about it, which if so difficult, as is said above, he could not have passed over. But though he differs from the ancient historian<sup>n</sup>, who gives us the situation of this city in respect of the soil about it; yet he seems to agree with the geographer<sup>o</sup> from whom we have its last-mentioned distance from the sea, computing it at seven furlongs, which fall short of a mile<sup>p</sup>: but his expression on this point is obscure, and we cannot build on it. For the more convenient communication with the sea, it had a sea-port, Majuma<sup>q</sup>, a place of no great account, as seems, till Constantine took notice of it, and called it Constantia, in honour of his son Constantius. The ancient name of this sea-port is not ascertained; but Julian, out of hatred to the memory of Constantine, altered its name Constantia, into the Port of Gaza, or the maritime part of the said city<sup>r</sup>: and from hence we find, perhaps, Gaza in the plural number, Gazæ<sup>s</sup>. Majuma is also called the maritime Gaza: There is no sign that it ever was a commodious place for the entertainment of shipping; but a shift was made with it, where no place more convenient was to be had; and doubtless the shipping which belonged to, or frequented it, were of a nature proper for so indifferent a station; though perhaps, on the other hand, the port may have been altered from what it originally was by the incroachment of the sea, though we read nothing of this; parallel cases, indeed, happen almost every day. Antbedon seems also to have been another sea-port belonging to Gaza, situate to the southward of Majuma; but of what antiquity, or how far, or whether at all, it depended on Gaza, cannot be said: it was not quite three miles distant from it. We shall have occasion to mention it as a place of some note hereafter. We will not particularize the history of Gaza, and shall only say that it several times groaned under the miseries of war; that it was sometimes in a flourishing state, with mighty walls and costly edifices (C); sometimes in a low, depressed condition.

After

<sup>d</sup> POMPON. Mel. lib. 1. c. 11.    <sup>e</sup> STEPHAN. ubi supr.    <sup>f</sup> Idem ad vocem Ioniæ.    <sup>g</sup> See before, p. 323.    <sup>h</sup> Josh. xv. 45.    <sup>i</sup> Judg. i. 18. iii. 3.    <sup>k</sup> ARRIAN. l. 2. p. 150.    <sup>l</sup> STRABO l. 16. p. 759.    <sup>m</sup> SANDYS Trav. book 3. p. 116.    <sup>n</sup> ARRIAN. ubi supr.    <sup>o</sup> STRABO ubi supr.    <sup>p</sup> SANDYS ubi supr.    <sup>q</sup> SOZOMEN Histor. l. 5. c. 3.    <sup>r</sup> MARC. DIAC. in vit. S. PAPHYR. cap. 8.    <sup>s</sup> SOZOMEN ubi supr.    <sup>t</sup> MARC. DIAC. ubi supr.    <sup>u</sup> HIERON. in Dan. xi.

(C) It is now a miserable place; <sup>a</sup> Yet there are some reliques left, and some impressions that testify a better condition. For divers simple roofs are supported with goodly pillars of <sup>b</sup> Parian marble, some plain, some curiously carved. A number broken in pieces do serve for thresholds, jambs of doors, and sides of windows, almost unto every beggarly cottage. On <sup>c</sup> the north-east corner, and summit of the hill, are the ruins of huge arches sunk low in the <sup>d</sup> earth, and other foundations of a stately building. From whence the last Sanziack conveyed <sup>e</sup> marble pillars of an incredible bigness, enforced to saw them asunder ere they could be removed; <sup>f</sup> which

After several vicissitudes it lay neglected so far, that in the New Testament it is called a desert<sup>a</sup>; such a desert as it is now, we may suppose, weak in inhabitants, and defenceless<sup>b</sup>; for so fertile a spot can never be called by that miserable appellation<sup>c</sup>, according to the common acceptation of the word with us. In this city they chiefly worshipped a deity called Marnas<sup>d</sup>. Its name is remembered with Tyre and Sidon<sup>e</sup>, when its sister cities are either forgot, or omitted, as not worthy of a place among the considerable towns of this sea-coast.

THE second place we shall give to Ascalon, Askelon, Askelon or Askalon, a great and noble sea-port of this country, by ancient accounts sixteen, by modern twelve, miles to the north of Gaza; and known to us still under the same name it bears in scripture, and in the writings of the ancient Greeks and Romans, by whom it was had in b a religious veneration. Nor do we find any considerable variation from this name, except that the Greeks sometimes lengthened it into Ascalonion. This city, as well as Gaza, is reckoned into the lot or tribe of Judah, and was taken by them, but not held. The situations of Gaza and this city cannot be disputed, since they may be said to stand at this day, and have been often visited; therefore we shall multiply no words upon so needless a dispute. By Josephus<sup>f</sup> we understand this city to have stood upon a spacious plain, and, in his days, extremely well fortified. Though we have placed this city on the brink of the sea, and made it a sea-port of itself, yet there is a Majuma<sup>g</sup> given to this, as well as to Gaza, which, how it became necessary, cannot be precisely said; it may, perhaps, have been a distinct part of c the city next to the sea-side; or, perhaps, Ascalon was not quite so close thereto, but it might require the convenience of a more immediate port-town to intervene; or the harbour of Ascalon may have been rendered unfit for the reception of shipping, as we have before observed in speaking of Gaza; whence a necessity arose of seeking some other place near, and of erecting a town there. But, to have done with these conjectures, let us proceed to things we are more sure of. Ascalon was famous among the ancients on many accounts. It was the birth-place of Semiramis the Assyrian empress, which puts us in mind of the lake that is said to have stood near this city, wherein the goddess Derceto, her mother, plunging herself for shame of her rash amour, was transformed into a fish<sup>h</sup>. This city is noted for d the place which originally produced the kind of onion called the shalot<sup>i</sup>, which is supposed thence to have borrowed its name (D). It is famed also for its wines<sup>j</sup>, and very remarkable for its great flights of pigeons<sup>k</sup>, which, whence they increased to such extraordinary numbers, will be told hereafter: nor must we forget the cypresses<sup>l</sup>, which were here admired; or the extraordinary wells attributed to Abraham and Isaac<sup>m</sup>. The changes this city underwent will be shewn in the course of this work. It is now dwindled to almost nothing.

WE now strike up into the country to Asdod, or Azotus, which lay about twelve miles north-easterly of Ascalon. This was a city of extraordinary fame among the ancients. It had an inland situation, and is said to have been built by one who fled e from the Red-sea, who called it after his wife, whose name was Aza or Capra<sup>n</sup>. But this seems, at least, to be a mistake; we hear of none that fled from the Red-sea but the Edomites; and that they, under some chief, may have repaired and fortified this place is probable enough; but that they imposed this name [Azotus] on it, we cannot allow, it being very evidently a corruption of the Hebrew name Asdod, which was in use long before the Edomites were driven out of their country. But to continue what we find concerning this city, it stood in a champaign country, which produced great plenty of corn<sup>o</sup>. It held out against the longest siege re-

<sup>a</sup> Acts viii. 26.    <sup>b</sup> See SANDYS ubi sup.    <sup>c</sup> Vide eund. & ANTON. GALL. apud RELAND. Palæst. Illust. p. 788.    <sup>d</sup> STEPHEN. ubi sup. HIERON. Epist. 11. ad LAT.    <sup>e</sup> LUCAN. lib. 3.    <sup>f</sup> De Bell. Judaic. l. 3. c. 1.    <sup>g</sup> JOAN. HIEROSOLY. in Act. Concil. Constantinop. Tom. V.    <sup>h</sup> DIODOR. SIC. l. 1. par. 1. p. 65.    <sup>i</sup> STEPHAN. ad vocem Ἀσκάλην.    <sup>j</sup> ALEX. TRALL. l. 8. c. 3. & ALBERT. AQUES Histor. Hieros. l. 9. c. 15 & 51.    <sup>k</sup> PHILO apud EUSEB. de Præpar. Evang. l. 8.    <sup>l</sup> DIOSCORID. de re Med. l. 1. c. 124.    <sup>m</sup> PLIN. lib. 12.    <sup>n</sup> ORIGEN. contr. CELS. 3.    <sup>o</sup> EUSEB. ad vocem φῆμαρ.    <sup>p</sup> STEPHAN. ad vocem Ἀζότῳ.    <sup>q</sup> JOSEPH. Antiq. lib. 12.

<sup>a</sup> which he employed in adorning a certain mosque 'below in the valley.' The Jews are silly enough to think this the building Sampson pulled down upon the Philistines (2). We must note by the by, that our traveller seems to confound Majuma and Gaza with each other.

(D) This seems at first sight to be a very oblique derivation; but the Latin of this plant is Ascalonia, whence the French have their Echalote, which we have curtailed into Shalot.

(2) SANDY'S Travels, l. 3. p. 116.

a corded in history, if it be true that Psammetichus laboured twenty-nine years in the reduction of it. Here stood the temple of Dagon, and here was he peculiarly worshipped.

ALMOST east from hence lay the city of Gath, of principal fame, as being the royal seat in the middle times of this people; but it dwindled away very early, so that we have few or no materials towards a description of it. It is famed for the remnant of the giants or Anakims who there fixed their abode.

b NEARLY north-west of this city, about nine miles distant, was Ekron, corruptedly Accaron, concerning which we can only say that it was the northermost of the five cities; that it was consequently a frontier town; that the famous idol Baal-zebub was there worshipped; that it faded away to a great degree of obscurity, and that although the name, and even considerable vestiges of what it had once been, subsisted for many ages, it happens that no mention is made of it in prophane authors.

THESE were by way of eminence called the five cities of the Philistines, and the whole country was sometimes from them called Pentapolis; and here their five lords resided. Other cities they had, as Gerar, venerable for its being the ancient seat of their first kings; but its exact situation being by no means determined, we for that reason pass it over with the bare mention of its name, and for the same reason we shall be quite silent as to what concerns their other places of less note.

c THEIR most ancient form of government was administered by kings, who were all honoured with the appellation of Abimelech; such were the kings of this people, father and son, who had to do with Abraham and Isaac: but, as we have observed concerning the Canaanites, and, as will be plainly seen in the following history, these first kings were under great limitations. The scepter departed from this race very soon; for in the days of Moses their monarchy was revolved into an aristocracy of five lords, who seem to have been in part independent of each other, though they were also apparently obliged to act in concert for the common cause. After this they had a king over them, which, how they submitted to, or whether it was their choice or not, we cannot say. This second race of kings are called, so far as we know, by the appellation of Achish, though they were also called Abimelech. Three of these, we think, we have some account of, but their power seems to have been circumscribed within very narrow bounds; they were subject to the controul of their imperious nobles, and particularly of the lords, the five, we think, who seem to have subsisted under these kings; so that these princes, it is likely, were set up to act merely as umpires, and to appear at the head of affairs; cyphers of state, without any extent of power. This kind of mixed government can be to none so aptly applied as to that of Poland in our days. We find little or no mention of this second race of kings. They held their residence at Gath, during their best times, from whence the royal seat was removed to Ascalon, and from thence to Gaza. In a word, we may say that the Philistines had very violent notions of liberty. They did not circumcise, and in their earliest times, at least, held adultery in the greatest abomination.

d AFTER what we have said, we need not remark that they were a very warlike people; to which we may add, that they were no less ingenious and industrious. Their character, however, must be considered at different times; for we may say, they were not always the same people. In the days of Abraham and Isaac they were, most assuredly, a righteous and hospitable nation; and so, in great measure, they may have been under all their first race of kings: upon whose decay, a revolution in government, religion, and morals, may have ensued all together. From henceforward they became like other idolatrous nations, the same enormities crept in, and prevailed among them. They are constantly mentioned in scripture as strangers, and though possessed of a most valuable part of the land of Promise, yet God would never suffer them to be driven out, they being Egyptians by descent, and not original natives, whose land only was promised to Abraham and his seed. Their arrogance and ambition were great, and their inveterate enmity (E) against the Israelites was such, that one would be almost tempted to think

(E) And from a passage in Chronicles (3) it is guessed to have been of very ancient date; where it is said, that the men of Gath slew the children of Ephraim, who would have taken their cattle from them. This incident is no where else to be found; and there are various thoughts concerning the

(3) 1 Chron. vii. 21.

they were chiefly designed to be a thorn in the side of that chosen people; for although the hand of God was self-evidently against them several times, and particularly whilst they detained the ark, yet they hardened their hearts, and closed their eyes against conviction, flattering themselves that they might one day compass their ends against the Israelites. They seem to have entertained a very fond veneration for their deities, in which they persisted, though they, with their own eyes, saw the shame and ignominy which beset them, when, in the presence of the captive ark; and were even stupid enough to imagine, notwithstanding, that their gods might prevail against him, who had so greatly shamed them. They were much addicted to trade, which they, considering their situation, may have exercised from the beginning; but by the accession of the fugitive Edomites in David's time*, they rose to so great a reputation as merchants, that the Greeks, it seems, reckoned them the most considerable people in that way, and from them, called all the country bordering on them, Palestine†. Their language was not so different from that spoken by the Hebrews, as to cause any apparent difficulty for them to converse together, as may be inferred from their intercourse with Abraham and Isaac; so that in all this region the several nations spoke one and the same tongue, perhaps indeed, with some variation of dialect. They had doubtless the arts and sciences in common with their most learned and ingenious contemporaries; and, perhaps, some of them in greater perfection than any where else. They had giants<sup>c</sup> among them, who, whether they were originally of the breed of the Anakims, who retired hither when they were expelled Hebron<sup>m</sup>, or whether they sprang from accidental births, is not a very clear matter. We must not forget that the bow and arrow is attributed to their invention (F), and that they were particularly skilful in the use of those weapons.

Their Religion.

THEIR religion was different at different times: under their first race of kings they were of one religion with the Hebrews: Abimelech, in the sin he had like to have committed with Sarab, through Abraham's timidity, was favoured with a divine admonition from God; and by his speech and behaviour at that time, d it seems as if he had been used to converse with God. In after-times they erred into endless superstitions, and a multifarious idolatry, each of the principal or five cities, seeming to have had a deity of its own. Marna, Marnas, or Marnashe, was worshipped at Gaza, and is said to have migrated into Crete (G), and to have become the Cretan Jupiter. Dagon was worshipped at Azotus; he seems to have been the most grand, the most ancient, and most favourite god they had: to which may be added, that he, perhaps, subsisted the longest of any<sup>o</sup> that did not straggle out of the country, as we are not sure he did. To him they attributed the in-the sense we must take this passage in. As to the time it was transacted, most allow it to have been while the children of Israel were sojourners in Egypt. It plainly appears by the next verse, that Ephraim himself was living at the time. The Targum supposes his children mis-computed the time they were to serve in Egypt, and began too early an attempt upon their promised land. Dr. Lightfoot (4) makes the men of Gath to have been the aggressors, and supposes the Ephraimites only stood up to defend themselves and cattle. But taking the words in the first sense, which seems most obvious, they may serve to account for the reason why Moses would not conduct the Israelites by the way of the Philistines. If this be the case, it must have been some horrid injury, or very uncommonly resented.

* See before, p. 314, 315. † See CUMBERLAND Origin. Gent. Antiquiss. p. 37. <sup>m</sup> See before, p. 333, 334. <sup>c</sup> HIERONYM. in Esai. <sup>o</sup> See 1 Macch. x.

(F) It is supposed (5) that before they removed from Pelusium, where they are thought to have first inhabited, as we shall shew hereafter, they had occasion to annoy the enemies, who then infested them at a distance: whereupon the bow and arrow came into their head, wherewith they armed their stoutest men, whom they called Cherethites (6), a name which includes this whole nation, as will be observed hereafter.

(G) The migration of this god may be naturally enough accounted for, if true it be that the Philistines planted the island of Crete; and it seems plain also, that the inhabitants there were a colony from Gaza in particular, the peculiar place of his worship. The Philistines are in several places of scripture (7) called Cherethites: particularly, they are so called by the Egyptian (8), whom David laid hands on, when he was in pursuit of the Amalekites, who had burnt Ziklag; whence we may infer this to have been their Egyptian name, or the name they were known by in Egypt. The LXX do every where translate the word Cherethim, or Cherethites, by that of Cretans; as they do that of Philistines by Allophyloi, strangers. Hence have some learned men built their notion of deriving the Cretans from the Philistines; and from hence they proceed farther, and derive the Curetes also from them, which we may consider hereafter.

(4) Annotat. in Gen. sub fin. (5) See BEDFORD'S Script. Chronol. p. 245. (6) BOCHART. Can. l. 1. c. 15. (7) 1 Sam. xxx. 14, 16. Euk. xxv. 16. Zephan. ii. 5. (8) 1 Sam. ubi supr.

a vention of bread-corn, or of agriculture, as his name imports *. We cannot enter into the common notion of his being represented as a monster, half man, half fish; or consequently into another, almost as common, that he is the same with the Syrian goddess Derceto, who, we are told, was represented under some such mixed form. Our opinion is, that this idol was in shape wholly like a man; for we read of his head, and his hands, and his feet † (H). He stood in a temple at Azotus, and had priests of his own, who paid a very constant attendance on him, as one would think ‡. Next to Dagon was Baal-zebub, the god of Ekron. In the text of the New Testament he is Belzebub and the prince of Devils. His name is rendered lord of flies, which it is very likely was an opprobrious appellative given him by the b stricter part of the Jews. Others, indeed, think him so styled by his worshippers, as Hercules, Apomyos, and others were, from his driving those insects away; and urge that Abaziab, in his sickness, would scarcely have applied to him, if his name had carried any reproach with it. But it must be remembered, that it is the sacred Historian that makes use of that contemptuous term in derision, whereas the idolatrous monarch, who was one of his votaries, might call him by his common name, supposed to have been Baal-zebooth, the lord of armies, or Baal-shamim, lord of heaven; or some other bordering to Baal-zebub. How, or under what form he was represented is uncertain: Some place him on a throne, and attire him like a king; others paint him as a fly †: a very wide difference. To have c done with this obscurity, it appears that he became an oracle in highest repute for omniscience and veracity; that he had priests of his own; and that he, in the middle times at least, was much sought after by those who were anxious about futurity, or solicitous concerning other hidden matters. Derceto we take, certainly, to have been the goddess of Ascalon ‡; but, as we are herein only supported by prophane authority, without the least countenance from scripture, we shall not insist on it. Gath is seemingly the only city of all the five unprovided with a deity; wherefore, as the scripture declares that Astarte †, or Astarte, was worshipped by this people, we are ready to place her at Gath, and the rather, as this of all their cities may have had most communication with Sidon; but concerning her we d must be silent here, seeing we shall have a more proper opportunity to touch on her hereafter. To speak in general concerning their religious rites and ceremonies, which is all we can do; it appears as if they erected very large and spacious temples, or else very wide halls for the celebration of their solemn seasons and festivals ‡, for such they surely had; that their religious offices were attended with much pomp; and a great concourse from all parts; and that they presented their gods with the chief of their spoil, and carried them about to war with them. We do not find in scripture that they sacrificed their children, and yet the Curates (I) are derived from them.

* See before in the notes, p. 135.

† See FULLER'S Pisgah-fight, book 2. c. 10. § 32.

‡ See

1 Sam. v. 3, 4.

§ 2 Kings i. 2.

¶ PROCOPIUS GAZEUS.

‡ Vide DIOD. SIC. l. 2. p. 65.

¶ 1 Sam. xxxi. 10.

¶ Judg. xvi. 27.

(H) That he had feet, we understand from a Greek reading of the LXX in Fuller (9), where mention is made of Dagon's mutilation, which runs thus, ἀποτέτρα τα ἰχθυ τοῦ ποδῶν αὐτοῦ ἀπὸ τῶν ποδῶν. Here we are told that the soles of his feet were off; that is, his feet. In the edition before us, which is after the Vatican copy, we read τα ἰχθυ τῶν χειρῶν, or the soles of his hands, which seems absurd. We have never observed that the Greek word ἰχθυ is put for the palm of the hand. And we the rather reject this reading, because a very senseless tautology follows it; for it is said, that the wrists of his hands were gone also. Whence it must appear that hands, in the first place, are corruptly placed for feet; and that Dagon had hands, and head, and face, and feet. Sure no one, allowing this, will give him a fish's tail: that would make him Horace's monster indeed. And here we cannot but note the fondness of the generality of the learned, rather to derive his name from דָּג Dag, a fish, than from דָּגָן Dagan, bread-corn (10): it seems no difficult matter to choose which we are to stick by. From this last etymology, it may be rationally enough supposed that they borrowed their idolatry from Egypt (11); and that Dagon is a copy of their Isis, to whom much the same invention is attributed. Not that they originally brought it away with them from Egypt; for their history plainly assures us, they brought a pure system of religion from thence; and we do not remember that Moses mentions the Egyptians of his time as idolaters once throughout all his writings.

(I) The Curates did sacrifice their children to Saturn (12); and from the similitude this name bears to Corethites, or Philistines, it has been advanced that they are the same (13); but as we have no warrant for saying the Philistines practised so barbarous and unnatural a custom, we may venture to pronounce that they learned it not from them, but borrowed it elsewhere.

(9) Pisgah-fight, book ii. c. 10. § 32: in the margin.

(10) See before, p. 135.

(11) See

SHUCKFORD'S Connexion of the fact, and proph. Hist. vol. 1. p. 344.

(12) ISTER and PORPHYR.

l. 2. § 56.

(13) BOCHART. CASTLE, &c.

Their History. IT is now time for us to think of the history of this extraordinary nation. They came directly out of Egypt (K); but upon what motive is not positively known, no more than the time of their removal: and, finding that the Avims were a people seated in a pleasant and fruitful land, and that they were strong enough to expel them, they made their attempt, and succeeded. We are not much inclined to think them a very numerous multitude when they first settled in this their conquest; for their king, even in the days of Isaac, grew jealous of that patriarch's power, which is no great sign that his own was as yet very great; though possibly they may have been settled there many years before, and must consequently have been very much increased to what they were at first. But supposing this kingdom or state to have been but weak in its beginnings, as most others have been, we proceed, continuing with the next notice we have of their affairs.

Abimelech I. ABIMELECH (L) their king in Abraham's days was an holy and just person, and appears to have had some intercourse with God †. He resided at Gerar, of which place he is called king, and had like to have been drawn into a very fatal snare by the too great caution of Abraham; who coming into his kingdom to be out of the stench of the vale of Siddim, then reeking under the calamitous judgment of heaven, gave out that Sarab was not his wife, but his sister. Abimelech saw her, and was smitten with love of her; and, understanding she was a single woman, resolved to take her to his bed. He took her accordingly to him with that intent, but ere he accomplished his desires, he was warned by God to return the woman to her concealed husband, and that immediately, upon pain of death. Abimelech hereupon excused himself to the divine vision upon the innocence of his intentions; and seeming to have fresh in mind the terrible overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrab, Lord, says he, wilt thou also slay a righteous nation? that is, wilt thou take vengeance on this people for a crime I was going ignorantly to commit? But he had the comfortable answer from the vision or dream, That God knew well, and approved his integrity, and had prevented him in his intentions; and, to conclude, that Abra-

† Deut ii. 23.

† Gen. xx. 3. &amp; seq.

(K) This we take to have been really the case, and so do many of great authority; but there is also another opinion concerning this matter. For it is thought there is a great affinity in name between the Castubim and the Colchi; whence it has been taught, that they migrated first into the country of Colchis, now Mingrelia; and from thence returning towards Egypt, in their way seized on the country of the Avims, and there fixed their abode. Bochart (14) takes this to be plainly proved by what is said of the agreement between the Colchi and the Egyptians in Herodotus and others; therein forgetting that the Philistines did not circumsise, which Herodotus assures us the Colchi did. Again, nothing can be positively asserted in this matter, by what the same author relates, who speaks of them as dwelling in Colchis in his time, where they had abode so long, that it was doubtful when they settled there first; so that from him there is no solid argument to be deduced that the Colchi he speaks of were the Castubim of Moses. In like manner the Caphtorim, from whence also the Philistines are derived, are placed in Cappadocia, a country of Asia minor, adjoining to the country of Colchis. Here, say they (15), we find the city called Side, and the country Sidene, mentioned by Strabo: and because Side in Greek, and Caphtor in Hebrew, signify a pomegranate, therefore, in all likelihood, the same country was by the Hebrews called Caphtor, and by the Greeks Sidene. But, to shew that nothing can be fixed from such a manner of arguing, it may not be amiss to add, that the Caphtorim are on the other hand supposed to have dwelt in Afric, on the bay of the great Syrtis, which is supposed to have been called צִי־עֵינָן chaph ether, the circular shore, as it forms a semi-circle; and that the pomegranate was so called by the Hebrews, because it first came from that part of Afric, consonant to what Pliny writes concerning the origin of that fruit (16). Another judicious modern has made it much more probable that Caphtor is the island of Crete; we refer our readers to him for his reasons †, as well as to what we have already advanced as our opinion elsewhere (17). It would be in vain for us to touch on the history of the Philistines before they removed out of Egypt, or from the last place of their abode, before they came into the land of the Avims; but we will, however, briefly insert what some have been tempted to say upon that very obscure subject. According to bishop Cum-berland (18), they cohabited with the Phœnicians or Canaanites in Goshen; that is, that side of Egypt next to Arabia; but finding their country invaded by their kindred, the other sons of Mixraim, they left it to avoid the miseries of the impending war between the pastors and the pure Egyptians; that is, removed into the land where Abraham found them.

(L) One Philistinus, whom Josephus (19) makes a son of Mixraim, is sometimes reckoned their first king (20), from whom that Hebrew writer derives the name of Palestine. Whatever truth there may seem to be in this, it is at least as likely that either they borrowed their name from Pelusium, or Pelusium from them; for here, or hereabouts, did they first settle, as is by most allowed (21); and it will not be much out of the way if we suppose they founded that city, and dwelt there till force or inclination made them remove.

(14) Phaleg. l. 4. c. 31.(15) BOCHART. ubi supr.(16) Vide CLERIC. in Gen. x. 14.† CALMET. Dissert. in 1 Sam.(17) See before, p. 165, 166.(18) ON SANCHON, p. 372.(19) Antiq. l. 1. c. 7.(20) Vide Hist. Jul. in Regn. Palest.(21) See before, ubi supr.

<sup>a</sup> ham should, at his request, pray for him, and all would be well again. Being thus admonished, he first acquainted his servants with what had happened, and all were instantly seized with a general dread for the consequence which might ensue: Then, calling Abraham to him, he asked what he had done to him, that he should mislead him into so dangerous an error; or what offence he had ever committed against him, that he should tempt him to such a sin, as might have proved the ruin, not of himself only, but of his whole kingdom also? Indeed, says he, you have not used me well; what have you observed in the morals or behaviour of me and my people, that you should imagine we would offer any violence to you out of desire for your wife? The answer he received from Abraham to all this, was a frank confession of the truth, he acknowledging, without disguise, that he feared they had not been indued with right notions of God and his laws, and that he should certainly be deprived of his life, that they might enjoy Sarah. Moreover, that in saying she was his sister, he had not spoken wrong, she being really so; and, to save the matter in some measure to the king's good-liking, he acquainted him, that in strange places it had always been his custom to make her pass for his sister, only for fear of the worst. Abimelech was satisfied with what he heard; and in consequence thereof, and in obedience to the divine admonition, not only returned Sarah to Abraham, but in so doing, made him a very noble present in sheep and oxen, and in servants, both men and women; declaring to him withal, that he <sup>c</sup> was welcome to live in what part of his dominions he best liked. He also made a considerable present to Sarah, and accompanied it with a speech which ours, and most versions, have rendered as a reproof, but was the quite contrary, as we shall show in the Jewish history. In this manner did Abimelech acquit himself of the divine admonition, and, upon the prayers of Abraham, he and his whole house, were restored to their natural faculties, of which they had been deprived for Sarah's sake, the Lord having struck them all with barrenness and impotency (M). Ever after this, Abimelech lived in perfect harmony with Abraham, and that the same might be transmitted down to their posterity, Abimelech, with the participation of Phicol the chief captain of his host, proposed an oath to Abraham, whereby he <sup>d</sup> should bind his posterity to live in love with his, and deal by them just as he had dealt by him. This was readily embraced by Abraham; but first he desired a dispute might be set right, concerning a well which Abimelech's servants had forcibly taken from him. Abimelech declared he never had heard a word of this outrage till that moment, and that nothing of this kind should have been then to be complained of, had Abraham informed him of it. And that this matter might be terminated in such a manner as to admit of no farther dispute, Abraham, among the numerous presents he made him of sheep and oxen, severed seven ewe lambs, which he gave him to be a standing witness of his having digged, and consequently of his being the right owner of that well. Abimelech accepted of them accordingly, and the <sup>e</sup> well was from them called Beer-shebah. After a mutual ratification of their covenant, Abimelech rose up, and Phicol the chief captain of his host, and returned from whence they came * (N).

* Gen. xx, xxi.

(M) * Or, as some understand it, with such swellings in the secret parts, that the men could neither enjoy their wives, or the women, who were cith child, be delivered (22).<sup>b</sup> If so, they must have been quickly sensible of such an alteration; but it is by others supposed to have been something imperceptible, both by the men and women, and a matter not to be discovered but by length of time; and thence it is concluded, that Abraham and Sarah were a considerable time at Abimelech's court (23). Nothing can be positively determined in this case from the words of the text. We find this whole story quite altered by Josephus (24), who says, Abimelech was taken with so violent a fit of sickness, that his life was despaired of; that in the midst of it he had a dream which admonished him concerning Sarah; that finding himself upon the mending-hand, he called together his friends, and disclosed to them his dream, and the violence of his passion; and that thereupon he made up the matter with Abraham, and so on.

(N) In the text it is, They returned into the land of the Philistines (25); as if they had come out of it to make a league with Abraham, who was still a sojourner in Palestine: It can therefore mean no more than that Abimelech returned to the place of his own abode, as if a distinction was now made of that part of the country occupied by Abraham, which, by the covenant made, was now considered as his own, and no longer under the jurisdiction of the Philistines.

(22) PATRICK upon Gen. xx, 18.
(25) Gen. xxi. 31.

(23) Vide CLERIC. in Gen. xx. 17.

(24) Antiq. l. v. c. 13.

Abimelech II.

ABIMELECH the son of Abimelech, and therefore called the second (O) of a that name or appellation, succeeded his father in the kingdom of the Philistines, and reigned also at Gerar. He had almost the same transactions with Isaac, as his father had with Abraham, and seems to have been actuated by the very same principles with his father, and, by what appears, well deserves to be styled a just and pious prince. In his days came Isaac to Gerar, sore pressed by famine, and conducting Rebekah with him, whom in imitation of his father, he gave out as his sister or cousin. Whether Abimelech and his subjects had remembrance of that fallacy before, and what had like thereupon to have ensued to the grievous detriment of the whole nation; or whether the morals of this country were still so pure, and chastity and hospitality in such due and high esteem, that they abhorred the thoughts of an impure or dangerous attempt, we take not on us to say; but so it was, that Rebekah was unmolested by suitors of any sort; and Isaac was perfectly at his ease upon her account. However, it is pretty evident that Abimelech himself, at least, had a shrewd suspicion they were man and wife; for, looking one day out of his window, as it is expressed, he saw Isaac caressing Rebekah in such a manner as convinced him they were much nearer related than they pretended to be. Wherefore, he called Isaac to him, and asked him how he could be so deceitful, as to pretend that she, who was really his wife, was no more than his sister? To which Isaac pleaded his father Abraham's excuse. Abimelech replied, It was by no means kindly done of him, for that ignorantly some or other of the people might have lain with her, and thereby have involved the whole nation in a most dangerous sin (P). Which to prevent, he made proclamation of the matter, and forbade any to seek Rebekah in marriage, or attempt to hurt her husband, upon pain of death. Nothing can well be added to give us a more favourable idea of this upright king than his behaviour in this case; doubtless he was no stranger to what had happened in a like case to his father; and having the fearful judgments of God before his eyes, he had faith therein, and dreaded to incur the wrath of God. And very remarkable it is, that though, considering the dreadfulfulness of his apprehensions, it might have been expected that he would have driven out Isaac from his dominions, as one who either maliciously or ignorantly had exposed his whole nation to irretrievable ruin; yet, instead of that, he suffers him to abide in the land till his vast success made him look on him more as a dangerous rival, than a harmless inmate. Then indeed, when the Philistines beheld the prodigious increase of Isaac's store, they began to envy him in good earnest, and to give him all possible uneasiness, by filling up all his wells as fast as his servants digged them, and by other such-like ill offices. At length Abimelech sent him a positive order to remove, and acquainted him, that he should never be at rest whilst he had so powerful and near a neighbour. This message was couched, seemingly, in such civil terms, that Isaac, who knew himself free from any ill design against him, and relied still on the equity of his old friend, only removed from one part of his country into another. But though he judged rightly enough of Abimelech, it not

(O) Some (26), between these two Abimelechs, place Ephron the Hittite, who was so kind to Abraham (27); which, perhaps, is the best, if not the only ground of such a surmise. It is supposed he may have been surnamed the Hittite, either from having conquered that tribe, or from having entered into a league with them (28); but nothing of this kind can be depended upon or believed. This second Abimelech seems plainly the natural successor of the former, as appears by his name or appellation, and by the series of time; his father being contemporary with Abraham, as he was with Isaac; and so plain a case can admit of no dispute with any but such as are fond of nothing else.

(P) Notwithstanding this Abimelech makes so amiable a figure in the writings of Moses, Josephus (29) represents him as a very ill and corrupt person; and, to mend the matter, tells his story in a very broken manner. Passing over what relates to Rebekah, and Isaac's denial of her for his wife; he says, that Abimelech did behave with much outward respect to Isaac upon his first arrival in his country; but in time, finding him to be more in the favour of God than himself, he broke with him, and burned with envy of him, and gave him all the ill-natured trouble he could upon all occasions. But in the end, perceiving the man's increase, and well knowing the corruption of his own heart, he began to be afraid of the consequences his inhospitable breach might bring on him and his, and thought it best to propose a renewal of the covenant which had been made between him and Abraham; for he all along takes this Abimelech for the same that conversed with Abraham, thereby to blacken him the more, as a man of no faith or sincerity; and besides, thereby makes him abundantly too old, except he supposes Abimelech to have been but a child, or a meer lad, when Abraham first removed into the land of the Philistines.

(26) THEOPHIL. ANTIOCH. lxi. p. 76.

(27) See before, p. 329.

(28) Antiq. d. i. c. 18.

(29) Vide Hist. Jul. in Regn. Pa-

a appearing that he used any violence to drive him further from him, he had not been long come to this new canton, before new broils and contentions arose between his servants and the Philistines of Gerar, chiefly on account of their wells. Isaac had caused all those which his father Abraham had digged, and which had been since stopped, to be opened afresh; which was no sooner done, than the Philistines claimed them as their own. For this Isaac expressed his resentment only by giving such names to the wells, according to the customs of those times, as might expose the violence that was offered to him; calling one of them Hefek; that is oppression or contention; another Sinab, hatred; but by these vexations and contentious claims, Isaac was obliged to shift from place to place. At length b Abimelech remembering, we may suppose, the covenant between his father and Abraham, and plainly perceiving that Isaac was favoured with God's special favour and blessing, thought it his duty, or his interest, to renew the aforesaid covenant; and taking with him Abimelech, an intimate friend, and Phicol (Q) the chief captain of his host, went to Isaac, who at first wondered to see them, after what had past, and plainly told them as much. To which they answered, That they plainly saw God was with him, and that he was rising to a high pitch of power and prosperity; and therefore desired to enter into bonds of friendship with him by a new covenant, or by a revival of the old; desiring no other terms, than that the Philistines and their posterity might be used and considered by Isaac and his posterity, as he and his family had been considered and used by Abimelech and his people. They were all three then entertained by Isaac, and the league they desired was mutually sworn to next morning, and they departed in peace c.

THE history of the Philistines, hitherto pretty clear and circumstantial, is all at once involved in an impenetrable mist, through which we can only perceive that the men of Gath fell on the children of Ephraim, and slew them for attempting to drive off their cattle d. When this happened, or the particulars of it, or the consequences that ensued, we know not e.

For a very long series of years we hear nothing of this people, and are only left to guess, that they in the mean time dissolved their ancient form of government; and contracted an aversion to the Israelites; for, when they are next mentioned, they are represented under distinct jurisdictions, and at strife with the children of Israel.

WE do not read of any war they had with Joshua; but soon after his death Gaza, Ashkelon and Ekron (R) were taken from them by the united tribes of Simeon and Judab f; but they possessed the said cities again in a very short time g: but whether they recovered them by force of arms, or whether they were restored to them by the conquerors, is not said.

ABOUT one hundred and twenty years after the reduction of the three cities above-mentioned, the Philistines held the Israelites under their yoke, till they were delivered by Shamgar, who slew six hundred of this people with an ox-goad h (S). Nor must we forget, that the Philistines suffered in common with the Israelites i by the furious incursions and ravages of Zebah and Zalmunna kings of Midian n.

* Gen. xxvi.
• Ibid. iii. 3.

b Chron. vii. 21.
f Ibid. ver. 31.

c See before in the notes, p. 342.
g See Judg. vi. 4.

d Judg. i. 18.
h See before, p. 304.

(Q) The chief captain of his father's host, as may be remembered, was also called Phicol (30); but, as it is impossible, or very highly improbable at least, that this was the same man, we conclude Phicol to have been a title of honour or dignity; and that as the king was constantly called Abimelech, his chief minister or general was constantly called Phicol.

(R) Here Josephus (31) tells us of only Ashkelon and Azidon or Anotus, as subdued; and, by an unpardonable inaccuracy, reckons them to the Canaanites. But for Gaza and Ekron or Acaron, says he, they were in the flat country, very strong in chariots, and well able to make good their defence, whereby they saved themselves from the calamities of their neighbours.

(S) It is worth observing that Josephus (32), who is so fond of extraordinary events, and so apt to make more of them, than, it is likely, he found them, quite passes over this. We will not dwell on the niceties which are offered to explain or illustrate this action. A parallel case is found in Homer, where Lycurgus put to flight the Bacchæ with an ox-goad. By the Vulgate it is interpreted a plow-share, induced thereto by the LXX. But those (33) seem to think very rationally, who imagine that Shamgar put himself at the head of a tumultuary rise of country people, who were armed in their rustic way with the implements of tillage, and that Shamgar happened to have an ox-goad in his hand when these six hundred of the Philistines fell; not that he killed them all himself with that weapon.

(30) See before, p. 345.
in Judic, iii. 31.

(31) Antiq. l. 5. c. 2.

(32) Antiq. l. 5. c. 5.

(33) Vide CLERIC.

A SECOND time they oppressed the Israelites in conjunction with the Ammonites in a the days of Jephthab<sup>1</sup>.

A THIRD time they reduced the Israelites by the permission of God, and kept them very strictly under forty years. In the mean time was Samson born to check their pride, and give them great trouble (T). He, when grown up, was smitten with love of a damsel of this country, who dwelt at Timnath. At the celebration of the nuptials, thirty young men of the Philistines were appointed to attend on Samson, as we now speak (U); who, among other discourse, proposed a riddle to these thirty youths concerning a lion he had killed, in whose carcass a twelvemonth after he had killed him, he found honey. It was proposed to these young men by Samson, that if they got the better of his riddle, he would give them thirty suits b of apparel, one to each; but that if they could not answer him at the end of the seven days of the marriage-festival, they should each of them give him the same. They accepted the offer, and desired to hear the riddle, and in vain perplexed themselves therewith for three days together, and then, despairing to overcome the difficulty, they went to their country-woman, Samson's bride, to desire her to get the mystery out of her husband, or else they would burn her and all her kindred, as persons who had on set purpose introduced a stranger to trick them out of their substance. This made a deep impression on the young woman, who, by continual entreaties, prevailed at last on her husband to disclose the ambiguity to her, which she communicated to the thirty young men; in consequence of which c they won the prize. This brought a misfortune upon Askelon; for Samson, to make good his engagements, went down thither, and slew thirty men, whose garments he gave to the thirty expositors of his riddle<sup>2</sup>.

THIS marriage was a very obscure beginning of great misery upon the Philistines; for Samson's father-in-law, apprehending his daughter was not well possessed of her husband's heart, gave her away to another, and denied Samson, who had been absent a twelvemonth, all access to his wife; but, to pacify his resentment, would have given him another daughter, who, as he said was younger and handsomer. This did by no means mollify Samson, who, in revenge, sent out three hundred foxes with firebrands at their tails into the corn-fields; and all the standing corn was d thereby consumed with fire, as were also the other fruits of the earth, and the vines, and the olives. The Philistines were amazed at so terrible a disaster, and understanding the motives which had provoked Samson to use them so cruelly, they looked on his father-in-law as the incendiary in a primary sense; and therefore went and burnt him, together with his daughter, who also may be called the cause of all this mischief (W). But this execution they did not with impunity, they were smitten hip and thigh by Samson. They determined then to take their revenge on him; and understanding he had retreated to the rock Etam, they went thither to take him; but he was delivered bound to them by the men of Judah, who dreaded their displeasure. The Philistines shouted aloud at the sight of Samson e bound; but their joy was soon turned into mourning, for Samson breaking his cords, found the jaw-bone of an ass at hand, and killed a thousand of them therewith<sup>3</sup>.

ALL this the Philistines never forgot, and wished for nothing so much as an opportunity to be revenged on Samson. The Gazites, about twenty years after the last slaughter, thought they had him secure in their city. They had information

<sup>1</sup> See before, p. 359.    <sup>2</sup> Judg. xiv.    <sup>3</sup> Idem xvi.

(T) Josephus (34) reckons that the Philistines were stripped of their dominion over Israel by Samson, but he is plainly mistaken.

(U) This we take to have been the custom of the country in cases of a like nature, and a usual compliment now paid to Samson, who was come to marry among them; but nothing less appears by Josephus (35), who writes, that these young men were set as a guard upon him to prevent his doing any mischief in his cups.

(W) This seems to have been inflicted on them by way of retaliation; for, as through their indiscretion they drew on their country so sad a revenge by fire, the rest might think it but just and natural that they should perish thereby to expiate their crime. But on the other hand, we find that punishing or revenging by fire was a notorious practice in those days with this people; for the thirty young men, as may be remembered, when they began to despair that they should ever unfold Samson's riddle, threatened the bride to burn her and her father's house with fire if she did not befriend them, and help them out. It is supposed they were taken by surprize, and burnt in their house; and it is observed, that the bride and her father's house suffered the same calamity she sought to avoid by betraying her husband (36).

(34) Antiq. l. 5. c. 10.    (35) Ubi supr.    (36) See PATRICK upon Judg. xv. 6.

a that he was with an harlot of theirs ; and they watched him, and made fast their gates, being sure they should kill him the next morning. But their precaution was to no purpose, and they were disappointed ; for Samson rising at midnight, took the city gates and posts, and bar and all, and carried them away towards Hebron, leaving an open place behind him.

THE lords of the Philistines then heard that Samson was ensnared by another harlot of their nation in the valley of Sorek, whose name was Delilah. The five lords came to this woman, and promised her, each of them, eleven hundred pieces of silver, if she would betray Samson to them, by enticing him to tell her where his strength lay, and how he might be reduced to the ordinary strength of another
b man. So large a bribe corrupted Delilah's heart, and she used her best endeavours to earn the very many pieces of silver she had in prospect ; and thinking she was mistress of the secret, she sent for the Philistines to execute their pleasure on him ; but she was deceived, and they were disappointed. A second time she was deceived in like manner, and a third time ; but the fourth time she was sincerely informed that his strength lay in his hair, which she cut off, and delivered Samson a helpless prey to the lords of the Philistines, who gave her the promised reward of her treachery, and put out Samson's eyes, and bound him with fetters of brass, and carried him to Gaza, and there made him grind in the prison-house.

THEY then met in a solemn manner to celebrate a festival to their god Dagon, c and to offer him thanks, and praises, and sacrifices. They met together to the number of many thousands, and were all in one place ; which, whether it was a temple, or a theatre, or a palace, is quite unknown ; but it was of such extent that no less than three thousand persons were on the top of it (X). In the height of their jollity they sent for the blind Samson from the prison-house to make sport with him (Y), forgetting his hair was by this time pretty well grown again (Z), and his strength, consequently, returned to him. They made what diversion they pleased with him, and dearly they paid for it ; for they all perished by the fall of the building they were in, which was brought down by the strength of Samson. This was a terrible disaster, and most of, if not all the chiefs of the Philistines, were lost d in this mighty ruin ; so that the nation must, upon that account, have been reduced into a low and distracted condition, being destitute of governors, and commanders, and men of wisdom =.

FOR a considerable time the Philistines lay quiet : they recovered their loss at Gaza, and grew to a greater pitch of power than ever. They now made war upon the Israelites again, who had as good as thrown off their yoke since the fatal overthrow Samson had given them. They pitched first in Apbek, and the Israelites incamped at Eben-ezer. The two armies soon came to action, and the day turned in favour of the Philistines, who put the enemy to a precipitate flight, and in all e slew four thousand of them, and drove them into their camp. The Philistines, in the midst of their triumph, upon this occasion, heard an uncommon shout of joy from the Hebrew camp ; and enquiring into the cause of it, were told, that the He-

= Judg. xvi.

(X) We find the generality of the learned most inclined to think this vast building a theatre, such as formerly the Romans contrived, and which were almost incredibly capacious : this may have been the truth of the matter, and we should most readily have embraced the same opinion, did we not perceive that this building was roofed, and that so firmly, as to bear the weight of three thousand persons upon its top. A difficulty starts up here ; how could this roof be contrived so, that such a multitude might partake of the diversion Samson was making below ? It is answered, that those on the roof were the vulgar sort, who had conveniences of looking down into a great hall, where the lords and chiefs, and better sort, sat in state ; which will still make the building more extensive. A roof it had, which we sufficiently understand by the two pillars which Samson pulled down, and which supported it. It hence must have been a place of a particular construction, like the Egyptian hall in

Vitruius (37), and nothing like the theatres of the ancient Greeks or Romans.

(Y) Josephus (38) understands that they wanted to flout and jeer him ; though also they may have made him go through a course of ridiculous gestures and speeches.

(Z) In the margin of our version it is, As when he was shaven ; or it was grown to the same length it was of when Delilah clipped it. Whence we gather, that Josephus (39) is right in saying this was an annual feast in honour of their god Dagon, as appears also by the text of scripture ; where great thanks are returned to Dagon for delivering Samson into their hands, which was still uppermost in their thoughts, and what they had chiefly desired several years past. From hence we may learn, that the worship of Dagon was not confined to Apbek, though it may have been his peculiar place, and that in these days he was the most highly revered of any god they had.

(37) Lib. 6. c. 5.

(38) Ubi supr.

(39) Ubi supr.

breus had sent for the ark of the lord, and that it was come into their camp. <sup>a</sup> Upon hearing this they cried out in the utmost consternation, God is come into the enemy's camp, what will become of us! Such a thing was never known before; and greatly did they bewail their unhappy lot, despairing to be delivered from those mighty gods, as they spoke, who had so severely smitten the Egyptians. They now were quite daunted and spiritless, till their chiefs, or some of the more resolute awakened them from their fears, exhorting them to be of good cheer, and behave like men, lest they fell under the power of the Hebrews, and became their servants, instead of being their masters, as they were: Behave like men, said they, and fear not. This exhortation had its effect upon the drooping hearts of the Philistines in general, and inspired them with fresh courage. Thus ani- <sup>b</sup> mated, they came to a battle, and fell on so furiously, that they slew thirty thousand of the enemy's footmen; and to crown all, took the ark of God, which, at first, gave them so much trouble, and slew Hophni and Phinehas, the priests who attended it. Doubtless they called this a most compleat victory, and rejoiced in a most extraordinary manner, ignorant of the evil consequences they were to suffer in return. In high triumph they carried the captive ark to Ashdod, and placed it in the temple of their idol Dagon, as an acceptable offering to him, and as properly his captive, we may suppose. The next morning they went into the temple, and behold, Dagon was fallen upon his face to the earth, before the ark of the Lord. They took him up therefore, and set him in his place again, attributing <sup>c</sup> this first humiliation to some unheeded accident (A). But on the second day, when they went in again, they not only saw their god in the prostrate posture they beheld him yesterday, but dismembred also of his head, and hands, and feet, which lay upon the threshold; nor was any thing left of him but the stump, or, as we rather choose to express it, the trunk of his body. Hence came a superstitious custom among his priests, never to tread on the threshold as they went into his temple (B), either looking upon this mutilation as a great misfortune on their Dagon, or, perhaps rather, on the threshold as hallowed by the touch of the scattered limbs of that mangled deity. But their concern for him was quickly diverted by a more lively sense of their own real calamities, their whole country being smit- <sup>d</sup> ten with a sudden plague, of which many of them died, while those who survived were grievously tormented with emerods. Ashdod and its whole territory laboured under so dreadful a calamity, that they resolved to keep the ark no longer among them, being too sensibly convinced that they suffered because of the ark. But that they might not take a hasty step, they called an assembly of all the lords of the Philistines to deliberate upon the means of delivering them from this raging evil, and what was best to be done with that dire symbol of the Jewish God. The resolution they came to was, that the ark should be removed to Gath, apprehending, as is thought, that Ashdod was a place unacceptable to it (C). They carried it thither, and the same plague, and another sort of emerods (D) followed it to Gath, <sup>e</sup> without distinction of small or great. The men of Gath then sent the ark to Ekron;

(A) They might impute it to some defect in the pedestal, or might imagine the statue itself not to have been exactly poised; or, finally, they might attribute it to some unusual shock, as of an earthquake, and the like.

(B) This superstition obtained for many ages, as may be gathered from Zephaniah (39), where those are threatened that leap on, or rather, over the threshold, as not daring to set their feet upon it; which had, doubtless, an eye to the ridiculous and stupidly-grounded superstition of that people (40). The Jews have an idle story, that the Philistines, henceforward forsaking Dagon himself, worshipped the threshold of his temple (41).

(C) Just as Aeneas and his people indited their beds and their houses of the disasters that befel them; and Cadmus forsook his own city.

— tanquam fortuna locorum,

Non sua se premeret —

As if the ill luck which hunted him had been the place's, not his own; as our Dr. Jackson observes out of Ovid, in his Original of Unbelief, chap. 18. paragr. 4. (42).

(D) At Ashdod it is said, they were smitten with emerods only, without any addition; but now it is said they were smitten with emerods in their secret parts: whence it is evident enough that this plague was some how or other altered; and it being the most universally interpreted in both places that they were afflicted by emerods, there is no other way that occurs to us of accounting for this alteration, but that at Ashdod they had the ordinary sort, which appear outwardly; and that now at Gath they had the blind sort, which are inward. Instead of emerods some (43) speak of violent disorders in the intestines, of their rotting alive, and of their wasting away by dysenteries and vomitings, thereby discharging their loathsome corruption. Other opinions there are concerning this matter; but none so generally received as what we have said of the emerods.

(39) Zeph. i. 9. (40) Vide BOCHART. Hierozoic, par. 1. l. 2. c. 36. (41) Vide Buxtorf Hist. Arc. c. 19. p. 172. (42) PATRICK upon 1 Sam. vi. 8. (43) JOSEPH. Antiq. l. 6. c. 1.

a where, knowing what Gath and Ashdod had already suffered by the detention of it, they cried out with a frightful voice, that the ark of the God of Israel was sent to destroy and afflict them also. Their fears were not vain, and great was their lamentation for the loss of those that died, and for the grievous soreness of the emerods, the affliction gathering strength, and growing worse, as it spread (E). But they had no sooner received the ark than, all in confusion, they sent to the lords of the Philistines to consult with them, entreating them to fix upon some manner of sending it to its place. The result of this council is not expressed; but it seems as if, observing the afflictions to ravage the cities chiefly, they removed the ark into the country (F), which, as seems also, only added to the number of their plagues, b the country being now desolated by an extraordinary production of mice. Finding therefore there was no respite to be had, and that the persecution lay harder and harder upon them, and multiplied as often as the ark was removed, they called for their priests and diviners to demand of them what they thought most expedient to be done to get rid of their plagues, and in what manner it would be fittest to remove the dreadful cause of them out of their land. Their answer was, That they ought not to send it away empty, but by all means, with a trespass-offering, as an atonement. They were then asked what this trespass-offering must be: They replied, five golden emerods, and five golden mice, according to the number of the lords of the Philistines; 'for the same plague was common to you all; make c ' images of your emerods, and images of the mice, which have been so destructive to your land; and humble yourselves to the God of Israel, that he may ' withdraw his avenging hand from among you. Do not offer to harden your ' hearts, as Pharaoh did: proceed then, and make a new cart, and take two milk ' cows which have never felt the yoke, and take their calves away from them, and ' harness them to the cart you make (G), and on it place the ark and the jewels ' you offer for a trespass-offering in a coffer by it, and in that manner suffer it to ' depart. If it takes the way which leads to Beth-shemesh, you need not doubt who ' has so sorely afflicted you; but if not, you may conclude, that what you have ' suffered has proceeded from a mere natural cause.' They obeyed the voice of d their priests, and punctually followed their directions. The cows moved away for Beth-shemesh, lowing as they went along, nor turned once to the right or the left, the lords of the Philistines keeping after them till they saw them clear of their borders, where they wondering stood to observe in what manner the sacred captive was received by those with whom it would dwell<sup>a</sup>.

WE have sufficient reason to conclude, that the Philistines, by dismissing the ark in the manner they did, freed themselves from their bitter afflictions, and that,

<sup>a</sup> 1 Sam. iv. 5, 6.

(E) We find their lamentation and affliction expressed in deeper terms, upon every removal, which gives room for this assertion.

(F) Josephus (44) relates, that the ark went through all the five cities of the Philistines, which we have no warrant to assert from scripture, except that the five cities being equally afflicted, and their gods equally persecuted, as afterwards appears, may be accepted for a demonstrative proof thereof; but there is no room to suppose this, since we find, that the Ekronites, convinced of the destruction and plague which followed the ark, did not so much as think of procuring it to be sent either to Askelon, or Gaza; but only, that it might be sent back to its place. Their request, it seems, was no farther complied with by the rest, than the removing it from them into the country, or the fields, for that is the sense of the original, where it remained seven months; nor is it likely that either of those two cities would have admitted it within their gates after a thrice-repeated experience of what the consequence would be, if they did admit it; nor does it appear that they had yet been afflicted in the manner of Ashdod, Gath, and Ekrone, where the ark had been lodged. It seems that the ark being removed into the fields, gave birth to those prodigious swarms of mice which did eat up the country, and that Gaza and Askelon were now smitten by the plagues also, that the whole body of this people groaning under the same severities and distresses, there might be no dissension among them about dismissing the ark. And hence, perhaps, we may discover, that as much as they were divided into five satrapies or lordships, they were nevertheless so linked together, that one of them could not act in any matter of public concern without the concurrence of all the rest; which is no where so evident as in this case of the Ekronites, who were so thoroughly convinced the ark was to be sent home, that we cannot conceive what should have prevented them from acting accordingly, had it not been that they were afraid of making a breach into their common constitution; or dreaded to be called to an account by the rest, for presuming to act of their own heads in an affair of such moment.

(G) The new cart was ordered in honour of the God of Israel; and the kine, wholly unused to the yoke, were to prove whether or no he would interfere in the return of his ark. And, indeed, such unbroken cattle could never go on right together, or at all, as we may say, but by a miracle.

(44) JOSEPHUS. l. 6. c. 1.

being

being thereby made thoroughly sensible of the hand that had chastised them, they <sup>a</sup> did not quickly forget the mighty power of it. And it was not till above twenty years afterwards, that understanding the Israelites were gathered in a body at Mizpeb, they resolved to disperse them, jealous, perhaps, that they were upon measures of throwing off their yoke. They marched therefore towards Mizpeb, and a terror went before them, which quite confounded the Israelites, who having Samuel in the midst of them, begged, that, without ceasing, he would entreat God for them. The Philistines marched on, unmindful of him, who when his people turned to him, was ready to confound the strength and devices of the wisest and mightiest, but being on the edge of assaulting the Israelites, a fearful storm of thunder and lightning fell on them (H), which beat down, and dispersed them; so that <sup>b</sup> being broken into this wild disorder, they were pursued and slaughtered by the Israelites to Beth-car. This was a blow indeed, and such a one as deprived them of the dominion they had exercised over the Hebrews, and was the loss of all the encroachments they had made upon their territory, and reduced them so low, that they never offered to molest Israel again all the days that Samuel <sup>c</sup> governed.

DURING all this time that they had held Israel in subjection, they had quite disarmed them, and would not so much as suffer a smith to dwell among them <sup>d</sup>. How sensibly soever the Philistines may have been affected by this last rout; yet in a few years they seem to have been vastly, nay, infinitely more formidable than ever. For understanding that a fortress of theirs, called Geba, had been surprized by Jonathab the son of Saul, they gathered together thirty thousand chariots, six thousand horsemen (I), and foot as the sand of the sea, to fight with, or rather plunder the Israelites, who still laboured under the ill effects of their tyrannical policy, by continuing destitute of arms. This very numerous multitude went out, and pitched in Micbmash, and sent such a terror before them, that happy was the Israelite who could hide himself to his satisfaction from them, or get out of their way. Micbmash was their station, from whence they sent out three bands, three several ways, to spoil the country; and great damage they did to the whole land, as we have room to infer. Their ravages they committed without interruption, having to deal with an unarmed enemy, who consequently were in no condition to <sup>d</sup> make head against them.

AT Micbmash they continued to lie encamped, while their spoilers quite ruined and stripped the country; and here they took up their quarters some time. But in the midst of their depredations they received a check from Jonathab, who, hurried on by a divine impulse, and accompanied only by his armour-bearer, made a considerable slaughter of one of their out-guards; the noise of which spreading to the whole body, they were seized with a sudden pannick, and an unspeakable tumult arose among them; so that, hyperbolically speaking, the very earth trembled therewith (K). In the height of this disorder, it came to pass that they fell

* 1 Sam. iv. 5, 6.

† Ibid. xiii. 19.

(H) To this Josephus (45) adds, that it was so violent, that it was as much as they could do to keep their legs; and that another part was swallowed up by an earthquake.

(I) Sir Isaac Newton (46) from this vast number of chariots and horsemen is tempted to think the Philistines were now very powerfully succoured, and their numbers mightily increased by the accession of the shepherds out of Egypt, who were now expelled that kingdom: We shall not contend with him upon so dark a point, wherein he may as well be right as not. But we cannot refrain from noting, that he takes these thirty thousand chariots to be of the warlike sort, and designed for battle, wondering, as well he might, if they were really such, at the great excess of the number, when compared with those that followed Pharaoh, who perished in the Red-Sea. But, for our part, we cannot but look upon the far greater number of them to have been chiefly designed either for carriages, such as the baggage and lumber of so vast an army must needs require; or, perhaps also, to carry off the plunder of the enemy, at which they seem to have been grasping with the most insolent presumption. Nothing, indeed, but such a supposition, can account for that prodigious number of chariots, especially if we consider the nature of the ground, for the most part rocky and uneven, and, consequently, unfit for turning and winding with the dexterity which warlike chariots required. We may add, that though we reduced these to three thousand, as they stand in the Syriac and Arabic versions, they would be still far too many for warlike use, as a learned commentator judiciously observes (47), since Mithridates had but one hundred, Darius but two hundred, and Antiochus Epiphanes but three hundred; and no one can imagine that the Philistines, and whosoever else may have joined them upon this occasion, were able to muster up such a force in chariots as either of those three monarchs.

(K) Not that there was really an earthquake upon this occasion. Besides the thirty thousand chariots, and six thousand horsemen mentioned in scripture,

(45) Antiq. l. 6. c. 2.
1 Sam. xiii. 5.

(46) Chronol. of anc. king. amended, p. 167.

(47) PATRICK upon

a upon each other with a most fearful slaughter of themselves (L), and presently they began to move off in a wild uproar and fury; which, when it was observed by the Israelites, they moved after them by degrees, and at length pursued them one and all, with Saul at their head, who, if he had not been in too great a hurry, and forbid his troops to stand to take a little refreshment, the Philistines had lost a great deal more blood than they did upon this occasion; but as it was, their loss was very considerable (M), they being pursued from Michmash to Aijalon.

THOUGH they were thus visibly defeated by the hand of heaven; yet in a few years they revived again, and put themselves under arms, once more to try what they could do with the Israelites: but they were now, perhaps, chiefly induced b thereto upon hearing that Saul was gone distracted. But, though they made a great noise and parade this time, yet they did not proceed with such fury as formerly, and do not seem to have been very eager for a battle. They found Saul in the field ready to contend with them, which checked them in their career. They first rendezvoused in Shobchob in the tribe of Judab; and advancing thence, and still finding the Israelites in a posture to fight them, they went, and pitched upon a mountain opposite to that on which Israel was incamped. They had in their army at this time a giant, one Goliath of Gath, who was six cubits and a span high, and wore a ponderous and well wrought suit of brass armour: he had a helmet of brass on his head, a coat of mail (N) of the same on his body, and a target or gorget between his shoulders, and greaves upon his legs, all of the same metal. The staff of his spear was like a weaver's beam, and the head of it weighed six hundred shekels of iron; and before him went one who bore his shield. This gigantic person seems to have been very sensible of his warlike abilities and strength, and to have fancied that he alone could support his country's cause. Accordingly, whether by his own suggestions, or at the solicitation of his countrymen, we know not; this man took on him to fight any one in the host of Israel, and by a single combat to determine which of the two nations should rule, and which obey. With this view he went down into the valley which parted the two camps, and called up to the Israelites, 'To what purpose do you draw yourselves out in battle array? d ' here am I, a Philistine (O), and ye the slaves of Saul, find me out a man among ' you that has the heart to come down and fight me: if he kill me, we will submit to be your subjects; but, if I kill him, you shall serve us, as you have done scripture, Josephus (48) numbers the foot at three hundred thousand. Here a late bold commentator (49), from the alarm given them by Jonathan and his armour-bearer, and the fearful effects which ensued, takes occasion to think that the Philistines were neither so numerous, as is in scripture said, or so well skilled in war as they are usually deemed, and infers that the text must have been corrupted; but of this see the next note.

1 Sam. xiii, xiv.

(L) This favours, very much, the conjecture of Sir Isaac Newton, who supposes they had, about this time, an accession of the shepherds from Egypt, as we have already noted from him (50). It looks very much as if this great host, for such it may be justly stiled, though not perhaps quite so strong as is represented to us, had not a mutual confidence in each other, so far, as to be certain that a defection and treachery might not be brought to pass among them by the artifices of the enemy. The out-guard routed by Joshua and his armour-bearer, favoured strongly of treachery. The bare fame of an attack made by any two persons on so vast an army, could never, of itself, have caused so wild an uproar; but something, at the same time, must have been added thereto, that made them enraged against each other, and fired them with the utmost fury and indignation. Nor does what we here insinuate, by any means derogate from the concern the Almighty had in this miraculous deliverance of his people, since, in cases of this kind, he has so often acted by second causes.

(M) According to Josephus (51) it amounted to sixty thousand men.

(N) According to the English standard, the height of Goliath was twelve foot eight inches, and somewhat better than three tenths. His coat of mail alone weighed five thousand shekels of brass, or upwards of one hundred and eighty nine of our pounds Troy; and by the same rule, the head of his spear, which weighed six hundred shekels of iron, exceeded two and twenty of the same pounds (52). The weights of these and the other parts of his armour and arms, whose weight is not specified, was not, perhaps, too heavy for so gigantic a person, whose strength, doubtless, was in proportion to his stature: and yet some are willing to think it was too cumbersome; and therefore chuse to say the shekels enumerated above, and commonly taken for the weight of his coat of mail, were the price of it (53), which seems to be as much too little on this hand, as it may appear too much on the other.

(O) It is generally thought that he, here, vaunts himself as a lord among the Philistines; or rather, that he boasts of his liberty, as he was born of that country, and reviles the Israelites as servants or slaves; insinuating, that he did them honour in offering to demean himself so far as to contend in single combat with any one of them.

(48) Antiq. l. 6. c. 7.

(49) Cleric. in 1 Sam. xiv. 15.

(50) See before in the notes,

p. 352.

(51) Ubi supra.

(52) See Arbuthnot's Tables of ancient coins, weights, and measures. (53) See Patrick upon 1 Sam. xxii. 5.

heretofore : mark that I defy every one of you ; let who dare advance out of a
 ' your ranks to fight me ! ' This arrogant challenge met with no acceptance, and Goliath was left to himself to vapour his fill ; but the figure of the man, and his menacing deportment stood the Philistines in good stead, by quite disheartning the Israelites, who were greatly dismayed, both at him and his words. But, as confident as Goliath was in his own strength, and, in consequence thereof, how ready soever he was to fight, the rest of his countrymen had not the least stomach to it :
 They remembered how terribly it had more than once fared with them in their contentions with Israel. Wherefore, though the first day's experience convinced them, that not one soul of the Israelites would undertake a single combat with Goliath ; yet, having no mind to come to a battle, they every morning and even- b ing sent out Goliath to repeat his idle challenge, for forty days together. At last, as the armies were drawing down to each other in battle array, Goliath advanced out of the ranks as usual ; and in the height of his pretended expectations for one to come out (for pretended they must have been, after so many fruitless repetitions of the same defiance) he saw a handsome ruddy youth advancing towards him, from the Israelites, in the habit and appearance of an ordinary shepherd. The sight fired him with indignation, and observing a staff in his hand ; ' What, says
 ' he, am I a dog, that thou art come against me with a staff ? and cursing him
 ' by his gods, Come hither, that I may give thy flesh to the fowls of the air and ' the beasts of the field.' Having heard what the young man, David, had to say c in answer to him, he stepped towards him to seize on him, and crush the presumptuous lad ; but ere he reached him, a stone was slung at him by David, which took his forehead, and laid him flat at his length on the ground ; and his head was instantly severed from his body by his own sword, and carried off as a trophy by the conqueror. The Philistines no sooner say their champion gone, than they fled (P), as if their hopes and all had centered in him ; and to judge by their behaviour, it was really the case. They fled, and were pursued by Saul, quite home to the gates of their own cities, Gath and Ekron, with a fearful slaughter no doubt (Q) ; leaving all their tents and baggage behind them*.

THE same hand which had deprived them of Goliath, persecuted them again soon d afterwards ; for two hundred of them were slain by David for the sake of their fore-skins only, that he might perform the condition imposed on him by Saul, before he would give him his daughter to wife ; but the particulars of this slaughter are not specified in the text of scripture. But thence it may be gathered, that this was the cause of a fresh rupture, and that the princes of the Philistines undertook to revenge the injury, but what success they had, is not said*.

Achish.

Soon after this they were overthrown in battle by David*, and some great change seems, about this time, to have been wrought in their government ; for, as ever since the Abimelechs they are represented under lords or princes ; so now we read of a king they had, whose name was Achish, and who resided at Gath†. He e is elsewhere called Abimelech*, the ancient appellation, as we have seen, of the first kings of this people. David, to avoid the terrible intentions of Saul, fled to Gath, and was brought before this king ; who imagining him, by his behaviour, to be beside himself, would take no farther notice of him, than to order he should be brought no more into his presence*.

THE Philistines all this time were upon no settled terms with Saul, but invaded him, and thereby diverted him from laying hold on David in the wilderness of Maon ;

* 1 Sam. xvii.

* Ibid. xviii.

* Sam. xix. 8.

* Ibid. xxi. 10.

* Psal. xxiv.

* 1 Sam. ubi supr. Ibid. xxi. 27—29.

(P) From this slight commentators are apt to imagine, that what Goliath did in offering to decide the fate of each nation by single combat, was his own act and deed, and without the assent of the Philistines ; or else, that if they did bind themselves to submit to the fate of such a battle, they were faithless enough to slight the obligation. To us it appears, that they did in a very great measure depend on Goliath for success in this war ; that they prided themselves chiefly in him ; and that, flattering themselves he was invincible, and, by his strength and armour, an over-match for any in the host of Israel, they were not against what he took on him, as their champion ; but that they did formally agree to stand to what he promised, is unlikely : Such decisions, by single combat, seem not to have been the custom of these early times ; but the whole seems to be the effect of great pride and vanity in the champion, and a mixture of stupidity and cowardice in the rest.

(Q) If we hearken to Josephus (54), they had thirty thousand killed, and twice that number wounded in this pursuit, which seem to be somewhat exaggerated by that historian.

a but it seems they had ill success this time again, and fled before Saul, or else retreated for fear of him.

ACHISH the son of Maach (R), after this received David, and his wives, and all his train of followers into his protection, and treated the distressed refugees with great hospitality. And at David's request, that he might have some place allotted him for his particular dwelling, he readily appointed him the town of Ziklag for that purpose, from whom it was ever after claimed by the kings of Judah. This was, indeed, the most effectual means of binding David to his interest, as we observed in the last note; and Achish had, it seems, influence enough over the Philistines, to make them sacrifice their resentment for the wrongs they b had received from that fugitive prince, to their present interest and safety, and to let him live peaceably among them, rather than hazard the consequences of his return, or reconciliation with Saul (S). Achish, who conceived very high thoughts of David, understanding he had been out upon some expedition, examined him about it, and receiving from him such an answer, as made him imagine he had been plundering his own nation; expressed great satisfaction thereat, hoping David had done something to make himself odious in the eyes of his countrymen, and that now he should have him a servant for ever. Preparing soon after to war with Saul, he told David that he expected him to head his followers, and march with him; and promised to recompence him with some most eminent post in his service. The c Philistines first gathered together at Shunem, and there encamped. From thence they removed to Aphik, where the several bodies of the Philistines appeared together, in a kind of review, under their respective chiefs, and David and his men followed about, or after Achish; from whence it is gathered, that the post he promised him, was to be captain of his guard. When the lords and chiefs of the Philistines observed this, they were offended, and expostulated with Achish, who in vain endeavoured to persuade them that David was a fast, and very trusty friend. Instead of being satisfied with what the king said, they grew angry with him; and insisted on it, that David should not stir a step further with them; that he should return to Ziklag his appointed place, and not have it in his power to betray them in d battle, the only way he could have to reconcile himself with his natural lord and master, at the cruel expence of the Philistines. In short, they could not imagine that David, who was the idol of his own people, would forfeit his valuable popularity among them by fighting against them. Achish was unable to resist all this clamour, and calling David to him, assured him, that for his own part he had the highest sense of his sincerity and innate worth, and had been perfectly satisfied with his behaviour ever since he had sheltered him; but, that since the lords were far from being disposed to think so well of him, it were in vain, and imprudent to contend against them in this matter; and therefore desired him to return quietly to Ziklag. David resenting the unkindness of the notions the lords entertained concerning him, and protesting his readiness to fight in his cause, Achish answered him e with great earnestness, that he was fully convinced of his affection; that he had a singular veneration for him; and that, in his eyes, he was as an angel of God: but that seeing the lords were so unreasonably bent against him, he must consent to set out for Ziklag early the next morning, and thereby prevent their falling into a

(R) From this mention of his father's name, some are willing to think him a different person from the former; to which they seem to be partly inclined, by the kind manner in which he received David, whom the former had spurned at, as an idiot or a madman. But we must remember that David actually play'd that part to save his life; and it is no wonder if Achish did not care to be troubled with so unhappy a wretch, as David then made himself: but the same man may have returned to a better mind concerning him, when he was let into the secret of David's fears; and may afterwards have entertained a correspondence with a person of such known worth, and invited him into his dominions, and assured him of protection against the evil intentions of Saul; hoping thereby to weaken Saul, and keep up a division in his kingdom, at the same time that he strengthened himself. If no humanity may be allowed to Achish in this case, a large share of human policy may be admitted: nor do we perceive any solid ground for supposing this Achish and the former to be different persons.

(S) It seems, at least, more reasonable to us to attribute their unexpected moderation towards a man that had so ill deserved of them, to some such by views, than either to the extraordinary generosity of that nation, or to the interposition of providence, as many have done.

As for Ziklag, Joshua places it in the tribe of Simeon †, and Eusebius on the southern side of the land of Canaan *.

† Josh. xix. 5.

* Loc. Hebr.

discord, which would, in all likelihood, do more hurt to the common cause, than all his known valour and experience could do it good.

So David went his way, and Achish and the Philistines marched against Saul, who was encamped on mount Gilboa. A battle was fought between them on that same mount, and the Philistines prevailed mightily against the Israelites, and drove them before them with a great slaughter. In particular, they pressed hard after Saul and his sons; and these, Jonathan, and Abinadab, and Malchishua, they slew. They sent their arrows with great eagerness after Saul, and did hit him several times, but did not lay him along, nor had they the honour of dispatching him: he was dead, ere they reached him, by his own weapon. Thus the Philistines at length obtained a complete victory, in consequence of which, they possessed themselves of a great part of the enemy's country. On the morrow after the battle, when they came to strip the slain, they found Saul king of Israel, and his three sons among the rest, in mount Gilboa. They did cut off Saul's head, and dispoiled his body of his armour. His armour they dedicated in the temple of Ashtaroth; and his body, and those also of his sons, they ignominiously hung upon the walls of Beth-shan. What they did, particularly with his head, is not related; but it seems as if they at first sent it up and down with his armour, to dedicate both in the temples of their idols, and to feast the eyes of their people with those grateful objects, and demonstrative marks of victory. But the bodies of Saul and his three sons hung not long where the Philistines exposed them, for the brave inhabitants of Jabesh-Gilead, whom that monarch had lately saved from imminent destruction, as we have formerly seen in the history of the Ammonites †, took this opportunity of shewing their gratitude to their late deliverer, and, at the peril of their lives, to fetch away those mangled remains from the enemy, and give them a more honourable burial in their own city. How David did afterwards dispose of them, when he came to the crown, shall be seen in the history of the Jews.

THE death of Saul and his two brave sons having rid David of his fears, and paved him a sure way to the Israelitish crown, he stayed no longer at Ziklag, after the battle of Gilboa, than was necessary to take a decent farewell of his royal friend and protector, and removed to Hebron, an ancient and famous city in the tribe of Judah *, of which we shall have occasion to speak more fully in the sequel. Hither the greatest part of the tribes repaired to him, and unanimously proclaimed him king. As for Achish, though we read no more of him, yet there is reason to suppose that he continued his good offices towards him for some considerable time, at least so far, as to restrain the rest of the Philistines from any hostilities whilst he was strengthening himself on his throne. For it is very remarkable, that all the while the contest lasted between him and Ishbosheth, the surviving son of Saul, they never gave him the least disturbance. This pacific disposition of theirs towards a man so suspected and hated by them, at a juncture when they might easily have crushed him in the bud, by allying with his competitor, can hardly be ascribed to any thing but the kind interposition of Achish in his favour. And accordingly we find, that they did not begin their hostilities against him till after the death of Ishbosheth, when they understood that all Israel and Judah had submitted themselves to him, under two of the bravest and most experienced generals that ever Judea had. But whether this rupture was owing to their fear of his resentment for the affront they had put upon him, to a dread of his excessive power, or to their mutual hatred of the Jewish nation, or to the loss of his friend and protector, who might be either dead by this time, or, perhaps, wrought by the other Philistine lords into this change, the text leaves us wholly in the dark. But whatever might be the cause of this new war, we find that it began almost as soon as David had been acknowledged king of all the Israelitish tribes, and began to give them real occasion to dread his over-grown power. They therefore lost no time to raise a powerful army, and to invade his territories before he was grown too strong for them. They marched and incamped in the valley of Raphaim, from whence they removed to Baal-perazim, where they were encountered by David, and by him so completely overthrown, that, intent upon nothing but saving themselves, they left their baggage behind them, and even their gods, which they carried about with them, in imitation of the Israelites, when they brought their ark against them. The Philistines seem to have rallied again, upon recollection, to rescue their captive gods, and † See before, p. 297. a.

* Vid. 2 Sam. ii. 1. & seq.

- <sup>a</sup> drew up again in battalia in the valley of Repbaim (T); but they were defeated again by David in a sudden onset, by the immediate interposition of God, and pursued with a long and bloody slaughter from Geba to Gazer*, a place, it seems, on their own frontiers.

THE war did not end here; for a short time afterwards they were invaded by David, and subdued, and Metbeg-ammab (U) was taken out of their hands*.

- THE Philistines had several men of extraordinary stature among them, and all it seems of the kindred of Goliath (W). And, though they had experienced the little use of such men in an army, yet they seem foolishly to have cast their eyes upon these; now flattering themselves, that by their help they might retrieve their honour, and take revenge on David. Wherefore, after they had lain quiet several years, they broke out into a war again with Israel, and their giants marched with them. They came to a battle, in which Ishbi-benob (X), a son of Goliath, as is thought, taking David at some disadvantage, had like to have slain him. But missing his aim, he fell by the hand of David, assisted by Abishai, although the head of his spear weighed three hundred shekels of brass (Y), and although he was extraordinarily accoutred (Z) for war. A second battle was fought near a place called Gob, wherein Saph, another son of Goliath's was slain by Sibbecbai the Hushathite. A third battle they fought, at Gob also, and Goliath's brother, the staff of whose spear was like a weaver's beam, fell by the valorous might of Jaare-oregim a Beth-lehemite. From this last place the war was transferred into the territory of Gath; and in this fourth battle, another son of Goliath's, who had six fingers upon each hand, and six toes upon each foot, did, in imitation of his father, challenge the whole army of Israel to send out one of their number to fight him, and was brought down by the hands of Jonathan the brother of David. The Philistines thus exhausted of their gigantic brood, or perceiving that their mighty stature and strength stood them in no manner of stead, refrained from a further prosecution of the war they had so

* 2 Sam. v. 17—25. * Ibid. viii. 1.

(T) Or the valley of the giants, as Josephus (55) renders it; who supposes that they were now unable to raise any thing of an army themselves, and that they were joined by the Syrians and Phœnicians; as a proof of which he alleges that they returned home upon their first defeat, and came back to the charge again with thrice the numbers they had before, and drew up in the same place where the former battle was fought; and that they were again miraculously defeated with very great ease, and put to flight with the loss of all their baggage and their gods. Josephus is very fond of trebling the forces of a vanquished people, as we have observed before (56), and may have occasion to observe hereafter. But why he should imagine the Philistines were at so low an ebb as to be unable to make war with David of themselves, we do not clearly perceive, even though we should allow of the great slaughter and destruction he makes of them in some of their preceding battles (57).

(U) Or, as it is in the margin, the bridle of Ammah; or, as it is explained in the Chronicles (58), the city of Gath and the territory thereunto belonging. There are many and very various expositions of this point; but as the context clears it up naturally, we shall pass them over, and adhere to that, as most likely and just. Only let it be observed, that as Gath was the royal seat, it may, on many accounts, have been called a bridle to the rest of the land. As to its standing upon a hill called Ammah, as some commentators teach, they would have done well, had they produced their authority for it. The word חממה Ammah on the contrary doth signify a river, which the Jews therefore suppose to have run between Gath abovemention'd, and Metbeg, a fort on the other side, which receiv'd new reinforcements from the former, till David had cut off the communication, by stopping or turning the course of the stream.

(W) If they were not immediately his sons, they may possibly have been of the same family. To say nothing of their descent from the Anakims, who were expelled from Hebron, and took up their abode at Gath, which is a very obscure piece of history; it is common in all nations to see families remarkable for their extraordinary stature: nor is there any need to suppose them descended from any ancient race of giants. We are indeed told that the Anakims either fled from Hebron to the cities of the Philistines, or else were planted there of old time (59). But how it came to pass that they were so dwindled away there in the days of David, and how it comes to pass that we read no where of them in the armies of the Philistines till the days of Saul, we presume not to say.

(X) Josephus (60) calls him Amchob.

(Y) To judge of him by the weight of his spear, he was not of much above half the strength and stature of Goliath, the head of whose spear, as we have noted (61), weighed six hundred shekels, or twenty-two of our pounds Troy; whereas this man's weighed but three hundred shekels, or eleven of the same pounds.

(Z) The words of the text are obscure; it says, he was girded, or accoutred anew, or had on a new accoutrement — Josephus (62) says only, that he had his sword by his side. Of all the expositions we have seen, we approve of that most, which guesses that his armour, or military accoutrement, was made on purpose for him (63), to suit his strength, which surpassed that of an ordinary man.

(55) Antiq. l. 7. c. 4. (56) See before in the Notes, p. 297. (57) See before in the Notes, p. 353. (58) 1. xviii. 1. (59) Josh. xi. 23. (60) Antiq. c. 10. (61) See before in the Notes, p. 353. (62) Ubi supr. (63) Vide CLERIC. in 2 Sam. xxi. 16.

obstinately maintained in spite of the frowns of fortune in three successive conflicts, a before this last <sup>b</sup>.

FROM henceforward the affairs of this people are more slightly touched on; whence it may be argued that they suffered a decay; and, accordingly we are told, that their horn was broken asunder by these unfortunate wars with David<sup>c</sup>; who now made them tributaries to his throne, as we shall see anon (A); though on the other hand it may be also concluded, that having so often, and to so little purpose, engaged themselves in bloody and destructive wars, they grew wiser, and rather applied themselves to commerce and the advancement of their nation that way (B). And hence it may be that we find their country open to the Israelites in the beginning of Solomon's reign, Achish the son of Maachab then reigning at Gath; who, <sup>b</sup> whether he is the same Achish who was so kind to David, we must not hope to determine, though commentators are divided upon it: probably he was not <sup>d</sup>.

MANY years after these wars, the Philistines were harrassed by Nadab king of Israel, who laid siege to a city of theirs, called Gibbethon; which city was again besieged by Elab king of Israel<sup>e</sup>, some years afterwards; for it belonged to their kingdom, though the Philistines finding it deserted by the Levites<sup>f</sup>, seized on it, and kept it, notwithstanding these several efforts to tear it from them; the kingdom of Israel at this time being in great distraction.

BUT notwithstanding this their obstinacy against the kings of Israel, they afterwards courted the favour of Jehoshaphat king of Judah, by a voluntary payment of <sup>c</sup> the tribute <sup>h</sup>, which had been, as we may hence conclude, imposed on them by their conqueror David (C); and which, it seems, they had neglected to pay to some of Jehoshaphat's predecessors, as this story plainly enough insinuates, and as will be further confirmed by what follows.

FOR they rebelled against Jehoram the son of Jehoshaphat, and brake into his kingdom, and in the end rifled his palace of all the wealth they there found; and even extended their rage against him, to the cruel butchery of all his house, except Ataliab and her son Abaziah, who some how or other escaped. At this time we also gather that they carried off a great number of captives, some of whom they sold to the Edomites<sup>i</sup>, next to themselves, the worst enemies the Israelites had; <sup>d</sup> and some to the Grecians<sup>k</sup>, thereby sending them so far from home, that they could have but little or no chance of seeing their native country again. This their extraordinary success may have been brought to pass either by the conjunctive, or distant co-operation of the Arabians, who made war at the same time upon Jehoram.

WHENCESOEVER their success arose, it in the end proved a very unfortunate affair to them. They were invaded by Uzziah king of Judah, who dismantled Gath, and Jabneh, with Asdod, and reared cities of strength among them to awe

<sup>b</sup> Ibid. xxi. 15--22. * See Ecclesiast. xlvii. 7. <sup>c</sup> 1 Kings ii. 39. <sup>e</sup> Ibid. xv. 27. <sup>f</sup> Ibid. xvi. 15. <sup>g</sup> 2 Chron. xi. 14. <sup>h</sup> Ibid. xvii. 11. <sup>i</sup> Amos i. 6. <sup>j</sup> Joel iii. 6. <sup>k</sup> 2 Chron. xxi. 16, 17.

(A) According to Josephus (64), this was the last battle they had with the Hebrews, never daring to look them in the face again; which must be one of his mistakes.

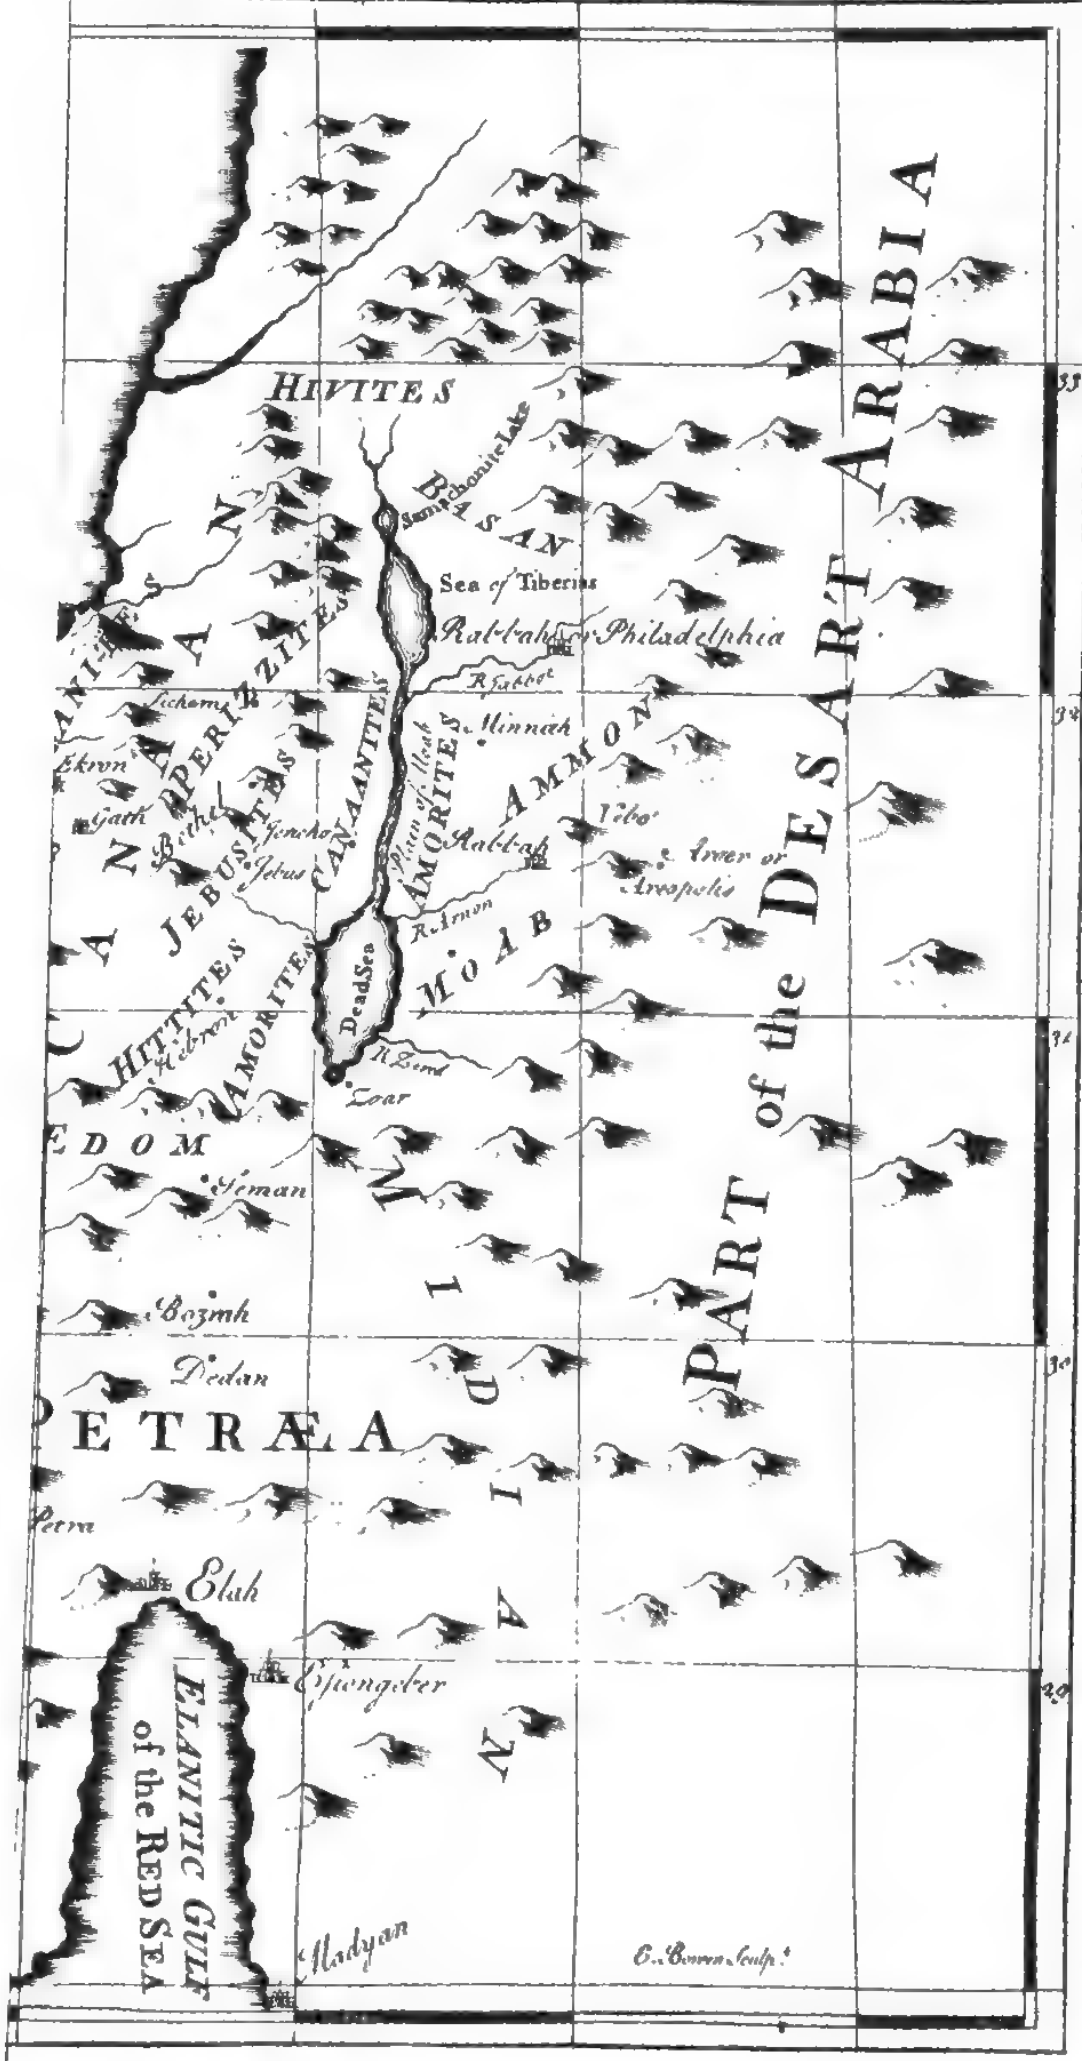

(B) We the rather think after this manner, it being pretty evident that they had been increased some years ago by the fugitive Edomites (65), who brought with them their superior skill in commercial and nautical affairs; not that the Philistines were wholly ignorant therein till the Edomites came among them; but it is now likely they applied themselves thereto much more than ever, and that they were greatly improved therein. Sir Isaac Newton (66) reckons that they took Sidon by the advice and assistance of the Edomites; thereby, it is likely, meaning to extend their trade, which they had now chiefly at heart, by destroying so dangerous a rival. He also (67) supposes this to have fallen out in the reign of David; for he observes that in Solomon's reign the Zidonians, tho' settled at Tyre, had not yet lost their name. We read in Justin (68), that Sidon was expugned by the Philistines; though he seems to mistake, in saying it was done by the king of Ascalon; for we do not read of a king of that place any where else. Remembering the story of the Syrian goddess Derceto, who was metamorphosed here (69), the Greeks and Romans may have considered the city of Ascalon as the metropolis of Palestine; whence we find the king of Palestine placed in that city by Trogus, whom Justin epitomizes.

(C) Josephus (70) calls it their accustomed tribute, and it can have been no body but David himself that imposed it on them.

(64) Ubi supr. (65) See before, p. 342. (66) Chronol. of anc. Kingd. amended, p. 104, 105. (67) Ubi supr. (68) l. 18. c. 3. (69) See before, p. 340. (70) Antiq. l. 8. c. 9.

of the Canaanites, Moabites, Ammonites, Midianites, and the Children of ISRAEL, according to this History.

obstinately maintained in spite of the frowns of fortune in three successive conflicts, a before this last <sup>b</sup>.

FROM henceforward the affairs of this people are more slightly touched on; whence it may be argued that they suffered a decay; and, accordingly we are told, that their horn was broken asunder by these unfortunate wars with David<sup>c</sup>, who now made them tributaries to his throne, as we shall see anon (A); though on the other hand it may be also concluded, that having so often, and to so little purpose, engaged themselves in bloody and destructive wars, they grew wiser, and rather applied themselves to commerce and the advancement of their nation that way (B). And hence it may be that we find their country open to the Israelites in the beginning of Solomon's reign, Achish the son of Maachab then reigning at Gath; who, <sup>b</sup> whether he is the same Achish who was so kind to David, we must not hope to determine, though commentators are divided upon it: probably he was not <sup>d</sup>.

MANY years after these wars, the Philistines were harassed by Nadab king of Israel, who laid siege to a city of theirs, called Gibbethon; which city was again besieged by Elab king of Israel<sup>e</sup>, some years afterwards; for it belonged to their kingdom, though the Philistines finding it deserted by the Levites<sup>f</sup>, seized on it, and kept it, notwithstanding these several efforts to tear it from them; the kingdom of Israel at this time being in great distraction.

BUT notwithstanding this their obstinacy against the kings of Israel, they afterwards courted the favour of Jehoshaphat king of Judah, by a voluntary payment of <sup>c</sup> the tribute <sup>b</sup>, which had been, as we may hence conclude, imposed on them by their conqueror David (C); and which, it seems, they had neglected to pay to some of Jehoshaphat's predecessors, as this story plainly enough insinuates, and as will be further confirmed by what follows.

FOR they rebelled against Jehoram the son of Jehoshaphat, and brake into his kingdom, and in the end rifled his palace of all the wealth they there found; and even extended their rage against him, to the cruel butchery of all his house, except Abiah and her son Abaziah, who some how or other escaped. At this time we also gather that they carried off a great number of captives, some of whom they sold to the Edomites<sup>g</sup>, next to themselves, the worst enemies the Israelites had; <sup>d</sup> and some to the Grecians<sup>h</sup>, thereby sending them so far from home, that they could have but little or no chance of seeing their native country again. This their extraordinary success may have been brought to pass either by the conjunctive, or distant co-operation of the Arabians, who made war at the same time upon Jehoram.

WHENCESOEVER their success arose, it in the end proved a very unfortunate affair to them. They were invaded by Uzziah king of Judah, who dismantled Gath, and Jabneh, with Ashdod, and reared cities of strength among them to awe

<sup>b</sup> Ibid. xxi. 15--22. <sup>c</sup> See Ecclesiast. xlvii. 7. <sup>d</sup> 1 Kings ii. 39. <sup>e</sup> Ibid. xv. 27. <sup>f</sup> Ibid. xvi. 15. <sup>g</sup> 2 Chron. xi. 14. <sup>h</sup> Ibid. xvii. 11. <sup>i</sup> Amos i. 6. <sup>k</sup> Joel iii. 6. <sup>l</sup> 2 Chron. xxi. 16, 17.

(A) According to Josephus (64), this was the last battle they had with the Hebrews, never daring to look them in the face again; which must be one of his mistakes.

(B) We the rather think after this manner, it being pretty evident that they had been increased some years ago by the fugitive Edomites (65), who brought with them their superior skill in commercial and nautical affairs; not that the Philistines were wholly ignorant therein till the Edomites came among them; but it is now likely they applied themselves thereto much more than ever, and that they were greatly improved therein. Sir Isaac Newton (66) reckons that they took Sidon by the advice and assistance of the Edomites; thereby, it is likely, meaning to extend their trade, which they had now chiefly at heart, by destroying so dangerous a rival. He also (67) supposes this to have fallen out in the reign of David; for he observes that in Solomon's reign the Zidonians, tho' settled at Tyre, had not yet lost their name. We read in Justin (68), that Sidon was expugned by the Philistines; though he seems to mistake, in saying it was done by the king of Ascalon; for we do not read of a king of that place any where else. Remembering the story of the Syrian goddess Derceto, who was metamorphosed here (69), the Greeks and Romans may have considered the city of Ascalon as the metropolis of Palestine; whence we find the king of Palestine placed in that city by Trogus, whom Justin epitomizes.

(C) Josephus (70) calls it their accustomed tribute, and it can have been no body but David himself that imposed it on them.

(64) Ubi supr. (65) See before, p. 342. (66) Chronol. of anc. Kingd. amended, p. 104, 105. (67) Ubi supr. (68) l. 18. c. 3. (69) See before, p. 340. (70) Antiq. l. 8. c. 9.

them,

of the Canaanites, Moabites, Ammonites, Midian odus of CHILDREN of ISRAEL, according to this History

a them, and keep them in subjection<sup>a</sup>; which must greatly have broken their spirits, and have brought them low.

THEY groaned under this fearful blow all the days of Uzziah, we may suppose, and, perhaps, all the days of Jotham; but in the reign of Abaz, they perceived the crazy state of the kingdom of Judah; and observing the opportunity to be favourable, they took up arms again. They warred against Abaz with a success which made ample amends for their sufferings by Uzziah, his grandfather; reducing the cities of Beth-sheMesh, Ajalon, Gedoroth, Shococho, Timna, and Gimzo, and the several territories thereunto belonging, and there settled themselves, thereby adding a large portion of the kingdom of Judah to their own country*.

b THUS did the Philistines rather more than reinstate themselves; but this fine acquisition was a very short time in their hands. They were immediately after this conquest admonished not to rejoice, because the rod of him that smote them was broken: for that out of the serpent's root should come forth a cockatrice . . . . . which should dissolve their whole country°. And this was severely fulfilled on them by Hezekiah the son of Abaz, whom they had conquered; for Hezekiah, as we understand it, over-ran their whole country°, and forced ample retribution of all sorts from them. This, though it had been, alone, a very grievous oppression on them, they saw almost at the same time the Affrians among them, in the reign of Sennacherib, who sent his general Tartan to reduce them. Their city Ashdod was besieged accordingly, and taken by Tartan†; and thus successively were they broken, almost without any intermission.

AND now the burthen of their final extinction comes heavily upon them. By their subjection to the Affrians, their liberties departed entirely from them; and, what was worse, their country became the seat of a long and obstinate war. For Psammitichus king of Egypt beholding the vast progress of the Affrian power, grew jealous, and apprehensive that Egypt might share the fate of its neighbours; and therefore to be as timely in his opposition as he could, he undertook to drive the Affrians out of Palestine. To this purpose he particularly laid siege to Ashdod of Azotos; but he was twenty nine years before that place ere he could reduce it°:

d during all which time it cannot be doubted but that the country sighed under all the calamities usual in such cases.

FROM henceforward they were tributary to the great monarchies, as they succeeded each other. In the beginning of this servitude they were miserably harrassed by the Egyptians, who, willing to make their barrier as strong as possible against the dreaded invader, laid hands on all they could of this country, and, particularly, took Gaza from them†.

AFTER this we read of a king of Gaza*; concerning which we have nothing to add, nor have we ought else to relate concerning this people. What in the end became of them will be best learned from the threats of the prophets, and particularly Zephaniah, who paints their destruction in very lively and natural colours (D): Gaza shall be forsaken, and Ashkelon a desolation: they shall drive out Ashdod at the noon day, and Ekron shall be rooted up. Wo unto the inhabitants of the sea coasts, the nation of the Cherethites: the word of the Lord is against you: O Canaan, the land of the Philistines, I will destroy thee, that there shall be no inhabitant; and the sea-coast shall be dwellings and cottages for shepherds, and folds for flocks†.

<sup>a</sup> Ibid. xxvi. 6. * Ibid. xxviii. 18. ° Isa. xiv. 29—31. ° 2 Kings xviii. 8. † Isai. xx. 1. ° HERODOT. l. 2. c. 157. † Jerem. xlvii. ° Zach. ix. 5. † ZEPHAN. xi. 4—6. See also Joel iii. Amos i. Jerem. xlvii. Ezek. xxv. Zach. ubi supr.

(D) Here it is worth observing, that Gath is omitted, as if already destroyed, as it doubtless was, being most obnoxious to the enemy, as it was the royal seat of this turbulent people; and as it was a key to, and a curb upon the whole country (71). Hence therefore it must have been that the throne of this kingdom was removed to Gaza; but to pursue this point any further were time lost.

We must only acquaint the reader that the Gath which Eusebius and St. Jerom mention as still standing in their days (72), were different from this metropolis. Gath in the Hebrew signifies a vine or oil press. And it is no wonder we find several towns of that name, and some of them tacked to another appellative; such as Gath-Rimmon, Gath-Epher, Gath-Shechem, and the like.

(71) See before in the Notes, 357. (72) Loc. Habr. & alib.

C H A P. V.

The History of the ancient Syrians.

S E C T. I.

A Description of Syria.Its Names.

SYRIA is in Hebrew Aram, so named from Aram the youngest son of Shem.<sup>a</sup> This Hebrew name is of very wide extent; perhaps, of little less than the Greek name Syria; at least it included what we now call Syria and Mesopotamia, which is the Aram Nabaraim or Syria of the two rivers<sup>b</sup>.

ARAM then is its first and genuine name; how it came to be called Syria is variously said. Some<sup>c</sup> derive it from one Syrus, who sprung from the earth (A). Others<sup>d</sup>, from Syrus, the son of Agenor. Other thoughts there are upon this subject; but the most certain opinion is, that Syria is a contraction of Affyria<sup>e</sup>, and that the ancients usually confounded them together (B).

AUTHORS are not agreed upon the exact bounds of this country, because they consider it at different times, when its name was more or less famous, and its empire more or less ample. But, confining ourselves to the proper Syria, we may venture to set bounds to it, and determine its dimensions. It lay between the Mediterranean on the west, and the river Euphrates on the east: and between mount Taurus on the north, and Arabia the desert, Palestine, and Phœnice on the south. And this tract extends from the thirty second to the thirty seventh degree of north latitude, and from the fifty eighth to the sixty second degree of longitude. Its length from north to south three hundred seventy five miles; its breadth from east to west three hundred miles.

Its Divisions.

SYRIA, in ancient times, has been very variously divided. At first, we may be sure, it was parcelled out into endless little kingdoms and jurisdictions. In after-times it seems to have been divided into four principal ones, Zobab, Damascus, Hamath and Geshur. These were the principal divisions; the rest we find in scripture, such as Beir-rebob, Ishtob, Maacha, were subdivisions, as we think. Afterwards the whole country was divided into two parts only, though the Phœnicians, Idumeans, Jews, Gazites and Azotites, or the whole country of the Philistines, were included, which two parts were Calesyria, and Phœnice<sup>f</sup>. After the death of Alexander, Syria in the great extent of its name was thus divided, Commagene, Seleucis of Syria, Calesyria, Phœnice on the sea-coast, and Judea in the midland. This is Strabo's division; but Ptolemy subdivides these, and in the proper Syria only, reckons Commagene, Pieria, Cyrristia, or Cyrrhestica, Seleucis, Cassotis or Casictis, Chalybonitis, Chalcidice or Chalcidene, Apamene, Laodicene, Phœnicia Mediterranea, Calesyria, and Palmyrene.

Commagene.

To follow the division of Ptolemy; Commagene or Comagene, had on the west mount Amanus; on the north, part of mount Taurus; on the east it was washed by the Euphrates; but on the south, whether it was conterminous with Seleucis or Cyrrhestica, or with both, is uncertain. It was the north corner of Syria. The chief cities of this province were Samofata upon the Euphrates, Antiochia ad Taurum,

<sup>a</sup> See before, p. 163.<sup>b</sup> AFRICAN. apud SYNCELL. p. 150.<sup>c</sup> Chronic. Alexandr. p. 101.<sup>d</sup> Vide HERODOT. l. 7. c. 63. JUST. l. 1. c. 2.<sup>e</sup> STRABO, l. 16.

(A) Perhaps this fabulous account may have taken birth from an ancient tradition, which still obtains, in the country, as we shall shew hereafter, that Adam was created in Syria.

(B) Mr. Selden in his Prolegomena to his Syrian gods, has dwelt on this point, to whom we refer our reader, who would be thoroughly informed and convinced thereof. We shall only add, that Lucian (8), who was himself a Syrian of Samofata, calls himself an Affyrian.

(8) De Dea Syr. p. 1.

- a or at the foot of Taurus, and Germanicia; these and other cities and eminent places stood within this compass, once flourishing and magnificent, but now obliterated, and in ruins.

THE maritime Seleucia contained Pieria and Casotis, which were subdivisions Seleucia, thereof; the first lying to the north, and the last to the south. Within these limits Pieria and stood Alexandria upon the Simus Issicus, Seleucia, Pieria upon the Mediterranean, and Casotis. Laodicea upon the same.

IN the inland or Mediterranean Seleucia, stood the famous Antioch upon the Orontes, Seleucia Me- diterranea. These two Seleucides are by Mela and Pliny called Antiochene.

- b APAMENE lay to the eastward of Casotis, and had Apamea, at least half sur- Apamene. rounded by the Orontes, for its chief town.

CYRRHESTICA was a province upon the Euphrates. Cyrrhus, or Cyrus, was Cyrrhestica the capital of this part of Syria. Here also stood a famous city called Hierapolis, Bambyce, and, by the Syrians Magog<sup>1</sup>, where the Syrian goddess was worshipped.

CHALCIDINE was wholly an inland province, nor bordered either upon the Chalcidene. Mediterranean sea, or the Euphrates, and had Chalcis for its capital. It was surrounded by Antiochene or Seleucia on the west; by Cyrrhestica on the north; by Chalchbonitis on the east; and by Apamene and Cele Syria on the south.

ON the east of Chalcidene lay Chalybonitis, on the Euphrates, its chief city Chalybonis. Chalybon.

- c PALMYRENE was a spacious and fertile province in the midst of a frightful Palmyrene. desert to the south of Chalybonitis; washed on the east by the river Euphrates; once stored with great cities; all of which are quite perished, but their metropolis Palmyra; which, though now as much a desert as that which surrounds and divides it from the rest of the nations, is yet deservedly reckoned one of the wonders of our present world.

- THERE is no reconciling the ancient geographers, so as to be able to determine Cele Syria the bounds of what they mean by Cele Syria; but before all of them we prefer Strabo, who tells us that Cele Syria was the vale between Libanus and Anti-Libanus; which however the name may have been extended, was undoubtedly the proper Cele Syria and Syria Cava, which we take to have been the same. The principal cities of this part are Heliopolis, now Balbek, which we shall have occasion to resume hereafter, and Damascus, now Sbām, as is commonly and inaccurately said, which lying eastward of Anti-Libanus, cannot be immediately reckoned into the proper Cele Syria.

WE know not how to fix the place of Laodicea. It may have been a part of Laodicea the proper Cele Syria. Its chief city was Laodicea Cabiosa or ad Libanum.

OF the Phœnicia Mediterranea, we shall speak in the next chapter.

- UNDER the Roman empire, the proper Syria was divided into Comagena or Ober Prid. Euphratenfis, Syria, Palmyrena or Syria Salutaris, Phœnicia Libani or Libanefia, fims. Libanefia and Libanufia, as we think. The Arabs reckon Palestine into Syria, on the one hand, and even Cilicia on the other, and call it Sbām, and Abulfeda divides the whole into five Junds or provinces, the Kinnesryne, the Hemfene, the Damascene, the Jordanitic, and the Palestine.

THE climate of Syria is happy, if any be so, and its fertility so great, that it Climate and may be justly stiled a pleasant garden almost throughout. We shall not here enter Fertility. into a detail of its productions, which are many, noble, useful and delicious. It abounds with sufficient of all things, both for the profit and delight of man. It is mostly a plain country, and for the most part covered over with a deep and rich soil. In short, it yields to no spot on earth that lies under the same happy parallel.

THE rivers of this country that we shall take notice of, are the Orontes (B), the Rivers. largest of them all, a turbid, rapid stream, with waters not fit to drink, and fish unfit to eat<sup>2</sup>; and the Barrady, formerly the Chrysorrhoas, which rushing from Anti-

<sup>1</sup> PLIN. Hist. Nat. l. 5. c. 19, or 23.

<sup>2</sup> See MAUNDRELL'S Journey from Alepp. to Jeruf. p. 4.

(B) This river, according to Strabo (2), disappeared at a place called Charybdis, between Apamea and Antioch; and after having run five miles under ground, appeared again. In the same author (3) also there is a fabulous tradition concerning the origin of this river, as that Typhon, in his flight, furrowed up the earth, and formed the canal; that he was thunder-struck at the fountain-head of this river, and that his going down, was the cause of the spring which rises there. They feigned him to be a huge dragon. This may be added to the fabulous accounts we have already given of Typhon's exit (4).

(2) l. 6. p. 275.

(3) l. 16. p. 750.

(4) See before, p. 244.

Libanus down to Damascus, is there divided into endless streams for the supply and a decoration of that city; whence recollecting at some distance, it soon loses itself in a bog *. The rivers Abana and Pharpar must have been only branches (C) of this.

Natural Rarities.

THINGS more particularly remarkable in this country are the two valleys of salt, the one within four hours of Aleppo <sup>b</sup>, the other in the neighbourhood of Palmyra <sup>i</sup>, which shoot forth that mineral in surprizing abundance; the soil to a considerable depth being strongly impregnated therewith, as is said of the valley near Aleppo; and as might, doubtless, have been said of the other, had trial thereof been made. The medicinal waters also in and about Palmyra, and in several other parts of Palmyrene <sup>a</sup> might claim our attention, were this a proper place. Among the remarkable of this country we may also reckon the few cedars which are now standing upon Lebanon <sup>b</sup> or Libanus. They are near a Christian monastery, called Canobine, about ten hours journey from Tripoli. They stand in the midst of snow (D), near the highest part of Libanus or Lebanon. Of the old ones, which are very large, there are only sixteen, but young ones of a lesser growth there are in great numbers. One of the largest of the former being measured, was found to be twelve yards six inches in girth, yet perfectly sound, and the spread of its branches was thirty seven yards in circumference: and about five or six yards from the ground it divided itself into five limbs, each equal to a great tree <sup>t</sup>. Another traveller *, who was also on the spot, tells us, that the largest he measured was, towards the middle of the trunk, seven foot wanting two inches round, at the same time that he reckons the spread of its <sup>c</sup> boughs one hundred and twenty foot about. In which last dimension, agreeing so nearly with what is said before of the same, there must be a monstrous slip of the pen, or oversight of the press, either in this or the former account; for the difference between seven foot and twelve yards is quite surprizing. But the difference between these travellers goes on: the latter says, the largest of the cedars had not a trunk above six or seven foot high out of the ground, which falls most unaccountably short of what has been just now said upon that point: and yet this author [De la Roque] talks of the enormity of the trunks of these trees, and of the prodigious branches which part therefrom; which is throwing away great words very improperly, if he is not most egregiously out in the dimensions he gives us, which are <sup>d</sup> so trifling that they cannot deserve admiration in any degree. This, though a digression of such a kind as is unfit to find a place in a work of this nature, we hope

<sup>a</sup> MAUNDRELL'S Voyage from Aleppo to Jerusalem, p. 113.

<sup>b</sup> Idem ibid. sub fine.

<sup>i</sup> Philosophical Transact. Numb. 217. p. 83.

* Ibid. p. 103, 104.

<sup>t</sup> MAUNDRELL ubi

supr. p. 142.

<sup>c</sup> DE LA ROQUE, Voyage de Syrie, Tome I. p. 88.

(C) Radziwille (2), the Palatine of Wilna, tells us roundly of the rivers Abana and Pharpar, which watered the city of Damascus, when he was there, which is about one hundred and fifty years ago, and that they were unnavigable, but full of fish, and streamed down to it from the mountain Chrizorea, which should have been written Chrysorrhoas, the Greek name of the river which watered Damascus, and not of any mountain there. Thevenot, who was so curious and minute an observer of every thing in and about Damascus, never once mentions the rivers Abana and Pharpar; but tells us (3) of three rivers that water Damascus, and meet at the end of the town; one of which, in the chapter following, he calls Banias. There is no footsteps of the names Abana and Pharpar * among the best Arabian geographers. Abulfeda tells us, that the stream which supplies Damascus, comes out of a cavern on the west side of the city, and immediately divides; which is so exactly Dr. Maundrell's (4) description of this water, that they very abundantly confirm each other. This last traveller could not so much as find any memory of the names of Abana and Pharpar, and supposes they must have been branches of this river Barrady, which comes out of the rock. And, as he so nicely agrees with Abulfeda in the approach of this river to Damascus, he does the same with Thevenot in its departure therefrom; they both agreeing, that its divided streams meet again on the other side of the town. Dr. Maundrell then in this case may be safely relied on, in what he says of this remarkable stream.

(D) Ramwolf, who visited these cedars about midsummer, complains of the rigour of the cold, and the snows here. Radziwille, who was here in June, about five years after him, talks of the snow that never melts away from these mountains. Other travellers talk to the same purpose; among whom our Maundrell represents the cedars standing in the midst of snow; but he was there in the month of May. From all this we might have formed a judgment that the cedars stand always in the midst of snow; but we are assured of the contrary by another traveller (5), according to whom the snows here begin to melt in April, and are no more to be seen after July; nor is, says he, any at all left, but in such clefts of the mountains which the sun cannot come at; that the snow begins not to fall again till December, and that he himself, when he was here, saw no snow at all; and it is probable, that he speaks nothing but the truth.

(2) Peregrin Jerusolym. Epist. 2. p. 31. (3) Travels in the Levant, Part 2. Book 1. c. 4. * Vide ALBER. SCULT. Comment. Geograph. in vit. Salad. ad vocem Damascus. (4) Journey from Aleppo to Jerus. p. 122. (5) DE LA ROQUE Voyage de Syrie, Tome I. p. 89.

- a we shall be excused it, meaning thereby only to obviate what might be objected, by some, to the discredit of a very sincere traveller of our own nation (E). It will not be expected of us to give an accurate description of this noble tree; therefore we shall only say, that it bears a narrow leaf, of a sad green, together with a cone like that of the pine-tree, but darker, and of a smoother coat. As these cedars spread out extremely with a broad flat head, which is compared to the top of an umbrella, the weight of the snow that might lodge upon them at certain seasons, would break down their branches: but, to prevent this, they are reported to have the extraordinary faculty of preparing themselves against so destructive a danger, by stretching their branches upwards till they form a cone; thereby exhibiting the smallest surface possible to the heavens, and by that means, preserving themselves from ruin<sup>m</sup>. These cedars of Lebanon making so noble a figure in the book of the Old Testament, and having been anciently the pride of this country, we could not well say less than we have concerning the few of them left, which are held in such veneration by the inhabitants in these parts, that nothing can be added thereto (F).

- As we have been so particular in describing the Egyptian monuments of antiquity, Artificial Ramus, we cannot pass over the chief, at least, of those which are to be found in this country, which in the judgment of many, may be thought no way inferior to any thing of the kind in Egypt. Who founded the noble edifices, whose remains we shall have here occasion to describe, is quite uncertain; but nothing is more probable than that they were not erected under any of the princes in the ensuing history, they being in the most correct stile of the ancient Greeks and Romans. Upon this account we might be taxed with irregularity in introducing them into a period, when they had no being, had we not this for our excuse; that being quite in the dark, as to the time when they were built, we may as well speak of them here as any where else.

THOUGH there are many noble vestiges of the magnificence of Syria, scattered up and down the country, both Pagan and Christian, we shall dwell on two only; Balbek, formerly Heliopolis, as is commonly supposed, and Palmyra or Tadmor in the wilderness.

- d BALBEK or Balbeck is mentioned by the Arabians as the wonder of Syria (G); and such of our European travellers as have visited it, are so charmed with what they there behold, that they are at a loss how to express their admiration. On the south-west of the town, which stands in a delightful plain on the west foot of Anti-Libanus, is a heathen temple, together with the remains of some other edifices; among the rest, a palace of a true magnificence. These ancient structures have been patched and pieced in latter times, and converted into a castle, as it is called. As you draw

= DE LA ROQUE ubi sup. p. 90, 91.

(E) We cannot forbear observing, that there seems to be almost as great a difference, concerning these cedars, between Rawley (5) and Radzeville (7); who visited them about a century and a half ago. The former reckons the largest cedars at several fathoms in circumference. The latter says, they were handsome proper trees, with wide spreading branches, like the trees the Poles call Modrazes; he does not raise the admiration at all. But the truth of it is, Mr. de la Roque must be excused, if he does deceive us by lessening the cedars so much. It is not his own voyage, though he sets his name to it, which is somewhat odd. He is no more than editor of this, as well as of other voyages under his name, which were really and properly Monf. le Chevalier d'Arvieux's. To prove that it must be his mistake, we shall only recur to the memoirs of the missionaries (8) in the Levant, where a Jesuit, who measured the largest of these cedars, tells us it was in girth six fathoms, which square very well with Maunderell's twelve yards.

(F) We are told (9), that at the foot of the largest of these cedars are four stone altars: That upon the day of the transfiguration, the patriarch of the Maronites repairs to them, attended by a number of bishops, priests, and monks; and followed by five or six thousand of their religion from all parts; and that under these trees they celebrate that festival, which they miscall the feast of cedars. By another it is added, that the patriarch officiates pontifically upon this solemn occasion; that they are particularly mindful of the blessed Virgin upon this day; because the scripture compares her to the cedars of Lebanon; and that the same holy father threatens with his church thunderbolts those who presume to (10) hurt or diminish them.

(G) The Arabian geographical lexicographer, cited by Schultens, in his geographical commentary (11), at the end of his edition of Soltan Salâh'addin's life says; Balbek is a city of three days journey from Damascus, where are wonderful foundations and magnificent vestiges of antiquity, and palaces with marble columns, such as in the whole world are no where else to be seen. And Abulfida, at Balbek are places of hewn stone with most lofty columns; nor is there in all Syria any stone structures more admirable or magnificent.

(6) RAY's Collect. of Voyages ubi sup. (7) Peregrin Jerosolym. ubi sup. (8) Tome IV. p. 358.
(9) Ibid. (10) DE LA ROQUE ubi sup. p. 87, 89. (11) Ad vocem Balbecum.

near

The Rotunda. near to these venerable ruins, you meet with a rotunda, or round pile of building, <sup>a</sup> incircled with pillars of the Corinthian order, which support a cornish that runs all round the structure; the whole of great elegance and stateliness, but now in a very tottering condition *. It is mostly of marble, and though round on the outside, is an octogon within; being withinside adorned with eight arches, supported by eight Corinthian columns, each of one single piece. It is now open at top, but appears to have been covered with a shell, and to have been much embellished with the figures of eagles. The Greeks, who have converted this lovely round into a church, have barbarously spoiled the beauty of the inside, by daubing it over with plaster *. Leaving this, you come to a large, firm, and very lofty pile of building, which has the air of an adjectitious work; and through this pile you pass into a noble arched <sup>b</sup> walk or portico, one hundred and fifty paces long, which leads you to the temple.

The great Temple.

THIS temple has, ~~on~~ a miracle, resisted the injuries of time, and the madness of superstition, being as good as entire. It is an oblong square, in its general form and proportion exactly like St. Paul's Covent-Garden; but for magnificence of structure and dimension, there is scarce any comparison, this temple being almost as big again every way. Its length on the outside is one hundred ninety two foot, and its breadth ninety six *. Its length within side is one hundred and twenty foot, and its breadth sixty. The pronaos, or anti-temple, took up fifty four foot of the hundred and ninety, but is now tumbled down, and the pillars which supported it are broken. The whole body of this temple, as it now stands, is surrounded with a noble portico, supported <sup>c</sup> by pillars of the Corinthian order, six foot three inches in diameter, about fifty four in height (H), and each of three stones apiece. Their distance from each other, and from the wall of the temple, is nine foot. There are fourteen of them on each side of the temple, and eight at each end, counting the corner pillars in each number. The architrave and cornish, which are supported all round by these pillars, are exquisitely carved. And as you walk round this temple, between its wall and the pillars which go round it, you have overhead, a solid arcade all the way, of great stones hollowed out arch-wise; in the center of each of which is a god, a goddess, or a heroe (I), struck out with that life that is not to be conceived *; and all round <sup>d</sup> the foot of the wall of the temple itself is a double border of marble, the lowest parts of which is a continued bas-relief in miniature, expressing heathen mysteries and ceremonies; where, without any confusion, you see a surprizing mixture of men and beasts, in the most happy composition and most agreeable variety *.

HAVING thus described the outside of this temple, we will proceed to the inside; but let us first take a view of the entrance, than which nothing can be more august. The ascent to it is by thirty steps, on each side bounded by a wall, which terminates in a pedestal, on which formerly stood a statue, as may be safely supposed. The front is composed of eight Corinthian pillars, as we have already said, fluted, as are all the rest that go round the temple, and an ample and nobly proportioned triangular pediment. Within these eight pillars, at the distance of about six foot, are four others, like the former, and two pillars of three faces each, that terminate the walls of the temple, which come out a good way from the body of the temple itself. All these form a porch or portico before the door of the temple, in depth about twenty four foot, and in breadth sixty odd. Through these pillars appears the door of the temple, under the vault of the portico; but it there appears with great majesty, and without the least confusion; so nice are the proportions of the pillars, their distance from each other, and the recess of the door itself. The door-case or portal is square and of marble, in proportion and construction just like the great

* MAUNDRELL ubi supr. p. 135.    ° LA ROQUE ubi supr. p. 152.    P MAUNDRELL ubi supr. 1 Idem ibid.    ° DE LA ROQUE ubi supr. p. 138, 147.

(H) These fifty four are French feet, which, according to Maundrell, ought to be but forty five English, which is a very great difference. The French author viewed this place for a fortnight together, whereas our English traveller was scarce here a day; so that the former may be chiefly relied on in most particulars, and accordingly we have adhered chiefly to him; though they both agree very well, considering that the one was a transitory, the other a constant observer, as we may call them. Besides, in this case the thing speaks itself; for, according to our mean skill in architecture, a Corinthian pillar, whose diameter is six foot, in which they both agree, will require at least fifty foot of height to appear with any manner of elegance and delicacy.

(I) An emperor or an empress, says De la Roque (12); but in this we choose to rely on Maundrell's judgment.

(12) Ubi supr. p. 148.

a marble portal at the west end of St. Paul's, but far richer in sculpture, and larger, if we mistake not. The whole height of it is about forty foot, and its whole width about twenty eight, with an opening of about twenty foot wide <sup>r</sup>. You are no sooner got under this portal, but, looking up, you see the bottom of the lintel, enriched with a piece of sculpture, which has scarce its equal in the world. It is a vast eagle in bas relief, expanding his wings, and carrying a caduceus in his pounce; and on each hand of him is a fame <sup>r</sup> or cupid <sup>r</sup>. These, each of them, support the one end of a festoon by a string or ribbon, the other being held in the eagle's beak on each hand, inimitably fine <sup>v</sup>.

When you are got withinside of the temple, you find it divided into three isles, b two narrow on the sides, and one broad in the middle, after the manner of our churches, being formed by two rows of fluted Corinthian pillars, of between three and four foot diameter, and in height, including the pedestal, about thirty six. These pillars are twelve in number, six on a side, at the distance of about eighteen foot from each other, and about twelve from the walls of the temple. The walls are adorned with two rows or orders of pilasters one over another, and between each two of the lowermost is a round nich about fifteen foot high. The bottom of the niches is upon a level with the bases of the pillars, and the wall to that height is wrought in the proportions of a Corinthian pedestal, and the niches themselves are Corinthian in all their parts, with the strictest precision and nicest delicacy. Over these round niches are a row of square ones between the pilasters of the c upper order: the ornaments belonging to them are all marble, and they are each crowned with a triangular pediment (K). Towards the west end of the middle isle you ascend to a choir, as it is called, by thirteen steps, which are the whole breadth of this part in length. This choir is distinguished from the rest of the temple by two large square columns adorned with pilasters, which form a noble entrance, exactly corresponding with that of the temple itself. Here is a great profusion of astonishing sculpture; but the architecture is the same here as in the body of the temple, except that the pillars have no pedestals, and the niches stand upon the pavement<sup>s</sup>. The two large square pillars which so remarkably distinguish this part of the temple, d are thought to have supported a canopy; but nothing of that kind is to be seen now. In the bottom of this choir is a vast marble nich, where stood the principal deity here worshipped. In this choir are seen the most finely imagined sculptures, festoons, birds, flower, fruits; and fine bas reliefs, neptunes, tritons, fishes, sea-gods, Arion and his dolphin, and other marine figures <sup>r</sup>. The cieling or vault of this temple is bold, and divided into compartments filled with excellent carvings. It is open towards the middle; but whether a cupola or lanthorn stood there for the admission of light, or whether it was always open, cannot be judged at this distance of time <sup>s</sup>. In a word, the charming symmetry, the correct taste, and the height wherewith all the carvings are finished, even at such elevations, where such niceness e is thought unnecessary, are such, that it may be truly said, the whole pile is faultless, and without the least blemish. The whole stands upon vaults of such excellent architecture, and so bold a turn, that it is thought they served for something more than merely the support of the superincumbent weight, and may have been a subterraneous temple, applied to some particular service in the Pagan worship. And, though this temple now stands by itself, there are evident marks that it was accompanied by other buildings, no way unworthy of it; among which are reckoned four different ascents to it, one upon each angle, with marble steps so long that eight or ten persons may go up abreast <sup>s</sup>.

f Within the walls of this castle, as it is now called, are also great remains of what must have been a palace scarce inferior to any royal seat that has ever been in the world; but being by no means in so perfect a state as the temple, we shall speak of it in general terms, and insist only on such parts as deserve our greatest attention. But first of all, it must be observ'd, that the old wall which enclosed both this and

<sup>r</sup> Idem ubi supr. p. 136.    <sup>s</sup> MAUNDRELL ubi supr.    <sup>v</sup> DE LA ROQUE ubi supr. p. 137.
<sup>w</sup> Idem ibid.    <sup>x</sup> Idem ubi supr. p. 140--142.    <sup>y</sup> MAUNDRELL ubi supr. DE LA ROQUE
 ubi supr. p. 143.    <sup>z</sup> Idem ubi supr. p. 144, 145.    <sup>aa</sup> Idem ubi supr. p. 149, 150.

(K) In the draught Maundrell (13) has given is a remarkable difference; but which way to us of the inside of this temple, the upper and the lower niches are exactly alike, both round: this reconcile them we know not.

the temple above described, is built of such monstrous blocks of stone, as exceed all a belief, and have given birth to a tradition among the natives, that the whole is the work of the devil. There are particularly three, which lie end for end with each other, and which together extend one hundred eighty three foot in length, whereof one is sixty three foot long, and the other two sixty apiece. Their depth is twelve foot, and their breadth the same; and, what adds to the wonder, these stones are lifted twenty foot from the ground. The rest of the stones of this wall are of surprising dimensions, but none quite so large as these <sup>b</sup>.

The Palace.

GOING through the long arched walk, which we have already mentioned as leading to the temple, and which looks like a subterraneous passage, adorned with many buits, which for want of light cannot well be discerned, the first object which b strikes the sight is a spacious hexagonal building or wall, which forms a kind of a spacious theatre, which is open at the other end, and presents you with a terrafs, to which you ascend by marble steps. This aperture admits you into a square court, larger than the first, round which are buildings more magnificent than what you see till then. Here, on each hand, you have a double row of pillars, which form portico's or galleries of sixty six fathom in length, and eight in breadth. The bottom of this court was taken up by a third building, more sumptuous than the rest, and deeper, and seems to have been the body of the palace, fronting east, as all the fronts in this castle do. The columns belonging to this part are of such size, that they are compared with those of the hippodrome at Constantinople. Nine of these c columns are standing (L), and a good piece of the entablature, which evince it to have been one of the wonders of Asia; and, to crown all, each of these nine pillars is but one block. Many considerable and distinct vestiges of the several parts of this palace are still extant. The Corinthian order prevails chiefly throughout the whole; and scarce is there any where to be found such precious remains of architecture and sculpture. The ornaments are various, but without any of the wild extravagancies of modern architects. The fine taste of Greece, and the magnificence of Rome here meet; statues without number, buits of all sorts, proud trophies, curiously-wrought niches, walls and cielings enriched with bas-reliefs, incrustations, and other works of the finest marble; therms and cariatydes judiciously d placed. Underneath the whole are vast vaults; where from time to time you discover, through the ruins, long flights of marble stairs, near two hundred in a flight. The turn and elevation of these vaults are bold and surprising: and in these subterraneous parts you find many rooms, halls, rich appartments entire, and many marble tombs. The walls here also are adorned with niches, bas-reliefs, and inscriptions in Roman characters; but these inscriptions are quite effaced by the length of time and the damps. Some of the vaults are quite dark, and must be visited with lights, either because of their great depth, or because the passages which may have given them light are stopped up by rubbish; but others receive light by great windows, which stand on the level of the ground above: and lastly, all these edifices are built with e stones of the enormous size already mentioned, without any visible mortar, cement or binding whatsoever <sup>e</sup>. The temple and these ruins stand in the same inclosure, as we have said, and may challenge any monument of antiquity now extant, either at Athens or Rome, or even in Egypt. All over and about the town you, at every step, meet with some melancholy fragment of antiquity. The quarry from whence they had the stone for these works is a little way out of the town. It is cut out in steps something like an amphitheatre, where there lies one stone ready hewn, which seems to surpass what have been already described. It is a notion, it was too heavy to be moved; but, upon a nice examination, it is fast to the rock <sup>d</sup>. Such was Balbeck, which might tempt one to think it to have been once the most considerable place in Syria, and the delight of some mighty prince, who there chose to reside (M).

BUT

<sup>b</sup> MAUNDRELL ubi supr. p. 138. DE LA ROQUE ubi supr. p. 121. p. 124—132.

<sup>d</sup> Idem ubi supr. p. 151, 155.

<sup>e</sup> Idem ubi supr.

(L) Maundrell remembers these pillars in the following words: About fifty yards distant from the temple, is a row of Corinthian pillars, very great and lofty; with a most stately architrave and cornice at top. This speaks itself to have been part of some very august pile; but what one now sees of it is but just enough to give a regret, that there should be no more of it remaining (14). He did not visit the palace; not being prepared, we suppose, with the thoughts that there had been any building of the kind there.

(M) We flatter ourselves, that no antiquary will, according to this description of Balbeck, allow Solomon to have had any hand in what we see there; a BUT the magnificent ruins of Palmyra seem equally to claim our admiration. We shall not here examine who was the original founder of this city, whether Solomon, or any other before him, nor will we endeavour to investigate to whom we are indebted for what now stands of this desolate and abandoned town. Such discussions will come more naturally in their proper places, as they may occur in the body of this work. Thus much, however, we may safely premise, that at Palmyra we see no remains, or next to none, of Solomon's Tadmor, this city having being more than once sacked and demolished since his time, as will appear, when we come to mention the vicissitudes thereof.

(14) Journey from Aleppo to Jeruf. p. 137.

THE PROSPECK OF BALBECK.

b PALMYRA, by the Greeks and Romans; in the scripture, Tadmor in the wilderness; by Josephus, Palmyra and Tbadamor; by the septuagint copies, Theodmor and Tbedmor; and by the Arabs and Syrians at this day, Tadmor, Tadmir, and Tatmor; was once a noble city in the south-eastern parts of Syria. The origin of these names is dark and uncertain (N). It stood on a fertile island, if we may so call it, surrounded on all sides by a thirsty and barren desert. The first object that now occurs as you approach this forlorn place, is a castle of mean architecture and uncertain foundation, though impreguably situated, as we say, about half an hour from the city. This castle stands on the north side of the city, and from thence you descry Tadmor, inclosed on three sides by long ridges of mountains; but to the south is a vast plain, which stretches away out of sight. The air is exceeding good; but the soil is barren (O), affording nothing green but a few palm trees in the gardens, and a few more scattered up and down. The city must have been of large extent by the space now taken up by the ruins; but there are no vestiges of the walls, whereby to judge of its ancient form. It is now a deplorable spectacle to behold, being only inhabited by thirty or forty miserable families, who have built them poor huts of dirt, within a spacious court, which once enclosed a magnificent heathen temple.

To begin the description here; this court, which stands about the south end of the city, is two hundred and twenty yards on each side, with a high and stately wall of large square stone, adorned with pilasters within and without, to the number, as near as there; and yet prince Radziville (15), who is, in the main, a very judicious traveller, thinks it past dispute, that it is the work of Solomon. He imagines it to be the house he built for Pharaoh's daughter, and that it most exactly answers the description of that palace in the book of Kings (16), and indeed we cannot say there is no similitude in the case. This he avers upon an accurate and diligent observation, as he tells us; and adds as a further proof of it, that the buildings have not suffered any violence, but are crumbled away and decayed by meer length of time. He must have minded these ruins in general; he cannot have descended to particulars; or he had never been so egregiously overseen as he seems to have been.

(N) The author of the description of Palmyra (17), calls it Palmyra, which he derives from the palms about it, and supposes it to be the translation of a Hebrew word, importing a palm. Halley (18) derives it from Πάλμυς Palmys, which Hesychius interprets a king or father, or from Παλμυτης Palmytes, an Egyptian god, according to the same Hesychius. Seller (19) is of another mind, he cannot think of deriving it from Palmys, a king or father, or from Palmytes, an Egyptian god; for what, says he, had the gods of Egypt to do so near the banks of Euphrates? He derives it therefore from Πάλμυς, Palme, a Persian shield, or Parma, as the Latins render it. This he supports with some authority, and a good deal of probability, rejecting the fantastic etymology of Makela (20), who will have it called Palmyra, ὅτι τὸ πάλαι μολύραν γὰρ ἴσθαι τὸν κῆρυον τῷ Γαλιᾷ, because David slew Goliath there, which few or none will be willing to allow. The etymology of Tadmor is still darker, if possible; but as dark as it is, we cannot forbear acquainting the learned and inquisitive reader with the thoughts of Shultens in his geographical commentary (21) upon both the names Tadmor and Palmyra. He observes, that in the text it is written תדמור Tamor, and in the margin תדמור Tadmor. Tamor he reckons to have become the usual name of this place, for softness sake, and to refer to תדמור Tamar the palm; with which in the next note this place will be seen to have abounded. He supposes also that originally in Arabic they did not spell it [תדמור] Tadmor, but [תדמור] Tadmor, and thus he accordingly finds it in his Arabic geographical Lexicon; as if you should say palmiferous, or palm-bearing, the T for sound sake being changed into D. The alteration of this name he ascribes wholly to the Romans, who upon finding the place called Tadmor or Tadmor, may at first have corrupted it into Talmura; but that soon after, understanding the city had its name from its palm-trees, they converted Talmura into Palmyra, whence Palmyra.

(O) Not that it had always the same sterile appearance. Abulfeda, who though he calls Tadmor a small city in the desert of Syria, yet places it in Arabia, writes, that Palmyrene, for the most part, abounded in salt; and that the palm and olive flourished there; adding, that there are many great and noble ruins there to be seen. In him moreover we read, that it had perpetual springs, and yielded fruits and corn. Upon this occasion it may not be amiss to refer you back to what we have conjectured concerning the present sterility of the land of Edom (22).

(15) Peregrin. Jerusalem. Epist. 2. p. 27. (16) 1. vii. 8—13. (17) Philosoph. Transact. Num. 217. p. 85. (18) Ibid. Num. 218. p. 161. (19) History of Palmyra in the Appendix, p. 177. (20) Par. 1. p. 182. Par. 11. p. 153. (21) In ult. Salad. ad vocem Tadmora. (22) See before in the Notes, p. 309.

could be judged, or sixty two on a side. The beautiful corniches have been purposely <sup>a</sup> beaten down by the Turks, who have thereby deprived the world of one of the finest works of the kind, that, perhaps, was ever seen, as here and there a fragment, which has escaped their fury, abundantly evinces. The west side of this court, by which you enter it, is most of it broken down; and towards the middle of it there are remains of an old castle, built by the Mamlûks, as is supposed, out of part of the ruins which are here in such abundance. This castle shrouds the remains of an ancient fabrick of exquisite beauty, as appears by what is still standing of its entrance, being two stones of thirty five foot in length, carved with vines and clusters of grapes, exceeding bold, and to the life. They are both in their right places, and by them it appears that the door or gate was fifteen foot wide. In this great court <sup>b</sup> are the remains of two rows of very noble marble pillars thirty seven foot high, with capitals of the finest carved work; and the corniches must have been of equal beauty, though quite destroyed by the relentless superstition of the Mohammedans. Of these pillars fifty eight are entire. They must have been many more in number; for by what appears, they went quite round the court, and supported a most spacious double piazza or cloister. The walks on the west side of this piazza, which face the front of the temple, seem to have been the most spacious and stately of all; and at each end of it are two niches for statues at their full length, with their pedestals, borders, supporters and canopies, carved with the greatest artifice and curiosity. The space within this once beautiful inclosure is conceived to have been an open court, as we have already called it, in the midst of which stands the temple, incompassed with another row of pillars of a different order, and far exceeding the former in dimensions, being fifty foot high. Of these, sixteen are now standing; but there must have been about double that number, which, whether they formed an inner court, or supported the roof of a cloister, is utterly uncertain. One great stone lies down, which seems to have reached from these pillars to the walls of the temple; so that the latter conjecture may naturally enough take place. The whole space contained within these pillars is one hundred and seventy seven foot in length, and in breadth, eighty four. In the midst of this space is the temple, extending ninety nine foot in length, and in breadth, about forty. It has a sumptuous entrance on the west, exactly in the middle of the building, and, by what remains, seems to have been one of the most glorious edifices in the world. You here see vines and clusters of grapes executed to the life; and over the door you can just trace out a spread-eagle, as at Balbek, which takes up the whole width; with some angels or cupids accompanying it on the same stone, and several eagles are seen upon stones that are fallen down. Nothing of this temple is standing but the walls, in which it is observable, that the windows, though not large, are narrower at top than at bottom, but mightily enriched with sculpture. It has been awkwardly patched up to serve for a mosque, all but the north end, where are very precious reliques: which whether they were in the nature of canopies over altars, or to what use else they served, <sup>c</sup> is not easy to conjecture. They are beautified with the most curious fret-work and sculpture; in the midst of which is a dome or cupola, six foot diameter, all of one piece; but whether they are hewn out of the solid rock, or molded of fine cement or composition, is made a doubt.

Promiscuous Ruins.

LEAVING this court and temple, your eyes are accosted with an amazing sight of marble pillars, scattered up and down for the space of near a mile of ground; but, in such lamentable confusion, that there is no room to guess for what ends they were framed. But, to pass by the ruins of a mosque, as not worth our observation, and not bewilder your eye with the sad confusion which here presents itself, we will proceed to particulars as they occur after, or correspond with, each other. <sup>f</sup>

Obelisk and two Pillars.

ADVANCING towards the north, as you leave the temple, you have a tall and stately obelisk or pillar before you, consisting of seven large stones, besides its capital. It has a wreathed work about it; the sculpture here, as every where else, extremely fine. It exceeds fifty foot in height, is twelve foot and an half in compass just above the pedestal, and a statue is conceived to have once stood upon it. On the east and west of this, at the distance of a quarter of a mile, is a large pillar, which seem'd to have corresponded with each other. And there is a piece of another near to the eastern pillar, which looks as if there had been once a continued row of them. The height of this eastern pillar, as taken by a quadrant, is above forty foot. Its circumference is proportionable, and on the body of it is a Greek inscription in commemoration of two patriots, by a grateful order of the senate and people, which, with the others of the same and other kinds, we may hereafter meet with, we shall pass over a over for the present, that we may not break in upon the thread of this description. The western pillar has another inscription of the like sort ; but not quite so perfect as the former.

PROCEEDING ON from the obelisk or pillar last mentioned, at the distance of one hundred paces, is a magnificent entrance, vastly large and lofty, and for work-<sup>The great piazza.</sup>manship nothing inferior to any piece hitherto described ; but unhappily it has suffered the same fate with the rest. This entrance leads into a noble piazza, above half a mile long and forty foot broad, formed by two rows of stately marble pillars twenty six foot high and eight or nine about. Of these pillars one hundred and twenty nine are standing ; but by a moderate calculation they cannot have been b fewer at first, than five hundred and sixty. Covering over them, there is none remaining, nor pavement beneath, that can be seen. Upon most of these pillars are inscriptions in Greek and Palmyrene characters ; so that it seems to have been a much frequented and most conspicuous part of the city, and most proper for the daily and honourable commemoration of such as had deserved well of their fellow citizens, or friends and relations. And, as if inscriptions were not sufficient, it seems as if here they fixed the statues also of the persons celebrated ; there being pedestals jetting out from these pillars, sometimes one way, and sometimes more, whereon must have stood statues, which have long ago fallen victims to the furious and barbarous zeal of the Mohammedans ; and upon these pedestals are inscriptions, even when none are c on the pillar they belong to, and sometimes even when there are. The upper end of this spacious piazza was shut in by a row of pillars, standing closer together than those on each side, and perhaps a banquetting-house stood upon them, though no sign of it be spared. But on the left hand, a little further, appear the ruins of a <sup>Banquetting-house.</sup>very stately pile, which may have been of such a kind ; of finer marble than is observed in the piazza, and with an air of delicacy throughout the whole, far surpassing what is observed in the piazza itself. The pillars which supported this last pile are all of one stone, twenty two foot long and eight foot nine inches round. Among these ruins is found the only Latin inscription that was seen in this place.

In the west side of the above piazza are several openings, supposed to have been d for gates, which led into the court of the palace. Two of these gates look as if they had been the most magnificent and glorious in the world, both for the elegance of the work in general, and for the stately porphyry pillars, wherewith they were adorned. Each gate had four, not standing in a line with those of the wall, but placed by couples in the front of the gate, facing the palace, two on the one hand, and two on the other. Of these porphyry pillars, there are but two entire, and but one of them standing in its proper place. They are about thirty foot in length, and nine in circumference, and of so very hard a consistence (P) that it is a very difficult matter to injure them. These, of all the pieces of porphyry here found, are the most beautiful. The palace itself is so compleatly demolished, that e there is no forming a judgment of what it has been, either for majesty or ornament. It plainly appears to have been thrown down by violence, which, together with the length of time, has quite defaced and obliterated this once noble pile, there being only a broken piece of its walls left standing here and there. But, it is very likely, that it fronted the famous piazza before-mentioned, and that it was surrounded with rows of pillars of different orders, many of which are still standing, some plain, and some wrought and channelled, as those immediately encompassing the temple. To these pillars also there are pedestals with inscriptions on them.

ON the east side of this same piazza is, if the expression may be used, a wood f of marble pillars, some perfect, some deprived of their beautiful capitals, but so scattered and confused, that there is no reducing them to order, or conjecturing to what use they formerly served. In one place are eleven together, forming a square in this disposition,  paved at the bottom with broad flat stone, but without any manner of roof.

AT a little distance from hence, is a small ruined temple, which, by what remains of it, must have been a very curious piece. The entrance into this temple <sup>The little temple.</sup>looks to the south, and before it is a piazza of six pillars, two on one hand of the door, and two on the other, and one at each end. The pedestals of those in the front have been filled up with inscriptions, both in Greek and the other characters, g but scarce intelligible.

(P) This our author says, supposing porphyry to be fictitious, which is disputed.

BUT of all the venerable remains of this desolate place, none more attract the admiration of the curious, than their costly sepulchres, which are square towers, four or five stories high, standing on each side of a hollow way, towards the north end of the city. They extend a mile, and may anciently have extended farther. At a distance they look like the steeples of decayed churches, or the bastions of a ruined fortification. Many of them, though built of marble, have proved faithless to their charge; having sunk under the weight of years, or submitted to the inexorable malice of violent hands. They are all of one form, but of different size, in proportion to the fortune of the founder. In the ruins of one of them, that was entirely marble, were found the pieces of two statues, the one of a man, the other of a woman, in a sitting, or rather leaning posture. By these it is discovered, that their habit was very noble, rather agreeing with the European, than the present eastern fashions; whence they are conjectured to have been Romans. Of all these sepulchres, there are two which seem to be more entire than the rest. They are square towers, five stories high, their outsides of common stone, but their partitions and floors within, of good marble. They are beautified with very lively carvings and paintings, and figures both of men and women, as far as the breast and shoulders, but miserably defaced. Under them, or on one side, are Palmyrenian characters, which are thought to be the names of the persons there deposited. To judge of the construction of the rest of these sepulchres, by what is observed in one of them; they had a walk quite across them from north to south, exactly in the middle, by which they entered. The vault below, was divided in the same manner, and the division on each hand subdivided by thick walls into six, or more or less, partitions, each big enough to receive the largest corps, and deep enough to contain at least six or seven piled one upon another. In the lowest, second, and third stories, these partitions were the same, excepting that the second had a partition, answering to the main entrance, for the convenience of a stair-case. Higher up this method was discontinued; because the building growing narrower towards the top, could no longer admit of it. In the two uppermost rooms, it is likely that no bodies were deposited, except that of the founder himself, whose statue, wrapt up in funeral apparel, and in a lying posture, is placed in a nich, or rather window, in the front of the monument, so as to be visible both within and without. Here is a Greek epitaph<sup>f</sup>.

SUCH were once the magnificent abodes, and such the noble sepulchres of the Palmyrenians; enough to evince that the world never saw a more glorious city; the pride, it is likely, of ancient times, and the reproach of our own: a city not more remarkable for the state of her buildings and unwontedness of her situation, than for the extraordinary personages who once flourished here; among whom the renowned Zenobia and the incomparable Longinus must for ever be remembered with admiration and regret.

S E C T. II.

Of the Antiquity, Government, Laws, Religion, Customs, Arts, Learning, and Trade of the ancient Syrians.

Antiquity.

THE ancient Syrians or Aramites (A), scarce submitted to any other nation under the sun, in point of antiquity, being the first that inhabited the fertile and well situated region of their abode after the general deluge, as we have already observed<sup>a</sup>. This is indisputably the case, and therefore there may be no need of expatiating thereon. But the posterity of Shem by Aram, did not possess this country wholly to themselves; their relations of Canaan's line, being straitned for want of room in the places where they settled at first, encroached upon them by degrees, and seized on a portion of their lot, and kept the same, till one common destruction and captivity involved them both. To use many words in proof of this twofold descent of the Syrians, from the righteous line of Shem, and the unrighteous line of Ham, is needless, since we find a very noted portion of the country of Aram or Syria, denominated from Hamathi, one of the eleven sons of Canaan, who may have even settled

<sup>f</sup> Philosophical Transactions, Numb. 217.

<sup>a</sup> See before, p. 163.

(A) This name was not wholly unknown to the Greeks. Strabo calls them Aramæi; for those, says he (1), whom we call Syrians, call themselves Arameans. Hence, the Arami, Arimi, and Erembi, and the like names.

(1) Geograph. l. i. p. 42.

here

BUT of all the venerable remains of this desolate place, none more attract the admiration of the curious, than their costly sepulchres, which are square towers, four or five stories high, standing on each side of a hollow way, towards the north end of the city. They extend a mile, and may anciently have extended farther. At a distance they look like the steeples of decayed churches, or the bastions of a ruined fortification. Many of them, though built of marble, have proved faithless to their charge; having sunk under the weight of years, or submitted to the inexorable malice of violent hands. They are all of one form, but of different size, in proportion to the fortune of the founder. In the ruins of one of them, that was entirely marble, were found the pieces of two statues, the one of a man, the other of a woman, in a sitting, or rather leaning posture. By these it is discovered, that their habit was very noble, rather agreeing with the European, than the present eastern fashions; whence they are conjectured to have been Romans. Of all these sepulchres, there are two which seem to be more entire than the rest. They are square towers, five stories high, their outsides of common stone, but their partitions and floors within, of good marble. They are beautified with very lively carvings and paintings, and figures both of men and women, as far as the breast and shoulders, but miserably defaced. Under them, or on one side, are Palmyrenian characters, which are thought to be the names of the persons there deposited. To judge of the construction of the rest of these sepulchres, by what is observed in one of them; they had a walk quite a-cross them from north to south, exactly in the middle, by which they entered. The vault below, was divided in the same manner, and the division on each hand subdivided by thick walls into six, or more or less, partitions, each big enough to receive the largest corps, and deep enough to contain at least six or seven piled one upon another. In the lowest, second, and third stories, these partitions were the same, excepting that the second had a partition, answering to the main entrance, for the convenience of a stair-case. Higher up this method was discontinued; because the building growing narrower towards the top, could no longer admit of it. In the two uppermost rooms, it is likely that no bodies were deposited, except that of the founder himself, whose statue, wrapt up in funeral apparel, and in a lying posture, is placed in a niche, or rather window, in the front of the monument, so as to be visible both within and without. Here is a Greek epitaph†.

SUCH were once the magnificent abodes, and such the noble sepulchres of the Palmyrenians; enough to evince that the world never saw a more glorious city; the pride, it is likely, of ancient times, and the reproach of our own: a city not more remarkable for the state of her buildings and unwontedness of her situation, than for the extraordinary personages who once flourished here; among whom the renowned Zenobia and the incomparable Longinus must for ever be remembered with admiration and regret.

S E C T. II.

Of the Antiquity, Government, Laws, Religion, Customs, Arts, Learning, and Trade of the ancient Syrians.

Antiquity.

THE ancient Syrians or Aramites (A), scarce submitted to any other nation under the sun, in point of antiquity, being the first that inhabited the fertile and well situated region of their abode after the general deluge, as we have already observed*. This is indisputably the case, and therefore there may be no need of expatiating thereon. But the posterity of Shem by Aram, did not possess this country wholly to themselves; their relations of Canaan's line, being straitned for want of room in the places where they settled at first, encroached upon them by degrees, and seized on a portion of their lot, and kept the same, till one common destruction and captivity involved them both. To use many words in proof of this twofold descent of the Syrians, from the righteous line of Shem, and the unrighteous line of Ham, is needless, since we find a very noted portion of the country of Aram or Syria, denominated from Hamathi, one of the eleven sons of Canaan, who may have even settled

† Philosophical Transactions, Numb. 217.

* See before, p. 163.

(A) This name was not wholly unknown to selves Aramæans. Hence, the Arami, Arimi, the Greeks. Strabo calls them Aramæi; for those, and Erembi, and the like names. says he (1), whom we call Syrians, call them-

(1) Geograph. l. i. p. 42.

here

- <sup>a</sup> here in person. The same we might here say of the Arkite, the Simite, Zemarite, and the Arvadite, though indeed we have not such positive assurances thereof, as of what we say of the Hamathite. We can only deliver it as our opinion, that these Canaanite families did most, if not all of them, fix their abode in Syria (B). But whether the country was more or less divided between the Aramites and Canaanites, we forbear to enquire into, since we have little or no authority to build upon. The ancient Syrians then were partly descended from Ham, and partly from Shem, and both of nearly equal standing in this country, and very little behind any nation in antiquity; but if we believe a tradition current among the present inhabitants, it must be called the oldest country in the world (C).
- <sup>b</sup> THAT they were anciently governed by heads of families, called kings, and that Government there were great numbers of them in the country, is certain; and that they continued under the same government, in part, even to the days of Saul, is plain by the kings of Zobab<sup>b</sup>; and by the petty kings in Mesopotamia, who were summoned to attend Benbadad in his wars, no fewer than thirty two. Seeing therefore that this most simple and natural form of government, obtained in Canaan on the one hand of them, and in Mesopotamia on the other, and that even we find vestiges of the same in Syria itself, down to the days of Saul, we cannot doubt but that they were at first divided into many small kingdoms. Not that this was the only form that seems to have taken place; for as Gibeon in Canaan, in the days of Joshua,
- <sup>c</sup> seems to have been a commonwealth among the many kingdoms there; so Damascus in Syria seems to have been the same in David's time. What we have to offer in support of this opinion, is not indisputably clear; but Damascus is spoken of as without a chief, and as if the power was wholly in the people in David's time. It is said, that the Syrians of Damascus<sup>c</sup>, not their king, sent an army of upwards of twenty thousand to the relief of Hadadezer king of Zobab, which seems to imply, as if they were something like what we call a republic. The foundation and nature of the kingdom of Zobab, we pretend not to speak of; but that of Damascus, which rose upon its ruins, as Zobab did upon the subversion of the smaller principalities, seems to have been of the tyrannical and arbitrary kind. The kingdom
- <sup>d</sup> of Damascus was established in violence, by a strong hand, and the constitutions thereof must, one would think, have been of a piece with its foundation; haughty, uncontrolable, and ambitious to subdue its neighbours; and, in truth, it rose to the universal monarchy of all the parts on both sides of the Euphrates, under Hazael, as will be shewn in its due place. This may be said of the kingdom of Damascus, which supported itself with various fortune, till Syria changed both inhabitants and masters, which it did upon the first rise, as it were, of the Assyrian power.
- WE have no system of their laws, and scarce wherewithal to form any particular idea of them, but we are not so much at a loss for what concerns their
- <sup>e</sup> religion. THE ancient state of their religion, indeed, we are wholly at a loss for, nor will Their laws. we dwell on the obscurities thereto relating. It is certain they had many idols among them of very ancient repute; among the rest Rimmon (D) may be reckoned, whole
- <sup>e</sup> Their religion.

<sup>b</sup> See 1 Sam. xiv. 47.<sup>c</sup> 2 Sam. viii. 6.

(B) The Arabs have a tradition there were Canaanites very anciently in Syria, for they talk of Dimashe (2) the son of Canaan, who built the famous city of Damascus (3).

(C) For here they particularly pretended that Adam was formed (4), and that Cain slew Abel*; both which places they shew to travellers that visit Damascus, for they are in the neighbourhood of that city (5). To which Radziwile adds, that hollow groans are sometimes heard under ground, in testimony of the innocent Abel, as they told him; that the place is held in deep veneration, and indued with a miraculous power of healing such as labour under any violent disease, if they but lie down naked thereon, restoring them immediately to their pristine health.

(D) This name, in the language of the Old Testament, signifies a pomegranate; whence this deity, whether god or goddess, is thought to have born some relation to Venus. Selden (6) is most inclined to derive it from רומ rum, high or lofty. We forbear to speak of Gad, and refer you to this last author. The Syrians had a deity also, called Babia, a goddess from whom the children and young people were called Babia's (7). They may have esteemed them under her tutelage, and our English word, babes, says one (8), may thence have been borrowed.

(2) Vide SCHULTENS, Comment. Geograph. in vit. Salad. ad vocem Damascus. (3) See before, p. 136. (4) See THEVENOT, MAUNDRELL, &c. * See before in the notes, p. 74. (5) Peregrin. Jerusolym. epist. ii. p. 30. (6) Vid. SELDEN de Di Syr. Syntag. ii. c. 10. (7) Damasc. vit. Isidor. apud Pbo. c. cxlii. (8) PURCHAS'S Pilgrim, book i. co. xx. at the end.

temple stood at Damascus: He seems to have been, at least the principal god of a Damascene, which is all we shall venture to say concerning him.

THIS ancient god in time gave way to another; for the Syrians deifying their king Ben-badad II. under the title of Adad or Ader<sup>a</sup>, he was considered as their most glorious and auspicious god (E). This fancied god, and others of the same stamp that may have succeeded him, flourished as long, we may safely suppose, as the ancient Syrians possess'd this their seat, or were masters thereof. But both they themselves and their gods, in great measure, submitted to fate, when Syria was conquered and transplanted by Tiglatb-pileser.

HEREUPON the religion of the country may, without straining the point, be said to have changed face; a new idolatry was introduced, or many additions to the old<sup>b</sup> were brought in, by the new inhabitants, who were sent hither by the Affrian; and now the religion of Affyria prevailed chiefly all over the country. That this is true, will be pretty evident from some arguments you will find in our chronology of Affyria. What changes and alterations this system suffered under the Babylonians first, and the Persians afterwards, and lastly under the Selucidae and Romans, we cannot presume to say; but such as it was, in the second century of the christian æra, we shall borrow from Lucian, who was an eye-witness of what he says for the most part, and the rest he received from the priests.

AT Hierapolis, or the holy city, or Magog, as the Syrians themselves are said<sup>c</sup> to have called it, in the province of Cyrrhestica, stood the temple of the great Syrian Goddess (F). It was upon an eminence in the midst of the city, surrounded by a double inclosure or two walls, the one old, the other new. At the north side it had a court, or porch before it, of about five or six hundred foot in circumference, where stood the priaps, of three hundred fathom, or three hundred cubits high; for we find both these measures, but both exceedingly too large, to our apprehension. These obscene images, or rather columns, were but slender, as we shall shew hereafter; but by whom, or to whom, they were erected, was the subject of much fable. The front of the temple itself stood east, and before it was a tower raised upon a terras, about twelve foot high; which<sup>d</sup> was no sooner mounted than the temple appeared. It was built after the manner of the Ionian temples; the porch of it was adorned with golden doors; nay, the whole temple glittered with gold, and particularly the roof. The air about it was enchanting, nothing inferior to the sweetest of Arabia, and so strongly perfumed the garments of all that visited it, that they were scented for a considerable time.

<sup>a</sup> JOSEPH. Antiq. l. ix. c. 2.

<sup>b</sup> PLIN. Hist. Natur. ubi. supr.

(E) Adad is called also Adod the king of the gods (9), and Adad is interpreted One (10); and where we have this interpretation we are told, he was their greatest god. Selden (11) and Isaac Vossius (12), are very nice in deducing the true import of this name, which we shall for this once pass over, because it appears to us, that according to the scripture orthography, it ought to be spelt Hadad, as is plain from Josephus (13), who, in speaking of the scripture kings of Syria, calls them Adad or Ader; and particularly writing of the great Ben-badad, the second of that name in scripture, he tells us he was deified or honoured with divine worship, as was also his successor Hazael. Here we have the first account of their deifying of Adad, or as the scripture styles him, Ben-badad, who, if we except his successor Hazael, was the greatest prince the ancient Syrians can boast of; and we are clearly of opinion, that this great god Hadad or Adad, is no other than the deified Ben-badad; and from thence it appears, that there were Syrian princes of the name of Adad, before they had any god so called. By Adad they meant the sun, and pictured him with rays darting downwards, to express his beneficence, and to shew that the chief influence of the heavens is in the beams of the sun (14). This high compliment might have suited better with Hazael, whose reign was a continued series of prosperity, than with Ben-badad, who was several times unfortunate; but, as Josephus tells us, they were both deified, and as Adad or Hadad, was a name common to all the kings of Syria, as appears both by scripture and Nicolas of Damascus (15), it may have been the Hazael of scripture, who was so highly revered.

(F) It is impossible to say who they meant by this Syrian Goddess; but we find a story in Justin (16), which we suppose to be borrowed from Nicolas of Damascus; that a king from whom Damascus derived its name, had a queen called Arathis; whose sepulchre was religiously frequented by the Syrians, who esteemed her as their principal deity: and this queen, according to our author's account, was older than Abraham, whom he reckons among the kings of Damascus, as we shall have occasion to observe again hereafter.

(9) SANCHON. apud EUSEB. Præpar. Evangel. lib. i. p. 38.

(10) MACROB. Saturnal. l. i.

c. 18. (11) Ubi supr. Syntag. x. c. 6.

(12) De Idololatria, l. i. c. 22.

(13) Antiq. l. ix. c. 2.

(14) MACROB. Saturnal. ubi supr.

(15) Apud JOSEPH.

Antiq. l. vii. c. 6.

(16) L. xxvi. c. 2.

- a THIS temple was not without its sanctuary, into which no admission was allowed, even to such of the priests, as were not in an especial manner allied to the gods there kept, or wholly addicted to their service and worship. Within the sanctuary, which was always open, were the statues of Jupiter and Juno, as the Greeks were so complaisant as to call them, though the inhabitants, as our author assures us, had other names for them. But since we have not their true names, we must be contented with the Greek. These statues of Jupiter and Juno were of gold. Juno sat upon lions, and Jupiter was supported by bulls, being in looks and posture like the Jupiter of the Greeks; but the statue of Juno was contrived so as to participate of Minerva, Venus, Luna, Rhea, Diana, Nemesis, and the Destinies, according to the view you had of her. In one hand she had a scepter, in the other a distaff. On her head she had rays and a tower, and she was girt with the cestus or girdle of the celestial Venus. She was adorned with a great variety of gems, which had from time to time been presented to her, by Egyptians, Indians, Ethiopians, Medes, Armenians, and Babylonians. But of all these, the most remarkable was the Lycnis she wore at her side. This stone is said to shine most by candle-light. With this Lycnis therefore she illuminated, says our author, the temple by night. In the day-time it had no remarkable lustre, and only looked of a fiery aspect. It was wonderful of this statue, that though a person stood either on one side or before it, still it looked at him. Between Jupiter and Juno was another golden statue, but with no characteristics or peculiar ensigns, and only called the Sign. It was uncertain who they pointed at by this statue; but because it had a golden dove on its head, some were willing to think it was Semiramis. Twice every year it went in procession to the sea-side. On the left hand going into the temple, was the throne of the sun, but it had no statue in it; for they held it absurd to make statues either of the sun or moon, who were so resplendently visible to mortal eyes; but no more than right, to form the statues of such as were invisible. Next after this throne was the statue of Apollo, not a stripling, but with a large beard; for they could not endure the thoughts of addressing themselves to any god that was under age; and moreover, they did put cloaths on this idol, which was done to no other. Next to Apollo stood Aias, then Mercury, then Lucina, all which made the side furniture of the temple. On the right hand as they entered the temple, stood Semiramis, pointing to Juno; for that empress had had the arrogance to claim supremacy to herself, in the adoration of mankind, not excepting even Juno; whereupon being severely punished by the gods, who persecuted her with diseases and various calamities to humble her pride, she at last submitted to the goddess; and for this reason was figured as pointing to Juno, in perpetual acknowledgment of her arrogant error; and to direct people that the said goddess was to be worshipped, not herself. Next to Semiramis stood Helen, then Hecuba, Andromache, Paris, Hector, Achilles, Nereus the son of Aglaia, Philomel and Pronge, Tereus turned into a bird, another statue of Semiramis, Combabus, Stratonice, a beautiful piece, Alexander done after the life, and Sardanapalus, in a peculiar habit and attitude. Under this temple they shewed the cleft where the waters drained off at Deucalion's flood: on this place, said they, did Deucalion erect an altar to Juno, and this tradition brought on an extraordinary ceremony, which we shall mention hereafter. This hole or cleft was but small when our author saw it. We had almost forgotten, that on the right hand of the temple, there was a little brazen man, with privities far beyond their due proportion.
- FINALLY, within the inclosures of the temple, they kept oxen, horses, lions, bears, eagles, all which were no way noxious to men, but all sacred and tame.
- f ADJACENT to the temple was a lake, where sacred fishes were preserved and attended. Some of the largest had names given to them, and came when called. One of these our author particularly observed, had golden fins. The lake itself was deep, two hundred fathom, the priests reported; and in the midst of it stood a stone altar, which seemed to swim, as most thought it did; for the pillar, or what else supported it, was not easily to be discerned. This altar was for ever crowned, and reeking with incense, and daily frequented, as we shall see anon. Without the temple stood a large brazen altar, and statues for kings and priests almost innumerable.

THE oracle in the temple was quite extraordinary, and may serve to evince, how deeply the priests were versed in the mystery of their profession. Here were images that would move, sweat, and deliver oracles, as if alive; and noises were often heard in the temple, when it was shut up. Apollo, as we understand our author, was the chief oracle. Other idols delivered their answers by their priests : This a Syrian Apollo did all himself. He, as we have already observed, was the only god that had cloaths put on him ; the reason of which, to our apprehension, was, that a living person might the more speciously be substituted to act the part of the stupid block. However this were, this Apollo, when he was inclined to make an answer upon any consultation, began first to move himself ; upon which the priests immediately stepped up to him to lift him, or else he fell into great agonies, sweating and bestirring himself after a furious rate. But with the priests who came to his assistance, he behaved in a very unruly manner, tossing and tumbling them about from place to place as they pleased ; till the high priest coming up to him, proposed his question. If the question was unacceptable to him, he retired ; if other- b wise, he drove his supporters onwards. He had the direction of all matters sacred and civil, being upon all occasions consulted, and always declared the time when it was proper for the image, we have called the Sign, to make its procession to the sea. In fine, our author assures us, that he saw this god walk in the air.

Riches of the temple.

THE revenues and treasure of this temple were in proportion to its splendor, to the great majesty of the goddess, and to the mighty power and excellence of her kindred deities that attend her. Arabia, Phœnice, Babylonia, Cappadocia, Cilicia, and Syria, paid their liberal contributions. Here were costly presents shewn, in garments and other things of inestimable price, which were very carefully kept ; so that, in this respect, it was a very Loretto. c

Now for the priests. There were several sorts of them, each assigned to particular tasks. Some killed the sacrifices, some bore the drink-offerings, some carried fire, and some waited at the altar ; and of these above three hundred in white habits, and with caps or bonnets on their heads, attended the sacrifices. And besides them, there were other consecrated orders ; as of minstrels, skilful in the touch of several instruments, Galli or eunuch priests ; and to conclude, mad and frantick women. The office of high priest was annual, he wore purple, and a golden mitre. Other sort of holy persons there were of the several nations, who held the Syrian Goddess in veneration, whose business it was to instruct their countrymen, who from time to time resorted hither in pilgrimage, in the rules and customs d of this holy city. They were called masters or instructors.

The story of Combabus.

It is remarkable of their eunuch priests, that they were emasculated by the voluntary operation of their own hands. How this unnatural custom came to prevail, is accounted for by the following story. Stratonice, who built this temple, having been admonished by the goddess, to undertake the work to no purpose till she forcibly brought her to obedience by a violent procedure against her, the king her husband consented to let her go and take in hand the building ; but committed the care of her to a beautiful youth named Combabus. This Combabus no way fond of his commission, but dreading the consequences of being so much alone with the beauteous queen, destroyed his sex, and left the ruins of it, carefully embalmed and sealed up, with the king. He departed with the queen Stratonice, was after some time solicited by her, and convinced her of his inability. But nevertheless, it came to pass, either through malice or envy, that Combabus was clearly convicted of adultery, infidelity, and impiety to the goddess. As he was leading to execution, he called out for the treasure he had left with the king, which being produced, his intended punishment was converted into the most tender embraces in the arms of his prince. The king now raised him to the highest degree of riches and honour, and he was famed for the wisest and happiest man living. Combabus desired leave to finish the temple ; which being granted, he passed the remainder of his life there. And there stood his statue in brass, as we have already said, the work of Hermolaus the Rhodian. And because it was industriously reported, that some of his dearest companions resolved to undergo his calamity for his sake, or that Juno inspired several with a rage of unmanning themselves, that he might not be single in his misfortune ; many mad zealots, either in honour of Combabus, or to please Juno, performed the hated operation on themselves every year in the temple, as we shall hereafter relate. Furthermore, these Galli, or devoted eunuchs, took on them the habit and offices of women, because Combabus had been fallen in love with by a strange woman, who knew not the violence he had done to his sex ; which to prevent for the future, he put on the outward appearance of a woman. Such were the Galli, their institution, and their g patron.

a WE come now to speak of the sacrifices, ceremonies, and peculiar customs pertaining to this holy city. They sacrificed twice a day, to Jupiter in silence, to Juno with great noise of minstrels and singers. Every spring they celebrated an extraordinary sacrifice; for felling some great trees, in the court of the temple, they garnished them with goats, sheep, birds, rich vestments, and fine pieces of wrought gold and silver: they then carried the sacred images round these decorated trees, and set fire to them, and all was consumed. At this sacrifice there was always a great concourse of people from all parts, every one bringing his sacred images with him, made in imitation of those in the temple. There was also a private sacrifice made by every one that undertook the pilgrimage to this city of Hierapolis. The pilgrim killed a sheep, cut it up in joints, and feasted on it, spreading the fleece on the ground, and kneeling upon it. In this posture he put the feet and head of the victim upon his own head, and besought the goddess to accept his sacrifice, and vowed her a better. To these may be annexed the offerings made upon the following occasion. Twice a year a man climbed up to the top of one of the priaps we have mentioned, and there continued seven days. He let down a chain, by which to draw up what should be given to him; for many upon these occasions brought their offerings, and declared their names, which one below took care to bawl out to the man sitting above, who thereupon began a prayer, striking a kind of a bell all the time. Finally they had, sometimes, a way of sacrificing which was truly shocking and barbarous. They first crowned the victims with garlands, and then drove them out of the porch or court of the temple, one side of which was an abrupt steep, where falling, they perished. Nay, some were so mad as to tie up their children in sacks, and then shove them down the same steep, reproaching them as not children, but beasts.

SOME of their festivals, if so they may be called, were observed in memory of Deucalion's flood. Twice a year they went to the sea-side, and thence brought water into the temple; in which labour, not only the priests were employed, but also all Syria and Arabia, says our author. This water they poured out in the temple, and it ran off by the hole or cleft we have already mentioned. This they did by a pretended command of Deucalion's, as our author, like a meer Greek, calls him. What ceremonies they practised at the sea-side, we are not told; but it seems they were very extraordinary. Returning with their vessels full of water and sealed up, they carried them first to a sacred person called Aletryo, who receiving the said vessels of water, examined the seals, and taking his due from each votary for his pains, untied the string, took off the seal, and returned his burthen to each, who carried it into the temple for the purpose before-mentioned. This Aletryo, whoever or whatever he was, received a considerable revenue for holy uses upon those solemn days. They had another kind of festival, which in our language may be called their descention days. For upon these days did their gods and their other fine things make a visit to the bottom of the lake we formerly mentioned. Juno or the Syrian Goddess herself went down first, for the preservation of her favourite fish, who if they had seen Jupiter, would have died. Upon these occasions a notable farce was acted between the said goddess and god. He was wont to advance to go down first; whereupon she interposed, and, after much ado, prevailed on him to return back again. But of all their holy-days the great burning, as we may call it, was the most considerable. Upon this occasion, there came people from all parts to assist at the great sacrifice we have already described, and the other religious duties of the season. This festival was of some days continuance, as we apprehend our author; and at particular times while it lasted, the whole multitude was drawn into the temple, while the priests stood without, some of them mangling their bodies, some thumping violently against each other, while others beat upon tabrets or drums, and sounded with musical instruments, and sang out aloud, and prophesied. And now it was that amidst all this uproar, the frenzy of castrating themselves seized on many in the temple, who crying out with a loud voice, and drawing their swords, performed the operation, and devoted themselves to the goddess.

THE religious customs, and laws, and traditions of this place, were as extraordinary as any thing else we have hitherto seen. Twice a year a man went up to the top of one of the priaps, as we have said, and there remained seven days. His manner of getting up was thus. He surrounded the priap and himself with a chain, and ascended by the help of that and certain pegs or pins, which stuck out of the sides of the priap for that purpose, lifting the chain up after him at every ry step he mounted. Here we cannot but observe, that our author says, That those <sup>a</sup> who had seen them climb up the palm trees in Egypt and Arabia, might readily understand him; whence we gather these phalli or priaps, so monstrously high as he says, were so slender, that a man might grasp them. Whether we reckon the height he gives them, at three hundred fathom, which is monstrous, or even at three hundred cubits, which is somewhat more credible, they were about as high as our monument. How so slender a body could be reared to such a height, we leave to those who are better skilled in such matters than ourselves, and proceed. When the person had got up, he let down a chain, wherewith he drew up all manner of necessaries for himself, and therewith made him a commodious seat, a kind of a nest. It was given out that during the seven days, he had a more in- <sup>b</sup> intimate intercourse with the great goddess; and also that this was done in memory of Deucalion's flood, when the men clomb up the mountains and trees to save themselves from perishing. During these seven days, the person never slept, and if at any time he happened to dole, a sacred scorpion, said they, went up and awakened him. Our author rather thinks, that the fear of falling kept him from sleeping.

EVERY day many people swam to the altar in the midst of the lake, there to perform their devotions.

THEY sacrificed oxen, sheep, and the like, but swine they held to be unclean.

BUT the sacrifice was not performed at the temple. The victim was only <sup>c</sup> presented at the altar. The rest was done at home.

FISH, and doves or pigeons, were accounted holy, the former to Derceto, the latter to Semiramis; in memory of their different transformations.

THEY fed many doves in and about their houses, and if a man had touched one of them, he was unclean all the rest of that day, as holy as they esteemed them.

As soon as any man had commenced Gallus or eunuch priest, by dismembering himself, he ran about the city with the part in his hand, till at length, throwing it into some house, he thence received a woman's attire, and from that time forward wholly addicted himself to a feminine way of life. <sup>d</sup>

THE eunuch priests, notwithstanding, entertained a flame for the women, and the women for them, which far from being thought scandalous or portentous, was esteemed pure and holy.

IT was unlawful for any Gallus or eunuch priest to enter into the temple.

WHOSOEVER took on him the pilgrimage to Hierapolis, this holy city, first shaved his head and eye-brows, then offered up a sheep in the manner already mentioned. After which he might bathe in nothing but cold water, or drink of any thing else, or lie upon ought but the cold ground, till he had reached the city.

THE pilgrims being arrived, were entertained at the publick charge, and lodged with people of their respective countries, here called instructors or masters, <sup>e</sup> who were paid by the publick for informing them in the rites and ceremonies of the place.

THE pilgrims were all branded with marks upon the neck and wrists.

THE young men and boys consecrated the first fruits of their beards and heads of hair, which being shaved or clipped in the temple, were deposited in a gold or silver box, or other vessel, with the name of the person it belonged to, inscribed, and kept in the temple.

WHEN any of the Galli died, their funeral was not after the ordinary manner. Their companions carried their dead bodies into the suburbs, where setting them down, they hurled stones at them, and left them lying upon the bier; where they lay the space of seven days, and then were conveyed into the temple; but to have done it before had been prophane.

HE that had seen a dead person, might not enter into the temple that day; but on the morrow he was absolved from his uncleanness, if he purified himself.

ALL the family of any one deceased, were to keep from the temple thirty days, and shave their heads.

THUS much we have thought necessary to say concerning the great Syrian Goddess, and her worship, all which is very unhappily disguised in a Greek dress. We cannot doubt, but that here we have great remains both of their doctrines and practices of the ancient Syrians, though blended and confounded with many additional superstitions.

<sup>a</sup> For the present we shall add no more concerning the religions of Syria. The superstitions at Antioch, under the Seleucide, we shall enlarge on in the history of those princes. We are not sure that Plutarch means this Syrian goddess; for hereafter you will see, that she was not the only idol that seems to have born the title; when he says, that she punished those who eat of two certain sorts of fish with ulcers and boils all over their bodies; with sore shins, and with a dissolution of the liver<sup>a</sup>. They are said to have expiated this crime, by putting themselves in a sack, and rolling themselves in the dirt<sup>b</sup>. But, as we have observed, we are not certain that what is here said refers to this goddess, though it is likely it may.

We learn from Plutarch, that the Syrians, of his time at least, were an effeminate people, prone to tears, and very remarkable for their way of mourning for their deceased, hiding themselves from the light of the sun, in caves or other obscure places, many days together. This mournful, tender, effeminate temper of mind, may have always been one of the characteristics of the Syrians, as it still is.

We can say nothing particular touching the customs of the ancient Syrians, their civil concerns, or of their arts and learning. They were by some<sup>c</sup> anciently joined with the Phœnicians, as the first inventors of letters; but however true or false this may have been, certain it is that they submitted to no nation that flourished with them, in degree of human knowledge and skill in the fine arts. They were so happily situated, that they may, almost, be said to have been in the center of the old world; and as in the sunshine of their empire they were enriched by the spoils, and tribute, and commerce of the nations far and near, they certainly arose to a great pitch of splendor and magnificence, those great encouragers of ingenuity and industry. The altar at Damascus, which so ravished Abaz king of Judah<sup>d</sup>, may serve as a noble specimen of the skill of their artificers.

Their language is one of those kindred dialects we commonly call the Oriental tongues, and is pretended to have been the mother of them all; concerning which, and for our thoughts thereon, we must refer the readers to what we have already said<sup>e</sup>. It became a distinct tongue so early as the days of Jacob, for what his father-in-law and uncle, Laban of Padan-aram or Mesopotamia, calls Jegar-sabadusba, is by Jacob himself called Galeed<sup>f</sup>. The Syriac was not only the language of Syria, but also of Mesopotamia, Chaldea; for there is no more difference between the Chaldee and Syriac, than between the English and Scotch; Assyria, and, after the Babylonish captivity, of Palestine.

There are three dialects of the Syrian tongue. 1. The Aramean, or Syriac properly so called, which is the most elegant of all, and used in Mesopotamia, and by the inhabitants of Raba or Edessa, and Harran, and the outer Syria. 2. The dialect of Palestine, spoken by the inhabitants of Damascus, mount Libanus, and the inner Syria. 3. The Chaldee or Nabathean dialect, the most rude and unpolished of the three, and current in the mountainous parts of Assyria, and in the villages of Irak or Babylonia<sup>g</sup>.

The Syriac character is very ancient, and supposed by some to have been in use above three hundred years before the birth of Christ<sup>h</sup>. There are two sorts of this character; the Estrangelo (G), which is the more ancient and rude, and chiefly found in the titles of books, as capitals with us; and that called the Esbato, the simple or common character, which is much more expeditious and beautiful. There was a project set on foot by Paul of Antioch, for adding the letters that are wanting in the Syriac alphabet, as the Greeks had done; which he recommended to the thoughts of James of Edessa, who declined it, because he feared that the books wrote in the imperfect character or alphabet, might, by such an innovation, come to be lost<sup>i</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> Περὶ συνιδρυμάτων, p. 170. <sup>b</sup> MENAND. apud PORPHYR. Περὶ ἀποχῆς ἐπολέμας Παρεμίων ἀποχῆς ἀπὸς Ἀπῶλ. p. 113. <sup>c</sup> CLEM. ALEXANDR. Strom. l. i. p. 307. <sup>d</sup> 2 Kings xvi. 10. <sup>e</sup> See before, p. 152. <sup>f</sup> See Genes. xxxi. 47. <sup>g</sup> ADULTARAG. Hist. Dynast. p. 11. <sup>h</sup> See NARD. Tab. Alph. <sup>i</sup> ASSEMAN. Biblioth. Oriens. Tom. I. p. 479.

(G) This name is generally derived from the Greek word στρογγύλος, round, as if it was a round character, whereas it is rather square; wherefore, if it must be derived from that word, we should rather choose to take it in Theophrastus's sense, who uses στρογγύλη ἕβλη (17) for rough uneven timber, by reason of its rude and unpolished form.

THE SYRIAC ALPHABET.

The common Character.				The Estrangeli.
Power.	Figure.			Names.	Figure.
	Joined both to the following and preceding.	Joined to the preceding letter only.	Joined to the following letter only.	Single.
The support of a vowel.		Ⲁ		Ⲁ	Ⲁ
B.	ⲁ	Ⲃ	ⲃ	Ⲅ	ⲅ
G.	Ⲇ	ⲇ	Ⲉ	ⲉ	Ⲋ
D.		ⲋ		Ⲍ	ⲍ
H.		Ⲏ		ⲏ	Ⲑ
W.		ⲑ		Ⲓ	ⲓ
Z.		Ⲕ		ⲕ	Ⲗ
Hb.	ⲗ	Ⲙ	ⲙ	Ⲏ	ⲏ
T.	Ⲑ	ⲑ	Ⲓ	ⲓ	Ⲕ
Y.	ⲓ	Ⲕ	ⲕ	Ⲍ	ⲍ
C or Kb.	Ⲗ	ⲗ	Ⲙ	ⲙ	Ⲏ
L.	ⲏ	Ⲑ	ⲑ	Ⲓ	ⲓ
M.	ⲓ	Ⲕ	ⲕ	Ⲍ	ⲍ
N.	Ⲗ	ⲗ	Ⲙ	ⲙ	Ⲏ
S.	ⲏ	Ⲑ	ⲑ	Ⲓ	ⲓ
The support of a vowel, but a guttural.	Ⲕ	ⲕ	Ⲍ	ⲍ	Ⲏ
F. or P.	Ⲗ	ⲗ	Ⲙ	ⲙ	Ⲏ
S { grossly pron.		ⲑ		Ⲓ	ⲓ
K.	ⲓ	Ⲕ	ⲕ	Ⲍ	ⲍ
R.		Ⲏ		ⲏ	Ⲑ
Sb.	ⲗ	Ⲙ	ⲙ	Ⲏ	ⲏ
T or Tb.		ⲑ		Ⲓ	ⲓ

THE Syriac writing, like that of the other eastern tongues, was destitute of vowels, till towards the latter end of the eighth century, when they were introduced, as is generally supposed, by Theophilus of Edeffa, chief astrologer to the Khalif al Mobdi, who borrowed them from the Greek alphabet, and first made use of them to distinguish the Greek pronunciation of the names and Patronymies in his Syriac translation of the works of Homer<sup>r</sup>. The marks to express these vowels are still nearly in the form of five of the Greek vowels; for they reject the Epsilon and the Omicron, there being no short vowels in their tongue. But James of Edeffa, who flourished about a century before Theophilus, invented seven new characters for all the Greek vowels; which he did, at the desire of Paul of Antioch, to whom he sent them. They are still extant<sup>s</sup>.

<sup>r</sup> ABULFARAG. ubi sup. p. 147. ECHLENNIS in not. ad Catal. Ebedjesw. p. 180. ASSEMAN. ubi sup. p. 522. <sup>s</sup> Apud BAS. HEBR. (vel ABULFARAG.) in libr. splendor. Vide ASSEMAN. ubi sup. p. 479.

<sup>a</sup> THE Syriac is said to have much degenerated till James of Edessa restored it to its ancient purity. He was the first that wrote a grammar in Syriac<sup>1</sup>. It is an easy and elegant, but not a very copious tongue, and has a great number of Greek words, which were incorporated with it, in the times of the Seleucide. There is a number of books in the Syriac, very little known to the Europeans, of which a late writer<sup>2</sup> has given an ample account; but what this tongue is most to be valued for, are the excellent translations therein of the old and new testament; which equal, if they do not surpass, those in any other language.

PERHAPS no nation, of equal antiquity, had a more considerable trade than the ancient Syrians. We cannot doubt, but they had ships on the Mediterranean, as soon as any of their neighbours; and by the vicinity of the river Euphrates, it is past dispute that they traded with the eastern regions upon that river very early. They had many valuable commodities of their own to carry into other parts. The easy and safe navigation of the Euphrates, when compared with that of the sea, would tempt one to consider them as older merchants than the Phœnicians, or even the Edomites; who must have made very early attempts upon the Arabian gulf, in comparison of which, the Mediterranean was a main ocean. We rather insist on the trade of this ancient people, because we do not know that it has yet been fully handled, or professedly, by any body. Herodotus<sup>3</sup> indeed reports, that the Phœnicians were much older navigators than either the ancient Syrians or Egyptians; saying, that they carried on the commerce of Assyria and Egypt by their shipping. Here, by the way, is a further proof than we have hitherto given, that Syria and Assyria were confounded together by the ancients. For how should the Phœnicians have sailed to the coasts of the proper Assyria, an inland country; a country they could not possibly have reached, but by doubling the cape of Good-hope, and entering the Persian gulf? A voyage which could have answered no end, seeing they might have supplied that country, and have been supplied from thence, at an infinitely cheaper rate, by means of their next neighbours the Syrians, who navigated the Euphrates; and who, it cannot well be disputed, were the first that brought the Persian and Indian commodities into the west of Asia. Syria was therefore the most ancient magazine for such commodities, and chiefly supplied all the western parts; nor can we think otherwise, than that the Midianitish merchants<sup>4</sup>, who bought Joseph, had loaded their camels in Syria with the aromatics and other precious things they were carrying into Egypt. Among which it is no unlikely matter that they had commodities of other countries besides those of Syria. Till interpreters can agree upon the genuine explication of the text, we have liberty to think as largely this way as we please.

Now because the Syrians engrossed this lucrative commerce, they may have been in great measure negligent of the Mediterranean navigation, chiefly intent upon their eastern trade, which drew merchants from all the western parts to traffic in their country, as well for their own growth as for foreign productions; and particularly the Phœnicians, their next and most industrious neighbours. So that Herodotus<sup>5</sup> may be much in the right, when he talks of the trade they anciently carried on for Assyria [Syria] and Egypt. We might draw some natural parallels of this case, so as to leave it almost indubitable. The Spaniards and Portuguese, who have engrossed all the wealth, as it were, of the West Indies, make little or no use of shipping, if compared with the two trading nations, England and Holland, who may be said to drive on the commerce of the whole world in their bottoms. The Syrians then it is likely neglected sea affairs, and therein fell much short of the Phœnicians.

THIS was the state of the ancient Syrian trade and navigation, which we may safely suppose encreased from time to time, till their king Hazaël, as you will see in his reign, grasped at the whole trade of both east and south, by seizing on the famous emporium, Elatb, on the Red-sea. The Syrians now had a commodious outlet to the southermost parts of Arabia, Ethiopia, and the more southern shores of Afric, not to mention Egypt, who could not be very fond of her new neighbours, and may have been shy of them, and that, upon very just grounds. But this Syrian monopoly was of short duration. They had scarce settled themselves on the shores of the Arabian gulf, but their king Hazaël died, and they lost Elatb: which, however, they recovered again under their last king Rezin; but their empire was soon after extinguished, together with his life; and therefore, though the Syrian colony remained afterwards at Elatb, we shall pursue their commerce no further, it being foreign to our present purpose; but we shall endeavour to confirm what we have here advanced, when we are to treat of the Phœnician affairs. In the mean time let any one consider the state of trade in the Levant and Mediterranean, before the discovery or re-discovery, as some<sup>a</sup> would have of it, of the cape of Good-hope, and, possibly, he will be pretty much of our opinion. Diodorus Siculus numbers the Syrians among the mariners employed by Semiramis in her Indian expedition; but, as we are not disposed to give much credit to his author, Ctesias, we shall make no use of his hint, thinking it of no service to us.

<sup>1</sup> Idem.<sup>2</sup> Idem ibid.<sup>3</sup> l. 1. c. 1.<sup>4</sup> See before, p. 301.<sup>5</sup> Ubi supr.

S E C T. III.

Of the Chronology of the ancient Syrians.

BEFORE we proceed to the little we can say upon this obscure subject, we will exhibit a series of the races of the ancient kings of Syria according to different writers.

The Kings of Zobab or Sophene.

According to Scripture.	According to Josephus .	Contemporary with
Rebob - - -	Arach - - -	Saul .
Hadadezer or Hadarezer (A) -	Abrazar - - -	David .

The Kings of Damascus.

According to Scripture.	According to Nic. Damasc.	According to Josephus .	Contemporary with
* * * *	Adad I. - - -	Adad - - -	David .
Rezon - - -	Adad II. - - -	Uncertain - - -	Solomon .
Hezion - - -	Adad III. * * *	* * *	Reboam .
Tabrimon - - -	Adad IV. * * *	* * *	Abijah .
Ben-badad I. -	Adad V. - - -	Adad - - -	Asa .
Ben-badad II. -	Adad VI. * *	* * *	Jebozaphat and Jeboam .
Hazaël - - -	Adad VII. * *	* * *	Abaziah and Joash .
Ben-badad III. -	Adad VIII. * *	* * *	Amaziah .
* * * *	Adad IX. * *	* * *	Uzziah .
Rezin - - -	Adad X. - - -	Rases or Arafes .	Joabam and Abaz .

The Kings of Hamath.

According to Scripture.	According to Josephus .	Contemporary with
Tol * * *	* * *	David .
Joram or Hadoram - - -	Joram * * *	* * *

The Kings of Geshur.

According to Scripture.	Contemporary with
Ammibud -	Saul - - -
Salmai -	David - - -

WE have not minded the seniority of these kingdoms, by placing them either in an exact collateral, or successive order; but have given the second place to Damascus, because it rose upon the ruins of Zobab, though Hamath and Geshur were kingdoms before it (B).

<sup>a</sup> V. Huet Histoire du Com. et de la Navigat. des Anc. cap. 8.

(A) The difference between the Hebrew  $\text{רָבֹב}$  and the Hebrew  $\text{רָז}$ , is so little, that it is no wonder we find this king's name spelt these two ways.

(B) Not that we imagine it had never been a kingdom before. Nicolas of Damascus (1) writes that Abraham was king there, which we may

(1) In Excerpt. VALER.

- a WE have no positive assurance, that Zobab coalesced under one king in the days of Saul, or, consequently, that Rebob was their first king; we only build upon what we apprehend to have been the case. Their kings had been beaten by Saul*, and they thereupon may have come to the resolution of setting up one supreme, perceiving the Israelites to prosper so under their new monarchy. The Philistines seem to have done the like†, at the same time, and for the same reason. If this be granted, none is so likely to have been their first king as Rebob the father of the great Hadadezer, who in the days of David was so firmly seated in the newly-erected throne of Zobab, that he aspired at the universal monarchy of Syria, and, in effect, was become a very great and mighty prince, as you will see in the history of his reign; as also that if he was not the second, he was certainly the last king of Zobab, for we hear no more of the kingdom.

THE kingdom of Damascus rose upon the ruins of the kingdom of Zobab. It was founded by Rezon in the latter part of Solomon's reign‡. That Rezon seized on Damascus, while David was alive, or during the best days of Solomon, cannot be reconciled with scripture, as you will see in the history of those two kings; and that he deferred it till the reign of Reboboam is very improbable; it may be doubted whether he lived so long: for, supposing him to have been but thirty years of age, which is the least we well can, when he served under Hadadezer of Zobab against David, he must have been about one hundred years of age when Reboboam began to reign. It is most likely, then, that Rezon erected the kingdom of Damascus, while Solomon was taken up with his vanities, and had forgot both himself and his people.

- JOSEPHUS, as may be observed in the table, makes one Adad king of Damascus contemporary with David, in which he is a strict follower of Nicolas of Damascus, whom in the next reign he drops. Josephus§, instead of allowing Rezon to have made himself king at Damascus, seems to insinuate that he made Hadad, the Edomite, king there, or somewhere else in Syria. We know there are those who in this matter think along with him. Perhaps the best argument that can be brought in proof that the fugitive king of Edom was established on the throne of Syria¶, may be, that his successors possessed themselves of part of the Edomitish dominions, and particularly Elatb upon the Arabian gulf: but this argument will have but little weight with those, who consider that ambition and avarice may have had as large a share in that acquisition as any conviction of an inherent right. But we forget that our intention was only to prove, that the kingdom of Damascus commenced in the latter part of Solomon's reign.

- NICOLAS of Damascus seems to agree well enough with the scripture accounts of the Damascene kings, and particularly if we suppose his first Adad to have been Hadadezer of Zobab; and that he was so, is pretty plain: nor is it any wonder that he should have made the city of his birth the seat of a kingdom, only one reign longer than he ought to have made it. Besides, he may not be altogether mistaken, in calling his first Adad king of Damascus; for, as may be observed hereafter, he certainly was king or chief over that province, though he did not there reside. By calling his first Adad the Hadadezer of Zobab, we bring him to quadrate very well with the scripture.

It is impossible to determine the exact number of years each king reigned, wherefore we have only placed them over-against the princes of David's line, or the kings of Judah.

WE have on purpose avoided a dry discussion of this point; for there is no certainty to be expected in what concerns the succession of these kings, and the length of their reigns.

- f THE kingdom of Hamath rose together with that of Zobab, as appears pretty plain by the wars between them. But we must observe, that it is at a venture we have placed Joram as successor to his father Toi in the kingdom.

THE kingdom of Geshur seems to have risen together with Zobab and Hamath. We are not sure that Annibud preceded his son Talmi in the kingdom; but it is very likely he did.

* 1 Sam. xiv. 47. † See before, p. 355. ‡ See 1 Kings xi. 24. § Antiq. l. 8. c. 2. ¶ See before, p. 3 15.

may consider in the life of that patriarch. And from the same author, we suppose, Trogus borrowed the kings of Damascus he mentions to have reigned there, both before and after Abraham; as Damascus, Azelus, and Adores before him, and Israel after him; as well as all the rest of his mistaken history of the Jews, who, according to him, are originally of Damascus.

foreign to our present purpose; but we shall endeavour to confirm what we have here advanced, when we are to treat of the Phœnician affairs. In the mean time let any one consider the state of trade in the Levant and Mediterranean, before the discovery or re-discovery, as some* would have of it, of the cape of Good-hope, and, possibly, he will be pretty much of our opinion. Diodorus Siculus numbers the Syrians among the mariners employed by Semiramis in her Indian expedition; but, as we are not disposed to give much credit to his author, Ctesias, we shall make no use of his hint, thinking it of no service to us.

S E C T. III.

Of the Chronology of the ancient Syrians.

BEFORE we proceed to the little we can say upon this obscure subject, we will exhibit a series of the races of the ancient kings of Syria according to different writers.

The Kings of Zobab or Sophene.

According to Scripture.	According to Josephus .	Contemporary with
Rebob - - -	Arach - - -	Saul .
Hadadezer or Hadarezer (A) -	Adrazar - - -	David .

The Kings of Damascus.

According to Scripture.	According to Nic. Damasc.	According to Josephus .	Contemporary with
* * * *	Adad I. - - -	Adad - - -	David .
Rezon - - -	Adad II. - - -	Uncertain - - -	Solomon .
Hezion - - -	Adad III. * * *	* * * *	Reboboam .
Tabrimon - - -	Adad IV. * * *	* * * *	Abijam .
Ben-badad I. -	Adad V. - - -	Adad - - -	Asa .
Ben-badad II. -	Adad VI. * * *	* * * *	Jehoshaphat and
Hazaël - - -	Adad VII. * * *	* * * *	Abaziah and Jo
Ben-badad III. -	Adad VIII. * * *	* * * *	Amaziah .
* * * *	Adad IX. * * *	* * * *	Uzziah .
Rezin - - -	Adad X. - - -	Rases or Arafes .	Jordan and A

The Kings of Hamath.

According to Scripture.	According to Josephus .	Contemporary
Toi * * *	* * *	David .
Joram or Hadoram - - -	Joram * * *	* * *

The Kings of Geshur.

According to Scripture.	Contemporary with
Ammibud -	- - -
Talmai -	- - -

We have not minded the seniority of these kingdoms, in an exact collateral, or successive order; but have given Damascus, because it rose upon the ruins of Zobab, though Damascus kingdoms before it (B).

* V. HISTOIR. du Com. et de la Navigat. des A

(A) The difference between the Hebrew and the Hebrew  $\gamma$   $\delta$ , is so little, that wonder we find this king's name spelled in two ways.

(B) Not that kingdom before that At

...the ... ..

He

S E C T. IV.

The Reigns of the Kings of the ancient Syrians.

The KINGS of ZOBAB.

Rehob. REHOB we suppose to have been the first sole king of Zobab, and to have a laid the foundations of his son's grandeur.

Hadadezer. HADADEZER or Haderezer the son of Rehob, was a great and ambitious prince, and remarkable for his unfortunate wars with king David. He had warred with advantage against the king of Hamath; aiming at the universal monarchy of Syria, we imagine; but when he opposed David's progress towards the reduction of the land, which had been promised to Abraham and his seed, quite to the Euphrates<sup>a</sup>, his good fortune left him. In the first battle he fought with David he lost one thousand chariots, seven thousand horse, and twenty thousand foot. The Syrians of Damascus then sent their army to reinforce him. In the second battle Hadadezer lost two and twenty thousand men. Thus beaten out of the field, the conqueror b possessed himself of a good part of Syria, and particularly Damascene. Hadadezer now lost his golden shields; for such he had in his treasury, we suppose; his two cities Betab and Berothai, exceedingly rich in brass, were plundered<sup>c</sup>, and his dominion was considerably diminished and impoverished. But it is likely nothing perplexed him more than the defection of Rezon, afterwards king of Damascus, who leading the forces sent him from that province, or Hadadezer's own, uncertain which, deserted him in the midst of his adverse fortune, and gathering a band of men about him, lived an outlaw, and upon the spoil<sup>d</sup>.

Year of the
Flood, 1955.
Year before
Christ, 1044.

It is not expressed that Hadadezer became tributary to king David, nor indeed is it likely that he did, by what follows. For he furnished Haman king of Ammon with twenty thousand men against David; but they, with the other auxiliaries of that war, were put to a shameful flight by Joab<sup>e</sup>. Though he was paid for these twenty thousand men, and was by no means a principal in this war, yet the next year he seems to have made himself so<sup>f</sup>. He called in all the petty kings, that owed him homage, on the other side of the Euphrates, and every where else, as far as his power extended, he levied forces. By which means he got together a very considerable army, which he committed to the conduct of Shobach, his general, to assist Haman against David a second time; or rather to make a desperate effort to retrieve his own honour and dominion, or to humble David, if possible. But this great host also miscarried, being routed with the loss of many thousands, and Shobach himself was slain on the spot. The battle was fought at a place called Helam; about forty thousand of the Syrians were slain, and among the rest Shobach, as we have said. The petty princes that served Hadadezer in this fatal warfare, made their peace with David, and became his tributaries<sup>g</sup>, as Hadadezer himself did, as is very likely; concerning whom, or the kingdom of Zobab, we find no further account.

The KINGS of DAMASCUS.

Rezon. THE kingdom of Zobab being undone, that of Damascus rose upon the ruins of it. REZON was the first king, the same who deserted from Hadadezer king of Zobab. e He seized on Damascus, and was the founder of this noble kingdom, to whom he was a very troublesome, inveterate enemy, taking advantage of Solomon's neglect<sup>h</sup>.

Hezion. HEZION succeeded Rezon; but whether he was his son, or any otherwise related to him, we know not (A). He lived at peace and amity with the kings of Judah and Israel<sup>i</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> See Genes. xv. 18. <sup>b</sup> 2 Sam. viii. 3—9. <sup>c</sup> 1 Kings xi. 23, 24. <sup>d</sup> See before, p. 297.
<sup>e</sup> See before in the Notes, p. 297. <sup>f</sup> 2 Sam. x. 15—19. <sup>g</sup> 1 Kings xi. 23—25. <sup>h</sup> Ibid. xv. 18.

(A) It is the joint opinion of Sir John Marsham (1), Sir Isaac Newton (2), and archbishop Usher (3), that Rezon and Hezion are different names for the same king. It is impossible for us to declare ourselves, either for or against it.

(1) Canon Chronic. Secul. 13. (2) Chronol. of anc. Kingd. amended, p. 221. (3) Anal.

a TABRIMON (B) the son of Hezion. He, as well as his father, had no misunderstandings with the kings of Judab and Israel <sup>1</sup>.

BEN-HADAD, the son of Tabrimon. Ambassadors came to him with large gifts Ben-badad I. from Afa king of Judab, by whom he was tempted to make war upon Baalha <sup>Year of the Flood, 2059.</sup> king of Israel; from whom his army took Ijon, Dan, Abel-beth-maacbab, all Cin-neroth, and all the land of Naphtali <sup>Year before Christ, 940.</sup> <sup>Ben-badad II.</sup> <sup>Year of the Flood, 2059.</sup> <sup>Year before Christ, 901.</sup> and, in the end, extended his power to the city of Samaria itself, as we shall see anon.

BEN-HADAD, the son of Ben-badad. He vigorously prosecuted the enmity his father had so successively begun against Israel, but therein was twice very remarkably baffled by the interposition of heaven. When he first marched against Israel, b we understand it to have been with mighty parade, he having no less than thirty two kings over his chariots <sup>1</sup>, and a vast army of both horse and foot. He proceeded, and sat down before Samaria, and strait summoned Abab the king to surrender himself as his vassal; to acknowledge himself to be his creature; and that all belonging to him was at his service and disposal. To this he received as submissive an answer as he could wish for. But his arrogance swelled to that pitch, that a bare verbal submission would not serve his turn. He sent into Samaria, therefore, to admonish Abab, that he intended the next day to send some officers to search his palace and the city, for all the riches, women, and fine children (C), that they might seize on them, and bring them away. The king of Israel boldly refused to submit
c to so unparalleled an indignity, which Benbadad little expecting, was highly exasperated. He sent a third time to Abab, to try whether he could not threaten him into so base a compliance, wishing himself in a worse condition than Abab, if he did not bring such an army before Samaria, that every soldier taking but a handful of it (D), there should be no signs of it left. He received a stubborn reply to this vain menace, Abab advising him to wait the event of things before he reckoned upon them.

THE Syrian army, which had hitherto been in loose array, was now ordered to invest the city of Samaria in form, and get all ready for the assault. While this was doing, Ben-badad, who seems to have been a very voluptuous prince, and much given to drink, betook himself to his pleasure, fearless of all danger, for he could apprehend d none. As he was in the midst of his security and carousals, he was told that a party was drawing near from the city, which at first caused a small alarm in the camp, and disturbed Ben-badad himself. But when he understood what the matter was, he commanded, that they should be brought before him alive, whether their designs were for peace or for war, and then returned to his cups. The party which was coming out of the city was, in fact, Abab and a choice company with him; who, though it was noon-day, were encouraged to fall upon the great host of the Syrians. The Syrians on the other hand dreaming of nothing less than an assault, thought they should have nothing to do, but to conduct them to their king. But when Abab and his followers were come up, and all at once laid about them furiously, the Syrians e fled, and a panic fear spread itself all over the camp, so that there was no one that thought of any thing else but saving himself; and particularly Ben-badad mounted a horse, and rode away with the rest as fast as he could, instead of rallying and confirming his people. They all fled, and the Israelites pursued them with a very great slaughter.

<sup>1</sup> 1 Kings xv. 18.

<sup>2</sup> Ibid. ver. 20.

<sup>3</sup> Compare ibid. xx. 1. with ibid. xxii. 31.

(B) Sir Isaac Newton (4) reckons him to have been subject to the Egyptians, who under Sesac or Shishak conquered Syria (5), in this king's reign, according to his hypothesis; and that his son Ben-badad shook off the yoke.

(C) This last particular is aggravated by some (6) into a great piece of insolence and brutality; as if he sent to Abab for his most beautiful male children, to sin against nature with them.

(D) This proud message is very variously interpreted. The words of the text itself are: The gods do so unto me, and more also, if the dust of Samaria shall suffice for handfuls for all the people that follow me (7): Or as it is in the margin, are at my feet. This, according to Josephus (8), means no more, than that he had so numberless a multitude with him, that each taking but a handful of soil, could compass Samaria, with works that should over-top the wall of the city. Others (9) take it much as we do; that if each man in his army took but a handful of the ruins of Samaria, they might carry the whole place away with them. Others (10) again suppose his meaning to have been, that he would return with such an army, that if each soldier took but a handful of his country, nothing of it should be left remaining. Take it which way you will, it was a high vaunt, and passionately spoken to set off the greatness of his kingdom.

(4) Ubi sup. (5) See before in the Notes, p. 249. (6) Vide CLEBIC. in 1 Reg. xx. 3. (7) 1 Kings xx. 10. (8) Antiq. l. 8. c. 8. (9) CLEBIC. in 1 Reg. ubi sup. (10) PATRIC upon 1 Kings xx. 10.

THE Syrians were covered with shame at so inglorious a flight, and would gladly have found out some excuse to palliate it. They pretended, that the gods of the Israelites being the gods of the hills, it was no wonder that such a misfortune had befallen them; and, to comfort their king, assured him, that if he could but draw out the Israelites upon a plain, his gods would prevail in their turn, as they presided over the plains (E). They moreover laid some blame upon the two and thirty kings, as not hearty in his cause, or submissive enough to discipline, and desired that trusty skilful officers might be substituted instead of them. They then advised their king to levy just such an army as the former, chariot for chariot, horse for horse, and never doubt of success.

Year of the
Flood, 2099.
Year before
Christ, 900.

BEN-HADAD hearkened to all this, and bore his dishonour as uneasily, we b may suppose, as any of his subjects could for him. And when the season of the year came about, he marched towards the king of Israel with such an army, as if he meant to make good what he had boasted towards the city of Samaria. He pitched in Apbek, in a plain we may be sure, to be within the reach of his own gods, and filled the country, as it is expressed. Seven days he lay here incamped, over-against the despicable numbers of the Israelites (F). Upon the seventh day it came to a battle between them, and that day the Syrians lost of foot only one hundred thousand. This slaughter so confounded them, that they gave ground, and retreated with precipitation to the city of Apbek itself, which was near, where twenty seven thousand of them were crushed to death by the city wall, which fell on them (G). c

BEN-HADAD now gave all over for lost, and was not a little surprized, perhaps, that his gods had failed him. In despair therefore he concealed himself in the city of Apbek; but his officers reminding him that the kings of Israel had been generous enemies, advised him to throw himself upon Abab's mercy, and offered themselves to prepare the conqueror to receive him kindly, with sackcloth on their loins, and ropes about their necks. In this humble disguise they accordingly went and accosted Abab, intreating him in behalf of their king. Abab overjoyed at his victory, was in admirable temper to receive them, and in a kind of transport called Ben-badad his brother, and declared he was glad to hear he was living. The artful Syrians caught at the word brother, and made the best use of it they could d for the service of their disconsolate king. Ben-badad then was brought to Abab, who desired him to step up into his chariot. While he was thus in the chariot with Abab, he made many protestations and promises to him. He promised to deliver up all his father had wrested from Israel; and not only that, but to allow Abab great authority in his capital Damascus, even the same his own father had enjoyed in Samaria (H). By these fair speeches he so wrought upon the mind of Abab, that he was immediately restored to his liberty, and a peace was concluded =.

How strictly Ben-badad adhered to his word with Abab in other respects, he kept possession of Ramoth-gilead, which was the subject of a fresh war, wherein he was

■ 1 Kings xx.

(E) So early was the notion of topical deities, and of the gods fighting together with the men who worshipped them. However, they must have known, that the Jewish law was delivered on a hill; that the temple of Jerusalem stood on a hill. They could not but know that the enemy's country was very hilly, and that the Israelites were particularly fond of sacrificing and worshipping in high places. Knowing all this, it is no wonder that the Syrians, considering the theology of the times, should talk after so wild a rate.

(F) It may be very well asked, why the Syrians, seeing the advantage of numbers so greatly on their side, lay idle so long? But it may be answered, that the Israelites were incamped on a hill, and therefore they would not venture to attack them, choosing to stay till they should shift their quarters.

(G) This is so extraordinary a casualty, that it may be well asked how it came to pass? It is supposed they ranged themselves round the walls of the city to make a defence; and that the walls were beaten down upon them by the Israelites, or shook down by an earthquake (11). In a word, that God was immediately concerned in this destruction (12). It need not be supposed they were all destroyed, but partly killed and partly wounded or dispersed.

(H) What privilege or authority Ben-badad promises to Abab is very doubtful. What privilege or authority Ben-badad's father enjoyed in Samaria, is a question we should be glad to clear up, were it possible. Josephus (13) has it, that Abab should have as free liberty in Damascus as his father had had in the city of Samaria, which was built but a few years before by Omri king of Israel. It is most likely, according to the LXX and the Vulgate, that he promises Abab, the Israelites should live free in Damascus, with all the liberties they enjoyed at home; that they should have free ingress and egress [ἔξοδος], according to the former, or build them streets to live together, by their own country laws, according to a invaded by Abab, who also prevailed on Jeboſaphat, king of Judab, to be his confederate. The two kings led their forces againſt Ramoib-gilead; where they found the Syrians prepared to receive them; but Abab, having ſufficient reaſon to fear that the enemy would mark him out for deſtruction, diſguiſed himſelf before the battle, while the king of Judab put on his royal robes. The apprehenſions of Abab were not without foundation; for the king of Syria commanded his two and thirty captains, who had rule over his chariots, to direct their arms only againſt the king of Israel. This had like to have proved fatal to Jeboſaphat, who had inevitably been ſlain, had not the officers ceaſed their purſuit of him when they diſcovered that he was not the perſon they had in commiſſion to deſtroy. But Abab's precaution could not ſave him from the fate he endeavoured to evade; for one of the Syrians (I) drew a bow at a venture, and ſmote him between the joints of his harneſs: upon which he ordered his charioteer to carry him out of the field of battle, and died in the evening. But whether the Syrian chiefs had any knowledge of this accident, and giving over their ſearch, joined in the aſſault, we cannot pretend to ſay; but it appears, that the battle was fierce and obſtinate, and that it laſted till night; under the covert of which each ſide drew off with equal loſs and doubtful victory.

(11) PATRICK upon 1 Kings xx, 30. supr.

(12) CLERIC in 1 Reg. xx, 30.

(13) Antiq. ubi

Now the general who commanded the Syrians in the laſt battle, was called Naaman; and for his behaviour and conduct upon that day, his maſter beheld him as the deliverer of his country, and received him into higheſt favour as ſuch: and indeed he ſeems to have been a very excellent perſon, but, unfortunately, he was a leper, which drew him to Samaria, hoping there to be cleaned, as he was. For the Syrians, it ſeems, continuing at enmity with Israel, made frequent inroads into their country, and at times, carried off great booty, and numbers of captives. It happened that a captive among the reſt, a little maid, as ſhe is called, ſerved in the houſe of Naaman; and obſerving her maſter to be a leper, would with him at Samaria, where was a prophet who could relieve him. Thus was ſhe wont to expreſs herſelf to her miſtreſs; and at laſt it was reported to Naaman himſelf, that ſhe had ſaid ſo and ſo. Naaman then told it to Ben-badad, who was for embracing any opportunity to procure him relief, and with that intent wrote a letter to the king of Israel to recommend Naaman to him, and to entreat that he would cure him of his leproſy. With this letter Naaman departed, taking with him ten talents of ſilver, fix thouſand pieces of gold, and ten changes of raiment, that he might reward the perſon who ſhould cleanſe him, in proportion to his own elevated rank, and in proportion to the value of ſo great a bleſſing. He mounted his chariot, and went, attended by a number of horſemen, and delivered his letter to the king of Israel. Jeſoram miſtook Ben-badad's meaning, and thought he wanted him in perſon to cure Naaman, an impoſſibility for him to do, and fancied that he only ſought thereby an opportunity to wage open war with him. Naaman, in this comfortleſs dilemma, received a meſſage from Eliſha, who promiſed to help him. He therefore went to the prophet's houſe, and ſtopped at the door with all his train. Here he waited ſome time, and at laſt a ſervant came out to him from the prophet, with orders that he ſhould waſh himſelf ſeven times in the river Jordan (K). This direction, after ſo patient attendance, provoked him to diſdain.

1 Kings xxii. 3, 30—35

to the latter; and the ſame it ſeems, had been enjoyed by the Syrians in Samaria: this is the apparent ſenſe of our own verſion of this paſſage, and the moſt ſtrictly agreeable with the original. 'Some think by ſtreets, he means market-places where commodities were ſold, the toll of which ſhould belong to Abab. Others think he means courts of judgment, where he ſhould maintain a jurisdiction over Ben-badad's ſubjects: others, that we now call a piazza, of which Abab ſhould receive the rents. But commonly interpreters think he means fortifications, whereby he might bridle the chief city of the kingdom of Syria; that they might not make irruptions into the land of Israel. Citadels, as we now ſpeak, to keep them in awe, and to be a check to them, if they attempted any thing againſt the Israelites; yet,

' after all, Goff. Vallandus hath ſaid a great deal to prove that the Hebrew word ſignifies palaces; which he being allowed to build, was a great token of ſubjection (13). We muſt here obſerve, that we read of no cities Ben-badad's father took from Abab's. What he took was from Baaba. However, he may have made other incroachments upon the kingdom of Israel, which are omitted.

(I) The Syrian who drew this bow, is, by Jeſephus, called Aman. According to the ſame hiſtorian, Ben-badad was in this battle himſelf; to us it ſeems that he did not command in perſon, but committed the conduct of this war to Naaman.

(K) It is obſerved, that by the laws of Moses lepers were ſprinkled ſeven times (14). It is ſuppoſed

(13) PATRICK upon 1 Kings xx. 34. (14) Levit. xiv. 7.

He thought he was derided. He expected the prophet to have appeared in person, in a formal manner, to call upon the name of God, and apply his hands to the afflicted parts. If washing could be of any avail, he thought the streams of Abana and Pharpar at Damascus far beyond any waters of Israel: In short, thus disappointed, as he thought, he gave vent to the keenest resentment. But his attendants, much grieved to observe him in such disorder, begged him, in the most discreet and affectionate terms, to consider how easy a matter it was to follow the prophet's directions, whether any good came of it or not; and he being a man of sense, hearkened to them, and drove to the river, and dipping himself seven times therein, was perfectly changed (K).

He returned to the prophet with inexpressible joy, renounced all idolatry, and would gladly have forced a prosent upon him; but his endeavours this way were to no purpose. He entreated the prophet to grant him two mule-loads of earth, it being his design to worship or sacrifice to none other but God. He then consulted Elisba, whether or no it might be lawful for him to attend on his king in the temple of Rimmon, his office requiring him to support his prince at his devotions, so that he could not avoid bowing down when he did. As for the earth, it is not said that the prophet granted him any (L); and as for his scruple of conscience, we have not the prophet's decision thereon; he left it, perhaps, undecided, as a matter of indifference in Naaman's case, and dismissed him in peace.

NAAMAN thus purified both in body and mind, departed; but being on the road, was circumvented by Gebazi the prophet's servant, who accosted him with a forgery in the prophet's name, whereby he got from him one talent of silver, and two changes of raiment; wherefore his leprosy became entailed upon Gebazi and his posterity*; which is said to have given this generous Syrian an opportunity of displaying a noble instance of his generosity, the good effects of which are said to subsist at this very day (M).

Soon after Naaman's return to Damascus, Ben-hadad began to execute some private designs against Jezebel king of Israel; whence it is naturally enough gathered, that Naaman either died, or resigned, or was discarded very soon after his return home (N). It was not an open war that Ben-hadad meditated against the king of Israel, but all was secret, and mysterious, and stratagem (O). But Ben-hadad was continually frustrated in all his aims, and began to suspect the fidelity of some about him. To remove so dangerous a suspicion from his breast, he was told, that it must certainly be Elisba who disconcerted all his measures, he being indued with such a degree of omniscience, that nothing could be concealed from posed that there was something peculiarly efficacious in a seven-fold repetition, as the Almighty went through the great and beneficent work of creation within seven days (15); that accordingly it was enjoined in honour of God, and being performed, had its proper effects.

* 2 Kings v.

(K) This, says bishop Patrick (16), was the only cure of a leprosy we read of, till CHRIST, the great prophet, came into the world. It was, and still is, in those parts, as loathsome a disease as it is inveterate. It differs much from the leprosy which is seen among us. It defiles the whole surface of the body with a foul scurf, deforms the joints, particularly at the wrists and ankles, which swell out with a gouty scrophulous substance, very loathsome to look on; the legs of those afflicted with it look like those of old battered horses: in short, it may pass for the utmost corruption of the human body on this side the grave (17).

(L) It is not said, in the text, that Elisba granted this his request; but our translators, in their argument to the chapter where this whole story is found, imagine that he did. From the words which follow, it appears, that he wanted this earth to raise an altar with it; a pious motive, though mistaken.

(M) This is said by a meer tradition, no doubt, but we do not know how to pass it over. At Damascus, just by the city walls, is an hospital richly endowed for the reception of lepers; said to be the same built by Naaman for Gebazi, servant to Elisba (18).

(N) A late writer (19) tells us, without justification, that Naaman lost his great office of General for refusing to worship Rimmon; but the argument he builds on, which is the next thing we shall consider, seems to be but weak.

(O) The words of the text (20) itself are; Then the king of Syria warred against Israel, and took counsel with his servants, saying, in such and such a place shall be my camp; and, by what follows, he enjoined them strict secrecy. From hence the late writer (21) we just now touched on, asserts, that Naaman was displaced; for which reason the king of Syria now commanded his army in person, and being not used to such exercises, he on all occasions consulted his general officers. Did not Ben-hadad command his army twice in person before; once at Samaria, and once in the fatal day of Aphek? why then should he not command it a third time? and why must he be so ignorant in military affairs? If he committed his army for once to the conduct of another, must it be thought he did it always?

Finally,

(15) CLERIC. in 2 Reg. v. (16) Upon 2 Kings v. 14. (17) MAUNDRELL'S Journey from Aleppo to Jeruf. in the Append. Letter II. (18) THEVENOT'S Travels into the Levant, part II. book I. cap. iv. (19) BEDFORD'S Script. Chronol. p. 627. (20) 2 Kings vi. 3. (21) BEN-GAL'S lib. sup.

him,

a him, though transacted in the greatest privacy imaginable. Ben-badad had heard enough concerning that prophet, from Naaman, to incline him to believe as much; and therefore, by a strange absence of thought resolved to lay hands on him in the first place; and to that purpose, detached a strong party to Dothan, where he understood him then to be. They came to that city in the night, and the next morning were, by the prophet, smitten with such a deception of sight, that they suffered him to guide them into the very heart of the city of Samaria, where their right sense returned to them; that they might behold their situation. Here, instead of being made prisoners of war, they were hospitably entertained, and generously dismissed; and making their report to Ben-badad of all that had happened; b the prophet's power, and the king's humanity, a stop was put to the war (P).

THIS peaceable disposition subsisted not long, and in the conclusion Ben-badad marched against Samaria once more. This city he besieged with his whole force, reduced it to the greatest straits, and was on the point of taking it by famine; so that either the siege was long and obstinate, or else the place was poorly stored. He as we have said, was on the point of taking the city, when he was alarmed in the night, by a noise like that of a great army rushing in upon him; and presently it came into his head, that Yoram had hired the kings of the Hittites (Q) and Egypt to come to his relief; the apprehension of which so terrified him, that he raised the siege with unspeakable precipitation. His army would not so much c as take time to mount, but left every thing standing in the camp just as it was, when they took the alarm, and dropped every thing that was in the least cumbersome to them as they went along. They might have tracked them by the cloaths and vessels they threw away from them in their haste.

BEN-NADAD must at this time have been well advanced in years, and whether he had contracted some illness by the fatigue of his flight, and violence of his surprize, or whether his spirits were broken by so repeated a shame, he took to his bed. As he lay sick it was told him, the prophet Elisha was coming to Damascus (R); whereupon he sent Hazael with forty camels load of the choicest productions (S) of Damascus, to consult the prophet concerning his indisposition. Hazael then d went to the prophet, whom he accosted in the most respectful manner on the behalf of Ben-badad. The answer he received was, that Ben-badad might recover, but would not. The prophet having expressed himself in this dark manner, fixed his eyes upon Hazael, till he put the man out of countenance (T), and suddenly burst into tears. Hazael, amazed at this, and humbly desiring to know what might be the cause of it, was told, that he was to succeed Ben-badad, and to be a cruel and merciless persecutor of the children of Israel; that he would set their strong-holds on fire, slay their young men with the sword, dash their children, and rip up their women with child. Hazael professed to understand not what the prophet meant, nor could conceive how so mean a person as himself could ever have e it in his power to commit such outrages (U): whereupon he received a further confirmation, a confirmation from God himself, that he was to be king of Syria.

* 2 Kings vi. 8—29.

† Ibid. vii. 6, 7.

Finally, what wise king was there ever who did not on all occasions consult his general officers? It is certainly wrong in an historian to be positive in matters of palpable darkness, to be fond of an hypothesis, that is to write by the Spirit.

(P) According to Josephus (22), upon the report they made to their king, he gave over his private designs, and straight resolved, instead thereof, to wage open war with Jezebel.

(Q) Who these kings of the Hittites were is very uncertain. Josephus (23) calls them the kings of the islands. That any remnant of the Canaanitish Hittites should at this time be formidable in any of these parts, is past our understanding, though some think that way (24). We are told, the remnant of them was reduced to the most abject degree of servitude by Solomon (25).

(R) By Josephus (26), the prophet was not yet arrived at Damascus, and Hazael was sent out to meet him. Some (27) suppose he was just coming into the city.

(S) By the largeness of this present, it is thought Elisha was accompanied by many of the sons of the prophets, or that even four camels load had been sufficient (28).

(T) This seems to be the most natural explication of the text. Hazael beheld the prophet with an eye of veneration, and as one infinitely his superior, and therefore was abashed when Elisha fixed his eyes so steadfastly upon him.

(U) The text runs: But what is thy servant a dog, that he should do this great thing? Whereby most have understood that he disclaimed such barbarity as the prophet foretold of him; but the real meaning of this passage is, but what is thy servant, a dog? alluding to his mean condition, which would never allow him to commit what only a great prince had power to do (29). This is confirmed

(22) Antiq. l. 9. c. 2.

(23) Ubi sup.

(24) PATRICK upon 2 Kings x. 29. CLERIC. in 2 Reg. vii. 6.

(25) See before, p. 337.

(26) Ubi sup.

(27) PATRICK upon 2 Kings viii. 7.

(28) CLERIC. in 2 Reg. viii. 9.

(29) See PATRICK upon 2 Kings viii. 13.

Vid. antiq. CLERIC. in 2 Reg. viii. 13. & JOSEPH. Antiq. ubi sup.

With

With this he returns to his master, who by this solicitous message to the prophet, a unknowingly shortened the term of his days. Hazael flattered him with hopes of recovery, but the next day stifled him with a thick cloth dipped in water<sup>r</sup>. So ended the reign of the great Ben-badad, who having adorned Damascus with fine structures, as is said, and added to the glory of Syria, was advanced to be a god (X)<sup>s</sup>.

Hazael.

Year of the
Flood, 2115
Year before
Christ, 884.

HAZAEI having thus murdered his sick lord, ascended his throne. He had, by the wise providence of GOD, been nominated to the diadem of Syria some years before, and the prophet Elijah had orders to anoint him<sup>t</sup>. He was a scourge in the hand of GOD, to chastise the kingdoms of Judab and Israel, and under him the Syrian monarchy arose to its meridian. However, he seems to have sat very quietly on his throne, till he was provoked by Joram king of Israel, and Abaziab king of Judab who leagued against him to wrest Ramoth-gilead out of his hands, in imitation of what their fathers had attempted in the reign of Ben-badad; and so it happened that Hazael either could not, or would not prevent them from possessing themselves of that city, as we apprehend, though Joram was dangerously wounded in the attempt. But Hazael made himself ample amends, by invading both the kingdoms of Judab and Israel, and pursuing them almost to destruction. He began with Jebu king of Israel, and subdued to his dominion, all in general that belonged to the kingdom of Israel, on the other side Jordan, the countries of Gilead and Bashan, the two tribes, Reuben and Gad, and the half tribe of Manasseh<sup>u</sup>. In the prosecution of this conquest he, no doubt, punctually fulfilled, by his cruel rage, all the things the mournful prophet had foretold of him, in the remarkable conversation they had together (Y).

Year of the
Flood, 2159.
Year before
Christ, 840.

WITH the same fury and success he waged war upon Jeboabaz, the son of Jebu, till he had left him but fifty horse, ten chariots, and ten thousand foot; for the rest had perished in battle against Hazael, who, as it is strongly express'd, made them like the dust by threshing; and, to conclude, he oppressed Israel all his days<sup>v</sup>.

HAZAEI having thus chastised Israel, turned his arms against the kingdom of Judab, for they had both confederated against him; so that he had a fair pretence for infesting them both. He crossed the Jordan therefore; and after several successful attempts upon other places, as we may suppose, made himself master of the strong and royal city of Gath<sup>w</sup>, which had been the seat of the Philistine kings, but was now possessed by the house of David<sup>x</sup>. His next thought was to attempt Jerusalem itself; but as he was meditating this great enterprize, he was diverted therefrom by the rich gifts of the weak and apostate Jeboash, who then reigned at Jerusalem; and who dreading the Syrian power, sent Hazael all the treasure and rich moveables that had been set apart and dedicated by his father for sacred, and other uses. Hazael was pacified with so noble a present, and desisted from his designs against Jerusalem<sup>y</sup> for a while.

BUT he was soon stirred up again to war upon Jerusalem; he had not yet been the instrument of sufficient judgment upon that distracted city. Wherefore towards the end of the same year, as we apprehend, he detached a party from his army to serve against that city, and to make good his first intentions on it. This party is expressly remarked to have been very small; but yet it prevailed against the great host of Jeboash king of Judab, sacked Jerusalem, slew all the princes of the people there, and sent their spoil to Hazael at Damascus (Z). And by this expedi-

<sup>r</sup> 2 Kings viii. 7—15. <sup>s</sup> JOSEPH. Antiq. l. 9. c. 2. <sup>t</sup> 1 Kings xix. 15. <sup>u</sup> 2 Kings x. 31—33. <sup>v</sup> Ibid. xiii. 3, 7, 22. <sup>w</sup> Ibid. xii. 17. <sup>x</sup> See before in the notes, p. 357, 359. <sup>y</sup> 2 Kings xii. 17, 18.

firm'd by the prophet's answer, that he was to be king of Syria; which comes in very naturally.

(X) We are almost tempted to think that Hazael may have been the chief promoter of this deification, to cover his own guilt. He seems to have been afraid it should be known he was the murderer of his master, by his manner of dispatching him. Josephus calls this Ben-badad by the names of Adad, Adar, and Ader; which difference arises from the near similitude of the Hebrew R and D, as we have already (30) noted. The former number being printed off and dispersed, we cannot otherwise correct a fault in the list of the Damascene kings, according to Josephus, where his Adad, which now stands opposite to Ben-badad I. according to the scripture account, ought to be brought down to a line with Benbadad II. According to Sir Isaac Newton (31), the Damascus and Arath we formerly mentioned (32), were this Ben-badad and his queen, who were worshipped in their sepulchres or temples. But by this supposition it should seem that idolatry was yet in its nonage among the Syrians, whereas Josephus (33) talks of stately temples erected by Ben-badad in his life-time (34).

(Y) Josephus (35) assures us he did; that he neither spared man, woman, or child, wherever he came, but put all to fire and sword.

(Z) Josephus (36) makes but one expedition of these

(30) See before in the notes, p. 380. (31) Short Chronol. p. 32. (32) See before in the notes, p. 372. (33) Ubi supr. (34) See Sir ISAAC NEWTON'S Chron. of anc. kingd. apud p. 222. (35) Ubi supr. c. 8. (36) Ibid.

a tion did Hazael also make himself master of Elath on the red-sea, as appears, and as we shall endeavour to confirm hereafter, in the history of Rezin the last king of Syria. Hazael having thus subdued, and tyrannized over the kingdoms of Israel and Judab, died and was deified (A).

He left behind him a son and successor, called Ben-hadad, who suffered a total reverse of his father's fortune, ere he had reigned long (B). Thrice was he defeated by Jeboash, the son of Jeboabaz king of Israel, whereby he lost all that his father had wrested from Israel. Nothing more is said of this obscure and unfortunate reign. However, nothing is more likely than that this Ben-hadad was subdued to a tribute by Jeroboam, the son of Jeboash, king of Israel, who kept Syria in the strictest subjection, during all his long reign.

THE Syrians recovered themselves again amidst the disorders which raged in the kingdom of Israel upon Jeroboam's death; but not so perfectly as to be quite a free people; for we are apt to think they were under considerable acknowledgments to the newly-erected empire of Assyria (C). But not to dwell on this uncertainty, Rezin was their last king. Towards the latter end of his reign he entered into a league with Pekab king of Israel, against Abaz king of Judab. They were stirred up by heaven to punish Abaz, and their design was to dethrone him, and make room for a stranger to David's line, called Tabeal<sup>b</sup>. With this intent they besieged Abaz in Jerusalem, but without effect. Rezin, however, that he might not be wholly a sufferer by this disappointment, marched his army into Edom, and, whatever else he did there, made himself master of Elath on the red-sea, which he annexed once more to the dominion of Syria (D), and there he planted a colony of these two. According to him, Hazael having taken Gath, trait besieged Jerusalem; whence he was prevailed on to depart, by the great bribes mentioned in scripture. But it is impossible that what is said of Hazael's war with Judab, as it is represented in the second book of Kings (37), and in the book of Chronicles (38), should have been otherwise than we have represented. Nothing is plainer than that those two books speak of two very widely different events.

<sup>b</sup> Isa. vii. 1—6.

(A) It is no wonder, considering the blindness of the times, that they deified for fortunate and so great a prince as Hazael. He, as well as his predecessor Ben-hadad, adorned Damascus with temples, and their statues were carried about in procession in the days of Josephus (39), the Syrians boasting their antiquity. From hence there is room to imagine these two to have been their primary deities, and that the temples they are famed for building, were no more than noble sepulchres for themselves (40); but we forbear to expatiate hereon, and having given the hint, submit it to better judgments.

(B) It is said (41), The anger of the Lord was kindled against Israel, and he delivered them into the hand of Hazael king of Syria, and Ben-hadad the son of Hazael, all their days. Whence it might be imagined that Ben-hadad kept Israel under as long as he lived. But the word their is not in the original, and by what follows (42), it is evident, that the text means no such thing, referring only to the days of Hazael himself. To solve this matter, however, it is likely that Ben-hadad was taken into the government by his father, as his colleague; and that as long as they reigned together, they kept Israel under. St. Jerome (43) writes, that all the subsequent kings of Syria were called Ben-hadad, from this prince, the third of the name according to scripture. This we take notice of as it is apparently a great mistake. This prince borrowed the name of Ben-hadad from the first race of the Damascene kings, to which his father was an alien. The names Hadad and Ben-hadad were affected, as it seems, by all the kings of Syria, from Hadadener of Zabab, downwards. Ben-hadad signifies only the son of Hadad. The father of the first prince of this name is called Tabrimon; but by his son's name, it may to some appear that he was also styled Hadad (44). Josephus calls him Adad, and we must desire the reader once more to excuse an omission in the list of Damascene kings, according to that historian, and to write Adad under Hazael.

(C) This is a conjecture which we apprehend to have some tolerable foundation. The kingdom of Damascus had been broken and enervated by servitude under Israel; and when Pul, king of Assyria, was stirred against Menabem, the third that bore the title of king in Israel after Jeroboam, we cannot conceive but he must have marched through Syria, and have made himself master there in the first place. It is plain he was bent upon extending his dominion, and how he could think of reducing Israel before he had secured Syria, which lay between him and his projected conquest farther westward, is what we cannot conceive. It is likely that Syria invited him, submitted to him, and joined him, and that it now first became a province of Assyria.

(D) Our version says, he recovered Elath to Syria; so, says the Vulgate, in tempore illo restituit Rafin rex Syriae, Ailam Syriae. Whence we gather, it must have been conquered to Syria by Hazael, when he sent a part of his army against Jerusalem (45). Ben-hadad II. his predecessor, had no war that we read of with the king of Judab; and after Hazael's death, Syria was unable to make her own cause good, and therefore but ill qualified to extend her dominion. Azariah, king of Judab, restored it to Judab (46), and drove out the Syrims (47) when they were subdued by Jeroboam king of Israel. Le Clerc, in his version, will have it that he restored this noble emporium to the Edomites, taking on him, by a little too much presumption, to alter the reading of the text from לודם Laaram, to לודם Leedom. It had been

(37) Kings xli. 17, 18. (38) Ibid. xlii. 23, 24. (39) Ubi supr. c. 2. (40) See Sir Isaac Newton's Chron. of anc. kingd. amended, p. 222. See before, p. 372. (41) 2 Kings xlii. 3. (42) Ibid. ver. 22. (43) Amos i. (44) See before, p. 382. (45) See before, p. 388. (46) 2 Kings xlii. 12. (47) See PATRICK upon 2 Kings xvii. 6.

Year of the his own (E), which subsisted many years after the subversion of the kingdom itself a Flood, 2259. of Syria<sup>c</sup>.

Year before
Christ, 741.

THE next year Rezin and Pekab prosecuted the war against Abaz, and to distract him the more, divided their power into three bodies, that they might invade him in three different places at once. Rezin, for his part, succeeded well by this division; for he loaded his army with spoils, and led away multitudes of captives, wherewith, his avarice being pretty well glutted, he returned to Damascus<sup>d</sup>.

Year of the
Flood, 2259.
Year before
Christ, 740.

BUT this acquisition proved fatal to Rezin and his kingdom: for Abaz, grown desperate, and bent upon revenge, sent all he had to Tiglab-pilezar king of Assyria, therewith to bribe him against Rezin. Hence it was (F) that Rezin was invaded by Tiglab-pilezar, who slew him, and carried Damascus (G) away captive to Kir,<sup>b</sup> whither they were transplanted<sup>e</sup>. Thus was the empire of the ancient Syrians abolished according to the prophets; Behold Damascus is taken away from being a city, —and the kingdom shall cease from Damascus, and the remnant of Syria<sup>f</sup>.—I will send a fire into the house of Hazael, which shall devour the palaces of Ben-badad. I will—cut off—him that holdeth the scepter from the house of Eden: and the people of Syria shall go into captivity unto Kir, saith the LORD<sup>g</sup>.

The KINGS of HAMATH.

Year of the
Flood, 1955.
Year before
Christ, 1044.

WE have but a very short and imperfect account of these kings, whether as to their first setting up, or their continuance; and there is some doubt as to the situation of their city (H). They seem to have been raised by the Syrians of the Canaanitish blood (I); at the same time the Syrians of Zobab, who we think were Aramites, erected their kingdom. And this they did perhaps to defend themselves against the ambitious views of that new monarchy, and to keep themselves in one distinct and entire body. But however this was, for we are perfectly in the dark concerning it, thus far is certain, that Toi (K), their first king we read of, was engaged in an unequal war with Hadadezar, the great king of Zobab; the ground of which we can apprehend to have been nothing else but his refusal to submit to the power of that ambitious prince. In all probability he was on the verge of subjection, when Hadadezar bowed under the superior might of David; who having humbled the pride<sup>d</sup> of Zobab, Toi beheld him in a double light, as his present deliverer, and his future protector. Toi therefore, to secure his people in their rights, and himself on the been but common justice in Rezin to have restored it to its natural lord; but we cannot enter into le Clerc's notion that he did it, because the place was too far out of his reach to keep. He was stronger than the king of Judah, and might, upon that account, have kept it long enough, had he lived.

<sup>c</sup> 2 Kings xvi. 5. <sup>d</sup> See 2 Chron. xviii. 5—7. <sup>e</sup> Kings ubi supr. ver. 9. <sup>f</sup> Isa. xvii. 1, 3. <sup>g</sup> Amos i. 4, 5.

(E) Both the LXX and the Vulgate agree, that Rezin having subdued this place, the Edomites took possession of it. But it is not to be imagined that Rezin could so easily part with so fine an acquisition. If any heed may be given to Josephus (48), he agrees with our reading and translation, saying, that Rezin planted a colony of Syrians in Elath.

(F) Not for this reason only; there may have been another. We apprehend, that Rezin being a turbulent enterprising prince, gave umbrage to Tiglab-pilezar, to whom he was certainly tributary, or under some other obligation. For Tiglab-pilezar had warred in these parts before with great success against the Israelitish dominions (49). He may have been prompted to destroy Rezin, as he looked on him with a jealous eye, as well as to earn Abaz's bribe, who promised to become his tributary into the bargain.

(G) Josephus (50) makes but one action of this and the foregoing.

(H) This city was called Hamath, and sometimes Hamath the Great (51); whence some have conceived there were two Hamaths, or cities so distinguished; but for the same reason they ought to think there were two Sidons, which was sometimes called plain Sidon, and sometimes Sidon the Great (52). Josephus (53) places Hamath to the north of the land of Canaan, and Abulfeda (54), who reigned in Hamath, and who being so learned a prince as he was, should know at least, as well as any body, places Hamath upon the Orontes, between Hems and Apamea, that river surrounding it on the east and north. There was a country of Hamath, surnamed Zobab, which lay to the eastward of the land of Canaan, about Palmyra or Tadmor (55); so that here may have been another city of the name, whence, after all, may have been derived the distinction of Hamath the Great.

(I) We have already offered something from the orientals, in proof that some of Canaan's descendants did settle themselves in Syria (56); to which we will now add from Abulfeda (57), that this whole country was called Shâm, because many of the sons of Canaan, Tashâma, or travelled towards the left hand in migrating thither; for Syria lies to the left of the Caaba at Mecca. This is one way of accounting for the name of Shâm; there are others, which may be remarked hereafter.

(K) Josephus writes him Thannus; which being omitted in the column of the kings of Hamath (58), according to Josephus, the reader is desired to forgive this third oversight, and to place him over his son Jeram.

(48) Ubi supr. c. 12. (49) See 2 Kings xv. 29. (50) Ubi supr. (51) Amos vi. 2. (52) Josb. xi. 8. (53) Antiq. l. 9. c. 11. (54) Vide SCHULT. Comment. Geogr. in vit. SALAD. ad voces Fluvius Orontes & Hamath. (55) See 2 Chron. viii. 3, 4. 1 Kings ix. 18. (56) See before in the notes, p. 371. (57) Vide SCHULT. ubi supr. ad vocem Syria. (58) See before, p. 380.

a throne, sent his son Joram with a costly present in vessels of gold, and silver, and brass, therewith to conciliate the fortunate conqueror, and to congratulate him on his successes, and return him thanks for the deliverance he owed him *. All this, to our apprehension, implies that Toi became thereafter the creature of David, and tributary to his throne.

WHOEVER succeeded Toi, whether his son Joram or Hadoram, or any other, it is likely he cultivated a good intelligence with the kings at Jerusalem, till Rezin, the founder of the Damascene kingdom, arose. At this time it is likely the king of Hamath submitted to a new master, or protector. To conclude; this kingdom was most certainly subject to the kings of Damascus, as was the rest of Syria, till Jeroboam king of Jerusalem prevailed against it † when he reduced Damascus. Upon the dissolution and captivity of Damascus it may have lifted up its head a little ‡; but the Hamathites were in their turn conquered and transplanted by Sennacherib, and Esar-baddon kings of Assyria. So ended the ancient kingdom of Hamath.

The KINGS of GESHUR.

THE kings of Geshur, if compared with those of Zobab, Damascus, and Hamath, were, it is likely, but petty princes (L). Perhaps they were far more considerable for the alliance David made with their family, than for the extent of their dominion. We take them to have been one of the royal families which in ancient times divided the whole country of Syria between them. The first of them we meet with is called Ammibud, who being the father of Talmi †, who is expressly said to have been king of this part, we venture to give him the same title.

TALMAI. He had a daughter named Maacha, who was wife to David †, and the mother of Abshalom, whom he sheltered three years ‡, when he fled to him for the murder of his brother Amnon. To conclude; we cannot doubt but that Geshur bore the Damascene yoke, till they finally changed it for the Assyrians, and were transplanted; as were all the other Syrians.

Year of the Flood, 1969.
Year before Christ, 1030.

CHAP. VI.

The History of the PHOENICIANS.

SECT. I.

The Description of PHOENICE.

THE tract we commonly call Phœnicia is, more accurately, Phœnice; which being sufficiently known to the learned, we shall not multiply words about it, but hasten to what is more material.

WHENCE it borrowed this name of Phœnice is not determined. Some * derive it from one Phœnix: others †, from the Greek word Phœnix, signifying a palm or date; as if that tree remarkably abounded here: some ‡ again suppose that Phœnice is originally a translation of the Hebrew word Edom, from the Edomites, who fled hither § in the days of David. By the contraction of Canaan; for it was a part of that land; it was also called Cēna †. Anciently it was also called Rhabbotbin and Colpitis † (A). The Jews were wont to call it Canaan †, though some part of it at

* 2 Sam. viii. 9, 10. † 2 Kings xix. 28. ‡ Ibid. xviii. 34. and xix. 11, 13. § Compare Ezra iv. 2. with Kings xvii. 24. † 2 Sam. xiii. 37. ‡ Ibid. iii. 3. † Ibid. xiii. 37, 38. xvi. 8. † SYMCELL. p. 152. † Chron. Alex. p. 158. † Sir ISAAC NEWT. Chron. of anc. kingd. amend. † See before, p. 314. † See before in the notes, p. 88. † STRAB. BIZAN. ad vocem Φοινίκη. † Vid. Matt. v. i.

(L) Josephus (19) does not allow them to have been kings, but only a family of note and figure in the country where they dwelt.

(A) This last name is a translation of the first: רַבּוֹתִין Rabbotfen is in Hebrew a great gulph or bay. From Rabbotfen, by changing the Hebrew TS into the Greek T, comes Rabboten, and with a little variation Rhabbotbin. Κόλπος, Colpos, is Greek also for a bay or gulph; whence it appears that Colpitis, or Colpites, is a translation of Rhabbotbin. Bochart (1) therefore is of opinion, that these names did not properly belong to the eastern Phœnice, or the country properly so called, but to the Phœnician colonies in Africa, whose principal cities stood upon great and deep gulphs or bays. However, he is not wholly unwilling to allow that these names may have distinguished a part of the proper Phœnice, near Libanus, as he expresses himself, because it had a deep gulph or bay, according to Mela. Tripoli stands in the deepest bay, at present, on this coast.

(59) Antiq. l. 7. c. 8.

(1) Geogr. sacr. l. 2. c. 13. col. 746.

least they knew by the name of Syrophœnice<sup>b</sup> (B). These were the names peculiar to the small country before us, though of them Phœnice was sometimes extended to all the maritime countries of Syria and Judea; and Canaan to the Philistines<sup>c</sup>, and even the Amalekites (C). On the contrary, these two names, and the rest, were most generally swallowed up by those of Palestine<sup>d</sup> and Syria (D).

THE proper Phœnice, as precisely as we can gather, lies between the thirty second and thirty fifth degrees of north latitude. It took up no great space of longitude; but whether more or less we shall pass it over, being quite in the dark as to that. This, as near as we can gather, was the extent of this kingdom, and its situation. In general we may say, it was bounded by Syria on the north and the east; by Judæa on the south; and by the mediterranean on the west. b

THIS country was divided into two parts, the maritime and the mediterranean, or the coast and the country<sup>e</sup>.

AND these two general divisions were subdivided into districts depending upon the more remarkable towns and cities, and so on. We shall see hereafter that this country was partitioned into several kingdoms.

ON the coast are the famous cities of Sidon, Tyre, Aradus, Tripoli, Byblus, and Berytus. Sidon we may properly enough call the metropolis of Phœnice, since it seems to have been the eldest city of this part, borrowing its name from Sidon the eldest son of Canaan, by whom they<sup>f</sup> pretend it to have been built, and it is not unlikely. But all are not agreed in the derivation of that name from Sidon (E). c

THIS city was seated on the sea-side, and is said to have had a summer and a winter harbour<sup>g</sup> (F), or one much more land-locked or enclosed than the other, which we take to be a mistake (G) in the relater, which how it came to pass may be tolerably accounted for (H). It is now called Seyde.

<sup>b</sup> Vid. Mark vii. 27. <sup>c</sup> Zephan. xi. 5. <sup>d</sup> See before, p. 338, 360. <sup>e</sup> See before, p. 361.
<sup>f</sup> JOSEPH. Antiq. l. i. c. 7. <sup>g</sup> ACHIL. TAT. apud RELLAND. Palest. Illustr.

(B) Bochart (2) clears up this matter thus. He supposes that the borderers, both upon the Phœnician and Syrian side, were called by the common name of Syrophœnicians, as partaking equally of both nations. Some (3) would have it that the Phœnicians of Asia in general were called Syrophœnicians diacritically to distinguish them from the African Phœnicians. Others (4) take the Syrophœnicians and Cœlesyrians for the same people.

(C) Accordingly Philo (5) includes the Amalekites under the denomination of Phœnicians.

(D) Or rather Phœnice, Palestine, and Syria, were promiscuously used for each other, and particularly the two former. Phœnice and Palestine, says Stephanus Byzantinus (6), were the same. As for Syria, we have already observed, that in its largest extent (7), it sometimes comprehended Phœnice and Cœlesyria. Herodotus plainly confounds these three names, we mean, uses one for the other indifferently. First, he says, the Phœnicians coming into Syria from the red-sea, settled in the maritime parts of Syria; and that the Phœnicians dwelt in Syria (8). In the next place, he says, that Phœnice was a part of Palestine, which, according to him, stretched along the sea-shore quite to Pelusium in Egypt (9). Thirdly, he places Affod, or Asotus, in Syria (10), and Ascalon in the Palestine Syria; but yet its inhabitants he calls Phœnicians (11). In a word, we could wish that the geography since Herodotus's time, had been less indistinct than his in many cases.

(E) Trogus (12) derives the name from a Phœnician word, as he calls it, Sidon, signifying a fish. And this Bochart (13) gives into: for Seid, the name of this city at present, is, as we may render it, a fishing-place. The same Bochart (14) seems to doubt whether or no Canaan's eldest son was called Sidon, as we read in the writings of Moses (15), which he interprets to be meant of the city itself, which is used instead of the name of the father of the Sidonians, or the founder of that city, whatsoever his name was: but why the name of the eldest son should be passed over, and the rest specified, is what we are not able to conceive. Others (16) again derive the name of this city from Sida, the daughter, as they pretend, of Belus.

(F) This we imagine, because we find no mention made of a double harbour by any of the most accurate travellers and geographers; whereas, as we shall observe hereafter, there are still visible marks of this at Tyre. This city had a mole, till Faccardine the Emir of the Drusi demolished it, to free himself from the visits of the Turkish galleys; so that now the shipping have no other shelter than a small ledge of rocks, about a mile distant from the shore on the north side of the city (17).

(G) It is observed, that Sidonian and Tyrian were synonymously used (18). Whether or no the seeming mistake here noted, may not have arisen from some such usage, we leave the reader to judge.

(H) It is, at this day, pretty well stocked with inhabitants, but much shrunk from its ancient extent, and more from its splendor, as appears from the vestiges of the ancient city that are left (19).

(2) Gegen. sac. p. 349. (3) Apud BOCHART ubi sup. p. 350. (4) Ibid. eund. ibid.
(5) Ibid. l. i. p. 636. (6) Ad vocem Iona. (7) See before, p. 360. (8) POLYHISTORIA, c. 89.
(9) Ibid. c. EUSEBIUS, a. 104. (10) Ibid. c. 157. (11) CLEO. c. 105. (12) JUST. l. 8. c. 3.
(13) Gegen. sac. p. 302. (14) Ibid. (15) See before, p. 322. (16) Vide SANCTI TRAV. p. 163. (17) MAUNDER. Journ. from Alex. to Jerus. p. 45. (18) Ibid. REX. Pal. Illustr. p. 956. (19) MAUNDER. ubi sup.

- a TYRE, anciently Sor (I), is commonly called the daughter of Sidon, and stood Tyre. also upon the sea, two hundred stades or furlongs to the southward of Sidon. Tyre must be distinguished into three different cities in order of time<sup>a</sup>: as Tyre on the continent or Pala Tyrus [old Tyre], Tyre on the island, and Tyre on the peninsula, after the island was joined to the main land (K). It had two havens (L), the one looking towards Sidon, the other towards Egypt<sup>c</sup>. This city, including Pala Tyrus, was 19,000 paces in circumference (M); but the city itself was only twenty two furlongs about, or not quite three of our miles<sup>d</sup>, which is allowing it considerably too much if our modern accounts may be relied on (N). However, it appears that this famous emporium was never of very great bigness. It could spread out its walls no farther than the margin of the island. For this reason it must have been that they built their houses very lofty, and with more stories, as we are told, than the houses had at Rome<sup>e</sup>. The buildings of this city in general were spacious and magnificent, and above the rest appeared the temples built by Hiram to Jupiter, Hercules and Astarte<sup>f</sup>. Its walls were one hundred and fifty foot high, and proportionably broad, and firmly built of large blocks of stone, bound together with white plaster<sup>g</sup>. It is now called Sûr (O).

ARADUS (P) was not strictly speaking a city of Phœnice. It was an island city Aradus. like Tyre, and stood opposite to the southern limits of the sea coast of Syria<sup>h</sup>. That

<sup>a</sup> Vid. RELAND. Palest. Illustr. vol. 2. ad vocem TYRUS. <sup>b</sup> STRAB. l. 16. p. 757. <sup>c</sup> PLIN. Histor. Natur. l. 5. c. 17. <sup>d</sup> STRABO ubi supr. <sup>e</sup> MENAND. & DIUS apud JOSEPH. Antiq. l. 8. c. 2. & apud eund. contr. AP. l. 2. <sup>f</sup> ARRIAN de Exped. Alex. Magn. l. 2. <sup>g</sup> BOCHART. Phaleg. l. 4. c. 36. col. 305.

(I) From hence this city came to be called Sara by the Latini, and not from Sar a fish, as Servius upon Virgil intimates (20). From hence also, say they, is derived (21) Tyre, it being the Syrian way to convert the T or S into T. So that the Syrians pronounced it Tor, Tur, Tyr; and hence the Greeks adding their termination, formed Τύρος, in Latin Tyrus. Some pretend, that this city gave name to the whole country of Syria; and that Syria, Tyria, and Affyria, were indifferently usurped for each other (22); to which we cannot assent. This name signifies a rock (23); for it stood upon little better.

(K) There were four different places in Phœnice, which bore the celebrated name of Tyre (24).

(L) From hence it seems plain, that Tyre on the island, and old Tyre on the main, were considered as but one city, after the isthmus was thrown up between them; and possibly they may have had buildings contiguous to each other. If Pliny's numbers are right, the old city must have been by much the most extensive part of the whole, and especially as the place appears at this day. According to Pliny (25) the island was but seven hundred paces from the continent; according to Strabo (26), it was thirty stades, or somewhat better than three of our miles from Pala-Tyrus; and according to the same geographer (27), Tyre was wholly an island, after the same manner as Aradus, excepting the artificial isthmus, which formed it into a peninsula. Not to lose time upon so obscure a subject, as whether Tyre and the old town were joined by buildings a-crofs the isthmus; we shall only repeat what we advanced at first, and which we shall endeavour to make out in the next note, that old Tyre was much larger, that is, stood upon more ground than the new, if Pliny's circumference be allowed of.

(M) These were formed by the isthmus, which joined the island to the main. These harbours were called, the one Open, and the other Close.

The former looked towards Egypt; it was the southermost of the two; and was accordingly called the Egyptian port (28). The Sherif Edryff says, that one of these ports had an arch over the entrance of it, through which the shipping passed, and that it was fortified with a chain which ran a-crofs it (29). These bays, or ports, are still pretty large, and in part defended from the ocean, each by a long ridge, resembling a mole, stretching directly out on both sides, from the head of the island; but whether these ridges are walls, or rocks, is uncertain (30); it is most likely, however, that they are walls.

(N) By them, it appears, that Tyre itself was but a small city in extent, though it covered the whole island to the very wash of the sea; and the scantiness of their ground was doubtless, what induced them to raise their buildings so high as they did; a method they would otherwise have avoided for fear of earthquakes, which had threatened them with destruction (31). At present the island appears to have been, in its natural state, of a circular form, hardly containing forty acres of ground; and the foundations of the wall which surrounded it, are still to be seen at the utmost margin of the land (32). If then it be true, that the whole circuit of the old and new Tyre was nineteen thousand paces, or nineteen Roman miles (33); and that they were distant from each other but thirty stades, or three of the same miles and three quarters (34); it must be evident, that the old city stood upon much more ground than the new. A good part of the island was made ground (35), as we call it.

(O) It is now a meer Babel of broken walls, pillars, vaults, &c. there being no such thing as one entire house left. Its present inhabitants are only a few poor wretches, who harbour themselves in vaults, and subsist chiefly by fishing (36).

(P) Bochart (37) takes this, and that part of the continent opposite to it, to be the seat of the Caananitish

(20) Vid. BOCHART. ubi supr. p. 735. (21) Vid. CELL. Geogr. Antiq. tom. 2. l. 3. c. 12. p. 277. (22) See Sir ISA. NEWT. Chronol. of anc. kingd. amend. (23) Vid. BOCHART ubi supr. (24) Vid. SCYL. Peripl. in minor. Hudson, vol. 2. (25) Hist. Nat. l. 5. c. 17. (26) Lib. 16. p. 758. (27) Ib. p. 756. (28) STRAB. ubi supr. p. 757. (29) Vid. ALBERT. SCHULT. Ind. Geogr. in vit. Saladin. ad vocem Tyrus. (30) MAUND. ubi supr. (31) STRABO ubi supr. (32) MAUND. ubi supr. p. 50. (33) PLIN. Hist. Nat. l. 5. c. 19. (34) STRAB. ubi supr. p. 758. (35) MENAND. & DIUS, apud JOSEPH. l. 8. c. 2. (36) MAUND. ubi supr. p. 48, 49. De BRUYN. Voy. au Lev. tom. 2. in 4to, p. 341. (37) Phaleg. l. 4. c. 36. col. 305.

the Phœnicians, however, reckoned this city as a part of themselves, is plain by a several good authors *. There are some remains of it extant (Q).

Tripoli.

TRIPOLI, on the sea-coast of the continent, derived its origin from the joint contribution of the three cities, above-mentioned, Sidon, Tyre and Aradus. Accordingly it was at first three distinct cities at a furlong distant from each other, inhabited by three different draughts or colonies, but all within one common inclosure or wall†. It is still a considerable place (R) and bears its old name.

Byblus.

BYBLUS is reported to have been the first city built in this country ‡; but whether we are here to understand the Byblus which stood on the sea, or the old Byblus [Pale Byblus] which was farther up within land, may be a needless enquiry (S).

Berytus.

BERYTUS must not have been much inferior to Byblus in antiquity, since it is b said to have been standing in the days of Crenus*. It is now called Barût or Be-root (T). These were the chief cities of the maritime Phœnice †.

Phœnicia Mediterranea.

WE will not take on us to mark out the bounds of the midland Phœnice. Ptolemy reckons in it the following towns: Arca, Palebyblus [old Byblus] Gebala and Cæsarea Pania. This province was considerably extended in the times of Christianity, when being considered as a province of Syria, it included not only Damascus, but Palmyra also ‡.

Soil and Climate.

THE soil of this country is good, and productive of many excellent necessaries for food and cloathing. The air is wholesome. The climate is of the best. It is plentifully watered by small rivers, which running down from mount Libanus, c are subject to swell to an immoderate degree, either encreased by the melting of the snows on that mountain, or by heavy rains. Upon these occasions they overflow the country, to the great danger and hindrance of the traveller, and damage of the country. Among these rivers is that of Adonis, which we shall have occasion to mention, upon another occasion, presently.

Natural Curiosities.

THE sea on this coast formerly abounded with such fish, as in an extraordinary manner redounded to the honour and profit of Tyre in particular. Therewith they dyed the choicest purple. And on the shore there was a sand, wherewith the first and best glass was made (U), a staple manufacture of this ancient country. To these we shall add a remarkable property of the river Adonis. At certain seasons, d and upon certain occasions, it appears bloody. Hence was continued, at least, that extraordinary superstition in memory of Thammuz or Adonis yearly wounded. The cause of this red face of the river was anciently known and declared by those who were not so superstitious as the rest of their contemporaries and countrymen, and who attributed it only to a kind of minium or red earth, which this river brought away when it swelled to unusual heights †. It is still subject to the same appearance in the time of floods (W).

* PLIN. Hist. Nat. l. 5. c. 17. POMP. MEL. l. 2. c. 7. STRAB. l. 16. p. 753. STEPH. BYZANT. ad vocem 'Αραδ' &c. † DIOD. SIC. l. 16. c. 41. PLIN. ubi supra, &c. ‡ See before, p. 135. § See before, p. 138. ¶ See before, p. 392. † Vide RELAND. Palæst. Illust. p. 217. ‡ Vide LUC. de De. Syr.

naanitish tribe, called Arwadites (38); and we are very much inclined to subscribe to his judgment upon this head. The island of Aradus is about twenty stades, or two Roman miles and a half from the shore, and above seven eighths of a Roman mile in circumference. The buildings were, like those of Tyre, of many stories high (39). By the same pen we are told, as a very remarkable thing, that the Aradians, when besieged, could, by the help of long tubes, draw up fresh water from the bottom of the sea (40).

(Q) It seems to the eye to be not above two or three furlongs in length; and is wholly filled up with tall buildings, like castles. The Turks call it Ku-ad (41).

(R) And there are some remains of the ancient city or cities, which you will, still to be seen, in the fields near the shore; many heaps of ruins, and pillars of granite (42).

(S) Byblus was the city and seat of the famous superstition, in memory of Adonis. It is pleasantly situated, but, at present, it is but small; though, small as it is, its handful of inhabitants have room to spare (43).

(T) † At present it retains nothing of its ancient felicity, except the situation; and, in that particular, it is indeed very happy. It is seated on the sea-side, in a soil fertile and delightful, raised only so high above the salt water, as to be secure from its overflowings, and all other noxious and unwholsom effects of that element. It has the benefit of good fresh springs flowing down to it from the adjacent hills (44).

(U) There anciently went a story, that this sand could be melted no where but at Sidon (45).

(W) — † We saw. — the water [of the river Adonis] — stained to a surprizing redness; and — observed — it had discoloured the sea a great way into a reddish hue (46).

(38) See before, p. 322. and in the notes, p. 330.

(39) STRAB. l. 16. p. 753, 754, &c.

(40) Idem ibid. Vid. etiam PLIN. Hist. Nat. l. 2. c. 103. l. 5. c. 31.

(41) MAUND. ubi

supr. p. 19.

(42) Idem ibid. p. 31.

(43) Idem ibid. p. 38.

(44) Idem ibid.

(45) STRA-

MO ubi supr. p. 758. (46) MAUND. ubi supr. p. 34.

a THERE are still some few remains of the ancient splendor of this now desolate land. Thevenot<sup>a</sup> tells us, there are fine antiquities to be beheld at Tyre, but does not specify them. Sandys<sup>b</sup> could discover nothing there but a heap of ruins. The more modern travellers<sup>c</sup> are more particular. They take notice of the ruins of the metropolitan church there, near which is an extraordinary kind of a column, of unusual dimensions, which one<sup>d</sup> represents as a triple; another<sup>e</sup>, as a double column only, or two joined together. This last<sup>f</sup> informs us that it is of granate, of one block only, and fourscore foot long. Besides this, there are many columns entire, and many broken<sup>g</sup>. But nothing in and about this ruined city demands our attention more deservedly than a place the Turks call Roselayne; where are seen, what b are vulgarly called Solomon's cisterns or wells. The current tradition is, that they are filled from a subterraneous river, which that wise king, by his great sagacity, knew to run under ground here; and which made him undertake so admirable a work. The country people say, that nobody ever could reach the bottom of these wells, though the thing has been attempted with great lengths of line; and one of our travellers pretends to give a reason for the fruitlessness of these attempts, by supposing the current or spring to be so very strong, at a certain depth, as to prevent the lead from taking the ground<sup>h</sup>. All this is rejected and confuted by another traveller<sup>i</sup>; who supposes these wells cannot have been built before the days of Alexander; because the aqueduct which conveys the water from them to Tyre is carried c over the isthmus, formed by that conqueror, when he made himself master of Tyre: and, as these cisterns cannot be supposed to be ancients than the aqueduct, so we may be sure, says he, that the aqueduct is not older than the ground it stands upon. Of these cisterns there are three entire at this day, one about a furlong and a half distant from the sea, the other two a little further up. The first is an octagon in form, twenty yards in diameter. On the south side it is elevated nine yards above the ground, and on the north but six: and, as unfathomable as it is reported to be, ten yards of line confuted the opinion. Its wall is only of gravel and pebbles, but so firmly consolidated with a strong cement, that it seems to be an entire vessel of rock. Upon the brink there is a walk round it, eight foot in breadth: d from whence, descending by one step on the south side, and by two on the north, you land on another walk, twenty one foot broad. All this structure, though so very broad at top, is hollow, so that the water comes in underneath the walks; nor could the extremity of the cavity be reached with a long rod. The whole vessel contains a vast body of excellent water, and is so plentifully supplied, that though there issues from it a brook which drives four miles, it is always brim-full. On the east side of this cistern was the ancient outlet of the water, by an aqueduct raised about six yards from the ground, and containing a channel one yard wide. This aqueduct (now dry) is carried eastward about one hundred and twenty paces, and then approaches the two other cisterns, which are of a quadrilateral figure, the e one twelve, the other twenty yards square. These have each of them a channel, which communicates with the aqueduct; and the water of these three noble springs being thus joined, ran together to Tyre. The aqueduct is now gone to decay, but may easily be traced out. It goes about an hour northward, and then turning to the west, proceeds over the isthmus into the city.

SOME footsteps of what Sidon once was, are to be seen among the gardens without the walls of the present city<sup>g</sup>; such as beautiful columns, and other fragments of that kind. Here they pretend to shew a monument of high antiquity, no less than the tomb of Zebulun. It stands within a small chapel in a garden<sup>h</sup>, and is deeply revered by the Jews<sup>i</sup>. This tomb is made of two stones only; the f one supposed to be at the head, and the other at the feet of the deceased. Their distance is better than ten of our feet, which they give out to have been the stature of this patriarch<sup>j</sup>.

AT Byblus also are many heaps of ruins and fine pillars scattered up and down in the gardens near the present town<sup>k</sup>. Finally, on the continent, a little southward of the isle of Aradus, whereon the city of that name anciently stood, are several antiquities of a very extraordinary kind. The first is a dyke thirty yards over at top, cut into the firm rock. Its sides go sloping down, with stairs cut out <sup>a</sup> of the living rock, and descending gradually from top to bottom. This dyke stretches in a direct line, east and west, more than a furlong, bearing continually the same figure of stairs running in right lines all along its sides. It breaks off at last at a flat marshy ground, extending about two furlongs between it and the sea. Our observer thinks it hard to imagine that the water ever flowed up thus high; and harder, without supposing that, to devise why all this pains was taken in cutting the rock after such a fashion. Secondly, A little to the southward of this dyke, there is a court of fifty-five yards square, cut also in the natural rock; the sides of the rock standing round it are about three yards high, and supply the place of walls. On three sides it is thus encompassed, but to the northward it lies open. <sup>b</sup> In the center of this area, a square part of the rock is left standing, being three yards high, and five yards and a half square. This serves for a pedestal to a throne erected upon it. The throne is composed of four large stones, two at the sides, one at the back, and one at the top, in the manner of a tribunal or canopy. This whole structure is about twenty foot high, and faces towards the open side of the court. The stone that forms the canopy is five yards and three quarters square, and adorned with a handsome cornice. At the two innermost angles of the court, and likewise at the open side, are left pillars of the natural rock, three at each of the former, and two at the latter.

<sup>a</sup> Travels into the Lev. part I. book ii. c. 60. <sup>b</sup> Lib. 3. p. 168. <sup>c</sup> De BRUYN Voy. au Lev. tom. II. 4to, p. 338, 339, &c. <sup>d</sup> De la ROQUE Voy. de Syr. et M. Lib. tom. I. p. 17, 18, &c. <sup>e</sup> MAUNDRELL's Journ. from Aleppo to Jerus. p. 48, 49, &c. <sup>f</sup> De BRUYN ubi supr. <sup>g</sup> De la ROQUE ubi supr. <sup>h</sup> Ibid. <sup>i</sup> De BRUYN ubi supr. <sup>j</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>k</sup> MAUNDRELL ubi supr. <sup>l</sup> Idem ibid. p. 44. SANDYS Trav. I. 3. p. 164. <sup>m</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>n</sup> THEVEN. Voy. au Lev. part II. l. i. c. 3. <sup>o</sup> SANDYS ubi supr. <sup>p</sup> THEVEN. ubi supr. <sup>q</sup> MAUNDRELL ubi supr. p. 33.

ABOUT half a mile to the southward of this court, and this throne, there are in <sup>c</sup> each two towers. They are sepulchral monuments, and stand over an ancient burying-place. They are about ten yards distant from each other. The one is, in form, a cylinder crowned by a multilateral pyramid, and is in all thirty-three foot high, including the pedestal, which is ten foot high, and fifteen square. The other is a long cone discontinued at about the third part of its height; and, instead of ending in a point, is wrought into a hemispherical form. This is its general construction. It stands upon a pedestal six foot high, and sixteen foot six inches square, adorned at each angle with the figure of a lion in a sitting posture, pretty much defaced; though at best the sculpture of them appears to have been but bad. This is all that is visible of these sepulchres, as well as of a third and others near, <sup>d</sup> above ground. But under ground there are square chambers of convenient height for a man, and long cells branching out therefrom, variously disposed, and of different lengths, wherein the dead bodies were deposited. These subterraneous chambers and cells are all cut out of the hard rock: but because a bare description of them would communicate but an imperfect idea of them to the mind, by reason of the variety and irregularity of their disposition, we shall insist no farther on them; but refer you to the draught of them.

S E C T. II.

Of the Antiquity, Government, Laws, Religion, Customs, Arts, Learning, and Trade of the ancient Phœnicians.

Antiquity.

IT is universally allowed, that the Phœnicians were Canaanites (A) by descent; no- <sup>e</sup> thing is plainer, or less contested; and therefore it were time lost to go about to prove it. We shall only add, that their blood must have been mixed with that of foreigners in process of time, as happens in all trading places; and that many strange families must have settled among them, who could consequently lay no claim to this remote origin in this part, how much soever they may have been called Phœnicians, and reckoned of the same descent with the ancient proprietors.

* MAUNDÉ. Journey from Aleppo to Jerusalem.

(A) Bochart (1) insinuates, that the Canaanites were ashamed of their name, on account of the curse denounced on their progenitor, and terrified by the wars so vigorously and successfully waged on them by the Israelites, purely because they were Canaanites; and that therefore to avoid the ignominy of the one, and the danger of the other, they abjured their old name, and changed it for Phœ- nicians, Syrians, Syrophenicians, and Affrians. Heidegger (2) conjectures also, that they were ashamed of their ancestor Canaan. We can think no such thing. It seems unnatural. It may be combated by many solid objections; but because they would draw us into too great a length, we forbear to make them.

(1) Phaleg. l. 4. c. 34. vol. 301.

(2) Hist. Patriarch. Exer. 23. § 2. p. 491.

<sup>a</sup> THE Phœnicians were governed by kings, and their territory, as small a slip as Their Government it was, included several kingdoms, as those of Sidon, Tyre, Aradus, Berytus, and Byblus. In this they imitated and adhered to the primitive government of their forefathers, who, like the other Canaanites, were under many petty princes, to whom they allowed the sovereign dignity, reserving to themselves the natural rights and liberties of mankind <sup>b</sup>. It may appear plain by their history; that even the kings of Sidon and Tyre, when in their zenith, were far from uncontrollable by the subject.

We have no particular system of their civil laws, and shall therefore pass to their religion.

<sup>b</sup> THE Phœnicians being originally Canaanites, must once, as well as the rest of Their Religion their kindred, have had a knowledge of the true God; whom they, as is most likely, called, Baal or lord <sup>c</sup>. But by degrees degenerating to the deification, translation, and worship of such as, by their own confession, were once mortals like themselves, they became perverse and blind idolaters. The chief of their deities in order, as we find them in their own records, are these. Beelsamen, which, in Phœnician, is Lord of heaven, thereby meaning the sun <sup>d</sup>: Cronus or Baal <sup>e</sup>, who is likely to have been the Baal-berith, or the Cronus anciently worshipped at Berytus <sup>f</sup>: Astarte <sup>g</sup>, Cronus or Baal the second, Zeus Belus or Baal (B), Apollo, Melcarthus, Melcartus, or Hercules <sup>h</sup>. These are the gods of this people we shall chiefly take notice of here, the rest we have treated of amply enough in the antiquities and <sup>c</sup> mythology of this people. We will only add one observation, which is; That it is almost certain the Phœnician idolatry and superstition is not all their own; and that their subjection to the Affyrians, Babylonians, Persians, and Greeks, made great alterations in the whole system of what was taught and practised among them in a religious way. We need only look back to what happened in Syria <sup>i</sup>, upon its being subdued, to be fully convinced of this.

How far they retained, or how far they lost a due sense and notion of the true God in this their multifarious idolatry; and whether or no they might not, through these low disguises and their frantic adoration, point intentionally at God himself, is hard to say. It is reported of the Egyptians, that amidst all their endless polytheism, they still acknowledged one supreme God <sup>j</sup>; and since, as we shall see, the religion of the old Phœnicians was in substance hardly different from that of the Egyptians (C), as has been formerly observed <sup>k</sup>; it is very probable that their theory and doctrine agreed together, as well as their practice and traditions.

How they pictured Beelsamen we no where find; but we apprehend that they did not represent him at all: for, meaning by him, in a more especial manner, the sun, whom they had so daily before their eyes in all his glory, it is likely they made their addresses immediately to him, according to the ancient rite <sup>l</sup>. There were many Baals <sup>m</sup>. The Baal of Sidon was called Tbalassus, or the Sea-Baal <sup>n</sup>. There was Baal-berith (D), and others, each represented under proper attributes, we may

<sup>a</sup> See before, p. 326. <sup>b</sup> Vide SÆLD. de Di. Syr. Syntag. 2. c. 7. <sup>c</sup> See before, p. 86.
<sup>d</sup> See before in the notes, p. 134. <sup>e</sup> Ibid. <sup>f</sup> See before, p. 36. <sup>g</sup> See before, p. 137.
<sup>h</sup> See before, p. 86 — 89, 133 — 139. <sup>i</sup> See before, p. 372. <sup>j</sup> See before, p. 204.
<sup>k</sup> See before in the notes, p. 88. <sup>l</sup> See before, p. 86. <sup>m</sup> 1 Cor. viii. 5. <sup>n</sup> HESYCH.

(B) Here we have no less than three Baals, who are said to have been once mortal men; which might fairly induce one to think, that the learned are mistaken in supposing the Phœnician god Baal, of every sort and denomination, was erected in honour of, and to represent the sun (3).

(C) Bishop Cumberland (4) draws the following parallel between them, to shew how nearly they were related. 1. Plutarch (5) makes Ofris the son of Rhea, a wife of Cronus: so our author [Sachniatbo] owns Rhea married to Cronus. 2. Plutarch makes Isis to find, at Byblus, a king called Melcander; and that name is plainly derived from the Hebrew Melec or Moloch: which title, the Bishop thinks, was appropriated eminently to Cronus or Ham, in old times. 3. The queen whom Isis found at Byblus, Plutarch tells us is by some called Astarte [or A-

starte, as it is in the Greek] which is the name of one of Cronus's wives in Sachniatbo. 4. Plutarch makes Typhon a contemporary with Cronus and his children; so doth Sachniatbo. When the whole is weighed on each side, it must be allowed that the ancient mythology of both was derived from the same source; but that the gods of the Phœnicians were so ancient as they made them, and as we commonly take them to be, is what we shall occasionally dispute hereafter.

(D) This is a further proof with us, that all the Baals of the Phœnicians were not intended for the sun; we here see one denominated from the sea. A lord of the sea, as well as a lord of heaven; which seems to distinguish them into two very widely different deities. We cannot help thinking, that they had different genealogies for, and traditions of all their Baals. This appears from

(3) Vide SÆLD. de Di. Syr. Syntag. 2. c. 5. BOCHART. Geogr. sacr. (4) OR SARCH. p. 107.
(5) See before, p. 241.

suppose; but we know nothing particular (E) of their idols. Baal is called sometimes a god, and sometimes a goddess; and reverly, Astarte is sometimes termed a goddess, and sometimes a god (F): but by the Phœnician mythology, she was wholly a goddess; for there we find her mentioned as the mother of many children*. She is particularly called the goddess of the Sidonians, and in Hebrew Astarteth (G). Some† will have it, she was so called because she was represented in the form of sheep. But this is rejected as a meer notion. She was certainly represented as Isis was‡, with cows horns on her head§ (H), and for the same reason; that is,

* See before, p. 136.

† R. CIMEN. apud SELD. de Di. Syr. Syntag. 2. c. 2.

‡ See before,

p. 205. § See before, p. 138.

from what we have observed in the note above the last. We see they were procreated successively from father to son; and it is hard to suppose, that they had the same stories of, and the same dependance on them all: however, we will not answer for all the inconsistencies that may have crept into the minds of the idolatrous Phœnicians, nor examine into the pretences that the partisans of each idol may have broached in favour of its antiquity or pre-eminence. After all, they may have each laid claim to the first honour, and, consequently, they may have each translated their Baal into the sun, or bright God of heaven; so that all their superstition may, indeed, have centered in him. We are very much inclined to think the Sun and Moon were the two great objects of their worship; and these we take most generally to have been stiled Baal and Astarte; and that they sometimes addressed themselves immediately to those great luminaries and rulers of the night and day, and sometimes obliquely, by repairing to the images of their own fancy. For, though they had translated them into those lights, yet they remembered, perhaps, that they were once mortals and benefactors, and therefore may have adored them under their human form, as well as in their celestial dignity, being taught, perhaps, or taking it into their heads, that their worship would be imperfect if they did not thus divide it.

(E) Fuller (6) ventures to picture Baal in general as a royal hero, with armour and a mantle on his body, a diadem on his head, and a sword in his hand, in act to strike.

(F) The Hebrews knew no distinction of sex in the gods; whence this arose. There are many instances to prove this; but we shall only produce one, where, in one verse only, with reference to Baal, he is both masculine and feminine. Καὶ καλέσθη ἐν Ἰσραὴλ ἐπὶ χιλάδας ἀνδρῶν, πάντα γόνατα αὐτῆς ἐκκαμύσαν γόνυ τῷ Βαάλ, καὶ πᾶν εἶμα ὃ ἔπεριεζύοντο αὐτῷ (7). In other copies, however, it is τῷ Βαάλ; but the same do in other places make him feminine, as well as here masculine. Bochart (8) will have Baal-berith to have been a goddess, because berith in Hebrew is feminine; but, as it is most likely, that thereby is meant no more than the Baal of Berytus (9), we do not see how this conjecture will stand. Astarte was called a god by the Hebrews, they having no name in their tongue for a goddess (10).

(G) Astarteth, which signifies flocks of sheep or goats. It is conjectured that men in ancient times being chiefly addicted to a pastoral life, and delighting chiefly therein, drew their most favourite families of beauty from thence. This is supposed to have been the reason why Astarteth or Astarte was so called (11). It was first started by bishop Cumberland (12), that her first name was Naamah. His lordship tells us, that he could not think of Plutarch's Nemans, Cronus's wife, but Naamah came into his mind. A late author has taken up this, and pushed it as far as it can possibly go. He finds that Naamah signifies the fair one. He finds also, that she was the wife of Ham. That he, carrying her about with him, 'changed her name to one that in another language had the same signification, and called her Astarte, as it is in the Greek, or Astarteth in the Hebrew; which word signifies in Hebrew flocks of cattle, sheep or goats.' According to these interpretations we do not perceive the exact similitude of these two names Naamah and Astarte. There is an allusive one, if you will. A fair woman was a beauty, so was a flock of cattle in ancient days; ergo Naamah and Astarte are translations of each other. However, our author brings us back again to his fair one; for Lucian in his most inaccurate and unsatisfactory account of the Syrian goddess, happening to say a priest assured him, that Astarte was Europa, the sister of Cadmus; it is sufficient for our author to believe they really were but one; and so he comes round to Naamah his fair faced one again: for Bochart searching after the etymology of Europe, finds that Εὐρώπη Ur-appa in the Phœnician tongue is in Greek λευκοπρόσωπον, which may be aptly enough rendered fair of face; wherefore our author calls Bochart in to his aid, and discovers self-evidently that Europa is Astarte, and Astarte, Naamah. Q. E. D. The inconsequence and presumption in all this, are too glaring for us to animadvert upon them. Nor should we have taken any notice at all of this passage, had it not been delivered as from the Tripos. Nor should we have taken notice of this one, had it been the only piece of the kind in the work. As some of the Jews absurdly derive her name from being represented under the form of sheep (14): others (15) derive it from the numbers of victims offered up to her; as if they sacrificed to her by whole flocks at a time.

(H) Astarte, we are told (16), put on a bull's head, as the mark of her sovereignty; but Mercury claps on a bull's or ox's head upon Isis to supply the place of her diadem, which the enraged Orus had torn off (17). We may see by both these stories, that the ox's head was esteemed an ensign of supreme dignity; and that Astarte and Isis were names for one person. Bochart (18) observes, that the word Astarteth may be extended to herds in general, and is not confined to the smaller cattle only; and insinuates, that she may be the Grecian Is, turned into a cow. It is also held, that she was the great Juno, as we shall see anon. Whence, by the way, we may seemingly account for the epithet Homer so often bestowed upon Juno, Βοῆπις Hēn, the ox-eyed Juno. Dr. Clerk, in his notes upon Homer (19), thinks that nothing particular is alluded to thereby; that this epithet is used a is, to represent the moon's increase and decrease; for she was undoubtedly consecrated into that planet, and adored under the stile of Queen of heaven (I). She was also the Phœnician Aphrodite or Venus (K).

(6) Pisgah-fight. (7) Reg. xix. 18. (8) Canaan l. 2. c. 17. col. 775. (9) Vide CUMBERLAND on SANCHON. p. 151. (10) Vide BOCHART ubi supr. (11) Vide BEDFORD'S Script. Chron. p. 234. (12) Ubi supr. (13) BEDFORD'S Script. Chron. ubi supr. (14) Vide SELD. de Di. Syr. Syntag. 2. c. 2. (15) SCALIG. apud eund. (16) See before, p. 138. (17) See before, p. 245. (18) Canaan l. 2. c. 2. col. 709. (19) Il. ix. ver. 451.

As there were many Baals, so also there were many Astartes (L). She went under different names, and was doubtless very variously represented (M). She is said to have consecrated Tyre, by depositing a fallen star there (N). We have little or nothing to say of their Apollo (O). He is taken for the Phut of Moses, and Put, whence the Pythius of the Greeks; but as we have occasionally contested used only to express the majesty of her countenance, and cites Libanius, who says as much, "Ὅμηρος ἐνδείξασθαι ἐκλάμενός, ὡς ἔκαστος ὀφθαλμοῦ τῇ Ἡρᾷ καλὸν τε μέγαν τε, ὡς ὁὖτος αὐτὴν ἐκλάσθαι" which is, that Homér only understood she had a large fine eye.

* See before, 138. * Suid. ad vocem 'Αστάρη. * See before in the notes, p. 137. * Vide BOCHART. Geogr. Sacr. l. 1. c. 3. col. 11.

(I) There is all the reason in the world to believe this. It appears sufficiently from her horned front. Lucian (20) took her for the moon. Herodianus (21), mistaken in her name, calling her Astroarche, says, that the Phœnicians would have her to be the moon. Selden (22) thinks it indubitable, that she was the Balifama, corrupted from Buleth-Samain, the queen of heaven, as also Baal-is. Some (23) say on the contrary, that she was worshipped in the star called Lucifer; but the same consider her under the name of Aphrodite, or Venus, which also she bore; so that her attribute may have been altered or varied in this case, as well as her name. We shall have occasion to resume this again a little farther.

(K) Cicero (24) is very explicit upon this, enumerating the several Venus's, the fourth, says he, was a Syrian of Tyre called Astarte; who, as the tradition goes, married Adonis. That she was a Venus we understand from several other writers; but for the present shall content ourselves with this one very plain testimony; upon which we beg leave to animadvert a little. Cicero places her the fourth in order; which we apprehend he does, as supposing the three that precede her in his account to be older than she. Again, she marries Adonis, who is universally allowed to be an Affyrian by descent. What are we to conclude from hence? Why, it seems apparent enough, that the superstition in honour of Adonis was introduced by the Affyrians when they conquered Phœnice, and that Astarte was his contemporary. This seems to take off considerable from her great antiquity. Sir Isaac Newton (25) reckons that the Baalim and Astartoth came originally from the banks of the Tygris, whence they migrated into Phœnice. Hence he derives all the superstition and idolatry of the Phœnicians and Syrians: the Tyrian, Syrian, and Affyrian Belus, says he*, were all one. If we might be allowed to declare our sentiment on this head, we would add, that the greatest part of what we know of the Phœnician religion is of Affyrian origin, and that it was imposed on them together with the Affyrian yoke. This will bring down the antiquity of their fabulous deities very low. We know how the Syrians boasted the antiquity of their great Adad or Adad, the king of gods, as Sanctioniatho (26) in his Phœnician Antiquities styles him: we know also how vainly they did it, and how falsely (27). If then there be such a flaw to be found in the pretended age of Adad, the same must affect Cronus and Astarte, his contemporaries and confederates (28). They are certainly of late date, in comparison of what the learned have generally thought them.

(L) This we have sufficiently insinuated already. We have already seen her Venus, Juno, and the Moon. The LXX more than once mention her in the plural number. A father of the church (29) observes, that Juno was undoubtedly the Astarte of the Pæni, and consequently of the Phœnicians; and that she was mentioned in the plural with regard had to the many statues of her; and that as each statue was called a Juno, thence came many Juno's or Astartes. To this we will add, that Astarte was positively the Grecian Io.

(M) We cannot doubt but she was pictured as variously as the characters she bore, and the attributes bestowed on her required. As much a Venus as she was, it seems she was pictured with arms, as the goddess of war (31). She was far otherwise represented in her temple on mount Libanus, where she was mourning her lost Adonis: her head was muffled up in a veil; her left hand, which was under her mantle, supported her head; and floods of tears streamed down her cheeks (32). It must have been, we think, an Astarte that Lucian saw crowned with a tower, and with a sistrum in her hand, and supported by lions; but we cannot pick out of him in what temple, or where he saw this idol. It cannot be the Syrian goddess, as he calls her, of whom he gives a different description (33). This last idol resembles, in some particulars, certain images of Isis (34); but to trace her out through all her forms, is a task we are unequal to, for want of proper lights.

(N) Hence it was, we suppose, that she was worshipped as a star (35); and hence the notion of the star or globe of light, which at certain times darted down from the top of mount Libanus near her temple at Aphac, and plunged itself into the river of Adonis below, and was thought to be Venus (36). Bochart (37) knows not what to make of this fallen star, which Astarte is said to have carried to Tyre. Instead of ἐν τῷ ἀπορριπῆ ἄστρῳ, he would read ἐν τῷ ἀπορριπῆ vel ἀπορριπῆ ἀστράῳ, Ælian acquainting us from Aristotle, that there was a kind of eagle called Asteris; and therefore he would have it a bird instead of star. But by what precedes, it is most likely it was really a star they meant. The practice squares very nicely with the doctrine, as does also the story of the star that was wont to fall from the top of Libanus into the river below.

(O) We only know that he was in great repute among them; and that the Tyrians, when besieged by

(20) De Dea Syr. (21) Apud SELD. de Di. Syr. Syntag. 2. c. 2. (22) Ibid. (23) THEOPH. apud GYRALD. Hist. Deor. Syntag. 13. (24) De Nat. Deor. l. 3. (25) Chronol. of anc. kingd. amend. p. 161. * Ibid. p. 279. (26) See before, p. 137. (27) See before in the notes, p. 372. (28) See before, p. 137. (29) AUG. ad Jud. 2. quest. 67. (30) EURIPI. apud SELD. ubi supr. (31) Vide BOCHART. Canaan. l. 1. c. 42. col. 664. (32) MACROB. Satur. l. 1. c. 27. (33) See before, p. 373. (34) See before, 205. (35) See before in this page, note (I). (36) Vide BOCHART. ubi supr. col. 749. (37) Ubi supr. col. 709.

1
2
3
4
5
6
7
8
9 10
11 12 13 14 15 16
17 18 19 20 21
22
23 24
25
26 27 28 29 30 31 32
33
34 35
36 37
38
39 40 41 42
43
44
45 46
47 48
49
50
51 52
53
54
55
56 57
58 59 60
61
62
63
64
65
66
67
68
69
70
71
72 73
74
75 76
77
78
79 80
81
82 83
84
85
86
87
88 89
90
91 92
93
94
95
96
97
98
99 100

1
2
3
4
5
6
7
8 9 10 11 12 13 14 15 16
17 18 19 20 21
22
23 24
25
26 27 28 29 30 31 32
33 34 35
36 37
38
39 40 41 42
43
44
45 46
47 48
49
50
51 52
53
54
55
56 57
58 59 60
61
62
63
64
65
66
67
68
69
70
71
72 73
74
75 76
77
78
79 80
81
82 83
84
85
86
87
88 89
90
91 92
93
94
95
96
97
98
99 100

1
2
3
4
5
6
7
8 9 10 11 12 13 14 15 16
17 18 19 20 21
22
23 24
25
26 27 28 29 30 31 32
33 34 35
36 37
38
39 40 41 42
43
44
45 46
47 48
49
50
51 52
53
54
55
56 57
58 59 60
61
62
63
64
65
66
67
68
69
70
71
72 73
74
75 76
77
78
79 80
81
82 83
84
85
86
87
88 89
90
91 92
93
94
95
96
97
98
99
100

a Other deities they had, which we know nothing of. The Cabiri will have their turn in the Grecian mythology *.

We do not read that the Phœnicians; how nearly soever they may have agreed with the Egyptians in the main points of their superstition, ever extended their worship, like them, to the inanimate creation. But since there was such a harmony between them in other respects, it is by no means unlikely that they were tainted with some of the meanest and most unaccountable superstitions of that fabulous and mysterious kingdom. But this is only a conjecture which we leave to the readers determination.

b BELSAMEN we have understood to have been in an especial manner the sun Their Priests, himself <sup>b</sup>; and to him they addressed themselves with stretched out arms, as we ga- religious Cu- ther <sup>c</sup>. What else was practised when they made their addresses to the sun only, we stoms, &c. no where find.

BAAL had his prophets and his priests in great numbers. We read of four hundred and fifty of them which were fed at Jezabel's table only *. They were wont to offer burnt-offerings and sacrifices to this their god or gods *, and to dance and skip about the altar, with violent gesticulations (U); and having worked themselves to the height of frenzy, by this exercise, and a violent straining of their voices, they began to cut and slash their bodies with knives and lancets: this done, they betook themselves to prophecy <sup>f</sup>, as it is called, or rather raved, as if possessed by some invisible power <sup>e</sup>. Such was their barbarous way of worship (W), nor need we wonder at it, considering their more barbarous custom, in earlier days, of sacrificing even such persons as were most dear to them, to appease or reconcile their imaginary gods, when they laboured under any public calamities. This is charged very home upon them, not only by the testimony of others <sup>b</sup>, but by their own confession <sup>f</sup>. This also they had in common with the Egyptians *. This cruel practice, however, was discontinued here, as well as in Egypt, pretty early; but at what time, and upon what motives of persuasion we have not to say.

MANY priests or prophets attended also on the rites of Astarte. Jezabel had no fewer than four hundred of them to her share <sup>f</sup>. Our version calls them prophets of the groves: but Mr. Selden has proved, by comparing many passages of scripture together <sup>m</sup>, that Astarte is meant by them; and some <sup>n</sup> who know not how to contest this interpretation, believe she was worshipped in a grove, which is very likely, such places being for the most part accounted sacred to religious rites, in the first times *. We must not doubt but she was served with much form, pomp, and mystery; and women, particularly, are said to have been employed to weave hangings or tabernacles for her <sup>p</sup>. When she was adored as the Queen of heaven, or the moon itself, they offered up to her cakes, which were prepared for that service with great ceremony: The children gathered the wood, and the fathers kindled the fire, and the women kneaded the dough, to make cakes for the queen of heaven <sup>q</sup>. They also burned incense to her, and poured out drink-offerings to her <sup>r</sup>. This Astarte, queen of heaven, was, as we have said, the moon itself <sup>s</sup>; for as they paid their homage immediately to the sun, the same we may safely suppose, they did to the moon. It was an ancient custom. Those great lights were always considered together. The inimitable Job <sup>t</sup> says, If I beheld the sun when it shined, or the moon walking in brightness, and my heart hath been secretly enticed; or my mouth hath kissed my hand, this also were an iniquity to be punished by the judges. Some <sup>u</sup> fancy, upon what authority does not at present occur to us, that her cakes were stamped with a crescent. At Byblus she was worshipped in a particular manner; for there she had a temple as the Venus of Adonis <sup>v</sup>. And there, such women as would not conform to the custom of shaving their heads at the annual time of lamenting Adonis, were bound to prostitute their bodies for one entire day, to all strangers that would have them, for

* See before in the notes, p. 134.    <sup>b</sup> See before, p. 397.    <sup>c</sup> See before, p. 86.    <sup>d</sup> 1 Kings xviii. 19.    <sup>e</sup> 2 Kings x. 24.    <sup>f</sup> 1 Kings ubi supr.    <sup>g</sup> Vide PATRICK in loc.    <sup>h</sup> PORPHY apud alexand. l. 2. § 56, &c.    <sup>i</sup> See before, p. 138.    <sup>j</sup> See before, p. 259.    <sup>k</sup> 1 Kings ubi supr. ver. 19.    <sup>l</sup> PATRICK in loc.    <sup>m</sup> CLERIC in loc.    <sup>n</sup> See before in the notes, p. 294.    <sup>o</sup> 2 Kings xxiii. 7.    <sup>p</sup> Jerem. vii. 18.    <sup>q</sup> Idem xlv. 17, 18.    <sup>r</sup> See before, p. 399.    <sup>s</sup> Ibid. xxxii. 26, 27, 28.    <sup>t</sup> See FULLER's Pisgah-fight.    <sup>u</sup> LUCIAN de Dea Syr.

(U) It is uncertain whether they danced round the altar, or leaped upon it, or jumped over it, or how this was: Abarbinel thinks this leaping or dancing was a rite used in the worship of the sun, which puts all things in motion (63).

(63) PATRICK upon 1 Kings xviii. 26.

(W) Though all this was practised upon a particular occasion, or when they took on them to perform a miracle, we are persuaded there is nothing new in it. They are said to have wounded their bodies after their usual manner (64).

(64) 1 Kings xviii. 28.

the exorbitant antiquity of his kindred gods, we cannot allow his. Hercules or a Melcartus (P) was the great and ancient god of Tyre. They anciently represented him in no form. His temple had no images in it * (Q), a seeming undeniable instance of his high antiquity (R). However, that they deviated from this laudable custom may, perhaps, appear when we come to the siege of Tyre by Alexander †. Among their gods we may also place Adonis, Thammuz or Osiris, which you will (S); nor must we forget the Patæci (T) they carried about in the prows of their ships ‡.

* See before in the notes, ubi sup.

† See ibid.

‡ HERODOT. l. 3. c. 37.

by Alexander, were so much afraid that he should leave them, as they superstitiously dreaded, and go over to the enemy, that they chained him with golden chains (38) to the altar of Hercules (39).

(P) So called from מלך קרת מלך מלך Malac-cartha, the king of the city, which Bochart (40) supposes to be Tyre. Sir Isaac Newton (41) rejects this notion, and rather derives his name from his having been the founder, or governor, or prince of the city of Carteia in Spain. Hesychius (42) says, that the Amathusians called Hercules by the name of Malic. Pliny (43) calls him, corruptly, Midacritus. He was a great navigator, and was the first that brought lead from the Cassiterides or islands of Britain. According to others (44) he invented the shell-purple, by an accidental remark of a dog's mouth stained therewith.

(Q) This is in part contradicted by Philostratus, in his life of Apollonius of Tyana, who particularly dwells on the temple of Gadira or Gades, which is (45) said to have had no images in it, and to have continued in that simple state to the time of Silius Italicus (46). In Philostratus we find indeed that there were no statues erected either to the Egyptian or Theban Hercules; for both were worshipped in this same temple, as he informs us: there were only two plain brazen altars erected to the Egyptian Hercules. But though the gods were unrepresented, their temple was adorned with the twelve labours of Hercules (as they are commonly called) finely wrought; the Hydra, and Diomed's horse. In this temple were kept the golden belt of Tenar, and the golden olive of Pygmalion, bearing Smaragdine fruit, of wondrous workmanship (47). By this may be learned, that, at least, the Theban Hercules was the Tyrian Melcartus; for we need not say that Pygmalion was king of Tyre.

(R) We have already given his genealogy in the Phœnician Antiquities (48). The Egyptians reckoned their Hercules to be seventeen thousand years older than their king Amasis (49). The Tyrians were more modest, and only reckoned their Hercules to be as old as their city, which was two thousand three hundred years *. The Tyrians paid as great a veneration to their hero as the Egyptians could do to theirs (50); but whether both their Hercules's were in reality one and the same, is what we pretend not to decide. Cicero (51) reckons the Tyrian Hercules the fourth of those he enumerates, and calls him the son of Jupiter and Asteria, the sister of Latona, and the father of Carthage. Lucian (52) says, that the Tyrian Hercules was not the Hercules celebrated by the Greeks, but another far more ancient, who was a Tyrian hero.

(S) They were certainly but one, or meant the same object. Whence the people of Amathus, an ancient city of Cyprus, conflated their Admefris (53), which is a compound of both the names, Adonis and Osiris; for the Phœnicians and Egyptians laid equal claim to him (54) under different appellations, though he was certainly an Egyptian (55). So then the beautiful Adonis, begotten by Cyniras an Affyrian (56), is in reality the Egyptian Osiris. It is a very labyrinth we are in, to consider these things as they are told us; but take the following parallel (57) between the solemnities and ceremonies sacred to them both: they had both of them their aparisude, disappearance, or death; they both had their lustris, or their search after them with mourning; and they both had their iupais, or invention, with joy and gladness. In reality they were but one. Both the nations in this case meant no other than the sun; concerning whose approach and departure they framed such fables as might best take with the people. The month of June was the season when all this superstition was transacted both by the Phœnicians and Egyptians (58).

(T) They were small statues. Herodotus (59) likens them to pigmies. Hesychius (60) and Suidas will have them to have been placed in the prows of the ships. The fashion was, for certain, changed in the great length of time between them and Herodotus. They were carried about for protection from disasters of the sea. They were the tutelary gods of sea-faring men (61). Thus the Spaniards at this day carry to sea with them little images of the saints, that they may stand their friends in distress. They will perform you a nine days devotion to St. Francis Xavier for a fair wind and favourable weather when at sea; and if the miracle is not wrought as expected, vow never more to trouble the saints again. The next minute the captain will hang him up an image of our lady of Bethlem, and declare that he will not take her down till she gives him a fair wind. If she will not do as he would have her, she must give place to our lady of mount Carmel; who, upon non-performance, is changed into our lady of the Rosary; and if she prove deaf also, up goes our lady of Solitude instead of her; and she not bearing any more than the rest, our lady of Affliction takes her turn (62), and so on ad infinitum. These are Christian Patæci. Why should we wonder at the blind Phœnicians? This we thought worth the notice. It is a good parallel, and comes from a good Roman Catholic, who was an eye-witness of this practice.

(38) DIOD. SIC. l. 17. p. 584. (39) PLUTARCH in vit. Alex. (40) Canaan ubi supra, col. 709. (41) Chronol. of anc. kingd. amended, p. 111, 112. (42) Apud BOCHART, ubi supra. (43) Lib. 7. c. 56. (44) Incertus apud SUID. (45) Ibid. (46) See before in the notes, p. 137. (47) PHILOST. in vit. APOL. TYAN. l. 5. c. 1. p. 211. (48) See before, p. 137. (49) HERODOT. l. 3. c. 43. (*) Idem ibid. (50) Vide MACROB. Saturn. l. 1. (51) De Nat. Deor. (52) De Di. Syr. (53) Vide STEPH. BYZANT. de urb. & popul. ad vocem 'Aμᾶθῦς. (54) Vid. eund. ibid. (55) Vid. eund. ibid. (56) Vid. APOLLOD. Bibliot. l. 3. c. 13. & CYRIL in Is. l. 2. tom. III. p. 274. (57) Vide MARTH. Can. Chron. secul. 1. p. 31. (58) Vide eund. ibid. (59) Lib. 3. c. 37. (60) Ad vocem Πάταξ. (61) Vide SELD. de Di. Syr. Syntagm. 2. c. 16. BOCHART Canaan, l. 2. c. 3. col. 712, 713. (62) See FRAZIER'S Voyage to the South-Sea, p. 143. of the Eng. Transf. in 4to.

a Other deities they had, which we know nothing of. The Cabiri will have their turn in the Grecian mythology *.

We do not read that the Phœnicians, how nearly soever they may have agreed with the Egyptians in the main points of their superstition, ever extended their worship, like them, to the inanimate creation. But since there was such a harmony between them in other respects, it is by no means unlikely that they were tainted with some of the meanest and most unaccountable superstitions of that fabulous and mysterious kingdom. But this is only a conjecture which we leave to the readers determination.

b BELSAMEN we have understood to have been in an especial manner the sun Their Priests, himself <sup>b</sup>; and to him they addressed themselves with stretched out arms, as we ga- religious Cu- ther <sup>c</sup>. What else was practised when they made their addresses to the sun only, we stoms, &c. no where find.

BAAL had his prophets and his priests in great numbers. We read of four hundred and fifty of them which were fed at Jezabel's table only <sup>d</sup>. They were wont to offer burnt-offerings and sacrifices to this their god or gods <sup>e</sup>, and to dance and skip about the altar, with violent gesticulations (U); and having worked themselves to the height of frenzy, by this exercise, and a violent straining of their voices, they began to cut and slash their bodies with knives and lancets: this done, they be- took themselves to prophesy <sup>f</sup>, as it is called, or rather raved, as if possessed by some c invisible power <sup>g</sup>. Such was their barbarous way of worship (W), nor need we wonder at it, considering their more barbarous custom, in earlier days, of sacrific- ing even such persons as were most dear to them, to appease or reconcile their imaginary gods, when they laboured under any public calamities. This is charg- ed very home upon them, not only by the testimony of others <sup>h</sup>, but by their own confession <sup>i</sup>. This also they had in common with the Egyptians <sup>j</sup>. This cruel prac- tice, however, was discontinued here, as well as in Egypt, pretty early; but at what time, and upon what motives of persuasion we have not to say.

MANY priests or prophets attended also on the rites of Astarte. Jezabel had no fewer than four hundred of them to her share <sup>k</sup>. Our version calls them prophets d of the groves: but Mr. Selden has proved, by comparing many passages of scripture together <sup>l</sup>, that Astarte is meant by them; and some <sup>m</sup> who know not how to con- test this interpretation, believe she was worshipped in a grove, which is very likely, such places being for the most part accounted sacred to religious rites, in the first times <sup>n</sup>. We must not doubt but she was served with much form, pomp, and my- stery; and women, particularly, are said to have been employed to weave hang- ings or tabernacles for her <sup>o</sup>. When she was adored as the Queen of heaven, or the moon itself, they offered up to her cakes, which were prepared for that service with great ceremony: The children gathered the wood, and the fathers kindled the fire, and the women kneaded the dough, to make cakes for the queen of heaven <sup>p</sup>. They also burn- ed incense to her, and poured out drink-offerings to her <sup>q</sup>. This Astarte, queen of e heaven, was, as we have said, the moon itself <sup>r</sup>; for as they paid their homage im- mediately to the sun, the same we may safely suppose, they did to the moon. It was an ancient custom. Those great lights were always considered together. The inimitable Job <sup>s</sup> says, If I beheld the sun when it shined, or the moon walking in bright- ness, and my heart hath been secretly enticed, or my mouth hath kissed my hand, this also were an iniquity to be punished by the judges. Some <sup>t</sup> fancy, upon what authority does not at present occur to us, that her cakes were stamped with a crescent. At Byblus she was worshipped in a particular manner; for there she had a temple as the Venus of Adonis <sup>u</sup>. And there, such women as would not conform to the custom of f shaving their heads at the annual time of lamenting Adonis, were bound to prosti- tute their bodies for one entire day, to all strangers that would have them, for

* See before in the notes, p. 134. <sup>b</sup> See before, p. 397. <sup>c</sup> See before, p. 86. <sup>d</sup> 1 Kings xviii. 19. <sup>e</sup> 2 Kings x. 24. <sup>f</sup> 1 Kings ubi supr. <sup>g</sup> Vide PATRICK in loc. <sup>h</sup> PORPHY <sup>i</sup> ἐν τῷ ἀνοχῆς, l. 2. § 56, &c. <sup>j</sup> See before, p. 138. <sup>k</sup> See before, p. 259. <sup>l</sup> 1 Kings ubi supr. ver. 19. <sup>m</sup> PATRICK in loc. <sup>n</sup> CLERIC in loc. <sup>o</sup> See before in the notes, p. 294. <sup>p</sup> 2 Kings xxiii. 7. <sup>q</sup> Jerem. vii. 18. <sup>r</sup> Idem xlv. 17, 18. <sup>s</sup> See before, p. 399. <sup>t</sup> Ibid. xxxi. 26, 27, 28. <sup>u</sup> See FULLER's Pisgah-sight. <sup>v</sup> LUCIAN de Dea Syr.

(U) It is uncertain whether they danced round the altar, or leaped upon it, or jumped over it, or how this was: Abarbinel thinks this leaping or dancing was a rite used in the worship of the sun, which puts all things in motion (63).

(63) PATRICK upon 1 Kings xviii. 26.

(W) Though all this was practised upon a particular occasion, or when they took on them to perform a miracle, we are persuaded there is nothing new in it. They are said to have wounded their bodies after their usual manner (64).

(64) 1 Kings xviii. 28.

hire; and the money so got was presented to the goddess<sup>a</sup>. Her temple at Aphac <sup>a</sup> on mount Libanus was a perfect sink of lewdness, a very school of the most beastly lust. The men there sunk into the most degenerate effeminacy to comfort the mournful goddess<sup>b</sup>. The most shameful commerce between the sexes was allowed within those prophane walls. And this was permitted and practised, as some<sup>c</sup> conjecture, because in this place Venus first rushed herself into the arms of Adonis. Or, as others<sup>d</sup> say, because this was either the first or the last place where they enjoyed each other. Other temples she doubtless had, and other rites, which it were in vain for us to attempt either to distinguish or enumerate. What else may be said of her, or her worship, we may have occasion to resume hereafter. Though she is called the goddess of the Sidonians, her principal temple seems to have been <sup>b</sup> that at Tyre, built by Hiram<sup>e</sup>.

AFTER what manner they worshipped their Apollo is uncertain; but to their Hercules they are said to have paid great honour. His worship was performed with great solemnity: the assistants were all clad alike, in Egyptian linen. They offered the incense to him with a loose flowing garment; the priestly vest was adorned with broad streaks or stripes of purple; their feet were bare; their heads were shaven; they were pure from any pollution, as it was thought, contracted from the other sex, and the fire of the altar never went out. Women were not allowed to enter into the temple, and swine were carefully kept from approaching it<sup>c</sup>: such were the ceremonies used, and customs observed, in the worship of the Tyrian Hercules. <sup>c</sup> They paid him tythes. More might be said concerning this Hercules's temples, and the honours done him, which we shall refer till we come to treat of Hercules in general.

WE shall now close up this account of their religious practices, customs, and ceremonies, with what they were wont to do in commemoration of Adonis, or Osiris, or Adonofris, or Thammuz; for, as we have already observed<sup>d</sup>, all these names centered in one object. His father, they pretend, was one Cinyras an Assyrian, who founded the city of Paphos in the island of Cyprus<sup>e</sup>. Some say his name was Gingris or Gingras<sup>f</sup> among the Phœnicians. But whatever his name was, it is agreed, he was a most beautiful youth. On the one hand<sup>g</sup> it is reported, that Venus was enamoured of him from his infancy, and committed the care of his education to <sup>d</sup> Proserpine; that when Venus came to demand him of her, she refused to deliver him to her; and that hence a dispute arose between them, which was decided by Jupiter, who decreed that the youth should be one third of the year with Proserpine, another third with Venus, and that during the last third, he should dispose of himself as he best liked. That in consequence of this, Adonis, smitten with the charms of Venus, spent two thirds of his time with that fond goddess; whereat Diana taking offence, sent a wild boar to put a miserable end to his life. On the other hand<sup>h</sup>, it is reported that Adonis was the offspring of an incestuous embrace. That he was begot by his father Cinyras on his own daughter Myrrah. That to hide the guilt of so unlawful a commerce from the eyes of the world, he was ex- <sup>e</sup> posed on the mountains, where he was nursed by the nymphs, and became a great sportsman. That Venus seeing him at his manly sport, fell in love with him, and received him into an intimacy with her: and that Mars conceiving a violent jealousy thereat, turned himself into the shape of a wild boar, and slew the beauteous youth. That Venus being unspeakably grieved at the sad news, followed him to the shades to demand him; but that Proserpine at first refusing to deliver him, was at length brought to this agreement, that he should be half the year with her, and half the year with Venus, who returned with joy to the earth again, and acquainted her followers with the success of her descent, and ordained a festival to be celebrated in commemoration thereof. Whoever compares this with what is related of Isis <sup>f</sup> and Osiris<sup>g</sup>, will find it to be the very same story in a different dress. In consequence of this mysterious tradition, there was great grief among the women, at Byblus especially, for the death of Adonis, which was succeeded by as great joy for his recovery.

BUT the Jewish writers have among them another story concerning the origin of the rites of Thammuz or Adonis. Maimonides<sup>h</sup> relates that the ancient Zabii held Thammuz to have been an idolatrous prophet, who preaching up to a certain king

<sup>a</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>b</sup> See before in the notes, p. 399. <sup>c</sup> BOCHART. Cansan. l. 2. c. 14. col. 749.
<sup>d</sup> Etymol. magn. apud eund. ibid. <sup>e</sup> MENAND. & DIUS apud JOSEPH. Antiq. l. 8. c. 2. <sup>f</sup> SY-
LIUS ITAL. l. 3. <sup>g</sup> See before, p. 400. <sup>h</sup> APOLLON. Biblioth. ubi supr. <sup>i</sup> JUL. POL. l. 2.
c. 4. l. 4. c. 14. <sup>j</sup> APOLLON. Biblioth. ubi supr. <sup>k</sup> CYRIL. in Is. ubi supr. <sup>l</sup> See before,
p. 243. <sup>m</sup> In More Nebuchim.

a the doctrine of worshipping the seven planets and the twelve signs, the king ordered him to be put to a cruel death. That on the very night of his death, all the idols, from the uttermost parts of the earth, met together in the temple of the golden statue or the sun, at Babylon; and that he acquainted them with the tragical end of Tammuz. That hereupon the images wept and lamented all night for Tammuz, and that as soon as morn appeared, they all flew back to their places. Hence, says he, was derived the custom of mourning over Tammuz. Finally, it is said he was the son of a heathen king, whose images the Jewish women adored with tears, nor refrained from offering sacrifices to it.

b WHOEVER he was, and whatever they meant by him, the superstition of mourning over him was a universal custom of the women in those parts. They began their lamentations at a stated time. They set up their outcries as soon as they perceived the river Adonis to run with a bloody face<sup>a</sup>, as at certain times it did<sup>a</sup>. The lamentations of a mother for the loss of her only son could not be more piercing or extraordinary<sup>b</sup>. They then proceeded to their sacrifices of the dead, having first disciplined themselves with whipping; and on the morrow, pretending him to be revived, and ascended through the air to the upper regions, they shaved their heads, as the Egyptians did for the loss of Apis, and, at Byblus at least, those who would not comply, were bound to prostitute themselves in the manner, and for the purposes above specified<sup>c</sup>. Some<sup>d</sup> relate, that on a certain night, while this solemnity lasted, they laid an image in a bed, and having gone through a bead-roll of lamentations over it, light was brought in, and the priest anointing the mouths of the assistants, whispered to them that salvation was come—that deliverance was brought to pass. Upon which their sorrow was turned into joy, and the image taken as it were out of its sepulchre. Or as others say<sup>e</sup>, the priests of Osiris in Egypt wrote to the women of Byblus, signifying to them, that they had found that god. They sent this letter in an earthen pot, as some say, or in a small ark or head as it is called<sup>f</sup>, made of the papyrus, which came by sea of its own accord to Byblus. This voyage it performed in seven days<sup>g</sup>, and it no sooner appeared in the port, but the women danced, feasted and rejoiced as extravagantly d as they had before wept, mourned and lamented<sup>h</sup>. This custom has made so lasting an impression on the women of those parts, that it is visibly kept up by them of Aleppo to this day<sup>i</sup>.

THERE are different ways of explaining away all this mystery. Adonis was the sun. The upper hemisphere of the earth, or that which we think so, was anciently called Venus; the under, Proserpine. Therefore when the sun was in the six inferior signs, they said he was with Proserpine, when he was in the six superior, with Venus. By the boar that slew Adonis, they understood winter; for the boar they made, and not unaptly, the emblem of that rigid season<sup>a</sup>. Or, by Adonis they meant the fruits of the earth, which are for one while buried, but at length appear flourishing to the sight. When therefore the seed was thrown into the ground, they said Adonis was gone to Proserpine; but when it sprouted up, they said, he had revisited the light and Venus. And hence probably it was that they sowed corn, and made gardens for Adonis; for such a custom they also had<sup>b</sup>. We may safely suppose there was no small variation among those who received this piece of superstition, when they talked of what it meant, and why it was practised. Finally, Plutarch<sup>c</sup> takes Adonis to be Bacchus. Osiris also the sun<sup>d</sup>, as we have seen, was Adonis<sup>e</sup>. To be brief, it was contended that Osiris was buried at Byblus<sup>f</sup>. Adonis is lord<sup>g</sup>, so is Baal.

f PLUTARCH<sup>a</sup> also informs us that Isis had a temple at Byblus, where they worshipped the heath which had concealed Osiris's coffin. This Byblian Isis must certainly have been Astarte; so that we end with the Baalim and Astarte as we have began.

HERODOTUS<sup>b</sup> mentions the Phœnicians to have been circumcised: but Josephus<sup>c</sup> asserts, that none of the nations included under the vague names of Palestine and Syria used that rite, the Jews excepted; so that if the Phœnicians had anciently that custom, they came in time to neglect it, and at length wholly laid it aside. They abstained from the flesh of swine<sup>d</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> PHILAST. apud SELD. de Diu Syr. Syntagm. 2. c. 11.    <sup>b</sup> LUCIAN de De. Syr.    <sup>c</sup> See before, p. 394.    <sup>d</sup> AMM. MARCELL. l. 19.    <sup>e</sup> See before, p. 401.    <sup>f</sup> JUL. FIRM. apud PURCH. Pilgr. l. 1. c. 17. p. 90.    <sup>g</sup> PROCOF. & CYRIL. in lla. xviii.    <sup>h</sup> LUCIAN ubi supr.    <sup>i</sup> Idem ibid.    <sup>a</sup> PROCOF. & CYRIL. ubi supr.    <sup>b</sup> See SELLER's Hist. of Palmyra in the Preface.    <sup>c</sup> MACROB. Saturn. l. 1. c. 21.    <sup>d</sup> Vide VOS. de Idololat. l. 2. c. 5. p. 167.    <sup>e</sup> Sympos. l. 4. p. 671.    <sup>f</sup> See before, p. 204.    <sup>g</sup> See before, p. 400.    <sup>h</sup> LUC. de Dea Syr.    <sup>i</sup> See before,    <sup>a</sup> De l'Id. & Osirid.    <sup>b</sup> Lib. 2. c. 104.    <sup>c</sup> CONT. AP. l. 1.    <sup>d</sup> HERODIAN. l. 5.

*Their Arts
and Learning.*

MUCH is said of the Phœnicians, their arts, sciences, and manufactures. But as <sup>a</sup> what we find concerning them is couched in general terms only, we have it not in our power to expatiate on particulars. The Sidonians, under which we comprehend all the Phœnicians in general, as was anciently a very usual thing <sup>b</sup>, were of a most happy genius and frame of mind, capable of any thing <sup>c</sup>. Arithmetic and astronomy either took rise among them <sup>d</sup>, or were brought by them to their perfection, and applied to mercantile, nautical, architectonical, and fabrical uses. From them those excellent sciences flowed into Greece <sup>e</sup>, together with their letters <sup>f</sup>. They were from the beginning, as it were, addicted to philosophical exercises of the mind; inasmuch that a Sidonian, by name Mosebus, taught the doctrine of atoms before the Trojan war <sup>g</sup>, and Abdomenus of Tyre <sup>h</sup> undertook to grapple even <sup>i</sup> with Solomon, by the subtle propositions he offered to that wisest of earthly kings. Phœnice continued to be one of the seats of learning, and both Tyre and Sidon <sup>j</sup> produced their philosophers of latter ages; Boëthus and Diodatus of Sidon, Antipater of Tyre, and Apollonius of the same place, who wrote of the writings and disciples of Zeno <sup>k</sup>. Their doctrine concerning the origin of the world, and the formation of things, we have already mentioned <sup>l</sup>.

Their Language.

THEIR language was at least a dialect of the Hebrew. It was that of the ancient Canaanites. Their letters or characters we take to have been the same with the Samaritan. But for our particular thoughts of both the one and the other, and for the construction of both, we must crave the reader's patience till we come <sup>c</sup> to treat of the Hebrew tongue.

Their Manufactures.

How great soever they were for the sciences, and for their discoveries and improvements in the learned way; it is far from being improbable that they excelled much more in the labours of the hand than in those of the head <sup>e</sup>. The glass of Sidon, the purple of Tyre, and the exceeding fine linen they wove, were of their own growth, and their staple manufactures. These are said to have been their own inventions <sup>f</sup>. And for their extraordinary skill in working of metals, in hewing of timber and stone; in a word, for their perfect knowledge of what was solid, and great, and ornamental in architecture, we need only put the reader in mind of the large share they had in erecting and decorating of the temple at Jerusalem <sup>d</sup> under their Hiram; than which nothing is more known, nothing more certain, nor is there any thing that can more redound to their honour, or insinuate a clearer or greater idea of what their own buildings must have been. Their fame was such for their just taste, fine design, and luxuriant invention, that whatever was elegant, great, or pleasing, whether in apparel, or vessels, or toys, was called, by way of excellence, Sidonian workmanship or contrivance <sup>g</sup>.

*Their Trade
and Navigation.*

THUS far we have considered them as learned men and artificers, improving themselves, and cultivating their minds sedately at home. It remains that we mention them as merchants, navigators, and planters of endless colonies in foreign parts. As they were merchants, they may be said to have engrossed all the commerce of the western world at least. As navigators, they were the boldest, the most experienced, and greatest discoverers of the ancient times; they had for many ages no rivals. And as they were planters of colonies, they did so much that way, that when it is remembered that their country was probably little more than the slip of ground between mount Libanus and the sea, it is surprizing how they could furnish such supplies of people, and not wholly depopulate their native seat. They were the most busy, most enterprising people that can well be conceived.

WE have started a conjecture, that the Phœnicians were not a little induced to become foreign dealers by their neighbourhood with the Syrians, whom we have considered as the most ancient of those who negotiated any thing considerably and regularly with the more eastern regions <sup>a</sup>. And we see no reason we have to depart from this position. For their own territory was but small, and but little able to afford any considerable exports, if we except manufactures; but that their manufactures were any thing, to speak of, till they began to turn all the channels of trade into their own country, is hard to believe. In Syria, which was a large country, they found store of superabundant productions of the natural growth of that country, and many choice, and precious, and useful commodities brought from the east.

<sup>a</sup> Vide BOCHART. Phaleg. l. 4. c. 37. col. 301. <sup>b</sup> Idem ibid. col. 303. <sup>c</sup> STRABO, l. 16. p. 757. <sup>d</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>e</sup> HERODOT. <sup>f</sup> POSIDONIUS apud STRABO ubi supr. <sup>g</sup> MS. HAND. & DIUS apud JOSEPH. l. 8. c. 2. & cont. AP. l. 1. <sup>h</sup> STRABO ubi supr. <sup>i</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>j</sup> See before, p. 17. <sup>k</sup> Vide BOCHART. Phaleg. l. 4. c. 35. col. 303. <sup>l</sup> Vide eund. ibid. <sup>m</sup> See before, p. 379.

- a Hereupon having a safe coast and convenient harbours on the one side of them, and excellent materials for ship-building upon the mountains on the other, and perceiving by degrees how acceptable many commodities, that Syria furnished them with, would be in foreign parts; and being at the same time, perhaps, shewn the way by the Syrians themselves, who may have navigated the Mediterranean; they turned all their thoughts to trade and navigation, and, by an uncommon application thereto, soon eclipsed the Syrians themselves on the Mediterranean sea. Nature herself pointed to them their advantages, and daily experience before their eyes, and a laudable ambition, may have prompted them to that which brought them to be considered as the first of the earth for riches and splendor, if not for power.
- b It were in vain to talk of the Edomites, who fled hither in David's time *; or to enquire whence Herodotus derives the Phœnicians from the Red-sea †. Their origin we have already seen ‡. That some of the Edomites fled into this country in the days of David we have already shewn. And that the Edomites were a trading people we have elsewhere noted §. What improvements they brought with them into Phœnice is hard to say. And, by the way, it is as hard to speak of their numbers, or to say how it could be possible for a parcel of refugees to communicate their own name to the ancient proprietors, as is pretended ¶. It seems to be plain, that they brought with them a knowledge of the Red-sea, and of the south parts of Arabia, Egypt, and Ethiopia; and that, by their instructions and lights, they made the Phœnicians acquainted with those coasts, which before they knew nothing of, and enabled them to undertake the voyages they did in those parts for Solomon, and for Pharaoh Necho king of Egypt. But we will dwell no longer on these particulars so hard to be ascertained. We have only started them to exercise those of our inquisitive readers, who have leisure and inclination to bend their thoughts this way; and shall only add, in a summary way, that it is our opinion, the Phœnicians were both younger merchants and navigators than the Syrians, and that they reaped considerable advantages by the access of the fugitive Edomites that sought for shelter among them in David's time.

THEIR whole thoughts were how to advance their trade. They affected no empire but that of the sea. They sought to enlarge no other dominion. They seem to have aimed at nothing but the peaceable enjoyment of their commerce. They traded to all the known parts they could reach, or knew the way to. The British isles, commonly understood by the Cassiterides, Spain, other places in the ocean both to the north and south of the Straits mouth, in general all the ports of the Mediterranean, the Black-sea and the lake Meotis †; in all these parts they had settlements and correspondence, from all which they drew what was useful to themselves, or might be so to others reciprocally: and thus they exercised the three great branches of trade, as it is commonly divided into importation, exportation, and transportation, in full latitude. Such was the extent of their sea trade: as for their correspondence by land in Syria, and by the way thereof, in Mesopotamia, Assyria, Babylonia, Persia, Arabia, and even the Indies, not to carry the thing any farther; this may furnish us with some adequate idea of what this people once was, how rich, and how unhyperbolically their merchants are mentioned in scripture as equal to princes ‡. Their country was at that time the great warehouse, where every thing, that might either administer to the necessities or luxury of mankind, was to be found; which they distributed as they judged would be best for their own interest, which they must have had the art of cherishing, as much as we have in our days. It would be in vain for us to undertake a detail of what they brought by sea, or of what was sent them over land from each particular place, or of what they sent to the several countries they dealt with. We shall have occasion to specify the particulars when we come to mention the ancient trade of each country. Their own principal commodities were the purple of Tyre, the glass of Sidon, and the exceeding fine linen made in this country §; these, and other fine pieces of art, in metals and wood, seem to have been the chief, and almost only commodities of Phœnice itself. Their country was so small, that it is not to be imagined they could afford to export any of the fruits thereof. It is more likely that they rather wanted, than abounded with the fruits of the earth.

HAVING thus spoken in general terms of their trade, we shall now just touch upon their shipping, and some things remarkable in their navigation. Their larger

* See before, p. 314.

† See before in the notes, p. 315.

‡ See before, p. 396.

§ See before, p. 310.

¶ See before, p. 383.

† Vide HÛT Hist. de la Comm. et de la Navig. des Anc.

‡ Isai. xxiii. 8.

§ See before, p. 404.

embarkations were of two sorts. They divided them into round ships or Gauli <sup>a</sup> and long ships, gallies, or Triremes <sup>b</sup>. When they drew up in line of battle, the Gauli were at a small distance off each other in the wings, or in the van and the rear, and about; their Triremes were contracted together in the center <sup>c</sup>. If at any time their ships bound on a voyage, observed that a stranger kept them company, or followed them in their track, they were sure to get rid of him, if they could, or deceive him, if possible; in which they would go so far as to venture the loss of their ships, and even their lives, so that they could but destroy or disappoint him <sup>d</sup>; so jealous were they of foreigners, and so tenaciously bent on keeping all to themselves. And to add to the dangers of the seas, and to discourage other nations from trilling themselves thereon, they affected piracy <sup>e</sup>; or to be at war <sup>f</sup> with such as they met when they thought themselves strongest. This was but a natural stroke of policy in a people who grasped at the whole commerce of the then known world. Talking of their navigation we must not forget the famous fishery of Tyre, which so remarkably enriched the city of Tyre in particular. The fish they sought after were those wherewith they dyed purple, the richest dye in the world. They were always careful to take them alive. An ancient author <sup>g</sup> attributes the dissoluteness of Tyre to the number of the dyers there; from whence we may gather they were a rich and a numerous body of people, proud and extravagant, vain and debauched. This fish is some how or other lost (X), or those on that coast at present know not how to catch it.

We might here speak of the Phœnician voyages in the service of Solomon, had we not a more proper place in our eye of expatiating thereon. The long voyage some of them undertook in the service, and to satisfy the curiosity of Necho king of Egypt, round Afric, going out of the Red-sea, and returning by the way of the Straits mouth, deserves not to be passed over. They were three years about it (Y). The reader, we hope, will not be displeased that we have dwelt so long on this extraordinary people. He will perceive we might have said ten times more; and that it was impossible for us to say less of them than we have said, either to refresh his memory, or give him information. Their colonies and settlements will be particularly remarked in the order they may occur. <sup>d</sup>

<sup>a</sup> Vide BOCHART. Canaan, l. 2. c. 11. col. 739. <sup>b</sup> POLYÆN. l. 6. <sup>c</sup> Vide STRAB. l. 3. p. 175. <sup>d</sup> HUET ubi supr. c. 16. p. 70. <sup>e</sup> Idem l. 16.

(X) We are assured by an eye-witness, who is too modest to allow us the use of his name, that they have a kind of fish on the rocks on the coast a little to the westward of Panama, with which the Indians dye a red purple. That they carry their yarn down to the sea-side: that they bring it back dyed: and that their hands are always discoloured, like those of our dyers.

(Y) We see then the Portuguese were only the re-discoverers of the Cape of Good-hope. Here we will beg leave to animadvert a little upon a celebrated author (65), who will have it, the Phœnicians made it a common practice to trade with India, by the way of the Cape of Good-hope, from the times of Solomon. This is incredible on many accounts. 1. The Phœnicians had no such temptation to undertake so long and dangerous a voyage as we have: the voyage to them must have been much longer than it is at present to us. 2. They are not above half so far from India as we are. 3. It is incredible that the structure and rigging of their ships were rightly adapted for so unfavourable a navigation; nor is it likely that they could at once furnish themselves with stores and provisions sufficient for their use and necessities, and at the same time have any great cargo of goods on board. 4. These disadvantages considered, it must appear that they might have been supplied with all the eastern commodities in general, at a much cheaper rate, from the Egyptians and Edomites on the Arabian gulf, and from Syria on the Euphrates; and this certainly was a part of the trade they drove with Syria and Egypt (66). 5. It is not to be imagined, if the contrary practice had been usual, that all memory of it would have been lost; that the Romans in Ovid's time would have talked of the torrid zone as uninhabitable; and that Herodotus would have reckoned it as so noble a transaction of Necus's reign, that he sent the most expert Phœnicians he could procure to explore the shores of Afric (67); or that the same, in other respects, most knowing historian, would have disputed the credibility of what the sailors reported on their return, that they had the sun on the right hand of them (68); it being the ancient custom, as we have somewhere read in Plutarch, to set the face to the westward; in which posture the sun must be on the right hand of him who is to the southward of its course, which they must have been over and over again, who doubled the Cape of Good-hope. In short, the Indian commerce by that rout could have answered no manner of end to the Phœnicians, nor could they have been tempted to frequent it, situated as they were between Egypt and Syria, the two great magazines of whatever the east afforded.

(65) HUET Histoire du Comm. & de la Navig. des Anc. chap. 8.
(67) See before, p. 267. (68) MELPOMEN. c. 42.

(66) See before, p. 379.

S E C T. III.

The Chronology of the PHOENICIANS.

IT were labour in vain to dwell on this subject. In general we may say, that the history of the Phœnicians is no other than a continuation of that of Canaan; as is on all hands allowed (A). Their particular epochs it is impossible to discover. Their records, once so faithfully kept<sup>a</sup>, are now no more. We will not therefore enter professedly upon so dark a matter, but shall content ourselves with touching thereon occasionally hereafter. It is observed<sup>b</sup>, that they boasted an excessive antiquity, no less than thirty thousand years; in which, however, they were far more reasonable than some others, who certainly could claim very little, or nothing beyond them in that particular. To adhere to the method we have laid down, we shall subjoin a series of the kings of the different kingdoms of this country, so far as we can collect them.

K I N G S of S I D O N.

*****
Agenor,
Phœnix,
Pbalis,
 *****
 An anonymous king,
 *****
Tetramnestus,
 *****
Tennes,
Strato,
Balkonymus, Abdolomi- nas, Abdolominus, or Alonymus.

K I N G S and J U D G E S of T Y R E.	Reigned
	Accord. to MENAND. EPHES.	Accord. to THEOPHIL. ANTIOC.
*****
Abibal, or Abcimal, Hi- ram, Hierom, Hiero- men, Irom, Chiram, or Suron,
Balestartus, or Bazor,	7 Years - - - - -	- - - - 17 Years
Abdastartus,	9 - - - - -	- - - - 12
The eldest of the mur- derers of Abdastartus, }	12 - - - - -	- - - - -
Astartus,	12 - - - - -	- - - - -
Astarimus, or Atbary- mus, }	9 - - - - -	- - - - -
Phelles, or Helles,	8 - - Months - -	- - - - -
Ethbal, Ithobal, or Ju- thobal, }	32 Years - - - - -	- - - - 12
Badezor, or Bazor,	6 - - - - -	- - - - 7
Badezor's son,
Mettinus,	9 - - - - -	- - - - 29

<sup>a</sup> Vid. JOSEPH. contr. Ap. I. 1.    <sup>b</sup> AFRICAN. apud STYCELL. p. 17.

(A) We have already given several proofs to evince this. We shall add, that the compiler of the Alexandrine Chronicle (1), speaking of the Cananites driven out by Jehsa, calls them, in part, Phœnicians.

(1) P. 183. 1;

KINGS and JUDGES of TYRE.		Reigned Accord. to MENAND. EPHES.	Accord. to THEO- PHIL. ANTIOG.
Pygmalion, 		40 Years - - - - -	- - - - -
Elulens, 		36 - - - - -	- - - - -
Iibobal, Baal,		10 - - - - -	- - - - -
Judges {	Ecnibal, - - - - -	2 Months - - - - -	- - - - -
	Gbelbis, - - - - -	10 Years - - - - -	- - - - -
	Abbar, the High-priest,	3 - - - - -	- - - - -
	Mytomas and Geraſtus, -	6 - - - - -	- - - - -
	Balator, - - - - -	1 - - - - -	- - - - -
	Merbal, - - - - -	4 - - - - -	- - - - -
	Irom, - - - - -	20 - - - - -	- - - - -
	Massen, Straso,  Azelmic, *****
	Marion.

The KINGS of ARAD, or ARADUS.

*****
Arbal, Narbal,
*****
Geroſtratus.

WE need only refer the reader to the very unaccountable difference between Menander the Epheſian, and Theophilus of Antioch, in their reigns of the Tyrian princes, to judge of the impoſſibility of fixing on any thing certain in the chronology of even the beſt and cleareſt times of the Phœnicians in general.

S E C T. IV.

The Phœnician Kings, from the ancient fabulous History of the Greeks.

Agenor. BEFORE we enter upon the hiſtory of the Phœnician kings, we are, in ſome a manner, obliged to inſert the following dark and fabulous account of the family of Agenor, the firſt king of Phœnice mentioned by the Greeks.

AGENOR and Belus were, according to Apollodorus<sup>a</sup>, the ſons of Neptune by Lybia, daughter of Epaphus, who was king of a part of Egypt. Belus reigned in Egypt, and married Anchine daughter of Nilus, by whom he had Ægyptus and Danaus. Agenor paſſed from Egypt into Phœnice, where he ſettled, and became the father of a numerous race. He married Telephaſta (Stephanus calls her Telephe) by whom he had Europa, Cadmus, Phœnix, Celix<sup>b</sup>, and, according to Pauſanias, Eleſtra<sup>c</sup> and Tbaſus<sup>d</sup>. Phericides, as quoted by the ſcholiſt of Apollonius, gives him two wives, the one named Damno, by whom he had Phœnix, Iſea, and Melia; the other called Argiope, who<sup>e</sup> was mother to Cadmus and Europa. Plutarch mentions a fourth wife, called Diorippe, who brought forth Sippylus<sup>f</sup>. Antonius Liberalis a fifth, named Caſſiopea, who bore him a daughter, by name Carina. And Cedrenus a ſixth, whom he calls Tyrus, pretending that the city of Tyre borrowed its name from her. Europa (whom ſome writers will have to be the daughter of Phœnix, and not of Agenor) was ſtolen by Jupiter, transformed into a bull, that is, in a ſhip named the bull; or bearing <sup>a</sup> Lib. 2.

de Fluvio.

<sup>b</sup> Idem l. 3.

<sup>c</sup> PAUSAN. in BOEOT.

<sup>d</sup> Idem in ELIAC.

<sup>e</sup> PLUTARCH

a the figure of a bull in her stern, and carried into Crete. Agenor, being extremely grieved for the loss of his daughter, sent his son Cadmus with a great sum of money in quest of her: but he not finding her, nor daring to return home without her; resolved to go and settle elsewhere. With this design, having fitted out a small fleet, he put to sea, and landed in Thrace, where he had the good luck to discover a gold mine in the mount Pangæus. Being enriched with that metal, and in a condition to pursue his design, he was advised by the oracle of Delphos to leave Thrace, and pass into Boeotia, which he did accordingly; and having driven out the Hyantes; who opposed him, and allowed the Aones, who voluntarily submitted to him, to live in the country mixed with his Phœnicians, he founded a new kingdom, and built a b city; which, in derivation from his own name, he called Cadmea. That city was afterwards embellished, and enlarged by Amphyon and Zeibus, the two sons of Antiope (for they invaded the throne during the minority of Laius, the son of Labdacus; Cadmus's grand-son) and by them called Thebes, in honour of Thebe their aunt, by the mother's side (A), as we shall shew in the sequel.

ISAEA and Melia, Agenor's two daughters, married Egyptus and Danaus, their cousin Germans. Cilix is said by Appollodorus*, to have settled in Cilicia, and given * PAUSAN. in Boeot.

* APOLLOD. l. 3.

(A) We find such a disagreement among authors, in the accounts they give of Agenor, and his descendants, that it is impossible to come at the truth of the matter; and therefore not worth our while to attempt the unravelling of so perplexed and intricate a subject. What most authors seem to agree upon, is, 1. That Agenor was by birth an Egyptian; that from Egypt he passed (on what occasion we know not) into Phœnice, where he settled, and became the father of a numerous race. 2. All the Greek writers agree, that he was the first king of Phœnice, and the founder of the cities of Sidon and Tyre. But in the succession of the kings, some of the Latins place Belus the elder before him; and most of the moderns, upon the authority of Josephus (1), make Sidon, the eldest son of Canaan, founder of the city of Sidon, which was so called from him. And as to the city of Tyre, the same Josephus tells us, that it was founded two hundred and forty years before the building of Solomon's temple: from whence it is plain, if we follow Josephus (whose authority, as to this particular, is far preferable to that of the Greeks) that these two cities were not built by one and the same person. Tyre was, without doubt, a colony of the Sidonians, it being called in scripture the daughter of Sidon (2). And Justin tells us, in express terms, that the city of Tyre was built before the taking of Troy, by the Sidonians, who being driven out of their own country by the king of the Ascalonians, were forced to seek new seats (3). 3. It is agreed upon by most of the ancients, that Europa, Cadmus, Phœnix, and Cilix, were the children of Agenor; and that with them a great many Phœnicians and Syrians went into Asia Minor, Crete, Greece, and Libya; and there introduced letters, music, poetry, and other arts, sciences, and customs of the Phœnicians. It is pretended, that Europa being carried away by Taurus king of Crete, Agenor sent her brother in quest of her; who, on that occasion, as they were enjoined not to return without her, founded several Phœnician colonies in Asia Minor, Greece, and Libya, which we shall have occasion to speak of hereafter. But Sir Isaac Newton is of opinion, that these Phœnicians went not to seek Europa, but new seats, being driven out of Sidon by the Edomites, whom David had conquered and dispersed. For, according to his computation, the conquest of the land of Edom by

David, the coming of Cadmus into Greece, and the founding of Thebes in Boeotia, and other Phœnician colonies in other parts, happened much about the same time. The Edomites, says he, not being able to withstand David, abandoned Edom, and fled, some into Egypt with their young king Hadad, others to the Persian Gulf, with their commander Oannes; and some from the Red-Sea to the coast of the Mediterranean, where they fortified Azoth against David; and driving out the Sidonians, made themselves masters of their city, it being very convenient for the merchants, who fled from the Red-Sea. The Sidonians being thus expelled, went in great numbers under Cadmus, and his brothers, into Cilicia, Asia Minor, and Greece; while others fled under other leaders to seek new seats in Libya, where they built, as we are told by Nonnus (4), many walled towns. Their leader was also there called Cadmus (which imports a man come from the east) and his wife Sitbonis, a Sidonian. Sir Isaac adds, that some of the Sidonians, who were driven out by the Edomites flying from David, laid the first foundations of the cities of Tyre and Arad, and made Abibalus, their leader, king of Tyre. So that, according to his computation, Tyre was built in the time of David, and about the 16th year of his reign (5). But this is plainly contradicted by Josephus, who tells us, that Tyre was built two hundred and forty years before the building of Solomon's temple (6); which work Solomon undertook in the eleventh year of the reign of Hiram, son and successor of Abibal king of Tyre. It is therefore plain, both from Josephus, and the Tyrian annals, which he quotes, that Abibal was not the founder of Tyre, and that that city was built long before David's time.

Neither was Abibal the first king of Tyre, though he is the first we find mentioned in history, as appears from the same Josephus; who, in speaking of Menander's history, tells us, That Menander, after having given an account of the reigns of the other kings of Phœnice, comes at last to Hiram, who was raised to the throne upon the death of his father Abibal (8). From which passage it is manifest (if we give credit to Josephus and Menander) that Abibal was preceded by several other kings, whose reigns and actions Menander had described.

(1) JOSEPH. Antiq. l. 2. c. 6. (2) Isa. xxv. 12. (3) JUSTIN. l. 18. c. 3. (4) Dionysiac. l. 13. (5) Sir ISAAC NEWTON's Chronol. of anc. kingd. amend. (6) JOSEPH. Antiq. l. 8. c. 2. (7) Idem ibid. (8) JOSEPH. contr. ARION. l. 1.

his name to that country. He adds, that Thasus built the city of Thasos in Thrace,<sup>a</sup> which is confirmed by Pausanias<sup>b</sup>. All we know of Elestra is, that one of the gates of Thebes borrowed its name from her<sup>c</sup>. Of Sipylus we read in Plutarch<sup>d</sup>, that mount Sipylus was so called from him. We shall have occasion to relate more at length, what we read of Cadmus in the ancient Greek writers, when we come to write the history of the Theban kings.

Phœnix.

PHOENIX is supposed by the Greeks to have succeeded his father in the kingdom of Phœnice, or rather of Sidon; which city, as likewise that of Tyre, they pretend to have been built by Agenor, wherein they are followed, among the Latins, by Q. Curtius<sup>e</sup>. That country, according to them, borrowing its name from Phœnix, was called Phœnice, and the inhabitants Phœnicians. Eusebius adds<sup>f</sup>, that he<sup>g</sup> was the first who found out the scarlet colour, which was therefore called at first Phœnicus, and afterwards, with a small alteration, Puniceus color.

Phalis.

THE next king of Sidon we meet with in history is PHALIS, who flourished in the time of the Trojan war. He proved a faithful ally to the Greeks, and used his utmost endeavours, though in vain, to draw Sarpedon, king of Lycia, over to their side<sup>h</sup>. He is mentioned by Homer<sup>i</sup>, and honoured with the title of most illustrious.

THESE are the kings of Sidon we find mentioned in the ancient Greek writers; but as their accounts are no ways to be depended upon, being interwoven and darkened with a thousand fables, we have thought fit to treat of them apart, lest we should seem to confound what is fabulous with what is truly historical.<sup>c</sup>

S E C T. V.

The Reigns of the Kings of PHOENICE.

PHOENICE, as we have said, was divided into several small kingdoms; for besides the kings of Sidon and Tyre, mentioned in scripture, we read in history of Elbasus king of Berytus, to whom Sanchoiatho, according to Eusebius<sup>a</sup>, dedicated his history of Erylus king of Byblus<sup>b</sup>, and of other Phœnician kings<sup>c</sup>, whose dominions were confined within the narrow bounds of one city, and its territory. Of<sup>d</sup> all the kings of Phœnice, those of Sidon, Tyre, and Arad seem to have been the most powerful and wealthy, and make the best figure in history. But their successions, and the years of their respective reigns, are over-cast with such a mist, and interrupted with so many chaims, that it is no easy matter to give any tolerable account of them. However, we shall here produce what occurs in history relating to them, and seems chiefly to be depended upon. We will begin with Sidon, the most ancient city of Phœnice.

The KINGS of SIDON.

Sidon.

SIDON, the eldest son of Canaan, was, according to Josephus<sup>a</sup>, the founder, and,<sup>e</sup> very likely, the first king of this city, or, at least, the father of the people. But as to his actions, or the years of his reign, we are left quite in the dark. Neither are we better acquainted with the kings who succeeded him; for though the Sidonians are mentioned in the histories of Moses, Joshua, and the Judges, yet we find not, in holy writ, express mention made of their kings, till the time of the prophet Jeremiah, who speaks of ambassadors sent (on what occasion we know not) by several kings, and, in particular, by that of Sidon, to Zedekiah king of Judah<sup>f</sup>.

Tetramnestus.

THE next king we find mentioned in history, is TETRAMNESTUS, who assisted Xerxes, in his expedition against Greece, with three hundred galleys, and is counted by Herodotus<sup>g</sup> among the chief commanders of the Persian navy.

Tennes.

TENNES appears next: it is uncertain whom he succeeded. In his reign the Sidonians, and other Phœnicians, not being able to bear the haughty behaviour, and tyrannical proceedings of those whom Darius Ochus, king of Persia, had set over them, entered into a confederacy with Nectanebus king of Egypt<sup>h</sup>, and rose up in arms, with design to shake off the Persian yoke, and recover their ancient liberty. As the Persians were then making vast preparations to reclaim Egypt, which they could not well approach but by marching through Phœnice, this revolt happened very opportunely for Nectanebus. Therefore, to encourage the Phœnicians to

<sup>a</sup> PAUSAN. in Elia.    <sup>b</sup> Idem in Boet.    <sup>c</sup> PLUTARCH de Fluviiis.    <sup>d</sup> Q. CURTIUS l. 4.
<sup>e</sup> PREPAR. Evang.    <sup>f</sup> DICTYUS l. 1.    <sup>g</sup> Odyss. 8.    <sup>h</sup> EUSEB. preparat. Evangelii. d. 1. c. 6.
<sup>i</sup> ARRIAN. l. 2.    <sup>j</sup> STRABO l. 16.    <sup>k</sup> JOSEPH. Antiq. l. 1. c. 7.    <sup>l</sup> Jerem. xvii. ver. 3.
<sup>m</sup> HERODOT. l. 7.    <sup>n</sup> See before, p. 276. b.

a stand out in it, he sent a body of four thousand Greek mercenaries, under the command of Mentor the Rhodian, to their assistance, hoping thereby to make Phœnice a kind of barrier to Egypt, and carry on the war at a distance. On the other side, Tennes king of Sidon (which city then exceeded all the others of Phœnice in wealth) having fitted out with great expedition a powerful fleet, and raised a considerable army in his own dominions, took the field; and being strengthened by the Greek auxiliaries, engaged and routed the governors of Syria and Cilicia, whom Ocbus had sent to reduce him, and drove the Persians quite out of Phœnice. The Sidonians, on their first taking up of arms, had laid waste a delicious garden belonging to the kings of Persia, cutting down all the trees wherein they took great delight; seized
b and burnt all the forage which the Persian governour had laid up for the subsistence of his cavalry; and, what is still worse, punished with the utmost severity, such of their Persian oppressors as fell into their hands. Ocbus was provoked to such a degree at these proceedings of the Sidonians, especially after news was brought him of his lieutenant's being defeated, and the Persians driven out of Phœnice; that he now breathed nothing but revenge, threatening total destruction not only to the Sidonians, but to all the inhabitants of Phœnice. Being thus bent upon revenge, he drew together all the forces he could, and having mustered them at Babylon, marched from thence into Phœnice, at the head of an army of three hundred thousand foot, and thirty thousand horse. Mentor, who was then in Sidon, being terrified c at the approach of so powerful an army, sent privately a trusty servant of his own, called Thessalon, to the king of Persia, offering not only to put him in possession of Sidon, but likewise to assist him in the reducing of Egypt; where, as he was well acquainted with the country, he was capable of doing him good service. Ocbus, glad of this proffer, spared no promises to engage Mentor in his service; who, having received such assurances from the king of Persia as he desired, found means to draw Tennes king of Sidon into the same treason. In the mean time the Sidonians not mistrusting Mentor, and much less their own king, were preparing for a vigorous defence. The city was furnished with arms and provisions of all sorts to hold out a long siege, and the citizens had drawn a treble trench, and a high wall
d round them. Besides the mercenaries, the place was garrisoned with a brave body of tall, handsome, and stout Sidonians, all well exercised, and trained up in martial discipline; and the sea-coast was guarded with a fleet of an hundred large galleys. But all was to no purpose; for Tennes no sooner heard that the Persian army was drawing near, but feigning to go to the general assembly of the Phœnicians, he marched out with a body of five hundred men, and taking along with him an hundred of the chief citizens to be created senators, as he pretended, went strait to the enemy's camp, and delivered them up to Ocbus, who received him as a friend, but caused all the citizens, as authors of the rebellion, to be immediately put to death. This severity of Ocbus, joined with the treachery of Tennes, struck e such terror into the Sidonians, that five hundred more of the citizens, all men of rank, went out to throw themselves at their enemy's feet, and implore his mercy with all the respect and submission imaginable. Ocbus, on seeing them, asked Tennes, whether it was in his power to put him in possession of the city, for he was unwilling to take it upon treaty, being bent on the utter ruin of the Sidonians, in hopes that such an instance of severity would make the other Phœnicians voluntarily submit. Tennes assured him, he could deliver the city into his hands whenever he pleased: whereupon Ocbus caused the five hundred citizens, though they were come out with olive-branches in their hands, as badges of submission, to be shot with darts upon the spot. After this Ocbus and Tennes marched at the head of the f Persian army towards the city, and were admitted, without the least opposition, by Mentor and the Greek mercenaries, to whom Tennes, in leaving the city, had delivered up one of the gates for that end. The Sidonians, on the approach of Ocbus's army, had designedly burnt all their ships, to prevent any one's withdrawing himself from the defence of his country. And therefore finding themselves thus betrayed, and the enemy within the walls, without any means left them to make their escape either by sea or land, they shut themselves up with their wives and children in their houses, and setting fire to them, consumed themselves, to the number of forty thousand, and the most valuable things they had, in the flames. Tennes met with no better fate than his subjects; for Ocbus, seeing he could do him no further service, and detesting in his heart the treachery of the man, caused his throat to be cut, lest he should out-live the ruin which he himself had brought upon his country. As Sidon was at that time in a very flourishing condition, and the most wealthy

Year of the
Flood, 2648.
Year before
Christ, 351.

wealthy city of Phœnice; a vast quantity of gold and silver was melted down by the flames, and found in the ashes, which Ocbus sold for great sums of money. The ruin and total destruction of Sidon terrified the other cities of Phœnice to such a degree, that they all voluntarily submitted to the conqueror, each of them making peace with the king upon the best terms they could. Neither was Ocbus unwilling to compound with them, that he might be no longer retarded from putting in execution the design he had upon Egypt. And thus all Phœnice was again brought under the Persian yoke<sup>b</sup>, and the prophecies of Isaiah<sup>1</sup>, Jeremiah<sup>2</sup>, Ezekiel<sup>3</sup> and Zechariah<sup>4</sup>, touching the destruction of Sidon, fulfilled.

Strato.

Year of the Jlood, 2667.
Year before
Christ, 332.

AFTER Tennes reigned STRATO; for such of the Sidonians, as by being absent on traffic at sea, or on other occasions, had escaped the massacre, returning home after Ocbus was gone back into Persia, rebuilt the city; but ever afterwards bore an immortal aversion to the Persian name. No wonder then if, a few years after, they so readily submitted to Alexander the Great, and so greedily embraced that opportunity of shaking off the yoke they groaned under. For the Sidonians are counted among the first in those parts, who sent ambassadors to Alexander, as he marched through Phœnice, to make their submission to him. Strato, as it seems, did not approve of this resolution, but could not prevent it, the citizens being obstinately bent against the Persians. For we are told that Alexander deprived him of the crown, because he submitted at the instigation of the citizens, and not of his own accord<sup>a</sup>. Theopompus, as quoted by Athenæus<sup>5</sup>, gives him the character of a most lewd and voluptuous prince, and tells us in particular, that in order to assemble the women, and have thereby an opportunity of chusing the most beautiful for his own use, he instituted publick sports for them, consisting chiefly in dancing and singing, wherein such as excelled the others were amply rewarded. Ælian<sup>6</sup> says he died an unnatural death. Of one Strato, king of Sidon, St. Jerome<sup>7</sup> relates, that having adhered to the king of Egypt against the Persians, and finding himself in danger of falling into the hands of an enemy from whom he had no reason to expect any favour, he resolved to prevent the impending calamity, by laying violent hands on himself; but fainting in the execution of his design, his wife, who was present, snatching, with a manly resolution, the sword out of his hand, freed him from that perplexity, by putting first him, and then herself to death, without shewing the least concern. But the circumstances of this king's death, if true, plainly shew that he was not the same person whom Alexander the Great stript of his dominions on account of his attachment to the Persian interest. This Strato, king of Sidon, is also mentioned by Maximus Tyrius<sup>8</sup>.

Ballonymus.

STRATO was succeeded by BALLONYMUS, of whose assumption to the throne we have the following account from Diodorus<sup>9</sup>. Alexander having deposed Strato, gave Hephestio power to bestow the crown of Sidon upon which of his friends he pleased. Whereupon Hephestio named to the royal dignity one of the chief citizens, in whose house he then lodged, and was splendidly entertained; desiring him to accept of it as a pledge of his friendship, and an acknowledgment of the many favours he had received in his house. The citizen, not at all dazzled at the sight of a crown, returned his generous guest a thousand thanks, but at the same time earnestly begged he would excuse him from assuming a dignity to which he had no title, as not being of the royal family. Hephestio was not a little surpris'd at this answer; but finding the Sidonian to be in earnest, desired he would name some one of the royal race to be invested with the dignity himself had refused. Upon this he named Ballonymus, a man of an unblemished character, but so poor, that he was reduced to live in a very obscure condition, and to maintain himself with his daily labour. However, his poverty and mean condition were no objection to Hephestio, who immediately dispatched a messenger to him with the royal robes, and tidings of his elevation to the throne. The messenger found him all in rags, and working in a garden as a common labourer. He was actually employed in drawing water out of a well, when the messenger acquainted him with his promotion to the throne, and clothed him with the royal robes. He accepted without more ado the new dignity, and proceeding with the messenger towards the city, was there received by Hephestio with all the marks of distinction due to his character, and by him introduced into the Forum, where, among the joyful shouts of the people who

<sup>a</sup> Diod. Sic. l. 16.    <sup>1</sup> Isa. xxiii.    <sup>2</sup> Jerem. xlvii.    <sup>3</sup> Ezek. xxviii. and xxxii.    <sup>4</sup> Zech. ix.
<sup>5</sup> Curt. l. 4. & Diod. Sicul. l. 17.    <sup>6</sup> Lib. 12. c. 13.    <sup>7</sup> Lib. 7. c. 2.    <sup>8</sup> Contra Jo-
vian. l. 1.    <sup>9</sup> Serm. 4.    <sup>10</sup> Ubi supr.

a were extremely pleased with this election, he was proclaimed king of Sidon<sup>c</sup>. The same occurrence is related, with some small variation of circumstances, by Plutarch<sup>d</sup>, Curtius<sup>e</sup>, and Justin<sup>f</sup>. Plutarch names this king Alonymus; Curtius calls him Abdolominus, and Justin, Abdolomius. Plutarch makes him king of Papbus; and Diodorus, both him and his predecessor, kings of Tyre. But in this particular we have abandoned them to follow the current of writers, who place both Strato and Ballonymus (as Diodorus calls him) among the kings of Sidon. All we know of his reign is, that to the last he proved faithful to the Macedonians, to whom he was indebted for his crown. And now that we have brought the kings of Sidon down b to the conquest of Phœnicie by the Macedonians, let us turn back to the kings of Tyre.

KINGS of TYRE.

WE are left quite in the dark as to the series of the kings who reigned at Tyre before Abibal, with whom Josephus, and Theophilus Antiocenus begin the succession they have furnished us with from Menander the Ephesian, and Dius, both authors, as Josephus calls them<sup>g</sup>, of unquestionable credit. Dius, who was by birth a Phœnician, wrote the history of Tyre, which he extracted from the public records, which were carefully preserved in that city. And Menander compiled the lives and actions of princes both Greek and Barbarian, as the same Josephus tells us<sup>h</sup>, from the public archives of the places he treats of.

c THE first king of Tyre mentioned by these historians, as quoted by Josephus and Theophilus, is ABIRAL, as Josephus calls him<sup>i</sup>; or Abeimal, as he is named by Theophilus<sup>j</sup>. As to his actions and years of his reign we are left quite in the dark. He was contemporary with David, and probably joined with the neighbouring nations against him, since David counts the inhabitants of Tyre among his enemies<sup>k</sup>. The Tyrian officers, who served the Philistines against Samuel, as we are told by the son of Sirac<sup>l</sup>, might have been sent by him. But these are, we own, bare conjectures, since neither Josephus, nor Theophilus, make any mention of his friendship or enmity towards the Jews. Abibal.

ABIRAL was succeeded by his son HIRAM, whom Theophilus calls sometimes Hiram. Hieromus, and sometimes Hieromenus; Josephus, Hiram and Irom; Tatian and Zonaras, Chiramus. This prince maintained a strict friendship with king David, to whom he sent ambassadors, probably to congratulate him upon his victory over the Jebusites, whom he had just then driven from the strong hold of Zion, and to conclude an alliance with him. He presented him with cedar-trees, and sent skilful workmen to build him a palace in Jerusalem<sup>m</sup>. And hence he is said in scripture to have been ever a lover of David<sup>n</sup>; which shews, that he was not only a faithful ally, but a sincere friend of David's. Upon the death of David, and the succession of Solomon to the throne, the affection Hiram had ever maintained for the father, prompted him to send a gratulatory embassy to the son, upon the news of his accession to the government, expressing great joy to see it continued in the family. Upon the return of these ambassadors, Solomon embraced the occasion, and wrote a letter to Hiram in these terms, as we find it in Josephus†. Year of the Flood, 1987.
Year before Christ, 1012.

King SOLOMON to King HIRAM, greeting.

Be it known to thee, O king, that my father David had it a long time in his mind to erect a temple to the Lord; but being perpetually in war, and under a necessity of clearing his hands of his enemies, and making them all his tributaries, before he could attend this great and holy work, he hath left it to me, in time of peace, both to begin, and to finish it, according to the direction, as well as the prediction, of Almighty God. Blessed be his great f name for the present tranquillity of my dominions! and by his gracious assistance, I shall now dedicate the best improvements of this liberty and leisure to his honour and worship. Wherefore I make it my request, that you will let some of your people go along with some servants of mine to mount LIBANUS, to assist them in cutting down materials towards this building; for the SIDONIANS understand it much better than we do. As for the workmens reward, or wages, whatever you think reasonable, shall be punctually paid them.

HIRAM was much pleased with Solomon's letter, and returned him the following answer.

<sup>c</sup> DIOD. SIC. ibid.    <sup>d</sup> PLUTARCH de fortuna Alexandri.    <sup>e</sup> CURTIUS, l. 4.    <sup>f</sup> JUSTIN l. 11.    <sup>g</sup> JOSEPH. contra APION. l. 1.    <sup>h</sup> Idem ibid.    <sup>i</sup> THEOPHIL. ANTIOCEN. l. 3.    <sup>j</sup> Psal. lxxxiii. 7.    <sup>k</sup> Eccles. xlv. 18.    <sup>l</sup> 2 Sam. v. 11. and 1 Chron. xiv. 1.    <sup>m</sup> 1 Kings v. 1.    <sup>n</sup> Antiq. l. viii. c. 2.

King HIRAM to King SOLOMON.

2

NOTHING could have been more welcome to me, than to understand that the government of your blessed father is devolved by God's providence into the hands of so excellent, so wise, and so virtuous a successor; his holy Name be praised for it! That which you write for, shall be done with all care and good will: for I will give order to go down and export such quantities of the fairest cedars, and cypress trees, as you shall have occasion for. My people shall bring them to the sea-side for you, and from thence ship them away to what part you please, where they may lie ready for your own men to transport them to Jerusalem. It would be a great obligation, after all this, to allow us such a provision of corn in exchange, as may stand with your convenience, for that is the commodity we islanders b want most<sup>e</sup>.

JOSEPHUS assures us, that the originals of these letters were extant in his time, both in the Jewish and Tyrian records (B)<sup>a</sup>. And they are entirely agreeable with what is delivered in scripture upon the same subject<sup>1</sup>. Solomon was highly pleased with Hiram's answer, and in return for his generous offers, ordered him a yearly present of twenty thousand measures of wheat, and twenty measures of pure oil<sup>2</sup>. Besides the cedar-wood, and other materials for building of the temple, Hiram sent to Solomon a man, who was very famous in Tyre for working in gold, silver, and other metals, to assist and direct him in that great undertaking<sup>3</sup>. Neither did Hiram's friendship and kindness towards Solomon stop here; for he not only furnished him with the choicest wood from mount Libanus, and able architects and workmen, but moreover advanced him 120 talents of gold for the finishing of the fabric<sup>4</sup>. Neither was Solomon behind hand with him in his acknowledgments and presents; for besides the yearly supply of wheat and oil above-mentioned, he bestowed upon him twenty cities in the land of Galilee<sup>5</sup>, not far from Tyre; which Hiram upon a view of them (they not being much to his liking) fairly declined, with a respectful excuse to Solomon. From this refusal, that part of the country was called Cabul, that is, according to Josephus, displeasing<sup>6</sup>.

HIRAM proved no less serviceable to Solomon in the building of his fleet, than d in perfecting the grand work of the temple. For he no sooner heard that Solomon designed to build a fleet at Eloth and Ezion-geber, two sea-port towns on the red-sea, in order to carry on a trade from thence to Ophir, but he generously furnished him with as many builders and shipwrights as he had occasion for: and after having thus assisted him in building, fitting, and rigging out of his navy, he sent him expert pilots, and skilful mariners, to conduct his fleets to the land of Ophir; the Tyrians being in those days, and for many ages after, the most experienced of all men in sea affairs.

DIVUS, as quoted by Josephus<sup>7</sup>, tells us, that the love of wisdom was the chief inducement to that tenderness of friendship betwixt Solomon and Hiram. He adds, e that they interchanged certain riddles to be unfolded, upon condition, that he who failed of the solution, should incur a forfeiture; and that Hiram finding the question too hard for him, paid the penalty. But that one Abdemonus, a Tyrian, resolved the said question, and proposed new ones to Solomon, upon the penalty of paying so much to Hiram, if he did not uncypher them.

THE kingdom of Tyre was in a very flourishing condition under this prince. He repaired and improved divers cities in the eastern parts of his dominions; enlarged Tyre, and, by the help of a dam, joined it to the temple of the Olympian Jupiter, which stood in an island. In this temple he dedicated a golden pillar to Jupiter. He built two temples, one to Hercules, another to Asarte, and beautified them with f rich donatives. To Hercules he also erected a statue, and is said to have repaired the temples of other gods, and to have enriched them with offerings to a very great value<sup>8</sup>. Hiram it seems, was rather a religious, than a warlike prince; for the only military expedition we read of, during his reign, is that which he undertook against <sup>a</sup> JOSEPH. ubi sup. <sup>b</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>c</sup> 1 Kings v. 2. & seq. <sup>d</sup> 1 Kings v. 11. <sup>e</sup> 1 Chron. ii. 13. <sup>f</sup> 1 Kings ix. 14. <sup>g</sup> Ibid. ver. 11. & JOSEPH. ubi sup. <sup>h</sup> 1 Kings ix. 13. & JOSEPH. ubi sup. <sup>i</sup> 1 Kings ix. 27. and 2 Chron. viii. 18. & JOSEPH. ubi sup. <sup>j</sup> JOSEPH. ubi sup. & l. 1. contra APION. <sup>k</sup> MENAND. EPHES. & DIVUS apud JOSEPH. ubi sup.

(B) But it is pretty odd, that Eusebius (1), who calls this king Suron, should give us this letter with so much variation from Josephus as he does. He therein specifies, that he had sent to Solomon eighty thousand Phœnicians and Tyrians. — That the architect he sent him was a Tyrian by birth; but that by the mother's side he was descended of the tribe of David, and the like.

a the Eyceans, who refused to pay him a certain tribute that was due to him; and were reduced by him shortly after.

It is related by Tatian, from Theodotus, Hyscrates, and Mochus, three Phœnician historians, that king Hiram gave his daughter in marriage to Solomon: he adds, that by her Solomon was induced to worship Astartoth, the goddess of the Sidonians *. Hiram lived fifty-three years, and reigned thirty four †.

He was succeeded by his son Baleazar, Baleastartus, or Bazor, as Baleazar. Theophilus calls him, who reigned seven years, according to Josephus, and seventeen according to Theophilus, and died in the forty third year of his age ‡.

Abdastartus, the son of Baleazar, succeeded his father, and died, accord- Abdastartus.
ing to Josephus, in the twentieth year of his life, and the ninth of his reign. Theophilus says, he died at the age of fifty-four, after having reigned twelve years. This prince was murdered by his nurse's four sons, and the eldest of them usurped the kingdom, and governed twelve years.

Astartus, the brother of Abdastartus, recovered the throne to his family, lived Astartus. sixty six years, and reigned twelve.

After him, came his brother Astarimus, who lived, if we believe Josephus, Astarimus, fifty four years, and reigned twelve. Theophilus calls him Albarymus, and says, that he lived fifty eight years. He was murdered by his brother Phelles, who took the government upon him in the fiftieth year of his age.

c Phelles, or, as Theophilus calls him, Helles, did not long enjoy the throne Phelles. he had wrested to himself by so base and wicked an act, being murdered in the eighth month of his reign by Ithobal, whom Theophilus names Jubobal, son to Astarimus, and chief priest of Ithobal. the goddess Astarte; which dignity was next to that of the king. Ithobal lived to the age of sixty eight years, and ruled thirty two, says Josephus: but if we credit Theophilus, he lived but forty years, and reigned but twelve. He is called in scripture Eib-baal, and stiled king of the Sidonians *. Josephus gives him the title of king of Tyre and Sidon †. Whence it is plain, that in Eib-baal's time, Sidon was subject to Tyre. When that subjection began is uncertain, for even in king Hiram's time, the d Tyrians were, in all probability, masters of Sidon; since Solomon, in the beginning of his reign, applied himself to Hiram for workmen of Sidon, who were famous for their skill in hewing of timber ‡. Ithobal built Botrys in Phœnice, and Auzzates in Afric *. Jezebel, king Abab's wife (whom we shall have occasion to mention hereafter) was daughter to this prince. Menander, as quoted by Josephus, tells us, that in the time of ETH-BAAL king of Tyre, there was an extreme drought for want of rain, which lasted from the month Hyperberetæus, till the same month next year. There were prayers indeed, says he, put up for the averting of the judgment, which were followed with mighty claps of thunder †. This was undoubtedly the drought under Abab, for it was in his reign that Eib-baal was king of Tyre.

e After him, his son Badezor (who is called by Theophilus, Bazor) reigned, ac- Badezor.
cording to Josephus, six years, and lived forty-five. Theophilus says he reigned seven.

His son Mettinus succeeded him, and reigned nine years, says Josephus, twenty- Mettinus.
nine, says Theophilus. He died in the thirty second year of his age, leaving behind him two sons, Pygmalion and Barca, and as many daughters, Elisa and Anna.

Pygmalion ascended the throne on the death of his father Mettinus, being at Pygmalion. that time, as we are told by Justin ‡, very young; that is, sixteen, according to the computation of Josephus, who supposes him to have lived fifty-six years, and reigned forty †. It was in the seventh year of his reign that his sister Elisa, called also Dido, flying from Tyre, built Carthage in Afric. The occasion of her flight is commonly related thus. Pygmalion coveting the immense riches of his uncle Sichæus, who was a priest of Hercules, and had married his sister Elisa, determined by some means or other to make them his own. But as that could not be effected so long as Sichæus was alive, he invited him one day to hunt with him, and while those who attended him were engaged in the pursuit of a wild boar, ran him through with his spear; and then throwing him down a precipice, gave out, that the fall had been the occasion of his death. Justin and Virgil say, that Pygmalion barbarously murdered his uncle at the altar *. But however that be, he reaped no fruit from his wicked attempt, being disappointed, when he least expected it, by the prudent and artful conduct of his sister Elisa; who, as she was a woman of great sagacity and penetration, well knew what had prompted him to the murder of her husband; but at the same time concealing her thoughts with an artful dissimulation, shewed the same kindness and esteem for him, as though she had not entertained the least suspicion of him. In the mean while, having formed a design of leaving Tyre, and saving both herself and the treasures of her deceased husband, from the cruel avarice of Pygmalion; under pretence of retiring to Charta or Chartaca, a small city between Sidon and Tyre, as if to live there with her brother Barca, she desired the king to furnish her with men and ships to convey thither her effects. The covetous prince looked upon this as a fair opportunity of seizing at last what he had for so long a time so earnestly desired, though always in vain: because Sichæus, who was thoroughly acquainted with his nephew's avaricious temper, had taken care to conceal his riches under ground. With this view Pygmalion willingly granted Elisa her demands; which he soon repented; for as she was assisted by her brother Barca, and several senators, who were privy to her true design, and engaged to follow her at all adventures; her treasures were put on ship-board, and the fleet out of sight, before Pygmalion was apprised of her resolution. We are told, that seeing himself thus deluded by a woman, and the vast riches which he deemed already secured in his own coffers, snatched, by such a cunning device, out of his hands, he ordered a fleet to be fitted out with all possible expedition, in order to pursue the fugitives; but was prevented by the tears of his mother, and the threats of an oracle. The first place our adventurers put into was the isle of Cyprus, from whence they carried off a great number of young women, a commodity they wanted most of all, since their design was to plant a new colony. From Cyprus they steered their course for the coasts of Afric, where they put an end to their voyage; and being kindly entertained by the inhabitants of Utica, a Tyrian colony, laid the foundations of Carthage; a city, which, in after-ages, became so powerful both by sea and land, as to contend with Rome for the empire of the world. From Barca sprang the illustrious family of the Barcæ in Afric, which produced many celebrated heroes, and among others, the great Hannibal. But of the Carthaginian affairs hereafter: Let us now return to Phœnice. Pygmalion is said by Stephanus to have built the city of Carpesia in the island of Cyprus. He sent to the temple of Hercules, standing in the island of Gades, a rich donative, being the figure of an olive-tree of massive gold, and of most exquisite and curious workmanship; its berries, which were of emerald, bearing a wonderful resemblance with the natural fruit of that tree.

* TATIAN. orat. contra Græcos. † THEOPH. ANTIOCH. l. 3. ‡ JOSEPH. lib. 1. contra APION. JOSEPH. & THEOPH. ubi supr. § 1 Kings xvi. 31. ¶ JOSEPH. Antiq. l. 8. c. 7. & l. 9. c. 6. † 1 Kings v. 6. * MENAND. EPHES. apud JOSEPH. Antiq. l. 8. c. 7. ‡ Idem ubi supr. § JUSTIN l. 18. ¶ JOSEPH. contra AP. l. 1. † JUSTIN l. 11. Virg. 1. Æneid. artful

Elulæus

THE next king of Tyre we find mentioned in history, is ELULÆUS, who reigned in the time of Sbalmaneser king of Affyria. This prince, seeing the Philistines brought low by the war which Hezekiab had made upon them, laid hold of that opportunity to reduce Gath, which had some time before revolted from the Tyrians. Whereupon the Gittites applying themselves to Sbalmaneser, engaged him in their cause, so that he marched at the head of a powerful army into Phœnice; but upon the conclusion of a peace between him and Elulæus, he withdrew his troops, and retired. Not long after, Sidon, Arce, Pala-Tyras, and several other maritime towns of Phœnice, revolting from the Tyrians, proclaimed Sbalmaneser their king. Upon this, a new war being kindled between the Tyrians and Affyrians, Sbalmaneser, who could not brook to see that the Tyrians should be the only people in Phœnice that disputed his power and authority, resolved to use his utmost endeavours towards the reducing of their city: and therefore, besides his land forces, he ordered a fleet of sixty sail to be fitted out against them. But the fleet was encountered and dispersed by the Tyrians with only twelve vessels, and five hundred of the rowers were taken prisoners. This victory gained the Tyrians such a reputation for naval affairs, that Sbalmaneser, dreading to engage them a second time at sea, turned the war into a siege, and leaving the army to block up the city, returned into Affyria. The forces he left behind him reduced the place to great straits, by stopping the aqueducts, placing guards by the springs, and cutting off all the conveyances of water. However, by digging of wells within the city, they found some relief in their distress, which enabled them to hold out for the space of five years; at the end of which, Sbalmaneser dying, the siege was raised. Elulæus reigned thirty years.

Year of the
Flood, 2282.
Year before
Christ, 717.

Ithobal II.

ITHOBAL II. reigned in the time of Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, who laid siege to the city of Tyre, which kept that mighty monarch, that king of kings, as

<sup>c</sup> JUSTIN I. 18. EUSTATH. in DIONYS. VELLEIUS, vol. 2. OROSIUS I. 4. c. 2. APPIANUS de Bell. Pun. Liv. decad. 4. l. 4. SERVIUS in 4. Æneid. VIRO. Æneid. JOSEPH. ubi supra, &c. & PHILOSTRAT. in vita APOLLON. l. 5. c. 1. <sup>b</sup> JOSEPH. Antiquit. l. 9. c. 14.

- a the prophet Ezekiel styles him <sup>1</sup>, employed for thirteen years together <sup>2</sup>: such was the power of the Tyrians at that time. We have the description of the siege in Ezekiel <sup>3</sup>, who mentions a fort raised against the place, a mount cast up, and engines of war erected to batter down its walls. At last Nebuchadnezzar, after a siege of thirteen years continuance, made himself master of the city; but as most part of the citizens had retired with all their effects elsewhere before he entered the city, he had nothing but an empty town for his pains, as is plain from the scripture, where it is said, Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon caused his army to serve a great service against Tyre—yet had he no wages, nor his army, for Tyre. Therefore finding himself thus disappointed, he vented his rage upon the buildings, and the few inhabitants who were left, rasing the town to the ground, and putting all he found in it to the sword. To this deplorable condition was Tyre reduced by the Babylonians, and the severe prophecies, foretelling the overthrow of that city, plainly fulfilled <sup>4</sup>. Ithobal, in whose reign happened the destruction of Tyre, was, according to the character the prophet gives him <sup>5</sup>, a most proud, arrogant, and assuming prince; pretended to know all secrets, to be wise as Daniel, and even went so far as to rank himself among the gods; which brought that heavy judgment upon him, because thou hast set thine heart as the heart of God; behold therefore, I will bring strangers upon thee—they shall bring thee down to the pit, and thou shalt die the death of them that are slain in the midst of the seas <sup>6</sup>. From whence we may conclude, that in this war he was slain by the Assyrians.
- c As it is plain from scripture that Nebuchadnezzar utterly destroyed the city of Tyre, which he found empty; and as, on the other hand, we are told by the Phœnician historians, that Ithobal was succeeded in the kingdom of Tyre by Baal, and Baal by several temporary magistrates, it is very probable that the inhabitants of Tyre retreated with their effects, before Nebuchadnezzar got possession of the city, to an island about half a mile distant from the shore, where they built themselves a new city; which, after the destruction of the old town, submitted to Nebuchadnezzar, who thereupon appointed Baal to be king under himself; but upon Baal's death, Baal in order to make the government more dependent on the Assyrians, changed the royal dignity into that of temporary magistrates, called Suffetes (C), or Judges, a name well known amongst the Carthaginians, who were originally Tyrians, and whose chief magistrates were called Suffetes <sup>7</sup>.

Year of the
Flood, 2414.
Year before
Christ, 385.

Year of the
Flood, 2427.
Year before
Christ, 372.

- Baal* reigned ten years, and upon his death the following judges had the govern-<sup>Tyre govern-</sup>ment of the city, viz. Ecnibal, the son of Basbech, two months; Chelbes, the son of Abdeus, ten months; the high-priest Abbar, three months; Mytgonus, or Myttonus, and Gerastus, the sons of Abdelimus, six years. After Tyre had been thus governed for some years by judges, the royal dignity was restored, and Balator created king; but both he and his successors were entirely dependant on, and tributaries to the Assyrians, for the space of seventy years; which being expired, they recovered, according to the prophecy of Isaiab <sup>8</sup>, their ancient liberty and former privileges, of which in its proper place. Balator reigned but one year.
- e UPON his death the Tyrians invited Merbai from Babylon, who reigned four years. Merbai was succeeded by his brother Irom, who reigned twenty years. In the fourteenth year of Irom's reign, Cyrus, according to the Phœnician annals, made himself master of the Persian empire <sup>9</sup>.

AFTER Merbai reigned Mapen the son of Siren. He served in Xerxes's navy against the Greeks, and, with the other commanders, advised him to engage the Grecian fleet at Salamis <sup>10</sup>. The Tyrians, as well as the other Phœnicians, were, at this time, as may be gathered from Herodotus <sup>11</sup>, tributaries to the Persians, though under a king of their own; being greatly favoured by the Persian monarchs, in consideration of the services they rendered them in their naval expeditions.

ABOUT this time reigned Strato, whose accession to the throne is related by Strato. Justin thus. The slaves, who were then very numerous at Tyre, having formed a conspiracy against their masters, murdered them all in one night (except Strato, whom his slave secretly saved) and, taking possession of the city, married their mistresses, and put all the others to the sword who were not of their own race. Having thus, not <sup>a</sup> only recovered their liberty, but made themselves absolute lords of the state, they resolve to create a king out of their own body, and unanimously agree, that he should be raised to that dignity, as being the most acceptable to the gods, who the next morning should first see the rising sun. In pursuance of this resolution and agreement, they appointed to meet about mid-night in an open field, lying on the eastside of the city, and there, with one accord, bestow the crown upon the person to whom the sun should shew himself first. In the mean time, Strato's slave having imparted the whole matter to his master, whom he kept carefully concealed, was by him instructed to turn himself, not to the east, as the others would probably do; but to the west, and there keep his eyes fixed on the top of the <sup>b</sup> highest tower of the city. The slave obeyed his master's directions, and was therefore looked upon by the whole multitude as no better than a mad-man; it seeming to them very strange, that a man should look for the rising sun in the west. But they were soon made sensible of their error; for while the others stood gazing towards the east, in expectation of seeing the sun appear, Strato's slave shewed them the high edifices of the city already illuminated with his rays: whereupon he was highly applauded by his companions, and eagerly pressed to name the person to whom he was indebted for such a wise thought; which they could not ascribe to him, or any other slave. He refused at first to gratify their curiosity; but at last, upon promise of impunity for himself and the person he should name, he owned <sup>c</sup> that out of compassion and gratitude towards his master, who had always treated him with great humanity and kindness, he had saved both him and his son in the common massacre, and acted in the affair they were so inquisitive about, according to his directions. The multitude hearing this, not only pardoned the slave, but looking upon the master as one preserved by a particular providence of the gods, immediately proclaimed him their king <sup>d</sup>. This is all we know of Strato.

<sup>1</sup> Ezek. xxvi. 7. <sup>2</sup> PHILOSTRATUS apud JOSEPH. Antiq. l. 10. c. 11. <sup>3</sup> Ezek. xxvi. 8. & seq. <sup>4</sup> Jerem. xxv. 22. xxvii. 3. xlvii. 4. Ezek. xxvi. 3. Amos ii. 9, 10. Joel iii. 4. <sup>5</sup> Ezek. xxviii. 3, 4. <sup>6</sup> Idem ibid. ver. 6, 7, 8. <sup>7</sup> Liv. l. 18, 30. & 34. <sup>8</sup> Isai. xxiii. 15, 17. <sup>9</sup> JOSEPH. l. 1. contra APION. <sup>10</sup> HEROD. l. 8. <sup>11</sup> Idem l. 3.

<sup>12</sup> (C) Suffetes—had its derivation from the Hebrew word Shophetim, i. e. Judges; which was the very name whereby the chief governors of Israel were called for several generations, before they had kings (1).

Azelmic.

UPON his death, his son was placed on the throne; and the kingdom of Tyre was enjoyed by his descendants*, among whom, the only one we find mentioned in history is AZELMIC, in whose reign happened the memorable siege and reduction of that city by Alexander the Great†. We may judge of its flourishing condition at that <sup>d</sup> time, from the stand it made against that victorious prince, since it stopped the course of his whole army full seven months. As the conqueror approached the territories of Tyre, the Tyrians sent out ambassadors to meet him (amongst whom was the king's own son) with presents for himself, and provisions for his army: but when he desired to enter the city under pretence of offering sacrifice to Hercules, they refused him admittance; which provoked Alexander, now flushed with so many victories, to such a degree, that he resolved to storm the city, and enter it by force. On the other hand, the Tyrians, not at all terrified by Alexander's threats, determined to stand it out to the last. What encouraged them to this resolution was the strength of the place, and the confidence they had in the Carthaginians, their allies. <sup>e</sup> The city then stood on an island half a mile distant from the shore; was surrounded with a strong wall 150 foot high, and was stored with great plenty of provisions, and all sorts of warlike machines: besides, the Carthaginians who were a powerful state, and then masters of the seas, had promised to send them succours during the war. What animated the Tyrians to stand a siege, gave Alexander no small uneasiness in the undertaking and carrying it on. For he could no otherwise make his approaches to it, than by carrying a mole or causeway from the continent to the island on which the city stood. This grand work he undertook, and as he was resolved at any rate to reduce the city, he accomplished it at last, maugre the innumerable, and almost insurmountable difficulties he met with in so bold an attempt. He was <sup>f</sup> assisted in raising the mole (which was two hundred feet in breadth) by the inhabitants of the neighbouring cities, who were all called in on this occasion; and supplied him with stones from the ruins of old Tyre, and with timber from mount Libanus. The Tyrians at first looked upon this undertaking as a rash and desperate attempt, which could never be attended with any success: and therefore, from their ships, laughing at the king, asked him whether he believed himself to be greater than Nephtune? But seeing the mole, contrary to their expectation, beginning to appear above water, they resolved, for fear of the worst, to send their wives and children, and such as were not fit for service, to Carthage; but were prevented by the arrival of Alexander's fleet from Cyprus. Neither could the Carthaginians assist them with <sup>g</sup>

Year of the
Flood, 2667.
Year before
Christ, 332.

* JUSTIN. l. 18. c. 3.

* Idem ibid.

† ALEXANDER.

a the promised succours, being detained at home by domestick troubles. However; the Tyrians fainted not in the resolution of standing to their defence; first from their ships, and afterwards, as the mole was brought nearer the city, from the walls, with showers of arrows, darts, stones, &c. wherewith they made a most dreadful havock of the Macedonians, who were employed in the work, and exposed without any defence. But what most of all disheartened the Macedonians, was a violent storm, which arising all on a sudden, carried away, in great part, the causeway, after it had been, with unwearied labour and great loss of men, brought near the walls of the city. This unlucky accident perplexed Alexander to such a degree, that he began to repent he had undertaken the siege, and would have sent ambassadors to the Tyrians with terms of b peace, had he believed they would have hearkened to them. But as they had thrown head-long into the sea, the ambassadors, who before the siege had, in his name, summoned them to surrender; he was afraid those he should send now, might meet with such like, or more severe treatment. Being therefore diverted, by this apprehension, from all thoughts of making up matters, by way of treaty, and fully apprised that his reputation, and the future progress of his arms, entirely depended on the success of the present undertaking, he re-assumed the work with seeming cheerfulness, repaired, with incredible expedition, the breach which the sea had made in the mole, and having brought it again almost home to the city, began to batter it with all sorts of warlike engines: while the archers and slingers harassed, without interruption, those who defended it, in order to drive them from their posts. But the Tyrians
c stood their ground, and by means of a new contrivance of wheels with many spokes, which being whirled about with an engine, either shattered in pieces the enemy's darts and arrows, or broke their force, covered themselves against the aggressors, and killed great numbers of them, without suffering any considerable loss on their own side. But in the mean time, the wall began to yield to the violence of the rains that battered it night and day without interruption. Whereupon the besieged, setting all hands to work, raised, in a very short time, a new wall, ten cubits broad, and five cubits distant from the former; and by filling up the empty space between the two walls with earth and stones, kept the Macedonians a long while employed, ere they could make, with all their engines, the least impression on this new d piece of fortification. However, Alexander, having joined many of his ships together, and mounted upon them a vast number of battering engines, besides those he had already placed on the mole, succeeded at last in the attempt, and made a breach an hundred feet wide. But when he came to the assault, in hopes of breaking into the city over the ruins, the Macedonians, though encouraged with the presence of their king, were forced to give ground, and retire with great loss to their ships. Alexander designed to renew the attack next morning; but the breach having been repaired by the Tyrians, during the night, he perceived himself no further advanced than when he first began to batter the walls. Hereupon the Macedonian resolved to change his measures, and having first of all brought the mole home to the wall, e caused several towers to be built equal in height to the battlements. These towers he filled with the most brave and resolute men of his army; who, pursuant to his directions, having formed a bridge, with large planks, resting with one end on the towers, and with the other on the top of the ramparts, endeavoured, sword in hand, to gain the wall, but could not prevail, being opposed by the Tyrians with unparalleled bravery, and the invention of some kinds of weapons, unknown to the Macedonians. One was a three-forked hook, fastened with a cord (one end whereof they held themselves) which being thrown at a little distance, stuck in the enemy's targets, and gave the Tyrians an opportunity, either of plucking their targets out of their hands, and by that means exposing them, without defence, to showers f of darts and arrows: or, if they were unwilling to part with their shields, of pulling them headlong down from the towers. Some, by throwing a kind of fishing nets upon the Macedonians that were engaged on the bridges, did so entangle their hands, that they could neither defend themselves, nor offend the enemy. Others, with long poles armed with iron hooks, drew them off of the bridges, and dashed their brains out against the wall, or on the causeway. In the mean time, a great many engines placed on the walls, played incessantly upon the aggressors, with massy pieces of red-hot iron, which swept away entire ranks at once. But what most of all disheartened the Macedonians in the attack, and forced them at last to give it over, was the scorching sand which the Tyrians, by a new contrivance, showered upon them. For this sand (which was thrown in red-hot shields of iron, of g brass) getting within their breast-plates, and coats of mail, tormented them to such

such a degree, that many, finding no other relief, threw themselves headlong into a the sea; and others dying in the anguish of inexpressible torments, struck, with their desperate cries, a terror into all those who heard them. This occasioned unspeakable confusion among the besiegers; which gave new courage to the Tyrians, who now leaving the walls, charged the enemy hand to hand, on his own bridges, with such resolution, that Alexander, seeing his men give ground, thought fit to sound a retreat, and by that means save, in some degree, the reputation of his Macedonians. Such desperate attacks were frequently renewed by the aggressors, and always sustained with the same unbroken and undaunted courage by the besieged. And now Alexander began to entertain some thoughts of abandoning the enterprize, and continuing his march into Egypt: but again, considering the dangerous consequences that must unavoidably attend such a resolution, he determined to go on with the siege at all adventures; though, of all his captains, none was found but Amyntas who approved of that determination. Having therefore exhorted the disheartened Macedonians to stand by him, and infused into them all the courage he could, he surrounded the city with his fleet, and began to batter it on all sides. In the mean time, a fancy taking the Tyrians, upon a dream some of them had, that Apollo designed to forsake them, and go over to Alexander, they fastened his statue with golden chains to the altar of Hercules (D). This statue, or colossus (for it was of an extraordinary size) belonged formerly to the city of Gela in Sicily, and had been sent from thence by the Cartaginians, when they took Gela, to Tyre their mother city<sup>a</sup>. In this Apollo the Tyrians greatly confided; and therefore, upon the rumour that he was to abandon them, had recourse even to chains, in order to prevent his departure. But their utter ruin being already decreed by the true God, and foretold by his prophets<sup>a</sup>, the confidence they placed in their idols could not avert the impending judgment. They were destined to destruction; and destruction was their fate: for Alexander having at last battered down the walls, and taken the town by storm, after seven months siege, fully executed the sentence which the Tyrians had, by their pride and other vices, drawn down upon themselves and their country. The city was burnt down to the ground, and the inhabitants (excepting those whom the Sidonians secretly conveyed away in their ships) were either destroyed or enslaved by d the conqueror; who, upon his first entering the city, put eight thousand to the sword, caused two thousand of the nobler sort of prisoners to be crucified, and sold the rest, to the number of thirty thousand, says Arrian, for slaves. His cruelty towards the two thousand that were crucified, was highly unbecoming a generous conqueror. Alexander treated them thus for no other reason, than because they had fought with such bravery and resolution in defence of their country. But to palliate the true cause of so base an action, he gave out, that he did it to revenge, upon the present Tyrians, the crime which their fore-fathers committed, when they murdered their masters, as we have related above; and that being slaves by origin, crucifixion was the punishment due to them. To make this look the more plausible, he e saved all the descendants of Strato, as not being involved in that guilt; and among them king Azelmic, who, in the beginning of the siege, was out with his fleet upon a naval expedition, in conjunction with Autophradates, the Persian admiral; but had hastened home, as soon as he was acquainted with the danger of his country. After the city was taken, he took sanctuary in the temple of Hercules; and was not only spared by the conqueror, but restored to the throne after Alexander had re-peopled the place. For having thus cleared it of its former inhabitants, he planted it anew, with colonies drawn from the neighbouring places, and thenceforth stiled himself the founder of Tyre, a city which he had most ungenerously destroyed. Upon taking the city, he unchained Apollo, returning him thanks for his intention f of coming over to the Macedonians; offered sacrifice to Hercules, and, after performing many other superstitious follies, continued his march into Egypt<sup>b</sup>.

How MARION came to be made king of Tyre, and defeated by Herod the Great, will be more regularly told hereafter.

<sup>a</sup> DIOD. SIC. l. 13. <sup>a</sup> Isa. xxiii. Ezek. xxvi, xxvii, xxviii. <sup>b</sup> DIOD. SIC. l. 17. PLUTARCH in Alexand. Q. CURTIUS l. 4. ARRIAN. l. 2. JUSTIN l. 11. JOSEPH. Antiq. l. 11. c. 8.

(D) We have already (2) seen that there were only altars erected to Hercules, and these only to the Egyptian, in his temple at Gades; but since we find (3) that Hiram erected a statue to Hercules

at Tyre, we may infer, that he was either worshipped with other rites here, than in his temple at Gades, or that the ancient form of worship was corrupted. This we promised (4) to take notice of.

(2) See before in the notes, p. 400. (Q.). (3) See before, p. 414. (4) See before, p. 400. (Q.).

NICE, according to this History.

such a degree, that many, finding no other relief, threw themselves headlong into a the sea; and others dying in the anguish of inexpressible torments, struck, with their desperate cries, a terror into all those who heard them. This occasioned unspeakable confusion among the besiegers; which gave new courage to the Tyrians, who now leaving the walls, charged the enemy hand to hand, on his own bridges, with such resolution, that Alexander, seeing his men give ground, thought fit to sound a retreat, and by that means save, in some degree, the reputation of his Macedonians. Such desperate attacks were frequently renewed by the aggressors, and always sustained with the same unbroken and undaunted courage by the besieged. And now Alexander began to entertain some thoughts of abandoning the enterprize, and continuing his march into Egypt: but again, considering the dangerous consequences that must unavoidably attend such a resolution, he determined to go on with the siege at all adventures; though, of all his captains, none was found but Amynas who approved of that determination. Having therefore exhorted the disheartened Macedonians to stand by him, and infused into them all the courage he could, he surrounded the city with his fleet, and began to batter it on all sides. In the mean time, a fancy taking the Tyrians, upon a dream some of them had, that Apollo designed to forsake them, and go over to Alexander, they fastened his statue with golden chains to the altar of Hercules (D). This statue, or colossus (for it was of an extraordinary size) belonged formerly to the city of Gela in Sicily, and had been sent from thence by the Carthaginians, when they took Gela, to Tyre their mother city<sup>a</sup>. In this Apollo the Tyrians greatly confided; and therefore, upon the rumour that he was to abandon them, had recourse even to chains, in order to prevent his departure. But their utter ruin being already decreed by the true God, and foretold by his prophets<sup>b</sup>, the confidence they placed in their idols could not avert the impending judgment. They were destined to destruction; and destruction was their fate: for Alexander having at last battered down the walls, and taken the town by storm, after seven months siege, fully executed the sentence which the Tyrians had, by their pride and other vices, drawn down upon themselves and their country. The city was burnt down to the ground, and the inhabitants (excepting those whom the Sidonians secretly conveyed away in their ships) were either destroyed or enslaved by d the conqueror; who, upon his first entering the city, put eight thousand to the sword, caused two thousand of the nobler sort of prisoners to be crucified, and sold the rest, to the number of thirty thousand, says Arrian, for slaves. His cruelty towards the two thousand that were crucified, was highly unbecoming a generous conqueror. Alexander treated them thus for no other reason, than because they had fought with such bravery and resolution in defence of their country. But to palliate the true cause of so base an action, he gave out, that he did it to revenge, upon the present Tyrians, the crime which their fore-fathers committed, when they murdered their masters, as we have related above; and that being slaves by origin, crucifixion was the punishment due to them. To make this look the more plausible, he e saved all the descendants of Strato, as not being involved in that guilt; and among them king Azelmic, who, in the beginning of the siege, was out with his fleet upon a naval expedition, in conjunction with Autophradates, the Persian admiral; but had hastened home, as soon as he was acquainted with the danger of his country. After the city was taken, he took sanctuary in the temple of Hercules; and was not only spared by the conqueror, but restored to the throne after Alexander had re-peopled the place. For having thus cleared it of its former inhabitants, he planted it anew, with colonies drawn from the neighbouring places, and thenceforth stiled himself the founder of Tyre, a city which he had most ungenerously destroyed. Upon taking the city, he unchained Apollo, returning him thanks for his intention f of coming over to the Macedonians; offered sacrifice to Hercules, and, after performing many other superstitious follies, continued his march into Egypt<sup>b</sup>.

How MARION came to be made king of Tyre, and defeated by Herod the Great, will be more regularly told hereafter.

<sup>a</sup> DIOD. SIC. l. 13. <sup>b</sup> Isa. xxiii. Ezek. xxvi, xxvii, xxviii. <sup>c</sup> DIOD. SIC. l. 17. PLUTARCH in Alexand. Q. CURTIUS l. 4. ARRIAN. l. 2. JUSTIN l. 11. JOSEPH. Antiq. l. 11. c. 8.

(D) We have already (2) seen that there were only altars erected to Hercules, and these only to the Egyptian, in his temple at Gades; but since we find (3) that Hiram erected a statue to Hercules at Tyre, we may infer, that he was either worshipped with other rites here, than in his temple at Gades, or that the ancient form of worship was corrupted. This we promised (4) to take notice of.

(2) See before in the notes, p. 400. (Q). (3) See before, p. 414. (4) See before, p. 400. (Q).

NICE, according to this History.

a

The KINGS of ARAD.

BESIDES the ancient kingdom of that name, which we read of in the xxist chapter of Numbers, and concerning which we know nothing more, but that it was vowed to utter destruction by the Israelites; we find, in profane history, the names of three kings of Arad, or Aradus; namely,

ARBAL, the father of Narbal<sup>a</sup>, who accompanied Xerxes in his great expedition.

NARBAL, the son of Arbal, who served under Xerxes;<sup>b</sup> as we have said.

MANY years after this, reigned one GEROSTRATUS, who whether he descended from the two former kings or no, we have not to say. He served Darius against Alexander,<sup>c</sup> joined the Persian fleet, as other Phœnician and Cypriot princes did; till hearing his son, Strato, had put a crown of gold upon the head of Alexander, and given up to him the island city of Aradus, the city of Marathus on the main land over-against it, as also the city of Mariamnia, or Mariama, and whatever else belonged to the Aradian dominion; he thought it most for his interest to approve, seemingly at least, of what his son had done, and to make his submission to Alexander<sup>d</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> HERODOT. l. vii. c. 98.

<sup>b</sup> Id. ibid.

<sup>c</sup> ARRIAN. expedit. Alexand. magn. l. ii.

C H A P. VII.

The History of the Jews to the Babylonish Captivity.

S E C T. I.

The Jewish History, from Abraham to Moses.

c WE have, in a former chapter, brought down this history from the deluge to the birth of Abraham†, and given the genealogy of that patriarch from Shem, the eldest son of Noah, in a lineal descent of ten generations*; concerning which, the sacred historian has scarce given us any other particulars, than their successions and duration. And if we find him more copious in his account, either of that father of the faithful, or of his descendants, it was, doubtless, to inspire the Israelites with a firm persuasion of the certainty of God's promises, so oft repeated to him, that his seed should, in due time, possess the land of Canaan. To the same end he reminds them, that they had been made to him above four hundred years before; during which time, both he and his posterity had been led d through many trials and difficulties, from their departure out of Chaldea, to their signal deliverance out of their Egyptian bondage; where, in spite of all their slavery and oppression, they were so wonderfully increased, as to be now more than sufficient to achieve the conquest of that fruitful land. So that if God's promises were not executed with a speed equal to their sanguine desires, if the country to which they were now going was to be possessed but by slow degrees, they should wait with patience, and take special care not to provoke him by their ungrateful mistrust, after so many wonders wrought in their favour, to put off the accomplishment of them till a more hopeful generation sprang up<sup>a</sup>, but still act like men fully assured of his assistance and protection. This was, doubtless, the reason why Moses gave them a fuller history of Abraham, and his posterity, than he had done of his progenitors. In conformity to which method, we shall begin ours with that patriarch, the father and founder of the Jewish nation (A).

The design of the Book of Genesis.

† Chap. II. p. 110, & seq.

* Ibid. p. 116, & seq.

<sup>a</sup> Exod. xvii. 2, 7. Numb. xiv. 28.

(A) We have ventured to call them by that name in compliance with custom, though it was not given them till after the Babylonish captivity, when the tribe of Judah became the most considerable, if not almost the whole of what was left of Israel. The first name that was given to Abraham and his children, was that of Hebrews, which some derive from Heber, the fifth in descent from Noah (1). But it is hardly probable, that Abraham would call himself by his name, rather than by that of any of his ten predecessors. We rather think, as has been hinted before, that it was given him by the Canaanites, because he came thither from the other side of the Euphrates; the word עבר Heber, signifying in the original, the other side, whether of a river, sea, or any other thing: in which sense some people are called transmarine, transalpine, and the like. What seems to confirm this etymology

(1) Gen. x. 24. D. KPMKI.

Year of the
Flood, 1977.
Year before
Christ, 1921.

Abraham's
Call.

ABRAHAM was the son of Terah, and, as we hinted above, the tenth in a lineal descent from Shem, the son of Noah, to whom the right of primogeniture belonged. <sup>b</sup> He was born in Ur of the Chaldees <sup>c</sup>, and was about seventy-four years of age when his father and he came from thence into Haran <sup>d</sup>, where they had not been seated long, before Terah died in the two hundred and fifth year of his age (B). His funeral was scarce over when Abraham, who in all likelihood designed to settle there, was commanded by God to depart thence into a land which he should show to him, and assured him that he would bless, protect, and multiply him in an extraordinary manner; and that in his seed, all the nations of the earth should be blessed <sup>e</sup>: He readily obeyed, being, doubtless, well acquainted with the call, and taking Sarah his wife, and Lot his brother's son, with all his servants and cattle, went into the land of Canaan, and pitched his tents near the city of Sichem <sup>f</sup> (C), then inhabited by the Canaanites, where he built an altar to the LORD. Here God was pleased to appear again unto him, to confirm all his former promises, and to assure him, that he would one day give that land to his posterity. Soon after this, Abraham fearing, perhaps, an inundation in that low country, betook himself to a mountain which had Bethel (D) on the west, and the town of Hai on the east, where he reared a new altar to the LORD; but a great famine, which happened soon after in those parts, forced him to remove into Egypt, which was then the only place where he might hope to find provision for his numerous family, and great multitude of cattle. However, the fear he was in upon the account of Sarah his wife, who, though she was past the sixty-fifth year of her age, retained beauty enough to endanger the man's life who should pass for her husband, made him resolve, after some hesitation, that she should pass for his sister, and not for logy is, that we don't find that he was called by that name, till word was brought him of his nephew Lot's misfortune (2); so that it is likely the messenger enquiring for Abraham, of the inhabitants, might describe him by the word יִבְרִי Yibri, or one that came from the other side of the river. However, after Jacob had received the great name of Israel, they preferred that of Israelites to that of Hebrews, though the neighbouring nations did still call them by the latter (3).

<sup>b</sup> Gen. ix. 25, & seq. Vid. sup. p. 117, & seq. <sup>c</sup> Gen. xi. 31. <sup>d</sup> Vid. pag. 132. (Y) p. 133.
<sup>e</sup> Gen. xii. 12, & seq. <sup>f</sup> Ibid. vid. pag. 283, & seq. <sup>g</sup> USHER'S ANN. p. 5. VILLET. & al.

(B) There seems to be an insurmountable difficulty in this account of Terah's age: for if he was but seventy when he begot Abraham, and died in Haran, in the two hundred and fifth year of his age; and Abraham left Haran in the seventy fifth of his; it will follow, either that Terah must have lived sixty years in Haran, whereas it doth not appear by the text, that he lived there above one or two; or that Abraham must have lived sixty years longer than the text expressly says he did. We shall not trouble the reader with the ways which some ancient fathers and Jewish rabbies have taken to solve this difficulty. Some moderns think with Willet and Tremellius, that though Terah was but seventy years old when he began to have children, yet he was near an hundred and thirty when he begot Abraham, and that those that were born before him, are purposely omitted by Moses, that Abraham might have the honour of the primogeniture for the excellency of his faith (4). Others with Calmet, choose rather to give him Adar, or Azar, for his father, and Terah for his grandfather, according to the Arabian history of that patriarch; and to fill up the chasm, suppose that Adar begot Abraham in the sixtieth year of his age (5); but besides the small reliance we can have on that history, the thing seems quite opposite to the text. Others therefore more reasonably suppose, with Norton Knatchbull (6), that there is an error crept in the original; and that

Terah was either a hundred and thirty years old when he begot Abraham, or that if he was then but seventy years old, he died in the hundred and fifty fifth year of his age; for the text says, that Abraham was seventy five years old when he left Haran, and that his father died but a little while before it.

It may not be improper to take notice here, that though Haran, the land so called, and Haran, the son of Terah, be spelt with the same letters in ours, and other versions, from which some have concluded, that the latter gave his name to the country; yet, in the original, they are differently writ; viz. the former with a ח Cheth, equivalent to the Greek χ, and might be more properly spelt Charan; whereas Terah's son's name begins only with a ה He, which answers to our (H).

(C) If we may credit Nicholas of Damascus, Abraham came with an army from Chaldea, Egypt, and reigned some time in the country of Damascus, before he went to Sichem (7), and his name was still famous there. Josephus seems to have quoted his very words, which are to this effect; Abraham, though a stranger, reigned in Damascus, whither he came with a great number of followers, from a country beyond Babylon, called Chaldea. But the people after some time conspired against him; whereupon he and his followers removed southward into Canaan, since called Judea; where he fixed his abode, and became the father of a numerous offspring. Thus far Damascen; to which Josephus adds, that Abraham's name was still to that day in great veneration in that country, and that there was still a village which bore the name of Abraham's habitation. However, it is plain that the scripture says nothing of this imaginary reign.

(D) Bethel is here called so proleptically, for it did not receive that name till some time after, as will be seen in the sequel.

(2) Gen. xiv. 32. (3) Vid. sup. p. 128, & 129, b. (4) Idem loc. VILLET. ch. li. quest. 19.
(5) CALM. hist. vi. HERBELOT. Bibliot. orient. p. 12, 13. (6) Vid. Essay on a new vers.
(7) AP. JOSEPH. l. 1. c. 8. EUSEB. prep. l. 9. c. 16.

- a his wife, in every place they came to. He proposed it to her, and having gained <sup>Goeth into</sup> her consent, he committed her honour and chastity to the care of that providence <sup>Egypt.</sup> which had hitherto protected him, and set out upon the journey. From this descent into Egypt the generality of chronologers compute the space of four hundred and thirty years mentioned by St. Paul <sup>h</sup>, agreeably to what Moses says in another place <sup>i</sup>, that Israel dwelt in Egypt four hundred and thirty years; that is, as the LXX interpret it, that from the first coming of Abraham thither to the Exodus, should be four hundred and thirty years (E). We shall have occasion to resume this point in its proper place. Abraham had not been long in Egypt before Sarah charmed the <sup>Year of the</sup> Egyptians, and in the end captivated Pharaoh himself, who upon the fame of her <sup>Flood, 1075.</sup> beauty sent for her, and became so smitten with it, that for her sake he shewed <sup>Year before</sup> extraordinary favours to her pretended brother. In a short time Abraham saw him- <sup>Christ, 1919.</sup> self possessed of vast numbers of sheep, oxen, camels, asses, men and maid-servants, besides gold, silver, and other precious things, which Pharaoh heaped upon him, though all too mean to recompence him for the loss of his wife: at length God was pleased to interpose on his behalf, and to deliver Sarah from the imminent danger she was in. Pharaoh and his house were infested with such plagues, as plainly convinced them on whose account they suffered. The king then sent for Abraham, and having sharply rebuked him for deceiving him in a matter of such consequence, delivered up his wife to him as free from any stain of disloyalty as he had received <sup>Returns to</sup> her, and without staying for an answer, went out and gave orders that they might <sup>Bethel.</sup> safely depart his dominions with all the wealth they had.

PERHAPS it may not be unacceptable to the reader to remind him, that Pharaoh was not the name of this particular king, but an appellation common to all the kings of Egypt (F). They had also other particular names, as So, Necbo, Sibthac, &c. but under which of the kings of Egypt this event happened is impossible to determine; not only because his particular name is not mentioned by Moses, but likewise by reason of the great confusion we have observed in their chronology and succession of their kings <sup>k</sup>; however, A. B. Usher ventures to call him Apophis <sup>l</sup>.

- ABRAHAM made no stay in Egypt after this; the famine being ceased in the <sup>d</sup> place which he had left, he returned thither by the same way, and on the altar he had built before, offered a sacrifice of thanks for his happy escape and safe return <sup>m</sup>. In the mean time the herds of Lot, as well as his own, being grown too numerous for the land they lived in, such contentions arose between their shepherds, that Abraham resolved in a friendly manner to separate from Lot, and having given his <sup>Separates</sup> choice of the whole country that lay before him, Lot chose the fertile plains of <sup>from Lot.</sup>

<sup>h</sup> Galat. iii. 17. <sup>i</sup> Exod. xii. 40. <sup>k</sup> Vid. pag. 228, & seq. <sup>l</sup> Annal. p. 5. <sup>m</sup> Gen. xii. pass. & xiii. iv.

(E) This account is contradicted by a learned Romish chronologer (8), who pretends that from Abraham's going into Egypt to the Exodus, there elapsed six hundred years, and that the four hundred and thirty years mentioned by St. Paul (9), have no relation to these epochs. We beg leave to show his error, by comparing the number of years from the one to the other. 1st Then, that from Abraham's arrival into Canaan, to Jacob's descent into Egypt, are but two hundred and fifteen years, is thus proved. From the time of the promise made to him in Haran, to the birth of Isaac, are about twenty-five years; thence to the birth of Jacob are sixty more, and he was an hundred and thirty years old when he stood before Pharaoh; all which make but two hundred and fifteen years. 2<sup>dly</sup>, That the Israelites sojourned but two hundred and fifteen more in Egypt, is not only generally agreed on, but shall be farther proved in its due place. Again, that by the promise mentioned by St. Paul, as made to Abraham and his seed, is not meant that which God made to him, when he was going to offer up Isaac, is plain, because there are twenty five years between the first promise and the birth of Isaac, and if we suppose him to have been twenty five years old, as Josephus thinks (10), there will be fifty years wanting of the four hundred and thirty; and if he was thirty-three, as some, or thirty-seven, as others have supposed (11), the difference will still be greater, and lengthen the space of their abode in Egypt, to fill up that of six hundred years; the contrary of which we have promised to prove hereafter.

(F) It will not be amiss, we hope, here to add something to what has been said before, concerning the name of Pharaoh (12), seeing all the etymologies of it are so very uncertain. The most probable ones are these that follow. Boschart thinks the word Pharaoh signifies properly a Crocodile (13) and that Ezekiel alludes to it in these words,—Behold I am against thee, Pharaoh, king of Egypt, the great dragon that lieth in the midst of the river (14).—Another critic fancies, that the Arabick word Pharaoh, to be raised on high, or be superior to, is the true root of the name (15). Kircher doth indeed derive the word from the same root, but will have it to signify, to deliver, or be free; and that Pharaoh signifies one who is free from, or above the laws (16). Lastly, and to name no more, the learned Renaudot thinks that Pharaoh is the same as the Egyptian Pourro, or Pouro, which signifies a king.

(8) GENEBR. chronol. 1 loc. (9) Galat. iii. 17. (10) Antiq. l. 1. c. 14. (11) BEAUSH. Rab. 1. loc. Rab. fol. 9 al. (12) Pag. 280. (13) HIEROZ. p. 2. l. 5. c. 17. (14) Ezek. xxix. 3. (15) LE CLERC in Gen. xii. (16) KIRCHER Oedip. Egypt. l. 1. c. 76. (17) RENAUDOT. Dissert. de ling. Coptica, p. 127. AP. CALM. sub voc. PHARAOH.

Sodom and Gomorrab, which he saw watered by the land of Jordan, and parted from<sup>a</sup> his uncle *. Abraham was no sooner separated from him, but God, who seems to have been the sole conductor of this scene, that the promised blessings might fall on him alone, bid him cast his eye round the horizon, and promised to give all that land he beheld, to him and his posterity. Abraham soon after left Betel, and went to dwell in the land of Moreb (G), which is in Hebron, and there built an altar unto God, and soon after contracted a friendship with three of the greatest men of that place; viz. Mamre, Aner and Eshcol; the first of whom communicated his name to all the country. This alliance proved very serviceable to Abraham in process of time, and was the cause of his living peaceably near ten years among them: but a misfortune which befel Lot about this time, who was taken captive by Cbedorlaomer b and his allies *; forced him to muster up all his forces and his courage to rescue him out of their hands. This disaster no sooner reached Abraham's ears, than he communicated the news of it to his three friends, Mamre, Aner and Eshcol. He readily obtained their assistance, and joining three hundred of his men to it, they marched in pursuit of the conquerors, and came upon them at Dan, in the night, roused and pursued them as far as Hoba, on the left of Damascus, and happily rescued Lot with all his family, servants, and cattle, and brought him back to his old habitation. The king of Sodom, who was probably the son of him who had perished in the slime-pits (H), hearing of Abraham's success, came out to congratulate him upon it, and would have offered him all the booty which he had retaken, the men and women c excepted, but the patriarch nobly refused to accept of even the least share of it. Here Melchizedec met and blessed him, and he presented that high-priest with the tythes of all the spoil * †.

Lot taken prisoner,

and rescued by Abraham.

Removes to Hebron.

AFTER this Abraham removed to Mamre, or Hebron, where God was pleased to appear to him a fifth time in a vision, to give him fresh assurances of his special favour, adding that he would be his exceeding great reward. Abraham, who had hitherto hearkened to God's promises without any expression of distrust, ventured now for the first time to expostulate with him, not knowing how they could possibly be fulfilled whilst himself continued childless, and to all appearance must leave

<sup>a</sup> Ibid. ver. 7, 8, & seq. Vid. supr. pag. 284. a. b.    * Ibid. c. xiv. pass.    * Vid. sup. ibid. <sup>b</sup> Ib. ver. 18.    † Sup. ibid. & p. 327. c. (P).

(G) It is surprizing that so many versions, such as the Chaldees, Vulgate, Geneva, Munster, Cassio, and others, should render the word עֵלֹן Elon, a plain, since it always signifies an oak. The Syriac, Arabic, and St. Jerom's among the old, besides some of the modern ones, render it by that word; and our English doth the same in some other places (18). And were it to have any other signification, that of valley would suit it much better than that of plain, because Sichem is said to be situate in the valley of Aulon, or Elon (19). As for the name of Moreb, which in the original signifies illustrious or conspicuous, it seems to have been given to the oak, not from any place near it, but rather by reason of its largeness, or the eminence of the place on which it stood; or more probably, perhaps, because it became famous upon so many accounts; such as Abraham's dwelling under it, Jacob's burying his wife, nurse, and strange gods under it. The reader may observe the same fault committed in these versions, with respect to the oak of Mamre, mentioned Gen. xviii. 1. where the word Elon is translated a plain, instead of an oak. Sozomen tells us, that this oak in Constantine's time, was famous for pilgrimages and annual feasts: That it was but six miles distant from Hebron; and that some of the cottages which Abraham built, were still standing near it; as likewise a well of his digging, where Jews, Christians, and Heathens resorted, either out of devotion, or to trade. Bochari doth further assure us, that he had seen it, and that he brought away some of the fruit and wood. He observes, that its leaves are somewhat larger than those of the mastick tree, but its fruit is like an acorn (20).

As for Hebron, it is plain, that it was a very ancient city. Some authors (21) after Josephus, think that it was built ninety years after the flood, and that it claimed the precedency even of Memphis. Some ancient rabbies make it still older, pretending that Ham built it as soon as he was settled in that country (22): However, it is certain, that it was seven years older than Zaan in Egypt (23), which is not Memphis, but Tanis, the ancient seat of the kings of Egypt (24). Hebron was afterwards called Arba (25), or Kirjath Arbah, which signifies four cities, or rather the city of Four. The ancient Jews will have it to be so called, because Adam, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob were buried there; with Eve, Sarah, Rebecca, and Leah: but it seems more probable, that it had its name from the great Arbah, the father of the Anakims (26). As to the city of Hebron, or rather Chebron, חֶבְרוֹן, it is not likely that it took its name from Hebron, the grandson of Caleb, as some authors imagine (27), but rather from the verb חָבַר Chavar, to couple or join; because those married couples, Abraham and Sarah, Isaac and Rebecca, and Jacob and Leah, are buried there (28).

(H) As the text tells us, that the kings of Sodom and Gomorrab fell into some of the slime-pits, with which the valley of Siddim abounds (29), and takm

(18) Gen. xxxv. 4. Josh. xxiv. 26. & alib. (19) Vid. EUSEB. JEROM. Onomast. in Αὐλῶν.
(20) Essay on a new translation. (21) VILLET. ch. 13. quest. 15. (22) R. SAL. & al. in Numb.
xiii. 33. (23) Chald. Paraph. LXX. & al. (24) Gen. xxiii. 2. Josh. xiv. 15. (25) Ibid.
(26) 1 Chron. ii. 42. (27) JEROM. MUSICUL. AP. VILLET. ubi supr. ORIG. AP. eund. & al.
(28) Gen. xix. 10. (29) Gen. xiv. 10.

a all his substance to Eliczer of Damascus, overseer of his household. This was indeed a modest way to try whether God designed to bless him with a child, and God did not leave him long in suspense, but assured him, that not Eliczer, but a son of his own body should be his heir; then commanding him to lift up his eyes to heaven promised to make his posterity more numerous than the stars thereof. Abraham was now eighty five years old, and Sarah turned of seventy four, was thought barren. All these had been sufficient to stagger a faith less firm than his; but the scripture says, that he believed in God, and that it was imputed unto him for righteousness<sup>r</sup>. God was pleased moreover, to repeat his former promises, that he would infallibly give that land to his posterity, assuring him that it was for that very b end that he had brought him thither, out of Chaldea. Here Abraham could not forbear desiring of God to give him some certain token whereby he might be assured that his seed should possess that land, and God was pleased to comply with his request. He bid him to take a heifer of three years, a goat of three years, and a ram of three years (I); with a pidgeon and a turtle-dove, and offer them up. Abraham immediately took them, killed the four footed beasts, clove them in the midst, and joining the pieces one to the other, laid the birds on the top of them, whilst himself stayed to drive away the fowls from the sacrifice. As soon as the sun began to set, a deep sleep fell upon him, followed by a horror of great darkness; during which, it was revealed to him from God, that his posterity should sojourn and be c afflicted in a strange land four hundred years<sup>r</sup> (K): at the expiration of which, God would punish their oppressors, and bring his children out of the land which he had promised him, whilst himself should be gathered to his fathers in a good old age. After this, Abraham saw a smoking furnace, and a burning lamp pass between the victims, which in all probability consumed them. Thus was this new and glorious covenant ratified between God and Abraham, who, highly pleased with all these promises, went to impart his joy to his beloved wife<sup>s</sup>.

SARAH not dreaming that she was to be the happy mother of the promised child, and having moreover all the convincing proofs that a woman can have of her being past all possibility of having any of her own, resolved to be at least a mother by proxy, d according to the custom of that age and country. To this end she persuaded her husband to take her hand-maid Hagar to him, that if he had a child by her, she might bring it forth upon her knees, which was all the happiness she could expect from the promise. Abraham did easily acquiesce, and Hagar no sooner found herself pregnant, than she became haughty and insolent towards her mistress. Sarah, impatient to see herself insulted by a slave, whom her kindness had raised to that height of happiness, could not forbear breaking out into bitter complaints against them both; and Abraham, willing to shew his resentment against her maid, and to convince his wife that he loved her as much as ever, left it to her, to do herself justice in what way she should think fit; which she accordingly did, but with such severity, that Hagar, not able to bear e it, stole away from her, and went and sat down by a fountain on the road to Sur, leading to Egypt. Here the angel of the Lord met her and persuaded her to return, Hagar is forced to fly from her mistress.

<sup>r</sup> Gen. xv. 12, & seq. <sup>s</sup> Ibid. ver. 6. Rom. iv. 3. & alib. <sup>t</sup> Ib. ver. 9. ad fin.

takes no notice of their coming out of them; we think it more probable that they perished there, than that Abraham stayed to take them out, as the Jews vainly imagined (30), contrary to the sense of the text (31).

(I) The word which we translate three years old, in the original, is מִשְׁלֶשֶׁת, Mesheletheth, which doth rather signify triplicated, or thrice told, being the Paul, in the conjugation Piel as the grammarians speak. Accordingly Onkelos (32) translates it three heifers, three goats, and three rams; wherein he is followed by other Jewish commentators. One of them tells us (33), that Abraham was then representing the three future sacrifices; namely, burnt-offerings, sacrifice for sin, and peace-offering, but doth not allow that there were three of each kind.

(K) Expositors have given into various opinions in order to make out these four hundred years,

Genebrard mentioned, in a former note†, has affirmed that the Israelites dwelt in Egypt the full number of four hundred years (34), whose error may be easily confuted by the lives of Kobath, the son of Levi, who went down with Jacob (35), and died in Egypt in the hundred and thirty-third year of his age (36); of his son Amram, the father of Moses, who lived one hundred and thirty-seven years (37); and of Moses, who was eighty years old when he brought Israel out of Egypt; all which several numbers make but three hundred and fifty years, out of which we must subtract those which Kobath had attained when he went down into Egypt, and likewise the time the fathers lived with their children. This has made some reduce the number to less than two hundred and ten years (38), and others to two hundred; whereas we shall endeavour to prove that they remained there two hundred and fifteen years. St. Paul reckons from the first

(30) BERESH. RAB. RAMBAM, & al. (31) Gen. ubi sup. (32) Vid. MERCER. VILLET RAB. SAL. & al. in loc. (33) MOS. GERUND. ap. MUNT. in Gen. xix. sub not. d. † Vid. sup. pag. 423. (E.) (34) Id. ibid. (35) Gen. xlvii. 11. (36) Exod. vi. 18. (37) Ibid. ver. 20. (38) CHRYSOST. homil. l. 1. NIC. de LYR. in loc.

Is persuaded by an angel to return and submit.

Abram's
name changed into Abraham,
Year of the
Flood, 1101.
Year before
Christ, 1898.

and submit herself to her mistress; assuring her that she would be soon delivered of a son, whom she should call Ishmael (L), that his posterity would multiply exceedingly, and that both he and they should prove fierce and warlike, that their hand should be against every man, and every man's against them (M); and that they should dwell in the face of all their brethren<sup>a</sup>. Hagar hearing this comfortable news, was soon persuaded to take the angel's advice, and in memory of this surprising vision, she called the well Beer-labai-roi, which signifies the well of him that lives and sees me (N). This well was between Cadesb and Barneab<sup>b</sup>. Soon after her return she brought forth the promised son, and called him Ishmael, according to the angel's word. Abraham was now eighty six years of age, and did not expect another son, but brought this up as the heir of all his substance, and of all God's promises; and Hagar, whose interest it was not to undeceive him, was prudent enough to conceal what the angel had revealed to her; so that it was not till almost thirteen years after, that God plainly promised him a son by Sarah his wife.

By this time Abraham had attained to the ninety-ninth year of his age, when God was pleased to ratify his former covenant with him, by changing his name from Abram to Abraham (O); and by assuring him, that he would make him the father of many nations; that kings should come out of him, and that his posterity should surely possess the land wherein he was a stranger. And as a token or rather trial of his faith and obedience, God commands him to circumcise all the males in his family, with a further injunction, that for the future all the males that should be born of him, or in his family, whether bond or free, none excepted, should be circumcised on the eighth day after they were born; and that if any male remained uncircumcised, that soul should be cut off, as a despiser of God's cove-first promise made to Abraham, to the promulgation of the law in the first year after the Exod, four hundred and thirty years (39). Of which two hundred and fifteen were already expired when Israel came into Egypt, as we have already proved †. The last remaining two hundred and fifteen may be thus reckoned; Kobath came down with Jacob, and, according to Eusebius, begot Amram in his seventieth year; and Amram begot Moses much about the same age; to which, if we add the eighty years of Moses's age when he led them out, the whole will make two hundred and twenty; from which may be subtracted five years, the supposed age of Kobath, when Jacob left Canaan, and the remainder will be the time of their abode in Egypt, namely, two hundred and fifteen years (40).

<sup>a</sup> Gen. xvi. 12.

<sup>b</sup> Ibid. ver. 14.

Hence it is plain, that the four hundred years of Abraham's seed sojourning in a strange land, must be reckoned, not from their coming into Egypt, but from the birth of Isaac. For all the time of their sojourning in the land of Canaan, Gerar, or any other, was still in a strange land, in which they had not a foot of ground, if we except the cave of Machpelah. As to what is added, that they shall likewise serve and be ill treated, it is commonly understood to be spoken circumstantially, and might be put in a parenthesis, thus; they shall sojourn and be strangers, (and likewise serve and be oppressed) during the space of four hundred years, as St. Austin, and others, have fully proved (41). Accordingly we find Isaac oppressed in Gerar, his wells filled up by its inhabitants, and himself forced still farther from them*; and Jacob served, and was oppressed by Laban near twenty years; yet neither of them laboured under a continual oppression. The Egyptian servitude did not commence till after Joseph and all his brethren were dead (42); before that, the Israelites lived in peace and plenty. Allowing therefore, that Levi was forty-four years of age at his first coming into Egypt, which is the most that can be supposed, he must have lived ninety-three years in Egypt, because the text tells us, that he died in the hundred and thirty-seventh year of his age (43). And these ninety-three years being subtracted from two hundred and fifteen, the time of their abode there, there will remain but an hundred and twenty two years of thralldom, even supposing it to have began immediately after his death. The natural sense therefore of this prophecy to Abraham can be only this, that his seed, from Isaac on, should be strangers in a land that was not theirs, during the space of four hundred years; during some part of which, they should be oppressed, afflicted, and, at length, brought under bondage; which term being expired, they should find a happy deliverance.

(L) Ishmael is compounded of the words יִשְׁמָעֵל and שָׁמַע, jishmagb and El, the Lord hath, or will hear. The reason of which name is immediately subjoined by the angel, namely, because the Lord had heard her complaint.

(M) This prediction has been exactly verified in the several tribes of the Arabs, Ishmael's descendants, who are generally cruel, warlike, and given to rapine; and whose habitation is in tents within the neighbourhood of Judea and Idumea.

(N) These words are no less obscure than the reason Hagar gives for calling the well by that name. They are both variously interpreted; but we choose to adhere to our English version, because it seems to us the most literal, and nearest to the sense of the original.

(O) We have already taken notice † that Abram is compounded of two Hebrew words אֲבִי and רֹם, Ab and Rom, which signify high father, and that Abraham is commonly derived from three, namely, אֲבִי רַב הָמוֹן, Ab Rab Hamon, the father of a great multitude; but this last is somewhat forced and ungrammatical, having nothing to support it but the reason which is subjoined in the text for a nant, from having any share in the promised blessings designed for him and his posterity. Lastly, and to compleat his happiness, God was pleased to assure him, that Sarab, his wife, should bear him a son, on whom all these blessings were to be conferred; and therefore, that her name should be no longer Sarai, but Sarab (P). Here Abraham falling on his face, probably to conceal his laughing, which either the strangeness or improbability of what he heard, had forced from him, began to intercede for the life and preservation of Ishmael, beyond which he thought it unreasonable to ask or wish for any thing; but the Almighty soon assured him, that these great blessings were not designed for Ishmael, but for a son to be born of the hitherto barren Sarab, whom he should therefore name Isaac (Q). That as to the son of Hagar, he would indeed bless him with a numerous posterity; but that Isaac alone, whom Sarab should bear in a year from that very day, was alone to be entitled to the covenant and promise, that in his seed all nations of the earth should be blessed *.

(39) Galat. iii. 17. † Vid. sup. p. 423. not. E. (40) Vid. MERC. VILLET. MURST. & al.
(41) AUG. quest. in Exod. vi. 47. MERC. JUN. MURST. VILLET. & al. 159. 15. LE CLERC in l. & al.
* Vid. sup. p. 347. h. (42) Ibid. (43) Exod. i. 6. Ibid. vi. 16. † Vid. sup. p. 153. sub not. K.

God was no sooner departed, than Abraham took his son Ishmael, and all the males in his family, and circumcised them, as well as himself, without any regard either to his own age, which was almost one hundred years, or to the tenderness of his son, who was not above thirteen. All submitted alike to the operation, and to God's command, on the same day (R); and it was not long before his obedience was rewarded with a seventh and more remarkable visit from God. Abraham, who

Isaac promised.

Year of the Flood, 1105.
Year before Christ, 1898.
Abraham and his family circumcised.

* Gen. xvii.

for changing Abram into Abraham, namely, that he was to become the father of many nations.

(P) Sarai שָׂרָי, in Hebrew signifies my princess, and שָׂרָב, Sarab, the name now given her, princess.

It is farther observable, that God, in the beginning of this 17th chapter (44), calls himself the first time, אֱלֹהֵי שְׁדָדַי, El Shaddai, which our version rightly translates Almighty God. Others have understood it otherwise, by deriving the word Shaddai from Shad, which signifies the breast of a woman, to express God's tenderness towards his servants; others deriving it from the verb שָׁדַד, Shaddad, which signifies to spoil, overcome, infer from the name Shaddai, the irresistibility of God's power, who, they think, doth here assume that title, because he is going to invert the order of nature, and cause the old and barren to become fruitful; but the most genuine etymology is from שָׁדַד used instead of שָׁדַד, for the pronoun qui, who, and יָדַי, dai, sufficient, or self-sufficient, an expression very fit and proper to assure Abraham and Sarab of the certainty of his promise to them, which none but an all-sufficient power could fulfil (45).

(Q) Isaac, or according to the Hebrew, יִשְׁכָּךְ, Ischack, signifies he has, or shall laugh.

(R) Whether this ceremony of circumcision was first introduced into the world by the Hebrews, or Egyptians, has been much contested by ancient and modern historians, critics, and others. Herodotus, who declares he had received all his knowledge of the affairs of Egypt from their priests, gives it indeed for the Egyptians; but he seems in some measure to retract, if not to contradict himself, in this very point, when he affirms, that no nation practised it, but what received it first from the Egyptians; and a little after owns, that he did not know whether of the two had it first, the Egyptians or Ethiopians, though he is inclined to believe the former (46). As for the rest of the ancients, who are on that side the question, as they have blindly followed Herodotus, all their authority centers in him. However, it is certain that neither they, nor any other nation we know of, the Jews excepted, did practise it universally.

The priests were indeed obliged to be circumcised, but the rest of the people were left wholly at their liberty. Neither doth it appear that they practised it upon a religious account, as the Jews did: Philo (47) has given us the reasons why those nations used circumcision; namely, first, in order to avoid a distemper called a carbuncle, to which they, who were not circumcised, were often subject. Secondly, for the sake of cleanliness, by cutting off whatever was apt to harbour any filth; and for this reason it was that they shaved their bodies all over. The third is symbolical, and foreign to our subject. The last is, that circumcision is a help to fertility, and that those who are circumcised are apter for procreation than those who are not. Now for the modern, we mean the Christian writers. These do not indeed affirm absolutely, that Abraham learned it from the Egyptians, but that it is possible he might have seen it in Egypt, and be so much taken with it, that God, in compassion to his infirmity, whose faith could not sustain itself without some outward and visible symbol, might sanctify this Egyptian ceremony, by retrenching all that was superstitious in it, and give it to him and his posterity, as a sensible token of his alliance with them (48).

Only Le Clerc (49) subjoins an argument which, in his opinion, turns the scale very much on the Egyptian side; for, says he, Abraham's family, at his first coming into Egypt, was so inconsiderable, and his posterity afterwards so hated and despised by the Egyptians, that it is by no means probable that proud nation should have received such a ceremony from them. But might not this be the very motive that determined them in favour of it? Was it not natural for the Egyptians, no less superstitious than haughty, to infer, that since it procured such great and valuable blessings to that despised people, it could not fail of proving more successful to them, if once they admitted it amongst them? Might not Joseph's time have been a proper crisis to recommend it to them? And were not those motives we have mentioned out of Philo, of its being reputed a promoter of fertility, cleanliness, and health, sufficient to recommend it, especially to a people that were mostly governed by their dwelt still at Mamre, was sitting one day at the door of his tent, under a tree, when he beheld afar off three men, whom he took to be strangers; he went to meet them, and in the most civil and respectful manner invited them to come and take a small refreshment with him, and having obtained their consent, ordered a feast to be got ready for them (S). As soon as it was over, one of his guests, enquiring after Sarah, and being told, that she was in the tent, he then addressed himself to Abraham, and assured him, that he would visit him again before the end their wives? and lastly, might not this be the very reason which made the Egyptian women use it as well as the men? However that be, the notion of the Hebrews having received it from them seems so contrary to the design and conduct of God, to preserve them from the superstitions of other nations, that it meets with but few advocates; and, indeed, it seems more reasonable to think that the Egyptians had it from some other nation, whether the Arabs (as Beckart thinks, by reason of the difference there was between the Jews and Egyptian circumcision) or from any other of their neighbours; or even that they might stumble upon that ceremony, without knowing, or having it from any, than to suppose that one must have it from the other, and that therefore the Jews might as well have it from the Egyptians. As for the reason of its being enjoined on the eighth day after the child's birth, the best we have met with is that of Cunæus (50), that children were not thought sufficiently clean or perfect during the first seven days, being still full of the corruption they brought from the womb. And this seems to be the reason of God's ordaining that no beast that was offered to him, should be less than eight days old (51). Circumcision therefore being a kind of solemn offering of a child to God, it seems highly reasonable, that the same law should be observed in it, as was enjoined concerning victims. But as to the eighth day being chosen rather than any other afterwards, without seeking for mysteries in that number, as some are fond of doing, it will be sufficient to say, that the child being reckoned perfect and fit at that age, and there being a necessity of fixing a day for it, and not to leave it to the choice of the parents, no time could be fitter than that, because the child is then least sensible of the smart of, and least in danger of being hurt by it.

(44) Ver. 1. (45) OLEAST. & al. (46) HERODOT. l. 1. c. xlvii. Vid. CALM. Dissert. de Circumcis. (47) PHIL. de Circumcis. p. 810. ap. eund. (48) SPENRO. de leg. rituel. Jud. LE CLERC in loc. (49) Id. Bibliot. an. & med. p. 250, & al.

Abraham entertains three angels.

The last enquiry we need make upon this subject of circumcision, is, the reasons of its institution: And here we shall only mention one or two of those that are thought most considerable. The first is topical; because the heat of the climate required it, for the reasons mentioned above. Secondly, political, in order to distinguish those who were in the covenant of God, from other nations. Thirdly, moral; to imply the circumcision of the heart, and the mortification of carnal appetites. Fourthly, religious; in that it was, first, the symbol and seal of the covenant made between God and Abraham, and his seed, and figurative of the faith which was to be in CHRIST (52). To these reasons we shall subjoin one more out of a modern author (53), which the reader will hardly meet with elsewhere: he writes thus: We reckon circumcision among the trials of Abraham's faith. It is easy to observe by very many circumstances of that patriarch's life, that he was designed as a pattern to all the faithful. The more his faith was tried, the more conspicuous it became; the more difficulties he observed in the accomplishment of God's promises, the more he shewed the great idea he had of him that had made them, by overcoming those obstacles. — Why did not God give him Isaac till the laws of nature seemed to exclude all hopes of his ever being a father? It was to try his faith. — Why did God command him to sacrifice that very son to whom so many blessings belonged, but to the same purpose? Why did God set so long an interval between the promise of a son, and the accomplishment of that promise, that Sarah thinking it impossible she should be the mother of him, did give him her maid Hagar? Why was Ismael born so many years before Isaac, &c. but to make still fresh trials of his faith? Why might not then God have the same views in enjoining him to be circumcised? He not only makes him wait for this son near twenty years, though promised in so solemn a manner, but when that time is elapsed, and Abraham thinks himself on the eve of receiving the reward of his faith, he crosses his hopes a-fresh, and commands him to undergo an operation that seemed wholly to put an end to them. Abraham could not but look upon circumcision as dangerous in that hot country, even to young men, much more to one of his years; and, consequently, that it must put him quite out of condition of ever being a father. The command of his having his covenant in the flesh, seemed as opposite to the promise of his having a son, as that of his sacrificing that son, was to the promise of his being the father of many nations. Notwithstanding which, Abraham's faith triumphed over this obstacle also — being fully persuaded that God could not only renew the strength of an old man, but likewise make him fruitful after his having undergone an operation which seemed so contrary to it. It is to extol this triumph that the scripture observes he was ninety-nine years old when he was circumcised; and it was to preserve the memory of it, that God enjoined that ceremony to all his posterity, &c. (54).

All that needs be added under the head of circumcision, is, that the Israelites did not afterwards understand the curse pronounced against those who had it not, so strictly as to cut them off, or drive them out from among them, provided they kept the law of nature, worshipped the only true God, and abstained from blood; but if they became circumcised, they were looked upon as children of Abraham, and were bound to keep the law of Moses. These were called by the Jews, Proselytes of righteousness, to distinguish them from those of habitation, who were uncircumcised, and only observed the laws of Noah, and were therefore called also Noachides. Thesetwo sorts of proselytes became so numerous, that in Solomon's time there were an hundred and fifty thousand and six hundred of them in his kingdom (55).

(S) This feast was a whole fatted calf, three measures, or pecks of fine flour, besides cream and milk, by which, and that other of two kids, which Rebecca prepared for her husband (56) when he was already grown dim with age, if we may guess at their stomachs, we shall be apt to conclude that they were not of the smallest. Neither

(50) CUN. apud BASNAG. Rep. Hebr. p. 351. HIERON. PAGIN. MUNST. MERCER. VILLET.

(51) Levit. xxii. 27. & al.

(52) TARG. ONKEL.

(53) SAURIN Disc. Hist. du V. Test.

(54) Gen. xvii. 24.

(55) 1 Chron. ii. 17.

(56) Gen. xxviii. 9, 10.

a of a year, by which time Sarah would have a son. Sarah, who was listening at the A son promi-tent door, and thought herself past child-bearing, burst out into a laughter, and fed to Sarah.
the stranger asked the reason of it in such a serious tone, as struck her with a terrible fright. She would fain have denied it, but it was to no purpose that she endeavoured to hide any thing from the person that spoke to her, who dismiss'd her with this gentle reproof, that she was highly in the wrong to mistrust what he had said to her, since nothing was impossible with God. The three heavenly guests, for such they were, rose up in order to proceed on their journey, and Abraham courteously accompanied them some part of the way. At length one of them, whom the original calls the LORD (T), as a further mark of his favour, b began to reveal a most dreadful secret to him, which was that the cry of Sodom and Gomorrab was gone up to heaven; and that he was going down fully resolved to destroy them utterly, if, upon enquiry, he found their wickedness equal to the cry of it; whether the remembrance that Lot was in one of those cities, or rather his natural compassion, gave the good patriarch fresh courage to intercede for those righteous men that might be found among the wicked; Abraham did not cease ex- Abraham postulating with him, till he had obtained a promise, that if there were but ten pleads for Sodom.
righteous men found in the place, he would spare it for their sakes: Upon which, the LORD departed from him. The fate of those cities, and Lot's deliverance, have been already related †: as for Abraham, he saw the next morning the thick c smoke of those unhappy places ascending like that of a furnace †.

Not long after, Abraham, leaving the plains of Mamre, probably to be out of the stench of the vale of Siddim, went and dwelt in the country of the Philistines *, between Cadeb and Shur (U); where the same adventure happened to him which he had met with in Egypt. Sarah, whom neither her pregnancy nor advanced age Abimelech (she being now ninety years old) had deprived of her beauty, was again desired by takes Sarah.
Abraham to pass for his sister; Abimelech, king of that country, thought her still charming enough to invite her to his bed; but the LORD appeared to him in a Is threatened dream, and threatened him with immediate death, if he did not restore her un- by God, and touched to her husband, who was a prophet very dear to him; in consequence of restores her.
d which, Abraham had his wife returned to him with considerable presents (W) †.

THE time appointed being come, soon after their leaving the court, Sarah brought forth the long expected son, and called his name Isaac. And Abraham failed not to Isaac born.

† Supr. p. 284, & seq.

† Genes. xix.

* Vid. sup. p. 345.

* Genes. xx. p. tot.

Year of the
Flood, 2101.
Year before
Christ, 1898.

ther do the patriarchs differ much in this respect from Homer's heroes, since he tells us, that when Cumeus entertained Ulysses, he dressed a whole hog that was five years old, for him and four more (57).
However, if we consider their laborious life, and their enjoying a perfect state of health, we need not wonder at their extraordinary appetite and good digestion.

(T) The name Yehovah, יהוה, by which Moses calls the stranger that talked to Abraham, being looked upon, by the generality of Jews and Christians, to be the incommunicable name of God, it is believed by the far greatest part of the latter, that it was the Son of God who appeared in that form: However others, particularly some modern ones (58), maintain, that it was but an angel who spoke to him in the person of God.
But it is not probable, either that Moses should call an angel by that name, or that Abraham should intercede with him as he doth, when he says, That be far from thee to destroy the good with the wicked; shall not the judge of the world do right? Or lastly, that an angel should peremptorily say, If I find forty, thirty, or twenty righteous men in the place, I will spare it for their sakes. It is therefore more probable, that it was CHRIST himself, who is emphatically called the judge of all the world.

(U) Cadeb and Shur were the names of two deserts, the last of which the Israelites entered after the passing of the Red-Sea (59), and is the same which is afterwards called Ethan (60). A- brabam dwelling some considerable time here, called the place Beer-sheba (61). Here it was that Isaac was born, and Abraham liked the situation and people so well, that he continued in it upwards of twenty-five years: From this place likewise he went to offer up his son in the land of Mo- rea (62).

(W) There seems to be a double mistake in our translation, in Abimelech's speech to Sarah, which runs thus: Behold I have given thy brother a thousand pieces of silver: behold he is to thee a covering of the eyes—and thus she was re- proved. For it is plain, the king was purchasing Abraham's friendship, and not quarrelling with him or his wife; and Abraham had already so far justified both himself and her, that he seemed wholly satisfied, and therefore the word נִקְמָה, Nake- cheth, should not have been rendered rebuked, as Kimki, and others do, that think she was blamed by all for the lye she had told. Pagninus renders it erudit se, i. e. she learned more wit; whereas it is the participle of the verb נִקְמָה, which, though it is generally rendered to reprove, or rebuke, yet as often signifies to search, or enquire thoroughly

(57) Odyss. 14.

(58) Le Clerc Com. in loc. Et al.

(59) Exod. xv. 22.

(60) Numb.

xxxiii. 8. Vid. TOSTAT. contr. Nic. de Lye.

(61) Gen. xxv. 31. Vid. Jun. in loc.

(62) Gen.

xxii. 1.

circumcise him on the eighth day. They were now in the zenith of their happiness. <sup>a</sup> Sarah suckled the child herself, and weaned him at the usual time (X); and Abraham made a feast to all his household that day: but their joy could not last long without some mixture of grief, by the jealousy which Isaac caused to Hagar and her son. Isaac was scarce seven years old, when Sarah observed Ismael shew some marks of contempt to him (Y), which made her resolve to part them for ever, that she might be rid at once of all her fears. You know, said she to her husband, that Ismael has no share in the inheritance with my son; for which reason, it is not fit that they should continue longer together; send him therefore, and his mother away, that we may once more be at peace. Though Abraham loved her to such a degree that he could deny her nothing, yet he could not forbear looking on her <sup>b</sup> request as too cruel and unreasonable, seeing she knew that he had still a great fondness for the boy: but God confirming what Sarah had said, and promising moreover to protect Ismael, and to make him a great nation out of regard to him, Abraham was at last prevailed upon to send him and his mother away the very next morning (Z). What befel them afterwards is foreign to our present subject.

*Ismael
mocks Isaac.*

Is sent away with his mother.

Abimelech makes a covenant with Abraham.

ABRAHAM, in the mean time, entered into a solemn league of friendship with Abimelech, king of the Philistines.<sup>a</sup> To secure his property in a well he had dug, and to guard himself against the outrage of the Philistines, who had taken several others from him before, and to ratify the aforesaid alliance, Abraham presented the <sup>c</sup> king with oxen, sheep, and other cattle; then taking seven young ewes, he desired him to accept of them, as a token that he had dug such a well, and that he should from thenceforth peacefully enjoy it. Upon this occasion that place was called Beersebabah, or the well of the oath, because of the covenant which they had sworn there (A). The pleasantness of the place, and the friendship of the king, invited Abraham to sojourn there many years. He planted here a stately grove, and built an altar to the LORD, resolving to end his days in this part, unless God should otherwise determine <sup>b</sup>.

*Abraham
commanded to sacrifice his son Isaac.*

BUT GOD had yet a further trial to make of Abraham's faith and obedience, but so sensible a one, as would put it to the utmost proof. Isaac, the son of his old <sup>d</sup> age, the promised head of a new and numerous race, the fountain of so many promised blessings, and the dear and only object of so much affection; this very Isaac was now at length commanded to be brought unto a mountain which God was to thoroughly into a thing, till the truth be found. Abimelech therefore means no more, than that she is acquitted after a full hearing; and the Chaldee paraphrase hath translated it accordingly. The other mistake is Abraham's being said to be a covering to her eyes; whereas the king seems to speak of the thousand pieces of silver which he gave them, as a token of her justification; the veil being then looked upon as the symbol of women modestly (63).

<sup>a</sup> Vid. sup. p. 344. & seq.

<sup>b</sup> Gen. xxi. p. tot.

(X) It is not easy to guess how long they gave suck in those days, the ancient Hebrews are divided about it (64); some holding that Isaac was weaned at the end of five, and others not till the end of twelve years, and others at the end of twenty-four months (65); if we may judge by what the young Maccabee's mother said to him (66); My son, remember I have suckled thee three years, that time will appear the most probable. However, we may safely believe that Isaac was not weaned before the usual time, for want of care or affection in his mother (67).

(Y) The Jewish interpreters expound the word בצחק, in the text, which signifies laughing or playing, by מלעין, which signifies to deride and despise, and not without good grounds, since Sarah did so highly resent it. They think that it happened on the day in which Abraham made the feast for the weaning of Isaac; and that whilst the guests were congratulating him for having a son and heir in his old age, Ismael shewed some tokens of derision, which Sarah observing, went and complained of to her husband (68). However, it is plain it must have been something worse than childrens play, as the Septuagint has rendered it, since St. Paul calls it a persecution (69). Besides, it must be remembered, that Ismael is described by the angel (70) as a fierce and cruel man, and, consequently, could not but begin to shew some tokens of that disposition, being then upwards of twenty one years of age.

(Z) The text tells us, that Abraham gave them only some bread and a pitcher of water; a small provision if that had been all; but we must remember that bread and water are commonly taken in Hebrew, for all other necessary provisions. Abraham therefore may be supposed to have given them all things necessary for their journey.

(A) בְּאֵר שֶׁבַע, Beersebabah, is compounded of two Hebrew words, the first of which signifies a well, and the other an oath, or likewise seven. Here Moses applies the name to the oath, though it is more than probable that Abraham had an eye to the double meaning of the word Sebabah, when he

(63) PFEIFER FLACC. in loc. LE SCENE'S Essay. (64) Apud HIERON. quæst. Hebr. in Genes.
(65) 2 Maccab. vii. 27. (66) AP. CALVIN. & MERCER. (67) CALV. WILLET.
(68) Vid. MUNST. in loc. (69) Galat. iv. 29. (70) Gen. xvi. 13.

a point out to him, and there to be offered up a burnt-sacrifice, and that by the hands of his own father (B). Abraham never stayed to expostulate about the cruelty, illegality and severity of the command; but on the very next morning he gets all things ready, and leaving it to God to make good his own promises, resolves to obey. He sets out the next morning for the place, and takes with him his son Isaac, some servants, and all other things necessary for the dreadful work. And on the third day after his setting out, discovers mount Moriab afar off (C), the place appointed by God. There, leaving his servants behind, he goes up to the mount without betraying any sign of grief or concern, which might raise a suspicion in his son. Isaac, on the other hand, being laden with the wood and other materials b for a burnt-offering, and observing nothing of a victim, could not forbear asking his father where it was. Such a question at such a time was sufficient to have staggered a heart less firm than Abraham's, who only answered calmly, that God would provide himself with one. He little thought how prophetically he spoke, for he had no sooner bound his son upon the wood, and stretched out his hand to give the fatal blow, but God was pleased to stop him short, being fully satisfied with this last trial of his obedience. He renewed all his promises and covenant afresh, and bound them with an oath, at the same time Abraham looking about found a ram, the victim God was to provide, caught by the horns in a thick bush, and with the help of his son offered it up instead of him; in memory of which he called c that place Jehovah-Jireb, the Lord will look to or provide, alluding to the answer he had given to Isaac's question. He went and rejoined his servants, and returned home to Beer-sheba, where Sarah, who in all probability was kept ignorant of the important secret, was ready to receive them with her usual tenderness and affection<sup>c</sup>. Not long after this he heard the joyful news, that Milcab, his brother Nachor's wife, had bore him a numerous issue (D), which determined him to send thither for a wife for his son Isaac<sup>d</sup>.

ABRAHAM well pleased with the constancy and resignation which he had beheld in his son, lived in great peace and tranquillity for some time; but it was at length disturbed by the death of Sarah, which happened in the hundred and twenty Sarah's death.

Year of the
Flood, 1127.
Year before
Christ, 1872.

But countermanded by an angel from heaven.

<sup>c</sup> Gen. xxii. p. tot

<sup>d</sup> Gen. xxiv. 3, 4, &c.

he made choice of seven, rather than any other number of ewes. From this well the adjoining city was called also Beer-sheba, which was the utmost bound of the land of promise on the south, as Dan was towards the north; whence came the proverb, From Dan to Beer-sheba. This city was one of those which fell to the lot of the tribe of Siméon (71); but because Siméon had his inheritance in the midst of the tribe of Judah (72), therefore Beer-sheba is also numbered among the cities of Judah (73).

(B) As the age of Isaac is not set down in the text, it is uncertain how old he was when Abraham was ordered to offer him up. The opinion of some learned Jews (74), that he was but twelve years old, is ridiculous, since it would have been impossible for him to have carried such a load of wood as he did. Others (75) say, that he was thirty-seven years old; but that was the year of Sarah's death, whereas she was alive when this happened. Josephus makes him twenty-five years old (76); and some christians, ancient and modern, conjecture that he was past thirty, because that was about the age in which CHRIST suffered, whose type Isaac was at least in this transaction, in which there were several circumstances which bore a great conformity with those that attended CHRIST's passion.

(C) This mountain is certainly the same on which the temple was afterwards built by Solomon (77); and therefore those who affirm that CHRIST was crucified upon it, don't fix the name to that particular hill; but to the whole ridge of them. Moriab takes its name from the Hebrew מֹרְיָא, Raab, to see: whence the LXX and Aquila translate it ὁ ὕψιστος, a high or conspicuous land. Fuller derives it from two Hebrew words מֶרְיָא, vision, and אֵל, God; and by contraction Moriab, because God was seen upon it (78).

(D) The children of Nachor by Milcab were 1. Huz; 2. Buz; 3. Kemuel; 4. Chezad; 5. Hazo; 6. Pildas; 7. Jidlaph; and, 8. Bethuel, who begat Rebecca the wife of Isaac. He had some others besides from a concubine named Reumah (79). Huz the first-born, is supposed by some to have peopled and given name to the land of Huz (80), where Job dwelt (81); but it is not improbable that it was already so called from Huz the son of Aram (82). From Buz came the Buzites; of which family Elisba, one of Job's friends, probably was (83). Kemuel, called in the text the father of Aram, is therefore thought the father of the Aramites or Syrians, perhaps the same with the Camuelite of Strabo (84), in the land of Haram (85); but we are inclined to believe, that by this Aram is only meant a son of Kemuel, and not a race of descendants, much less of the Syrians, as the LXX and Vulgate read it; or of Aram Naharim, (71) Job. xix. 9. (72) Ibid. ver. 1. (73) Ibid. xv. 28. VILLET. ubi sup. (74) ABENEZRA ap. TOSTAT. (75) Ap. VILLET. ib. (76) JOSEPH. Antiq. l. 14. (77) 2 Chron. iii. 1, 2. (78) Miscel. Sacr. l. 2. c. xiv. (79) Gen. xxii. 21, & seq. (80) CALMET. Hist. vet. Test. p. 148. (81) Job i. 1. (82) Gen. x. 22. Vid. HIERON. in loc. (83) Job xxxii. 6. (84) STRABO, l. 16. (85) CALM. ubi sup.

seventh year of her age, in the city of Arbab, alias Hebron (E). Abraham came a thither to mourn for her, and to pay the last devoirs to the faithful partner and constant companion of his travails, till having given a sufficient vent to his grief, another care called upon him; viz. to procure her an honourable burial. He therefore arose, and went to the gates of Hebron (F), in order to purchase a burying-place from the sons of Heb, who dwelt in that city, and were probably the most considerable in that place. He had no sooner declared the occasion of his coming, but they one and all told him with the utmost civility and respect, that he might make choice of the best sepulchre in the whole land, assuring him that none of them should withhold his own from him. But Abraham came to purchase, and not to borrow or beg, wherefore having returned their civilities, he intreated them b that he might be permitted to buy the cave of Machpelah (G) from Ephron the Hittite, who was then one of the assembly, and did immediately make him a free offer of it †. But Abraham still insisting upon paying the full worth thereof, before he would make any use of it, they agreed for four hundred pieces of silver (H),

Abraham
buys the cave of Machpelah.

‡ Vid. sup. p. 424 (G.)

† Vid. sup. p. 323. c.

harim, as some; or Aram Seba, as others think (86); for the city of Nahor was in Aram. This city and nation therefore seems to have been more ancient than Kemuel, and to have been so called from Aram the son of Shem (87). As for Chezec, if he was the father of the Chasdim, or Chaldees, at least of that part which was on this side Babylon, as is supposed by the same author (88), 'tis certain there were others more ancient on the other side, for Abraham came from Chaldea. However, these sons of Nahor gave names to some cities and families of Syria, such as Buzan, &c. remembered by a Latin author (89). The children of his concubine were Tebah, Gabam, Thabab, and Maachab. From this last the city of Maachab or Abel Beth Maachab (90), whose territories are supposed to have been situate between the two Lebanons, might probably receive its name (91).

(E) The text is somewhat obscure in this place. Sarah is said to die at Arbab, and yet no mention is made of Abraham's removing from Beer-sheba thither; only he is said to come thither to mourn for her, and bury her. Some therefore are of opinion, that they might be parted upon some occasion or other, and that Sarah went to Arbab, whilst her husband kept his old dwelling. Others, not brooking such a separation, think that he came only from his own tent into that of Sarah, to weep over her. For, in those days, persons of his rank had separate apartments for their female household, whether they dwelt in houses or tents.

(F) The gates of cities in those days, and for many centuries after, were the places of judicature and common resort. Here the governors, or elders of the city, met to hear complaints, administer justice (92), make conveyances of titles and estates, and to transact all the affairs of the place (93). To this custom alludes the verse in the Psalms (94), They shall not be ashamed when they speak to their enemies in the gate, i. e. when they are accused by them before the court of magistrates.

It is probable that the room or hall where the magistrates sat, was over the gates, because Boaz is said to go up to the gate. The like did David, when he went to weep for the death of Ab- salom (95). How considerable they became in time for largeness and sumptuousness, appears by the two kings of Israel and Judah being present at one of them in all their royal splendor, and convening thither four hundred priests of Baal, besides their own guards and attendants (96). It seems as if these places had been at first chosen for the conveniency of the inhabitants, who being all husbandmen, and forced to pass and repairs, morning and night, as they went and came from their labour, might be more easily called as they went by, when-ever they were wanted to assist in any public business. These gates were likewise markets for provisions, like those of the Romans, as appears by the prophet Elisha's foretelling an incredible plenty to happen the next day, in the midst of famine, at the gates of Samarina (97). What the number of these magistrates were, how far their power extended, and how many orders of them there were, is not to be gathered from scripture; only it is plain there could be but few of the latter, since, in the time of Josue, we can find but four sorts of them; viz. the Zekenim, or elders; the Rasim, or heads of the people; the Sopbetim, or judges; and the Soterim, or officers *. Abraham, therefore, could not make his purchase from Ephron the Hittite †, without having recourse to the city gates.

(G) Machpelah, in Hebrew, signifies double: whence it is supposed, by some, that there was a cave within another; or two, or more, contiguous to each other; in one of which Sarah was buried, and Abraham afterwards in the other (98). Others think that is the name of the field, and that it should be rendered the cave that is in Machpelah. Calmet tells us of a person, whom he doth not name ‡, well versed in the Arabick, who says, that the word Machpelah, in that language, signifies shut up, or walled up; it being the custom to wall up these tombs, to prevent robbers from sheltering themselves therein. There are still multitudes of such sepulchres thus shut up, which seem to confirm this conjecture; which, if true, the words ought rather to have been rendered the inclosed cave, ground, &c.

(H) The learned Prideaux, who has given us the last and best estimation of Hebrew and Attick coins,

(86) TOSTAT. CAJET. in loc. (87) Gen. x. 22. (88) CALMET l. i. Vid. JUN. & VILET. (89) AMMIAN. MARC. l. 18. (90) 1 Chron. xix. 6, 7. (91) CALMET, ibid. p. 148. (92) Gen. xxxiv. 20. (93) Ruth iv. 1, & seq. 2 Sam. xviii. 33. (94) Psal. cxxvii. ver. ult. (95) 2 Sam. xviii. 33. (96) 1 Kings xxii. 10. 2 Chron. xxviii. (97) 2 Kings vii. 1, 31. * Josh. xxiv. 1. † See before, p. 323. (98) JUN. MUNST. VILLET. & al. in loc. ‡ Sub voc. Machpel.

which

a which he payed down in full weight before them, and became possessor of the cave, field, and trees belonging to it, and soon after deposited the dear remains of his beloved wife in the cave (I) <sup>s</sup>.

By this time Abraham was well advanced in years, and Isaac was come to the fortieth year of his age. He thought it therefore high time to marry him to some of his own family during his life, which in all probability could not last much longer. To this end he called one of his chief and most faithful servants, and having made him take an oath to get his son a wife out of his own kindred (K), gave him all necessary instructions and authority to conclude the marriage, and sent him away with a train suitable to the embassy he was sent upon. That is, with ten camels loaden with the richest presents for the damsel's dowry; it being the custom in those days for the husband not to receive, but to pay a dowry for the wife. The servant made the best of his way to Haran, where Nabor dwelt; and being fat down by a well a little before the damsels of the country came to fetch water, pensive and solicitous how to perform his message to his master's satisfaction; he made a mental prayer to God, that he would give him a token of his having prospered his journey, which was, that the damsel, of whom he should ask for some water to drink, and she answered, that she would water his camels also, might be she who was designed for Isaac. He had not waited long ere Rebecca's officious courtesy gave him to understand, that his prayer was heard; and being informed by her whose daughter she was, with some other circumstances relating to her family, he immediately took out some gold ear-rings, to the weight of two shekels, and a bracelet that weighed about ten (L), which he presented to her, desiring, that if they had any room at her house, he might be permitted to lodge there that night. Rebecca answered in the affirmative, and taking the presents with her, ran home to acquaint her family with the adventure. Laban had no sooner heard the news, than he came and invited the stranger to his house, who gave them a full account of all his master's wealth and great prosperity. Whilst care was taking of him and his camels, he told them the occasion of his journey; and when he related to them the success which his prayer had had, and that he would neither eat or drink till they had given him a positive answer, Laban and Bethuel (M) concluded that the hand of God was visible throughout all this affair; and that it would be an unpardonable thing to refuse Rebecca to his master. They thought her extremely well disposed of, and consented that he should convey her to her husband as soon as he pleased. He then immediately began to take out all the jewels of silver and gold, and fine raiment, which he had brought, and presented them to her, and made some considerable presents besides to her mother and brother; after which the rest of the day was spent in feasting and mirth. The next morning

Year of the Flood, 1142.
Year before Christ, 1857.
Abraham sends his servant to get a wife for Isaac.

Rebecca is given to Isaac.

• Gen. xxiii. p. tot.

coins, reckons a shekel to be equivalent to three shillings of our English money; so that the sum which Abraham paid for his new purchase will amount to sixty pounds sterling (97).

(I) The art of embalming being known already in those days, it is more than probably that Abraham embalmed his wife before he buried her. The days of mourning, which he had fulfilled before he went to buy her sepulchre, being three days for any ordinary relation, but at least seven or eight for so near a one as a wife, he could never have kept her sweet till the cave had been purchased and fitted for her.

(K) The text tells us that the servant took the oath by putting his hand under his master's thigh, or upon his privities. This is the first time we read of the ceremony; but it was afterwards used by Jacob (98), and Joseph (99) in Egypt, when they were a dying. The oddness of it has inclined some judicious writers to think that it implied a more solemn mystery than men are aware of; viz. a swearing by the great MESSIAH that was to come, and the like (100). Some Jews think it was a swearing by the covenant of circumcision, and that whosoever violated the oath, lost all the privileges and benefits of that covenant. Kimchi tells us, that it was still observed all over the east by those of his nation (101).

(L) In order to know the value of these presents, we should know what proportion gold bore to silver in those days, which is impossible. The author above quoted (102), tells us, that in process of time it came to be as ten, eleven, and twelve to one, according as it changed. But if we compute them according to the present value, which is as sixteen to one, they will be worth 27 l. 6 s.

(M) This Bethuel could not be her father, who had probably been dead some time before, but another brother (103); who therefore is here named after Laban, and is never more taken notice of during the whole transaction (104). Josephus makes the damsel tell the man, that her father had been dead long ago, and that she was left to the care of her brother Laban (105).

(97) PRID. Connell. Pref. p. 22. SAL. in loc. Vid. ALIX. in Pentat. Pref. p. 25. l. 1. c. 16.

(98) Gen. xlvi. 29.

(99) Ibid. l. 25.

(100) RAB.

(101) KIMCHI apud MUNST. in loc.

(102) PRID.

(103) Gen. xxiv. 50, & seq.

(104) Vid. NIC. de Lyræ.

(105) Antiq.

Isaac takes her home.

Abraham's servant, who thought now the time long till his master was acquainted a with the good success of his negotiation, desired to be dismissed. This request did somewhat surprize them. They desired him to stay at least ten days longer; but he standing firm to his resolution, the thing was referred to Rebecca, who consenting to go with him as soon as he pleased, they got all things ready for her departure; and after they had wished her all the usual blessings, and given her her nurse to accompany her, they took their leave. The servant soon brought her in sight of his young master, who chanced, that night, to be taking a solitary walk in the neighbouring fields; and as soon as Rebecca was informed who he was, she alighted, and throwing a veil over her face, as the manner of young damsels then was, she waited to receive his first compliments<sup>b</sup>. He then conducted her to his mother's tent, highly pleased with her extreme beauty and modest carriage, as well as the kindred she came from; all which he looked upon as ample amends for the loss of his mother. He had now nothing to wish for but that she might prove fruitful; but he was forced to wait nineteen years before he could obtain that blessing; during which he comforted himself and her with the assurance of God's promises, and the example of Sarah, who remained childless till the ninetyeth year of her age.

Abraham being 141 years old, marries Keturah, and has six sons
by her.

ABRAHAM could not but be pleased to see his son in the possession of so agreeable a wife; but that not proving sufficient to comfort him for the loss of his own, and finding himself still strong enough to make a new addition to his family, though c he was then an hundred and forty-one years old (N), and had continued a widower several years; he took another wife, named Keturah (O), by whom he had six sons, whom he afterwards portioned, that they might not interfere with Isaac's inheritance, and sent them to dwell towards the east (P). These six sons went away eastward of Beerseba and the land of Canaan, and settled in both Arabias, the Petrea and the Deserta, some footsteps of whose names are still to be met with, of which we have in part given an account already<sup>1</sup>.

Abraham's
death.

CONCERNING Abraham we have nothing more recorded, except that he lived to the hundred and seventy-fifth year of his age, and was gathered unto his fathers, and that his two sons paid him their last devoirs, Isaac having probably sent for his d brother Ishmael, and buried him in the cave of Machpelah, near Sarah his wife. By which it is plain, that Moses has here anticipated his death, by mentioning it

<sup>b</sup> Gen. xxv. p. tot.

<sup>1</sup> Vid. sup. p. 299.

(N) We need not wonder that Abraham, or any of the patriarchs should allow themselves to have concubines, and sometimes more wives than one, if we consider that a numerous posterity was looked upon as one of the greatest blessings, and as a mark of grandure and esteem. Accordingly we meet with several places of scripture, in which men of rank are particularly recorded for having a great number of sons (107).

(O) The Jews pretend that this Keturah was the same with Hagar, whom Abraham sent for again after his wife's death, and by whom he had all these children. The reasons they give for it are, 1. Because the Psalmist calls the Midianites, which came of Keturah, Hagarens (108). 2. It is said elsewhere they made war with the Hagarens, with Jethur, Naphish, and Nadab (109), which were the sons of Ishmael (110). And 3. because Ishmael, Hagar's son, is said to have assisted Isaac at the funeral obsequies of their father Abraham (111). To which they add, that Hagar being Abraham's lawful wife, it was juster for him to marry her than another. But these reasons, and her name's being changed from Hagar into Keturah, which signifies incense, and is the emblem of continency, in which she had lived ever since she had been dismissed from Abraham, are rabbinical dreams, for she is still called Hagar in the same chapter (112). Besides, the text is plain against them, it being said that Abraham added or proceeded to take another wife, which is inconsistent with his recalling the old one. Add to this, that Hagar was only a concubine, and is no where called a wife, as Keturah is. As to the two passages of scripture above quoted, we need only answer, that they prove not the Midianites, or any of Keturah's sons, to be called Hagarens; but that this last name was common to all the posterity of Ishmael, some of which were called Ishmaelites, some Iturians, some Nebeans, &c. (113).

(P) From these words some authors have concluded that Abraham had married Keturah long before Sarah's death (114), or even immediately after he parted with Hagar; and that the words should be rendered he had married, instead of he married another wife, since Abraham doth not seem to have lived long enough to have disposed of all these sons in his life-time, as the text says he did, if he did not take Keturah till after his son's marriage. In answer to which, besides what has been said in the last note, that such a notion is contrary to the sense of the original, we may observe that Abraham lived at least thirty four years after it; by which time they might be all big enough to go from him. Besides, Hagar must by this time have been about eighty years of age, and so too old to bear so many sons.

(107) Vid. int. al. Judg. viii. 30. Ibid. x. 4. Esther ix. 10.

(109) 1 Chron. v. 9.

(110) Hieron. tradit. Heber. in Gen. xxv. 20.

(112) Ibid. ver. 12.

(113) Jun. in loc. Villet. c. 25. quest. 3. & al.

(108) Psal. lxxiii. 6.

(111) Gen. xxv. 7.

(114) Vid. CAL-

VIN in loc.

before

a before the birth of his two grandsons Esau and Jacob, though he must have lived to the fifteenth year of their age (Q).

(Q) Abraham's history has been embellished with a great many notorious fictions by the Jews, Arabians, and Indians. We have already touched on some of them*, and we shall now subjoin some few more that are remarkable; such as his making a long abode in Egypt, and teaching astronomy, and other sciences there (115); his inventing the Hebrew characters and tongue (116), the same we now use. His being the author of several books, and, in particular, the famous one mentioned in the Talmud, and highly valued by several learned rabbies, called Jekirab, or the creation; of which it gives an account. There is also an apocalypse attributed to him by the Se-thians, a sort of hereticks that sprang up in the earliest times of christianity (117). His assumption is mentioned by St. Athanasius; and Origen tells us of an apocryphal book pretended to be written by him, wherein two angels, a good one and a bad one, are introduced disputing about his salvation or damnation (118). The Jews make him also the composer of some prayers, and of the ninetyeth psalm, and of a treatise against idolatry (119). The Indian fire-worshippers, who think him to have been the same with their great prophet Zoroaster, do attribute his books to him, which they call the Zend, Pavend, and Vostab, containing all the principles of their religion (120). Dr. Prideaux mentions them as one book, or, perhaps, three books in one volume, which he calls Zendevesti; or, as the vulgar people pronounce it, Zendevestow, or plain Zund. Which name, he tells us, signifies a fire-kindler, such as a tinder box is here with us; and was given it by the author, to insinuate that it would kindle a brighter fire in those who should attentively and devoutly read it †.

The Arabians do likewise give us a history of this patriarch, though so altered and blended, that one would hardly think they were descended, as they are, from him by Ismael.

Abraham, according to them (121) was the son of Azar, and grandson of Terab; which account, could it be relied upon, would easily resolve that difficulty about his age when he died, which we have spoken of before, note (B), pag. 422. Since Terab might have begot Azar in the seventieth year of his age, and Azar have begot Abraham in the sixtieth of his; so that this last number, which is wanting in Moses's account of his life, would be here found complete; but we dare not affirm any thing about it. Calmet, indeed, thinks we might easily suppose two Terabs; one first-named Azar, Abraham's father, and the other his grandfather: But how he can say that there is nothing in such a supposition that contradicts the sacred text, we can't so well comprehend. The eastern heathens have also a long tradition of Abraham's life, though vastly different from that of Moses, and fraught with a great many wonderful additions of their own invention. The reader, however, may be glad to have a short account of it out of the last quoted author (122). Nimrod, the son of Canaan, did reign in Babylon, which he is thought to have built, and saw in a dream a star arising, whose light did out-shine that of the sun. The south-sayers, whom he consulted, told him that a child, not yet begotten, would be born in Babylon, who would prove very dangerous to him; whereupon Nimrod forbade, by an express order, all the Babylonians to lie with their wives; but Azar, one of his chief officers, found means to get at his own, and one night got her with child. The magicians came next morning, and acquainted him that his precautions had proved vain, and that the child was begot that night, and advised him to get all the pregnant women to be well guarded, and their children put to death as soon as they were born; but Adnah, Azar's wife, not shewing any marks of her pregnancy, went on with it, and was brought to bed of a son in a cave or grotto, the entrance of which she had carefully stopped; and then came and told her husband that the child died as soon as it came into the world. She failed not, however, to go and suckle it as often as she could; and was surprized to find him still sucking two of his fingers, one of which gave him milk, and the other honey. Being thus satisfied that providence took care of him, she visited him more seldom; but observing that he grew as fast in one day as other children do in a month, inasmuch that at the age of fifteen months he was as forward as a boy of fifteen years, she acquainted her husband with the whole story.

Azar went immediately to the cave, and ordered his wife to bring him into the city, where he designed to settle him in Nimrod's court. Adnah took the boy through some meadows where there were abundance of cattle; which made Abraham, who never had seen any before, very inquisitive what they were; and his mother took a great deal of pleasure in instructing him in their names, natures, uses, and the like, which made him desirous to know who had made them all; and being answered, that all creatures owed their being to God, Abraham asked how himself came into the world, and Adnah told him she brought him forth: He then enquired further who was her lord, and she answered that it was Azar; and who is Azar's lord, continued he? Nimrod, said his mother. But here she thought fit to stop all further enquiry, telling him, it was dangerous for him to be too inquisitive. By this time they were got to the city, which he saw swarming with all sorts of idolaters; he returned to his grotto more desirous than ever of knowing his Creator; and observing one night the star of Venus to shine brighter than all the rest, he began to fancy that to be the creator of the world, till he saw her set, which convinced him of the contrary, since he thought God incapable of any change. He made the same judgment of the moon; and, at length, seeing great multitudes worship the sun, he was tempted to do the same; but having likewise observed its declination towards the west, he concluded that it could not be God.

Azar presented him to Nimrod, who was seated on a lofty throne, and attended by a great number of the most beautiful slaves of both sexes. Abraham asked his father who he was that was thus * See before, p. 422. (C). (115) ARTAPHAN. & EUPOLEM. ap. EUSEB. præp. l. 9. c. 17, 18. JUSTIN. ex Trog. l. 36. JOSEPH. Antiq. l. 1. c. 8. (116) Id. ibid. SUID. in ABRAHAM. ISODOR. Hyspal. l. 1. c. 3. ORIGEN, &c. (117) EPIPHAN. Hæres. l. 39. c. 5. (118) ORIG. Homil. 35. in Luc. (119) R. SALOM. in Bava Batrab, c. 1. GRAMM. Cod. Talm. Tract. Habadab Zarab, c. 1. (120) HERBELOT. Bibliot. Orient. p. 16. † Connell. p. 317. (121) TARIK MOUNTCECKER ap. eund. p. 12. (122) Id. ibid. p. 13. ex lib. Mallem.

Rebecca's
pregnancy.

As for Rebecca, she continued barren above nineteen years; during which time Isaac ceased not intreating the LORD for her, who was pleased at length to hear his prayers, and sent him the long-desired blessing. They now thought themselves happy indeed; but Rebecca did not long continue so. The struggles of the twins, thus seated above all the rest, and he told him that it was Nimrod, whom all that croud about him looked upon as their god; but Abraham answered that he could not be their god, seeing he was not so handsome, and consequently not so perfect as they. He afterwards took occasion to preach to his father the unity of God, which made him so many enemies among the courtiers, who would not admit of his doctrine, that Nimrod, being acquainted with it, caused him to be thrown into a fiery furnace, out of which he came, nevertheless, safe and unhurt.

A famine that raged soon after this, having made him distribute all his store to the poor, he sent to a friend of his in Egypt for a fresh supply, but was refused, under pretence that he did not want it for himself, but to give it away to the poor. The messengers being afraid that the Babylonians would laugh at them, if they came home empty, filled their sacks with a white sort of sand; and being got home to their master, acquainted him with their ill success. Abraham, without being alarmed at it, went into his little oratory to comfort himself with his God; and, in the mean time, Sarah his wife, who knew nothing of this mystery, seeing the camels laden with full sacks, went and emptied one of them, which she found full of fine flour, and made some bread of it for the poor. Abraham having concluded his prayers, came out, and was surprized at the smell of the new bread, and asked his wife where she had got the flour; and she told him that it was that which had been brought to him from his friend in Egypt; rather, replied he, from God, our only true friend, who has not forsaken us in time of need. And, from that time, Abraham was styled the friend of God; a name given him by the prophets (124), and by all the Moslems, who call Hebron, the place where he lies buried, the city of the friend of God; though they make him vastly inferior to their Mohammed; to whom, one of them says, Abraham was but an officer, and the Messiah master of the ceremonies.

They are not agreed about the number of angels who dined in his tent. One of them (124) reckons there were three; viz. Gabriel, Arraphel, and Michael. The first of whom was sent to destroy Sodom, the second to foretel the birth of Isaac, and the third to deliver Lot and his family. The Koran tells us that Abraham treated them with a roasted calf: but observing that they did not eat, he was frightened with the thoughts of their being enemies; there being no greater token of enmity in those countries, than to refuse to eat and drink with the person that invites. The angels, however, soon eased him of that fear, by telling him that they were sent from God to Lot's people; which made Sarah, who was then present, burst out into a laughter. Thus far Mohammed, who being, perhaps, ignorant of the true history of Abraham, tells it after his ridiculous manner. His interpreters pretend, that the cause of her laughing was either her joy to see her husband rid of his fears, or the pleasure she should have to see Sodom in flames, or her admiration to see angels in human shapes. However, her laughter made the angel tell her that she should have a son named Isaac, who should be the father of Jacob. To which he answered, That it would be a marvellous thing indeed, if, old as she was, and her lord still much older, she should bring forth a son; but they having assured her that the divine power would not be wanting, seeing the blessing was upon Abraham and her, who were chosen to be the heads of a numerous family, they departed towards Sodom, whilst Abraham pleaded hard with God not to destroy the city, if so many righteous men were found in it; and so on.

The Mohammedans have likewise altered the story of Hagar and Ishmael, in which there is this prayer of Abraham: Lord, I have placed one of my sons in a barren valley, near thy holy temple. Of which the commentators on the Koran tell us the occasion was, that Sarah, who could not endure the sight of Hagar, or her son, desired Abraham to send them into some dry and barren land: That Abraham being troubled at her cruel request, was told by the angel Gabriel to do as his wife bid him; whereupon he conveyed both the mother and the child into the territory of Mecca, which was then barren, and without water; but that the angel made a fountain to spring up from under Ishmael's feet, which is now the well of Zemzem, so famed among the Turks, and the only one in all that country. At the same time God blessed the land, and made it so fruitful, that it abounds with each kind of fruit of the four seasons of the year, which grow plentifully there all the year round.

There was then no temple built at Mecca, but only a great edifice, called Sorab, reared up by Seth, in Adam's life-time, in the form of a temple, which was resorted to with great devotion. But the deluge having destroyed it, it was afterwards rebuilt by Abraham and Ishmael. The Turks call it Caabah, or the square-house, and think themselves bound to visit it at least once in their life, and always turn their faces towards it when they pray, in what part of the world soever they be. A modern author (125) thinks that both the Arabs and Ishmaelites did formerly worship Bacchus and Urania, or Venus, in that temple; for Herodotus assures us, that they worshipped none but those two deities, the first of whom they called Urotali, and the latter Ali-lat (126). Though other authors have since told us, that they worshipped also Jupiter, the sun, moon, and demons (127). However that be, it is most likely that the altar and grove which Abraham built at Beerseba (128), gave the first rise to the fiction of his building this temple.

They tell us moreover (129), that Abraham having prayed to God to let him see how he raised the dead, was asked by him Whether he wanted faith? No, replied he, but it would be a great satisfaction to me. At the same time the devil having taken notice of a dead body thrown up by the sea, and half devoured by fishes, birds, and wild beasts (130), thought it a proper instrument which

(123) Isa. xli. 8. Dan. iii. 35. (124) DAMIATI. (125) CALM. Diſſion. ſub voc. Abraham. (126) HERODOT. l. 3. c. 8. (127) STRABO l. 16. PHILOSTORG. ap. PHOC. AMMAN. MARCEL. & al. (128) Gen. xxi. 23. (129) Koran, c. 2. (130) HERBELOT. Bibl. Or. p. 15.

2 which she bore, caused her a great deal of pain and uneasiness, till having consulted God about it, she was answered that two nations were striving in her womb, and that two sorts of people should be separated from her bowels, one of which should prove stronger than the other, and that the elder should serve the younger. Accordingly she was soon after brought to bed of two sons, the first of which, viz. Esau, was all over hairy, and the second came out holding him by the heel, and was therefore named Jacob (R). Esau became a great lover of hunting, and consequently the darling of Isaac, who was very fond of his venison; but Jacob was the mother's favourite, who knew that he was to inherit the blessings, and could not, perhaps, forbear

Year of the Flood, 1182
Year before Christ, 1837.
Esau and Jacob born.

strument to ensnare mankind against the belief of a resurrection. He appeared to Abraham, who had been bid to repair to the sea-shore, in the shape of a man that seemed astonished at something, and asked him, How it could be possible for the parts of that dead carcass, which had been devoured by so many living creatures, to be re-united at the general resurrection? To whom Abraham answered, that he who had created all those limbs out of nothing, could more easily gather them from the different places where they lay scattered, than a potter could the broken pieces of a potsherd, and make a new one out of them.

After this God bid him take four birds, and cut them in pieces, and to carry the pieces upon four different mountains; and then give them a call, and he should see them all four fly immediately to him. This seems to be taken from the heifers, goats, and pigeons, which Abraham was bid to hew in pieces, &c. (131). To which the Mohammedans have added several other circumstances, such as that the four birds were a cock, a dove, a raven, and a peacock; that he cut them all in small pieces, and jumbled them all together. Some add that he pounded them in a mortar, and divided the whole mass into four parts, which he carried to the tops of four different mountains; after which holding their heads, which he had kept unminced, he called them distinctly by their names; whereupon each of them came to fetch his own head, and flew away. Thus it was that Abraham was convinced of the truth of the resurrection, according to the Mohammedans. And this seems to have some far-off relation with what our SAVIOUR says of him (132), that Abraham had desired to see his day, and that he saw it and rejoiced; which the Mohammedans, according to their custom, have applied to the day of the resurrection. The Persian fire-worshippers do to this day express a great veneration for him; they call him Zerdoost, or Zoroaster, which signifies the friend of fire, because when he was thrown into the furnace by Nimrod's order, the flames, instead of consuming him, caressed and embraced him in a friendly manner (133).

Calmet (134) mentions a book in the French king's library, N° 792, written originally by St. Ephrem the Syrian, and translated from the Syriac into Arabic, upon Abraham's journey into Egypt; in which book there is also a sermon on his death, preached by St. Athanasius, patriarch of Alexandria, on the twenty-eighth of March; on which day the Coptic, or Egyptian Christians, do celebrate his festival. The ancient fathers of the church have highly celebrated him on the account of his great faith and obedience; and the martyrologies have given him a place among their other saints, on the ninth of October (135). The church of Rome hath likewise ordered an office for him, and address him in particular for those who are at the point of death.

It is reported, that the tomb of Abraham having been discovered near Hebron, they found his body, and those of Isaac and Jacob, whole and uncorrupted. There were likewise some gold and silver lamps hung up in the cave, which was visited by multitudes (136). The Mosslems have such a veneration for this place, that they make it one of their four pilgrimages, the three others being that of Mecca, Medina, and Jerusalem; and the Christians built a church over the cave (137), which the Turks did afterwards turn into a mosque (138).

Mos. Ben. Maimon (139), and after him the learned Spencer, tells us, that Abraham was brought up in the religion of the Zabeans, who are supposed to have been great astronomers, astrologers, &c. and by discovering the power and influence of the stars, and heavenly bodies, came at length to worship them. Who these Zabeans were, whether a nation, or only a sect of philosophers, or whether their name imports any more than their religion, and the like, shall be enquired into in its proper place. In the mean time, as to what Maimonides says, we shall only answer with Meyer (140) that it is impossible to prove that the Zabeans were even as old as Moses, much more that they were older than Abraham; for though it be granted, that there were some people called Zabeans before Moses's time, and that that idolatry had been in vogue long before him; yet this will not prove that the Zabeans we are speaking of, were older than Moses; and Spencer himself owns (141), that it is almost impossible to discover their beginning, which has given rise to so many different opinions about it, and, perhaps, not one of them right. However, it is not improbable that Abraham being born and educated in an idolatrous country and family, might have been addicted to that superstition, till God called him away from the one and the other.

(R) From the Hebrew word קָנָה, Hekab, which signifies the heel, is formed the verb קָנָה, to supplant; and by the addition of the י Jod, one of the formatives of nouns, Jacob, a supplanter; which name he in time made good. As for the name Esau, the meaning is somewhat obscure, unless we derive it, as some (142) do from עֵשָׂו, Hassab, to make, because Esau came out all hairy, and, as it were, perfect; whereas other children are born with hair only on their heads. He is also supposed to have been called Sheir, or Schir, from שָׁחַר, Shahar, which signifies hair. And lastly Edom, from his selling his primogeniture for a mess of red pottage (143).

(131) Gen. xv. 9, & seq.

(132) John viii. 56.

(133) PRID. Connell. p. 1. book 4.

(134) Ex Bibliot. Orient. p. 16.

(135) Martyrol. Rom. ADON. USUARD. &c.

(136) BEV

SHOLMAN ap. HERBELLOT.

(137) Serm. Quadrag. Elmid. 1, 2. p. 773.

(138) Vid. CALMET

loc. citat.

(139) MAIMONID. Tractat. More Nevok. part. iii. c. 29 & 46. & in Avodah Zarab, c. 11 & 12.

(140) MEYER de Fest. dieb. Hebr. c. 12.

(141) SPENC. de Leg. Hebr. ritual. l. 2. c. 1. § 2.

(142) RAB. SAL. MERCER. & al.

(143) Vid. sup. p. 305.

intrusting him with the secret beelines, though she seems all along to have concealed it from her husband. The two brothers were not above twenty years old, before Jacob gave proof of it. Esau came home one evening from his usual hunting, faint and hungry, and seeing a mess of pottage which his brother had got ready, begged to be refreshed with some of it; which he, it seems, well instructed by his mother, utterly refused unless he would part with his birth-right to him. And Esau, in his distress, swore away his birth-right to his brother Jacob, as we have seen elsewhere<sup>1</sup>.

Esau sells his birth-right.

Year of the Flood, 1194.
Year before Christ, 1805.

Isaac goes to Gerar;

is envied by the people.

A covenant between Abimelech and Isaac.

Year of the Flood, 1239.
Year before Christ, 1760.

A FAMINE, which happened some years after this, obliged Isaac to seek for another habitation; he thought to have gone down into Egypt, when God appeared unto him, and diverted him from it, bidding him go to Abimelech king of Gerar, where Abraham had heretofore been so friendly entertained, promising that he would protect and multiply him exceedingly. He obeyed; but the fear he was in for his life, on account of his wife's beauty, made him resolve to let her pass for his sister, as his father had formerly done. This pretence passed current a considerable time, till at length the king observed from his window some familiarities between them, which made him suspect that she was something more than a bare sister to him. He therefore rebuked them sharply for the fraud, which Isaac endeavoured to excuse the best he could, telling him that the fear of his own life was the only motive that had induced him to it<sup>a</sup>. No sooner was this trouble over, c than new ones came thicker upon him. He sowed some land that had been allotted to him, and this brought such a surprising crop, as made him be looked upon with an envious eye by all his neighbours. His richness and multitude of servants made him likewise be feared as a dangerous man, who might, probably, prove one day too mighty for them. But as the success of open violence was doubtful, they resolved to harass him another way, by filling up all his wells, without which his vast multitude of cattle could not subsist. They likewise endeavoured to alarm the king against him, and succeeded so well in it, that Isaac found himself under a necessity of retiring to Gerar; where he dug new wells, and opened those which had formerly been dug by Abraham; in doing of which, d he met with great and repeated troubles and vexations from the Philistines of Gerar, and was forced soon after to remove at a good distance from thence<sup>a</sup>.

At length he was sued to by Abimelech in person<sup>a</sup>, either to revive the old covenant, or to make a new one with him. Isaac expostulated with them upon the ill usage he had met with in their land; but nevertheless prepared a sumptuous banquet for them, and on the morrow entered into the covenant they requested<sup>a</sup>. On the same day word was brought to Isaac, that his servants had found a spring of water; upon which account he called the place Beer-sheba (S). The tranquillity which this new alliance had procured him, was soon after disturbed by Esau's marrying two strange wives, Judith the daughter of Beer, and Basemath the daughter of Elon, both Hittites<sup>a</sup>.

HOWEVER, Isaac, who beheld him still as his heir, was easily reconciled to him, and, apprised of the alienation he had made of his birth-right, he only looked upon it as a youthful trick, and the effect of hunger and weariness. Finding himself therefore grow old and feeble, and his eyes quite dim with age, and apprehending his death to be nearer than it really was, he being then an hundred and thirty-seven years old, resolved to bless him before he died. He called him one day to him privately, and bade him get some fresh venison, and dress it to his palate; and told him, he designed to confer his last blessing on him that day. Rebecca, who over-heard their discourse, knowing the importance of the paternal blessing, laid hold on the favourable opportunity, to procure it for her beloved son, in the absence of Esau. She directed him then to take two choice kids, which she would dress to his father's liking, and send him with them to his father, therewith to personate his elder brother: Jacob made several excuses. His

<sup>1</sup> See before, p. 305. <sup>a</sup> See before, p. 346. c. <sup>a</sup> See before, p. 347. b. <sup>a</sup> See before, ibid. c.

<sup>a</sup> See before, ibid.

<sup>a</sup> Gen. xvi. p. tot.

(S) This name is rather revived than given to the place, since we have seen already on what account Abraham called it so (144); though it is not improbable but the discovery of this new well might lead Isaac into a third allusion to the word

שָׂבַע, Shabab, which signifies not only to swear, and seven, but likewise to satisfy or satiate; whereby he might intimate that he had wells enough, and would rest satisfied with them.

a skin and his voice he was afraid would betray him, being in both so unlike to his brother; so that if Isaac should detect the fraud, he would, more probably, curse than bless him. Rebecca, who knew there was no time to lose, took all the curses upon herself, and encouraged him to follow her directions, which he did. Whilst the kids were a dressing, she laid their skins on his hands and neck, and then arrayed him in Esau's cloaths, and sent him trembling to his father. When Isaac smelt the meat, he was surprized it was so suddenly got ready, and not knowing what to think of it, put the question several times to Jacob, whether or no he was in very deed his son Esau? to which he answered in the affirmative, desiring him to arise and taste of his venison, since God, who knew his zeal to obey his father, b had brought it into his hands much sooner than he could have expected. But Isaac, still doubtful, desired him to draw nearer, that he might be better satisfied; and when he had felt the hairy skin on his hands and neck, he owned that the bands were the bands of Esau, though the voice was the voice of Jacob. Thus far satisfied, or rather imposed on, he arose and eat heartily of his son's pretended venison. Rebecca forgot not to send some wine with it; and after a cup or two, he bid his son come near to him, that he might now bestow the promised blessing upon him. The smell of Jacob's raiment contributed much to Isaac's cheerfulness; he smelt and praised them, and in a kind of extatic rapture, embraced and kissed his pretended first-born; and having wished him all heavenly and earthly blessings, dismissed him. c If the father was pleased at his having performed this important ceremony, the son was no less rejoiced at his success, and at his being freed from acting a part, which to an honest man must have caused the greatest reluctance, to say nothing of the dread he must have been under during all that time, lest Esau should intervene. But what he did was in obedience to his mother, who, probably, assured him that they did only fulfil the divine decrees in all this, and that it had been a direct contravention of them to have acted otherwise. Her joy upon this occasion was great we may be sure.

Jacob gets his brother's blessing from him.

WHILST the mother and son were congratulating each other, Esau came to his father with the venison he had prepared for him. He invited him in the same dutiful manner that his brother had done, and wondered to observe such tokens of surprise and concern in his father's face. Not to repeat what we have already expatiated on: Esau found he had been circumvented in his absence; and a mournful scene ensued between the father and the son; which was closed up by Isaac's strenuously insisting that his blessing should remain with Jacob. I have blessed him, says he, yea, and he shall be blessed (T). Nevertheless, to assuage his excessive grief, he blessed him in these words, thy dwelling shall be the fatness of the earth, and of the dew Esau is also blessed.

* See Gen. xxvii. 28, 29.

† Vid. sup. p. 306. b.

‡ Gen. xxvii. 33. Gen. xxxvii. p. tot.

(T) Whosoever narrowly observes Jacob's life, after he had obtained his father's blessing, will own, that it consisted in nothing less than worldly felicity, of which he enjoyed as little as any man whatever. Forced from his home into a far country for fear of his brother; deceived and oppressed by his own uncle, and forced to fly from him after a servitude of twenty one years; in imminent danger, either of being pursued and brought back by Laban, or murdered by his brother. These fears are no sooner over, but the baseness of his eldest son, in defiling his couch; the treachery and cruelty of the two next, to the Sichemites (145); and lastly, the loss of his beloved wife, and supposed untimely end of his son Joseph; all these overwhelmed him with fresh successions of grief; and to complete all, his being forced by famine to descend into Egypt, and to die in a strange land: These, and many more, are sufficient proofs that his father's blessing was of a quite different nature, and consisted in two particulars only; viz the possession of the land of Canaan in right of primogeniture, which his brother had sold him, and which rather belonged to his posterity than to himself: The other and more valuable one, was that of the MESSIAH's being born of his race, and not of that of Esau. As to the stratagem by which this blessing was obtained, though it appears somewhat harsh and unjust at first sight; yet if we consider that these two brothers were designed by providence as types; viz. Esau of the Jews (who were afterwards to be rejected for not accepting the spiritual kingdom of the MESSIAH, for the sake of an imaginary earthly one, which they did then, and do still dream of; and which is, in fact, preferring a mess of pottage to the noblest birth-right) and Jacob of the Gentiles, who were to be admitted into that kingdom, which the former had rejected. If we consider further, that this alienation from one brother to another, had nothing to do with a future state, as some of the church of Rome, and of our own sectaries affirm, but was confined wholly to the present †; if we consider these things, we shall not want the subtilties of the schools to justify an action which was determined and conducted by a divine hand, unless men will affirm that God could not in justice make such an alienation; an assertion so bold and absurd, that we don't think any man of sense, and common modesty, would venture to maintain it.

(145) See before, p. 329. c.

† See before, p. 307. (H).

of heaven from above (U). By thy sword and thy bow shalt thou live, and shalt serve thy a brother; and it shall come to pass, that when thou shalt have the dominion, thou shalt break his yoke from off thy neck (W). This blessing was inferior to Jacob's in the following particulars. 1. It omits plenty of corn and wine, by which some think it implied, that Esau's lot should not be so fertile as his brother's; the reader may see what is already said on that head †. 2. Here is no mention of God, as there is in the first; God give thee, &c. 3. There is a spiritual blessing promised to Jacob, that they should be blessed that blessed him, &c. but no such thing is said to his brother. Jacob was, for a while, in danger of his brother's heaviest resentment; which Rebecca dreading, she found out an excuse to convey him out of the way, as far off as Padan-Aram, that he might there marry one of his cousins. She therefore proposed sending him to her brother Laban, alledging, that if he should follow his brother's example, and marry a Hittite, it would make the rest of her life uncomfortable.

Jacob is sent to Padan-Aram:

It is not improbable that Isaac had likewise had some suspicion of Esau's design to murder his brother, else it is not likely that he would have sent Jacob away alone, and with his bare staff in his hand, when his father Abraham had sent thither a servant in so noble a manner, unless it were done to conceal his flight. However that be, the other reason which the mother alledged, was thought highly reasonable, and Jacob was privately sent for, to take his leave of his father, and to receive his commands and his farther blessing; which done, he set out for Padan-Aram. In his way thither he was overtaken by the night near Luz, and forced to lie in the open fields with a stone for his pillow. Here he saw in a dream a ladder reaching from earth to heaven, and angels ascending and descending, whilst God, who stood on the top, was pleased to encourage him, by promising that he would be his protector, and that he would bless and multiply him beyond measure. Jacob awaking from his dream surprized and frightened, cried out, Surely God was on this place, and I knew it not! Rising therefore from his hard bed, he took the stone which had served him for a bolster, and pouring oil thereon, erected it into a pillar; and in memory of this vision he called the place Bethel (the house of God) for it was called Luz before that time. Here he likewise made a vow unto God, that if he would grant him his protection, feed and cloath him, and bring him back safe to his father's house, the LORD should be his God, that he would pay the tythes of all he had unto him, and that the stone which he had reared should be God's house. Having finished his prayer, he went on cheerfully the rest of his way, till he came to his journey's end.

Serves seven years for Rachel;

is elevated by Laban.

His uncle Laban received him with joy; and after a month's stay with him, Jacob falling in love with his youngest daughter Rachel, a beautiful virgin, they agreed that he should serve him seven years for her, at the end of which she should become his wife. Jacob was so pleased with this motion, that he spared no pains to make his service acceptable to his uncle Laban, who liked him so well for a servant, that he resolved to continue him in the same capacity another seven years. For when the time was come for his being put in possession of the wife he had so dearly earned, he conveyed his new son-in-law into his eldest daughter Leah's apartment. Jacob did not discover the deceit till the next morning, when he found, instead of his beloved Rachel, her homely bleary-eyed sister, he could not forbear expressing his resentment in the strongest terms. Laban had his answer ready, and in a magisterial tone told him, that it was an unprecedented thing, in that country, to marry the youngest daughter before the eldest, and that it would have been a great injustice to Leah to have preferred her younger sister to her; but, continued

† See before, p. 307. a. (F).

u Gen. xxviii. 12, & seq.

w Ibid. p. tot.

(U) These words have been rendered by some modern authors (146), thy dwelling shall neither be fruitful, nor watered by the dew of heaven. And it is true, indeed, that Idumea, or the land of Edom, was not very fruitful; but they that understand the original, will easily see that it is capable of a better meaning, as we have already noted.

(W) We must not think that these predictions were to be fulfilled in Jacob's time, or in his person, who never had any dominion either over the Edomites, or any other nation, nor ever possessed the least inheritance, Machpelah excepted; but died in a country where he had not one foot of land. How and when the Edomites, who multiplied exceedingly, and were a fierce, warlike people, became subject to Jacob's posterity, and when they shook off their yoke, we have already related (147).

(146) LE CLERC, &c. in loc.

(147) See before, p. 315, & seq.

he,

a he, in a milder tone, if you will fulfil the nuptial week with your wife, and consent to serve me another seven years for her sister, I am content to take your word for it, and to give Rachel to you as soon as the seven days are ended. Jacob could not but be troubled at such an unfair procedure; but he loved Rachel too well not to obtain her at any price; he therefore consented to these hard conditions, and at the week's end enjoyed the fruits of his servitude and constancy. Marries Ra-

DURING this interval, Eſau went and married Mabalah the daughter of his uncle Iſhmael, in hopes that she would be more acceptable to his parents than his two other wives, and brought her home to her father's house (X). He had children by all the three wives*: his posterity became very numerous; an account of which has been given in the history of the Edomites†.

IN the mean time Jacob behaved himself very differently towards his two wives. Rachel had his heart and affection, whilst Leah was forced to content herself with a formal civility; but God made quite another difference between them, by making the latter mother of many children, whilst her sister continued barren for a long time. Leah was soon brought to bed of a son, and it being then the custom of those times for mothers to give names to their children, not without some particular reason or meaning, she called him Reuben, intimating that God had seen her affliction, and had given her a son, which would probably engage her husband to love her. She had another soon after him, whom she called Simeon; because, she said, the LORD had heard her complaint. Her third she called Levi, hoping her husband would be now joined to her; and the fourth she called Judah, thinking herself bound to praise God for her fruitfulness; after which she left off bearing for a while‡. Reuben born.
Simeon, Levi;
and Judah
born.

RACHEL by this time was so extremely mortified at her sister's happiness, that she came one day in a fit of envy, and told her husband, that, unless he gave her children also, she should inevitable die of grief. Jacob, who could not forbear being provoked at such a speech, which seemed to lay the blame of her sterility upon him, answered her in a passion, that it was out of his power to do miracles, that God, who had shut up her womb, was alone able to open it; but that her behaviour was rather the way to obstruct, than to gain such a blessing. This mortifying answer made her bethink herself of the usual way, at that time, for women, in her case, to give their maids to their husbands; she therefore desired him to take Bilhab, and to try, at least, to make her a mother by her means; to which he consented, and soon after had a son by her, which Rachel called Dan, meaning that God had judged in her favour. She called the other son, which Bilhab bore, Naphtali, to express the violent struggles she had had with her sister; after which Leah, thinking she had quite left off bearing, gave her maid Zilpah also to Jacob, whose first son she called Gad (a troop) expecting more to follow, and the next she called Asher, to express her sense of the happiness she now enjoyed. Dan and Naphtali
born.
Gad and Asher born.

c BY this time Reuben, who was about six years of age, brought home one evening some mandrakes (Y) which he had been gathering in the fields in the time of the

* Gen. xxxvi. 1, 2.

† Ibid. p. tot.

‡ See before, p. 307, & seq.

* Gen. xxix. p. tot.

(X) It will be proper to observe here, that Moses gives these three wives of Eſau quite other names, when he comes to speak of the posterity he had by them (147); which might lead an unwary reader to think that he had more than three, especially, because the fathers of the two former are likewise called by different names. Thus his first wife, Judith of Beer, is afterwards called Adah, the daughter of Elon the Hittite; the second, viz. Bilhah, the daughter of Elon, is again called Abeli-Bamah, the daughter of Anah, the daughter of Zibeon the Hivite; the last, called at first Mabalah, is now called Bathshemah; but what shews that these two latter names mean the same person, and that the same thing may be supposed of the other two (especially, considering that Eſau is recorded to have had but three wives) is, that she is called, in both places, the daughter of Iſhmael, and sister of Nebajoth. All the account that can be given for this difference, is, that they had two names, and that it was usual to call them sometimes by one, sometimes by the other. Thus, the mother of Abijam, king of Judah, who is called in one place Maacah, the daughter of Abishalom (148), is, in another place, called Michaiab, the daughter of Uriel of Gibeon (149). Other parallel places might be brought in great numbers, were it needful.

(Y) What these mandrakes were, is not easy to guess; but they could not certainly be what we understand by that name, 1. Because they had nothing inviting, either in smell, taste, or colour, to induce a child of his age to gather them; much less could he chuse them for any particular virtue or quality they had. 2. The text says, it was then wheat-harvest, which, in those hot countries, is about May, when the apples of that root are far from being ripe. 3. The mandrake has a very strong

(147) Compare Gen. xxvi. 34. xxviii. 9. with xxxvi. 2. & seq.
(149) 2 Chron. xiii. 2.

(148) 1 Kings xv. 2.

Issachar.

Zebulon and Dinah born.Year of the
Flood, 1254.
Year before
Christ, 1745.

Joseph born.

Jacob's stratagem of the speckled sticks.

wheat-harvest. Rachel no sooner saw them, but she desired to have some part of a them. Leah hereupon answered, not over-complaisantly, that it was a little too much for her to take her husband from her, and now her son's mandrakes too; wherefore, to pacify her, and purchase the fruit, she agreed that Jacob should spend that night with her (Z); and Jacob no sooner came home, but Leah challenged him to confirm the bargain, which he accordingly did. The consequence of it was, that she bore him a fifth son, whom she called Issachar (the man of reward) alledging, that it was given her as a recompence for giving her maid to Jacob. After this she bore her sixth and last son, and called him Zebulon (dwelling) in hopes that so many sons would make her husband dwell with her. She had likewise a daughter, whom she called Dinah, which is the feminine of Dan; b after which she bore no more. As for Rachel, her prayers at length being heard, she was happily brought to bed of a son, whom she called Joseph, in hopes that God would add another to him. By this time, Jacob having finished his fourteen years servitude, and being desirous to re-visit his old parents, desired his uncle to dismiss him and his family. But Laban, who had found no small advantage in having such a faithful servant, begg'd of him to stay with him a little longer, promising him, upon that condition, to give him what wages he should name. Here Jacob took an opportunity of reminding him how much his substance was increased since it was put under his care; but that it was now high time he should make some provision for his own family; however, that if he would consent to let him c have all the spotted and parti-coloured cattle, whether of sheep, or goats, and all the black ones among the sheep, for his hire, he would consent to stay six years longer with him. Laban could not but think the condition somewhat hard, since the white ones only were to fall to his share; and had he known what project Jacob had in his head, he would hardly have consented to them; but as he was willing to keep him at any price, the bargain was struck, and a separation made between the white ones and the rest, and a space of three days journey put between them, to prevent all suspicion; after which, Jacob began to execute his new project. He had observed the rams leaping the sheep, at the places where they came to drink, from whence he concluded, that if he could lay some speckled sticks d in the water at that time, it might make the white ones to bring forth speckled lambs also; and tried it so successively upon the strongest of Laban's flock, that it soon dwindled away, whereas his own improved visibly, both in number and strength (A). Laban, vexed at his heart to see such a prodigious difference be-strong stupifying smell, and is therefore called by the Arabians, Jabrochim; whereas the dudaim, or mandrakes, are commended for their fragrantcy, in the only place of scripture where they are mentioned besides (150). For this reason some have fancied them violets (151); others lillies (152); others jassimin; others have rendered the word desirable flowers (153), agreeable to the word Dudaim, which signifies, loves, in the dual, or, the breasts of a woman. Others again, and perhaps more probably, have guessed them to be citrons (154). That which has induced so many interpreters to suppose them to be mandrakes, is the virtue attributed to them of helping conception (155), which made Rachel willing to try the effects of them; but besides that they were plentiful enough to have been bought at a cheaper rate, it is plain that she did not conceive after them. Neither is it probable that Leah would have parted with them to her rival, if they had been known to have had such a virtue, which, perhaps, was not discovered till a long time after; when it became known among the Greeks and Romans by the name of the apple of love; and of the juice of which, the emperor Julian tells his friend (156), that he had taken a dose to excite that passion in him. A modern author, in his history of Æthiopia, has confuted the notion of Dodaim signifying mandrakes (157), and affirms, that it signifies a certain fruit, which the Syrians call Mauz, not unlike the Banana, or Indian fig-tree, in shape and taste, and about the bigness of a cucumber, thirty or forty of which often hang upon one stem: But whatever these Dodaim were, whether a fruit or flower, it is certain they must have had something pleasant, and inviting to a child, either in smell or taste.

(Z) The custom of those countries where polygamy was allowed, was, in those days, for the husband to take his wives by turns (*); the kings of Persia, if we may believe Herodotus (†), were not exempt from that rule. This makes it more probable, that she sold her turn for that night to her sister, than that she did direct her husband which of the four he should lie with.

(A) Our ancient commentators fancied that Jacob made use of his speckled sticks in the spring of the year, when the lambs had the whole summer to grow fat and strong; but that he set them aside in autumn, when he knew the coldness of the Winter would spoil their thriving: But as the text speaks neither of Spring or Fall, our moderns have thought it more reasonable to suppose, that he laid the a tween the two flocks, and perhaps suspecting some trick in it, obliged him to invert the bargain, and for the future to take all the white lambs and kids for his hire, and to leave him the rest; from which time Jacob took care to lay by the speckled sticks. This change was renewed more than once or twice, as he complained to him afterwards<sup>a</sup>: in spite of all which, Jacob grew exceeding rich, and with the money which he got by his fleeces, &c. bought men and women servants, camels, oxen, and asses; which raised such envy in Laban, and his sons, against him, that they began to look upon him with an evil eye; so that he thought it now high time to contrive the means of getting off with all he had<sup>b</sup>. He acquainted his wives with it, and finding them of the same mind, he sat them and their little ones upon camels, and having got all his servants and substance together, began his journey towards the land of Canaan, whilst his father-in-law, who was at a pretty distance from him, was busy a sheering his sheep; which gave Rachel an opportunity of stealing her father's gods (B). Laban, who did not hear of their flight till the third day after, was full seven days before he could overtake him;

(150) Cant. vii. 13. (151) ONKEL. in loc. (152) OLEAST. (153) JUN. in loc.
(154) BOCHART. BROWN'S Vulg. Err. CALMET Comm. in Gen. cap. xxx. ver. 11. (155) EPIPH. ap. VILLET. (156) LUDOLPH. Hist. Æthiop. Com. l. 1. c. 72. (157) Vid. CALM. in Gen. xxx. 16. Diß. sub voc. Mandrag. AUG. cont. FAUST. l. 22. cap. 29. (*) Vid. VILLET. MUNST. & al. (†) HERODOT. l. 2. cap. 79.

Jacob steals away from Laban.
Year of the Flood, 1260.
Year before Christ, 1739.

<sup>a</sup> Gen. xxxi. 41.

<sup>b</sup> Gen. xxx. p. tot.

the sticks only before the young and lusty sheep and goats, and the old and weak he left to take their chance; by which means the best lambs came to his share, and the worst to Laban's (158).

(B) The word which we translate gods, in the Hebrew is תְּרָפִים Teraphim, which all the Jewish Rabbies own to be a word of no Hebrew etymology. The LXX translate it sometimes an oracle, and sometimes vain idols, and Aquila idols. Some think it to be an Egyptian word, and the same with Serapis; that Ham and his son Mizraim were the inventors of idolatry, and that the latter, who was the founder of Egypt, filled that country with idols; inasmuch that there was neither town nor village, house or road, where they were not to be seen (159): As to their figure, use, the manner of making them, &c. they are all equally uncertain. As to their shape, the most received and probable opinion is, that it was human, or something resembling a human form, as a busto term, &c. though the Jews pretend, that it was the head of a first-born son plucked off from the neck, and embalmed; under the tongue of which was fastened a golden plate, with the name of some false deity engraved upon it; which head being placed in a niche, or upon a shelf, did give vocal answers (160): but these are rather to be looked upon as fables not worth confuting; and the figure which Michol put in David's bed (161), which the original calls by the name of Teraphim, shews that it must have had an human shape. Josephus indeed, who might think it a reflection on that monarch, that there should be found an image or Teraphim in his house, has attributed a more subtle stratagem to Michol, though less credible (162). He tells us, that she hid the liver of a kid fresh killed under the bed-cloaths, that the panting of it might be taken for the panting of her husband in a fever. But without enquiring whether, or how long a kid's liver would continue panting, so as to be seen under the bed-cloaths; it is scarce credible, that the messengers would give her time to do all this; or, if she had notice of their coming, that she could time it so well, that the liver should be still panting hot when they came up. However, we shall meet with so many instances in the sequel of this history, wherein this author doth depart from the scriptures, and from truth, whenever the honour of his nation is concerned, that his authority will be of little weight in all such cases.

These Teraphims were afterwards universally known by the name of Talismen, as they are to this day all over India. The Persians called them Telephim, a name not unlike Teraphim. They were made of different metals and sizes, cast under certain constellations, with the figures of some planets, and magic characters engraven upon them. What metal those of Laban were, or how big, or how many, is not easy to guess; only this the text tells us, that she hid them in the straw, and sat upon them. As for their use, it was chiefly to give answers, to foretel what was to come, to discover what was hid or lost, and the like. Besides this, they were likewise addressed to for temporal blessings, and to avert evils. They were to be consulted and prayed to at certain times under particular aspects of the planets; from which, according to the Jews, they partly received that power, and partly from the characters engraven on them (163). Another Rabbi goes further, and pretends, that they gave their answers viva voce (164), and proves it from the words of the prophet, The Teraphims have spoken vain things (165). However, we must not suppose that all the Teraphims were of the same make, or for the same uses, even among the Jews. We shall have occasion to mention some other sorts, when we come to speak of that of Michol (166): Besides, as they came to be more universal, every one had them made after his own fancy; though the generality of them had at least a human head.

The last thing worth enquiring into, is, what induced Rachel to steal her father's gods: Concerning which we can affirm nothing certain. Some think, that she did it to repay herself for the damage which they had sustained by her father (167); others, that she thought by that means to prevent Laban's enquiring of them which way Jacob went (168); others, that she would thereby cure her father of his idolatry, against which Jacob had read his wives many a lecture (169). Lastly, others think, that both she and her sister were still addicted to that superstition, and that their designing to continue in it, made her to conceal the theft from her husband (170); but that Jacob, making a thorough reformation in his house, caused them to be taken from her, and buried under a tree in Sichem (171).

(158) BOCHART de animal. sacr. CALM. Comm. in Gen. c. xxx. 41. (159) KIRCHER. OEDIP. Egypt. Sint. 4. c. 3. CUNÆUS Rep. Hebr. (160) TARGUM JONAT. in Gen. xxxi. RR. TAN-HUM. ELEAZ. & al. (161) 1 Sam. xix. 14. (162) Antiq. lib. 6. c. 14. (163) D. KIMCHI
sub voc. Teraph. (164) R. ELEAZ. cap. 36. (165) Zachar. x. 2. (166) Jude xviii. 1. &
seq. (167) PERRER, JOHNSON, & al. (168) ABENEZRAE in loc. (169) THEODORET
Quest. 9. RAB. SAL. GREG. NAZIANZ. Orat. de S. Pasch. & al. (170) CYRIL in Gen. lii. CHRYSOST. CAJET. MUSC. CALV. & al. (171) Gen. xxxv. 4.

Laban over-
takes him :

Searches for his Gods.

Makes a covenant with Jacob.
They rear a monument in memory of it.
Laban returns home.

Jacob's vision.

He calls the place Maha-naim.

by which time Jacob had already passed the river Euphrates (C), and was got up the mountains of Gilead, where he had pitched his tent for that night. The day being too far spent for Laban, and those relations he had brought with him, to undertake any thing, they encamped near him, and waited for the morning. It is evident, that he had some ill design against his son-in-law ; but God, who appeared to him that night in a dream, was pleased to avert it, by threatening him severely, if he committed any hostility or violence against him. Laban's courage being thus cooled, their meeting on the next morning proved more calm than he intended it. He contented himself with expostulating with him, that he had stolen away without giving him an opportunity of kissing his children and grand-children, and sending them away with the usual ceremonies of musick and dances. Jacob, on the other hand, was not without his complaints ; the cheat he had put upon him in making him serve so long for a woman he did not care for ; the changing his salary so many times, and his late strange behaviour towards him and his family : all these, and many more, he answered him, were but ill requitals for all his diligence and care, or for the blessings which God had heaped upon him for his sake. Laban had yet another thing to lay to his charge, namely, the stealing of his gods ; and Jacob, ignorant of Rachel's theft, desired him to make the most diligent search for them throughout his family, promising, that the person with whom they were found, should be immediately put to death. Laban lost no time, but went and searched every tent, and last of all came to that of Rachel, who had hid the teraphims under the camels litter, and had set herself down upon them. She kept her sitting whilst he was curiously examining every corner of her tent, and excused it, with telling him, that the condition she was then in, allowed her sex to dispence with the usual ceremonies. This prevented all further scrutiny, and Laban, who could not think that she would come near such sacred stuff in that condition, went away with a heavy heart, and acquainted his son-in-law with his ill success. This caused some fresh expostulations, which being ended, they fell upon a more agreeable subject, which was to make a firm alliance between them, and to erect a monument, as a standing witness of it to future ages. They all put a helping hand, and reared the pile, which Laban called in the Syrian tongue Jegar-Sabadutha, and Jacob, in Hebrew, Gilead ; both which signify the heap of witness †. Here they likewise swore, that neither would pass over that monument to hurt the other, and Jacob, that he would use his wives and children with all becoming tenderness and affection. The ceremony being ended, and a sacrifice offered upon the occasion, he feasted the whole company the rest of that day ; and the next morning Laban having embraced and blessed the whole family, returned home to Padan-Aram <sup>c</sup>.

JACOB, who thought his absence a greater security than the oaths he had sworn, was glad to have so well escaped ; but one fear succeeded another, and the repentment of his brother Esau began now to give him a fresh trouble ; but a vision which he had of an host of angels, who met him in his way to Canaan did dissipate his anxiety for a while, and in memory of this vision, he called the place Mahanaim (two camps). But being still fearful of his brother ‖, he resolved to soften him with a submissive message, or at least, to feel how his pulse beat towards him. To this end, he sent some of his servants before, to acquaint him with the success he had during his stay in Mesopotamia, the riches and multitude of wives, children, servants, and cattle, which he had acquired, and that he did not think fit to proceed further homewards, till he sent him some assurance of his being reconciled to him. The messengers returned with the news, that Esau was coming to meet him, accompanied with four hundred of his men. This was enough to complete Jacob's fears, and to make him think himself a dead man ; but having recovered himself a little, he set himself about giving orders to his family. He divided them into two bands, in hopes that if the one perished, the other might escape ; which done, he addressed himself to God in a very humble prayer, † Vid. sup. p. 377. d.

<sup>c</sup> Gen. xxxi. p. tot.

‖ Vid. sup. p. 307.

(C) Though the text doth not say what river he passed, yet it is plain, it could be no other than the Euphrates, which the Scripture sometimes calls the river Perab, sometimes the great river, and sometimes emphatically, the river (172) ; either because that and the Nile were the only two considerable ones they knew ; or, because it was one of the four rivers of Paradise ; or lastly, because it was the boundary of the promised land †.

(172) Vid. Josh. i. 4. xxiv. 3. & alib.

† Vid. Gen. xv. 8.

acknowledging a acknow-

b begged all his f would twenty their co
before h ther, to to enter and flock ried at A morning thigh, an Jacob be name fro
when he Jacob th
march,
never ca
posterity
c mentions

(D) Mos words of th
the 23th ve
as well as o from preva
viz. Esau see from th cessary to h words, if t
it will do by followi which run like (in t also pres be more in about promise this visi to him need to the sent and diffi
der ; se subject tions : n strengthe in God, wife, th prevails less diffi with fro more ag images,
If the God, f over me
The
some o underst
which
the 1

(1)
(1-lib
dile
17.

a acknowledging his great mercies to him, and his own unworthiness of them, and begged his future protection against his brother's sword, and that he would fulfil all his former promises to him. After this he resolved to try how far presents would work upon Eſau's temper, and having set a-part two hundred goats and twenty he-goats, two hundred sheep and twenty rams, thirty she-camels with their colts, forty cows and ten bulls, twenty she-asses and ten colts, he sent them before him in separate bands, and charged their drivers, when they met his brother, to tell him that they were presents sent by Jacob to his lord Eſau, in order to entreat his favour and good-will. On the next morning he made all his family and flocks go over the brook Jabbok long before break of day, whilst himself tarried at Mabanaïm; where there appeared a man, who wrestled with him till the morning, and not being able to prevail with him, he touched the hollow of his thigh, and put it out of joint, then desired him to let him go since day appeared. Jacob begged that he might have his blessing first; upon which he changed his name from Jacob to Israel, which signifies a man that has prevailed with God. But when he was desired to tell his own name, he refused it, and vanished from him (D). Jacob therefore called the place Peniel, or the face of God, and when he came to march, he found that he halted upon his thigh; upon which account his posterity never eat of that joint<sup>d</sup>. And Josephus tells us, that neither Jacob, nor any of his posterity ever since, did eat that part of any creature<sup>e</sup>; and though the text mentions only the sinew that shrank; yet so scrupulous have some of the Jews

He sends some presents to Eſau.

Jacob is named Israel at Peniel.

<sup>d</sup> Gen. xxxii.

<sup>e</sup> Ant. l. 1. c. 20.

(D) Most versions, as well as ours, render the words of the angel to Jacob in the latter part of the 28th verse, as if Jacob had prevailed over men as well as over him; whereas he had been so far from prevailing over the only two enemies he had, viz. Eſau and Laban, that he had been forced to flee from them both. This makes it therefore necessary to have recourse to a better version of these words, if the original can bear us out in it, which it will do without the least violence; or rather, by following the most strict and literal sense of it, which runs thus. Thou hast acted or behaved princelike (in thy wrestling) with God, and thou shalt also prevail over men. And indeed, what could be more comfortable to Jacob, in the strait he was in about meeting his brother Eſau, than such a promise? Or, What can more naturally account for this vision, than to suppose, that it happened unto him in order to dispel his fears? Not that we need to confine the meaning of the wrestling, or the sense of the angel's words to the present dread and difficulties which that patriarch laboured under; for his numerous posterity was to be no less subject to the hatred and persecutions of other nations: nothing therefore could be more proper to strengthen his and his childrens faith and reliance in God, than this prophetick vision and promise, that as he had now wrestled with God, and prevailed, so he should likewise, in the numberless difficulties which both he and they should meet with from their enemies. This version is likewise more agreeable to the Chaldee paraphrase, the Sep-tuagint, and the Vulgate, which render it thus, If thou hast been thus far able to prevail with God, how much more wilt thou be able to prevail over men!

This mysterious wrestling has indeed induced some of the ancient fathers to think it was to be understood in a spiritual, and not actual sense (173): which they conclude from the words of the Apostle (174), we wrestle not against flesh and blood; and some Jews do think that it was done in a dream (175); and that his halting was either occasioned by weariness, the cold of the night, or the posture he slept in. But besides that his fear of his brother gave him but little inclination to sleep; the circumstances of the story, the imposition of a new name, and, above all, the testimony of the prophet Hosea (176), who says, he had power over the angel, and prevailed, that he wept and prayed unto him, seem to make it more than a dream, if it was not a real and corporeal wrestling. As to the person who wrestled with Jacob, some have believed it to have been an angel, only because Hosea calls him by that name in the place above quoted; whereas, when it is God or Christ that appears like one, he is distinguished by the angel of the covenant, or some other word (177). But what follows in the very next verse of the prophet, plainly confutes that notion: he found him in Bethel, even the Lord God of hosts. That it was God who met him in Bethel, is plain, by his saying, I am the God of Bethel (178). The general opinion therefore of ancient and modern authors, is, that it was Christ who wrestled with Jacob here. 1. Because he blessed him; and 2. Because Jacob says, I have seen God face to face, &c. and called the place Peniel (179). As for what is said, that he could not prevail, it might be an expression ad captum; as when he says to Moses, Let me alone, that I may, &c. (180). This Peniel became afterwards a city of some note; for we find that Gideon pulled down one of its towers, because they had denied him bread (181); but it was afterwards rebuilt by Jeroboam (182): Josephus says that he likewise built a palace there; it stood by the river Jordan, and belonged to the tribe of Gad (183). Strabo mentions a city adjoining to Tripolis, which was called the Face of God, at one end of mount Libanus (184).

(173) Hieron. qu. Hæbr. Orig. & al. (174) Ephes. vi. 12. (175) R. Levi, l. 1. & al. (176) Hos. xii. 4. (177) Ferrer. l. 1. c. 4. (178) Gen. xxxi. 13. (179) Tertul. lib. 2. contr. Marcion. Hilar. de Trin. l. 4. Ambro. de Fid. l. 6. Chrysost. in cap. 7. Act. & al. Calv. Merc. Jun. & al. mult. (180) Exod. xxxii. 10. (181) Judges viii. 17. (182) 1 Kings xii. 25. (183) Joseph. Antiq. l. 8. c. 3. (184) Strabo, l. 16.

been even to this day, that, for want of knowing which joint it was, they abstain<sup>a</sup> from the whole hind-quarter; though others, less nice, abstain only from the thigh; and some again will eat even that, and content themselves with plucking the sinew out of it<sup>b</sup>. Some think, that Jacob's lameness was soon over; others, that he halted all his life. However that be, this new vision gave him such fresh courage for the present, that he marched on cheerfully till he had overtaken his family.

*Meets with his brother
Esau.*

It was not long before he saw his brother afar off, coming towards him with his large retinue, at which he could not forbear betraying some fresh tokens of distrust. To prepare therefore for the worst, he divided his family into three bands; the two maids and their sons went first, Leah and her children next, and Rachel and Joseph, who was then about six years of age, he placed in the rear, as farthest from danger. As soon as he saw his brother, he bowed himself seven times down to the ground before him, who, being moved with his submissive behaviour, ran to him, embraced and kissed him, and wept over him (E). And seeing his wives and children, who, not to be wanting in their respect to him, did prostrate themselves before him one after another, in the same order in which Jacob had disposed them; and being informed who they were, returned their civilities with the same tenderness that he had done to his brother. He now began to chide him, in a civil manner, for sending him such great presents, and to desire him to take them back, alledging, that it was superfluous to him, who had enough of every thing; but Jacob begged so earnestly that he would accept of them, that he at length prevailed. Esau offered afterwards to accompany him to the end of his journey, or, at least, to leave a sufficient number of his men to guard him; but he begged to be excused from consenting to either, seeing he was forced to go gently on, by reason of his little ones, and the cattle that were with young: Upon which his brother took his leave, and went away for mount Seir<sup>c</sup>; and Jacob seeing himself rid of all his fears, stopped at a convenient place, to which he gave the name of Succoth, or Booths, by reason of the booths and folds he made there for his camels and cattle; soon after which, he likewise built himself a house there. <sup>d</sup> This Succoth became afterwards a city of some strength, and Gideon did severely punish some of its chief inhabitants for their saucy answer to him, when he was in pursuit of the Midianites<sup>e</sup>. It was situate between the brook Jabboc and the river Jordan. From Succoth he went to Salem (F), a place near the city of Shechem, in the land of Canaan, where he bought a piece of land from Hemor, the father of

*Jacob stopped
some time at Succoth.*

<sup>a</sup> CALM. Hist. O. T. in loc.    <sup>b</sup> Vid. sup. p. 307.    <sup>c</sup> Gen. xxxiii. p. tot.    Judg. viii. 13. & seq.

(E) The Mazorites and Cabbalists observe, that there is a large point over the word וַיִּשָּׁק Vaisba-kebu, and he kissed him, which implies that he did not design to kiss his brother, but to bite him; for the word signifies also to bite; but that Jacob's neck was immediately turned into marble. Wherefore the text says, they both wept, he for the odd change in his neck, and Esau because he had almost broke his teeth against it, and that this prevented his wicked design against his brother (185). But it is more than probable, that Isaac and Rebecca had taken much pains to convince him, during his brother's absence, that what Jacob and she had done, was by order of God himself, who had decreed the inversion of the succession before they were born; that it would therefore be not only in vain, but even an unpardonable crime for him to oppose himself against the decrees of providence; and that instead of recovering his brother's blessing, he would bring a terrible curse upon his own head: by which, and other such like arguments, they had wholly persuaded him to acquiesce in the divine will, and to set aside all animosity against Jacob.

(F) We have here followed the English version, though the original, we think, might be more properly rendered, he arrived safe and sound, or

peaceably, at the city of Shechem; for the word Salem, or rather Shalem, bears that signification; and there are no remains of any place near Shechem, that is called by the name of Salem. For this reason some have thought it to be that Salem of which Melchizedek was king (186), the ruins of whose palace were still to be seen in St. Jerom's time; which shewed it, he says, to have been a magnificent building, and which, he thinks, is the same with Salem here spoken of (187). But it is not likely, that the former was so near Shechem, any more than the Salim where John the Baptist did frequent (188), which was near Jordan; whereas Shechem was at a distance from it. Besides, Josephus tells us, that the old Salem was the same as Jerusalem (189). And the Psalmist seems to intimate the same, when he says, at Salem was his tabernacle, and his dwelling in Sion (190); but the supposed Salem, near Shechem, must have been near thirty miles from Jerusalem. Others have sought for Salem in Shiloh, which is about half way between Jerusalem and Shechem, and have thought that they were the same (191). But besides that Shiloh is not near Shechem, it is plain from Judges (192) that they were two distinct places: wherefore, upon the whole, we think that Salem should here be rendered safe or in peace; namely, (185) Beresh. Rabb. in loc.    MASSORAH. in loc.

quæst. Hebr.    (188) John iv. 5.    (189) Antiq. l. 1. c. 11.
VILLEX. c. 33.    (192) Judg. xxi. 19.

(186) Gen. xiv. 18.

(187) HIERON.

(190) Psal. lxxvi. 2.    (191) Vid.

Shechem,

a Shechem, for an hundred pieces of money, and pitched his tents there (G), and built an altar to the LORD, which he called El Eshbe Israel, or the mighty God of Israel<sup>b</sup>. This was in all likelihood the same place where Abraham had heretofore built one, soon after his first coming into the land of Canaan<sup>c</sup>. And here also was, probably, Jacob's well near mount Gerizim, where CHRIST talked with the woman of Samarita<sup>d</sup>; for that mountain stood in the country of the Shechemites<sup>e</sup>.

HERE Jacob might have lived long enough peaceably and agreeably, being beloved and respected by all that people, had not Dinab's curiosity of visiting the women of the city, some say, to see one of their feasts<sup>m</sup>, proved the cause of much mischief, and obliged her father to withdraw from that place nearer to Mamre, b where his father still lived. We have elsewhere seen † how Shechem, the son of Hamor the Hivite, who was prince of that country, saw her, became in love with her, ravished her, and sent her home to her father with the greatest assurances of marriage, if Jacob's consent could be as easily obtained as that of his father Hamor.

Dinab told her mishap to her father, who was forced to bear it patiently for the present; because his sons were all out in the field. But as soon as they were come home, and made acquainted with it, their resentment grew to such a height, that they resolved severely to revenge the dishonour done to their family. In the mean time Shechem having prevailed upon his father to obtain him the damsel, Hamor went with him to make the proposal of it to her father, and promised to give her

c as large a dowry as he should desire; adding, that if his family were to intermarry with the Shechemites, it might prove the most effectual means for both to live in perfect peace and friendship. But the treacherous sons of Jacob, who meditated nothing but the most bloody revenge, replied, that it was not lawful for them to contract any affinity with any uncircumcised nation; but, that if he and his people would consent to be circumcised, as they were, they would agree to his proposal.

The sequel shews that they designed nothing less. For the prince, having acquainted his people with the whole matter, did easily persuade them to accept the conditions, since it would give them a power over all their substance and riches. Shechem was no doubt very pressing to have the ceremony of circumcision performed out of hand, that he might the sooner enjoy his desires, and in complaisance to him, the whole city agreed to go about it that very day. Three days after this, when their wounds had rendered them incapable to stand in their own defence, Siméon and Levi, Dinab's brothers, entered the city, and put all the males to the sword, and brought their sister back. After this they went and plundered the place, took all the women captives, and carried away all the cattle they found in the neighbourhood. When Jacob came to hear of this barbarous exploit, he was extremely displeased at it. He reprov'd them for it, told them the dangerous consequences that must inevitably attend such a treacherous action, which, he thought, must end in the destruction of himself and family. To all this his haughty sons only e replied, Is then our sister to be treated like a common prostitute? And here it is not hard to guess how soon, or how easily the inhabitants of the neighbourhood could have repayed their treacherous cruelty with interest, had not God interposed, and sent such a pannick fear amongst them, that they did even let them

Shechem's
amour with Dinah.
Year of the
Flood, 1267.
Year before
Christ, 1732.
Hamor demands her marriage of his son.

Jacob's sons treachery.

They enter the city, and destroy all the males, &c.

<sup>b</sup> Judg. viii. 13. & seq. <sup>c</sup> Gen. xii. 7. Annal. USSER. p. 9. CALM. Hist. O. T. 205. VILLET. & al. <sup>d</sup> John iv. 6. & seq. <sup>e</sup> Judg. ix. 7. <sup>m</sup> JOSEPH. Antiq. l. i. c. 21. † Vid. sup. p. 329.

namely, from the dread and dangers he had been in of his brother Esau, and not because he was cured of his lameness, as the Jews imagine.

(G) The word Kesbitab, קֶסֶבִּיטָב, which is here rendered a piece of money, signifies also a lamb; from whence Onkelas (193), the Septuagint, Vulgate, Oleaster, and others, have translated it an hundred lambs, as they have also that place in Job, where every one of his friends gave him a Kesbitab; but it is more likely that they gave him a piece of money than a lamb; for that would be of greater service to him in the condition he was in. All the Jewish interpreters, except Onkelas above-named, render it by the word מָנָה (194), which signifies a piece of money of about the value of a penny; and tells us, that the Arabians called money Kesbitab (195). It is more probable therefore that it was a small coin that had a lamb stamped upon it, and was called by that name, as we do call an Angel, from the stamp it bears of one. As for those who think that this price was hardly sufficient to purchase such a piece of ground, it not amounting to above ten or twelve shillings (196), they should consider, that if a lamb in those days was worth no more than five farthings, or three half-pence, which is probable enough, money than bearing a higher value, an hundred lambs would be but equivalent to an hundred such pieces of money.

(193) Targ. Onkel. in loc. (194) Vid. MUNST. in loc. (195) Ap. VILLET. (196) LE SCENE'S Essay on a new Translat. p. 166.

depart

depart quietly, and carry off all the plunder they had got from the slaughtered Shechemites. a

Jacob is bid to go and dwell at Bethel.

HOWEVER, GOD was soon pleased to dissipate his fears once more, by speaking to him in a dream, and bidding him go to Bethel, where he had formerly appeared to him when he fled from his brother, and to dwell there, and build an altar unto him. Here Jacob, conscious of all the idols, teraphims, and other superstitious trash which his family had brought with them, whether from Padan-Aram, or from the plunder of the Shechemites, and unwilling to carry any thing with him that might be displeasing to GOD, ordered a thorough search to be made after them, in order to have them, not, indeed, destroyed, as one might have expected, but buried in a deep hole, which he caused to be digged at the foot of b a famous oak near Shechem. His commands were forthwith obeyed, and they parted even with their very ear-rings, which they used to wear as talismans, or charms, against sickness and other misfortunes°. After which Jacob and his whole family set out with all they had, and arrived safely at Luz, afterwards called Bethel: none of the neighbouring inhabitants daring to pursue after him. As soon as he came there, he built an altar to GOD, and called it El Bethel, or the GOD of Beth- el: soon after which Deborah, his mother's nurse (H), died, and was buried under an oak at the foot of the hill of Bethel, and the place was called Allon Bachuth, or the oak of mourning. He made but a short stay at Bethel, being desirous to go to visit his father, whom, for ought we find, he had not seen since he went to Me- c sopotamia: but as he was marching towards Ephraim, Rachel fell in labour at a small distance from the place, and perceiving that it would cost her her life, called the child Ben-oni, or the son of my affliction; but after she was dead, Jacob changed that name, too likely perhaps to revive his grief for her loss, into that of Benjamin, or the son of my right-hand. Rachel was buried in the way to Ephraim, and a stone monument was reared over the grave, which was still to be seen in Moses's time. This was not the only misfortune Jacob met with in this place: for his son Reuben, having taken a liking to Bilhah, his father's concubine, and Rachel's maid, did not scruple to lie with her: which, when his father heard, made so deep an impression in his heart, that he grieved at it to his dying day°. Soon after this Jacob left that d

Their idols buried.

Deborah dies.

Rachel dies,
and is buried
at Ephraim.

Reuben's incest.

Isaac dies,
and is buried
by his two sons.

melancholy place, and came at length to Mamre, to his old father Isaac, with whom he continued almost the space of thirteen years, some say, nineteen, that is, till the good old man departed this life, which he did in a very advanced age, being an hundred and eighty years old, and having been almost blind and decrepid a considerable number of years (I). His two sons buried him in the cave of Machpela with Abraham and Sarah; after which Esau returned home, and Jacob continued at *Mamre*¹.

HOWEVER, the happiness which Jacob had enjoyed during his stay with his father, had not been without some alloy. Joseph was about seventeen years of age, and was become his darling, in regard of his excellencies of body and mind; be- c

° Gen. xxxiv. p. tot.    ° See CALMET Comm. in Gen. xxxv. 4.    ° Gen. xlix. 4.    ¹ Gen. xxxv. p. tot.

(H) It is not easy to guess how so very old a woman as Rebecca's nurse must then be, should be found in his retinue, unless we suppose, that she was sent by Isaac to enquire after Jacob's welfare. Calvin, and others, indeed think, that she went with him into Mesopotamia, having a desire to see her own country again; and that when she heard that he was gone for the land of Canaan, her desire to see Rebecca made her follow him thither; but it is unlikely that a woman, at her years, should take such rambles: For if we suppose her to have been forty years old when she was taken in to be Rebecca's nurse (and less than that she could hardly be, seeing she was not taken to suckle her, but to bring her up as a governess) she must have been near an hundred and seventy years old when she died. The Rabbins tell us, that Rebecca having promised her son, at his departure, that she would send for him again as soon as she found that he was out of danger, did now send Deborah to fetch him back; but besides that a younger messenger would have been more proper, it is certain Jacob was not sent for, but called by GOD, and drove by Laban's cruel usage out of that country.

(I) The Jews tell us, that the masters who taught Isaac the law of GOD, were the patriarchs Shem and Heber, who were still living; and that when Abraham took him with him to mount Moriah to sacrifice him there, he told Sarah that he was going with him to the school of Shem (197). They likewise attribute to him the composing of the noon-prayers which they constantly use: For they think Abraham was the author of those of the morning, and Jacob of those of the evening, and Isaac of those of noon*.

(197) SCAMBAT. Archiv. Vet. Test. l. 2. p. 197.

* FABRIC. Apocryph. Vet. Test. 434.

a sides, his father had observed something extraordinary and promising in him, beyond what he could see in his other sons, which made him so excessively fond of him (K), that it procured him the envy of all his brothers. What encreased it still more was, that Joseph having observed some vile actions in the sons of Bilbab and Zilpbab, with whom his father had sent him to feed the sheep, in hopes that they would pay him a greater regard than his other brethren, came and acquainted him with it. But he himself helped to compleat their envy, or rather, to turn it into an irreconcilable hatred, by innocently telling them some dreams he had, which seemed to foreshew, that he should one day get the power and authority over them. One of them was, that he saw in a wheat-field his own sheaf standing upright, and theirs falling down before it, and paying homage to it. Another was, that he saw the sun, moon, and eleven stars, doing the like obeisance to him. This last he likewise told to his father, who, though he could not perhaps but be delighted with it, and think it significative of some great fortune that would attend him; yet, observing with what envy his brethren heard it, thought fit to rebuke him severely before them, asking him, if he thought that his father, mother, and brethren were to bow themselves to the earth to him? But this rather helped to encrease their hatred against him, and made them resolve to contrive his death. It was not long before an opportunity offered itself to them. Jacob being uneasy that he had not heard from them for some time, since their removing their flocks to Shechem, and fearing lest some ill luck had befallen them there, sent Joseph to enquire after them. When he came thither he was told that they were removed further off, about twenty miles further north towards Dudaim. He went after them, and they no sooner saw him, but they all agreed to make away with the dreamer, as they called him, and to make their father believe, that some wild beast had devoured him. They had certainly executed their bloody design, without any regard either to his tears, his age, or to the grief which the news of his death would cause to their aged father, had not Reuben dissuaded them from imbruing their hands in his blood, and advised them to throw him alive into a pit, and let hunger and grief perform that cruel office. Whether the fear of the guilt of blood, or desire d to make him die a more lingering death, prevailed upon them to take the advice; they let him down into the pit, after which, as if they had performed some noble exploit, they sat down to eat and to drink. In the interim a troop of Ishmaelites happening to pass by, with spices and balm from Gilead, and bound for Egypt†, Judah persuaded his brethren to sell him to them, since his death would do them no more service than his being carried down into that country. His project was approved, and Joseph was sold to the merchants, and carried off unknown to Reuben, whose design was to have got him out of the pit, and to have sent him back privately to his father. The surprize and concern he was in when he found him gone, forced such complaints from him, that they soon understood what his meaning had been. They took therefore the more care that he should not know what was become of him. Soon after this, having dipped his party-coloured coat, which they had stripped him of, in some kids blood, they sent it home to their father; who no sooner saw it, than he supposed that his beloved child had been torn in pieces by some wild beast. He took his supposed loss so to heart, that he did not cease mourning for him, till he heard the surprizing news of his advancement in Egypt‡ (L), where Joseph happened to be sold to an officer of the king's guard,

Hated by his brethren.

His two dreams.

He is sold, and carried down into Egypt.

† Gen. xxxvii. p. tot.

† Vid. sup. p. 301. a.

(K) Most versions, as well as ours, have made Jacob to love Joseph, because he was the son of his old age; whereas he had two sons younger than he, viz Zebulun and Benjamin, and this last was born above fifteen years after him. It seems they have confounded the words בן זקנים Ben Zekenim, the son of senators or elders, as he is called here, with בן זקנה Ben Ziknah, the son of old age. But the former has a quite different meaning, it signifying, according to the Hebrew idiom, the son or disciple of senators; that is, because he was endued with extraordinary wisdom and prudence. Accordingly the Samaritan, Persian, and Arabic versions have rendered it, because he was a wise and prudent son; though even this comes short of the energy of the idiom, and might be more properly translated, because he was wise and prudent as a senator. And as it is natural for parents, especially fathers, to admire those children that shew any degree of wisdom above their years, so Jacob had a great deal of reason to express a more than ordinary love for such a son; whereas, to be fond of a child of old age, had Joseph been even such, is but a common piece of dotage, which Moses would hardly have thought worth recording (198.)

(L) Justin, in epitome of Trogus, makes mention of Joseph's being sold into Egypt by his brethren,

(198) Vid. LE SCÈS. Essay.

Sold there to Potiphar: Is solicited to an amour
by his mistress.

named Potiphar (M). Here Joseph shewed such diligence and integrity, and proved a so successful in all he undertook, that his master soon took notice of him, and committed the care of all his affairs wholly into his hands. He had been about ten years in Potiphar's house, when his extraordinary beauty and comeliness began to inflame his mistress's heart, and she not being over-nice in such matters, made no difficulty to disclose the secret to him in such plain terms as would force a direct answer from him. But how great was her surprize, when instead of the chearful compliance she probably expected, she found herself denied, and severely reprimanded for her disloyal passion! However, being willing to hope that another opportunity might prove more favourable, after several fruitless attempts, she laid hold on one when all the family was abroad, and accosted him in so passionate and violent a manner, as gave him to understand, that she would not bear any further denial. Joseph thinking it now safer to flee, than to stay and expostulate with her, was forced to leave his upper garment behind, which she held so fast that he could not get it out of her hands. This last affront so enraged her, that she resolved his immediate ruin. She began with setting up a most horrid out-cry, which soon brought in all the people that were within the hearing of it, then shewing them Joseph's cloak, she told them that he had made so furious an attempt upon her chastity, that nothing but her loud cries could have delivered her from him. By that time her spouse came home, she had dressed up her story so well, and made such use of the dumb witness she had torn from him, that she was easily believed. Had Potiphar loved him less than he did, it is probable he would have sacrificed him that minute to his resentment; but he contented himself for the present with sending him into the king's prison<sup>a</sup>, where we shall leave him for a while, to take a view of what passed in his father's family.

His refusal makes her accuse him.

He is sent to prison.

Judah's marriage with a Canaanite.
Er's death.

Not long after Joseph had been sold into Egypt, Judah chanced to marry the daughter of a Canaanite, whose name was Shuab, by whom he had three sons (N), Er, Onan, and Shelab. Er being cut off for his wickedness, before he had any children by his wife Tamar, Judah bid his second son Onan to take her, according to the custom of that country, and to raise a posterity to his brother. Onan obeyed seemingly, but not brooking the thoughts that his children should be esteemed his brother's, took such a wicked and unnatural way to prevent Tamar's conceiving by him, that God was provoked to punish him with death also (O). Judah there-and death.

Onan's sin

<sup>a</sup> Gen. xxxix. p. tot.

then, who envied the excellency of his wit; and having got him privately into their hands, sold him to some merchants, who carried him down into that country (199).

(M) It may not be improper to observe here, that though the text calls Potiphar an eunuch, yet he was not a real one, as the LXX render it, and the Jews fancy; some of whom think that he was not so thoroughly castrated, but that some of the strings being left, might make him desire a wife (200); for though the Hebrew word סריס Saris, doth properly signify an eunuch, yet is often used to signify an officer belonging to the court, and near to the king's person. He is also called שר טבחים Sar Tabachim, which, in its primitive meaning, signifies the prince of the butchers, from Tabach, which signifies to kill, slaughter, or, what is best express'd by the French word, Egorger. For which reason, some have rendered it the prince of the cooks (201). But as the matter is of no great importance, we have followed the English version, which agrees in this with the generality of interpreters (202).

(N) It is not easy to guess at what time Judah had these three sons by this Canaanitish woman; and if we take the words in the original, at that time, in a strict sense, as if it happened about the time that Joseph was sold, he must have been too young, being but twenty-two years of age; for Joseph was seventeen years old, and he could not be above four or five years older, being the fourth son of Leah, and he and Joseph both born within the compass of seven years. So that the most that can be thought, is, that he had married either a little before Joseph was sold, or about that time; and that the latter part of the story of his son's marriage and death, and the business of Tamar, happened during the twenty years that Joseph continued in Egypt. And therefore, though Moses relates all these events in the chapter preceding that which gives an account of his disgrace and imprisonment, it is most probable, that he has done it to prevent intermingling the story of those two brothers too much, and so has made an end of Judah's adventures, before he went on with those of Joseph. Neither need we think strange that Judah and his sons should marry so young, since we have other instances in scripture of the like nature; such as that of Abaz, Hezekiah's father, who was but eleven years old when he was born; for Abaz was but thirty-six when he died, and his son was twenty-five when he began to reign (203), though he was his immediate successor. And if a prince in those latter days could have a child at that age, much more might they that lived in Judah's time.

(O) Though Onan's sin was in itself great enough, yet it is very probable that it was aggravated with a worse circumstance, viz. his having an eye to the suppressing the Messiah's coming, since

(199) JUSTIN. l. 36. c. 2.

(200) D. KIMKI, & al.

(201) Vid. MERCER. JUN. & al.

(202) JOSEPH. PHILO. AMBR. & al.

(203) 2 Kings xvi. 2. Ibid. c. xviii. 2.

a fore bid her remain a widow in her father's house, till his third son was grown old enough to supply his brother's place; but when she saw that time come, and that he neglected to send for her, as indeed he never designed it, lest Shelah should meet with the fate of his two brothers, she resolved to make herself amends by some other way, which she effected by the following stratagem.

JUDAH had buried his wife about this time, and was still young enough to feel the want of her. As soon therefore as the usual days of mourning were over, it being then the season of sheep-sheering, he resolved to try whether that diversion might allay his grief. He took an intimate friend with him, and went up to Timnath, the place where the shearers were at work. In the mean while Tamar hearing of it, resolved to make use of that opportunity to set on work her design. She put off her widow's garments, and dressing herself like a curtezan, and throwing her veil over her face (P), set herself between the two ways that lead to Timnath, through one of which the knew her father-in-law must needs pass.

JUDAH (Q) no sooner spied her, but thinking her to be what she appeared, Judah and Tamar began to make his addresses to her, and she insisting only upon a reward for her compliance, he promised her to send her a kid, and at her desire left her his seal, his bracelet, and staff, as a pledge for it. The encounter being over, Judah sent his friend Adullam, for that was his name, with the kid, to redeem the pledges, but in vain, for she was gone home; neither did the men of the place, of whom he enquired, know any thing of such a woman plying there. He went to Judah and told him his ill success, who, fearing to be exposed for his amour, answered his friend, let her keep the pledges, as long as I have performed my promise to her, as you yourself will bear me witness.

BUT the matter was not so indifferent as he thought. Some months after word Tamar with child was brought to him, that his daughter-in-law had proved disloyal, and was certainly with child. Judah, though glad at the news, because her death would free him from his promise of giving his son Shelah to her, pretended to be highly provoked at her incontinency, and ordering her to be brought forth, condemned her Condemned to be burnt to be burnt according to the laws of the country. Tamar, instead of being surprised at the dreadful sentence, which he had pronounced against her (R), pro-since he should not have the honour to be numbered among his ancestors (204); and this might provoke God to cut him off. As for the sin of his elder brother, it is thought to have been the same with Onan's, but committed with a different view, that Tamar might not spoil her beauty and shape by bearing of children; but this is only a rabbinic conjecture.

(P) The text says, that Judah thought her to be a harlot, because she had covered her face. From whence some have fancied that she had covered it with paint; but these are sufficiently reprov'd and confuted by Abenezra (205). Others think that the veil over the face was the sign of a harlot (206); but whether they were so shame-faced in those days, or not, it seems rather that she had veiled herself that Judah might not know her. What therefore made him think her to be a curtezan, was her sitting alone in such a conspicuous place; for so the original may be rendered. If it be asked, how she could prevent her voice from betraying her, all that can be said is, either that she had an art of altering it so as not to be known, as some people have; or, which is more probable, that Judah was so hot in pursuit of his pleasure, that it did not permit him to make any reflection about it. Vid. our next note.

(Q) It seems by this action of Tamar, that she had observed something of this propensity to women in him, whilst she lived with his two sons, else it is not probable that such a project should come into her head; neither would she have appeared so sure of the success, as she seems to have been by the sequel. And indeed, it is plain that it was neither the virtue nor sanctity of the twelve patriarchs, that recommended them to the favour of God, but his covenant with Abraham, and the glorious designs of his providence on their posterity. And this is what Moses told the Israelites in the wilderness in more places than one (207).

(R) Some think that Judah, as head of his own family, had power of life and death over all that belonged to it; but it is hardly probable that the Canaanites, in whose country he dwelt, would give a stranger such a power. 'Tis more likely therefore, that he meant only, that she should be brought before a court of judicature, and sentenced according to the laws of the country. However, whether judge or prosecutor, 'tis certain he acted like an unrighteous one; for Tamar could not be justly accused of adultery, which alone condemned her to be burnt, unless it were because he had betrothed her to his son Shelah, by the promise he made her to marry her to him, and which, it is plain, he did not design to keep; otherwise, it was lawful for widows to seek their fortune elsewhere, as appears by what Naomi said to her two daughters-in-law (208). It was, moreover, an inhuman thing to put a woman to death before she was delivered; and the Romans, bad as they were with respect to children, whom they used to expose when they thought them burdensome, had yet a law to prevent a pregnant woman being put to death before her delivery (209). But it is probable that his eagerness to be rid of her, made him speak more unadvisedly than he would have done, had she been a more indifferent person. Upon the whole it appears, that Josephus looked upon

(204) Vid. ALIX. in Pentat.(205) ABENEZRA in loc.(206) JUN. CALV. et al. in loc.(207) Deut. pass.(208) Ruth i. 9.(209) ÆLIAN. l. 5.

Is absolved.

A strange birth.

Joseph.

Dreams of two prisoners explained.

Pharaoh's two dreams interpreted by Joseph.

Year of the Flood, 1284.
Year before Christ, 1715.

duced the pledges he had left with her, and told him that she was got with child <sup>a</sup> by the owner of them. Whereupon Judab, in a confusion and surprize, owned that she was the more innocent of the two, and that he had wronged her in withholding Shelah from her. He afterwards conducted her home, but never touched her from that time. When her full time was come she brought forth twins; but the manner of their being born was something surprizing; for one of them put forth his hand, about which the midwife tied a scarlet thread, probably to try whether he would come out the first: but when he withdrew his hand, and his brother shewed him the way into the world; his mother called him Phares, or breach, by reason of the breach he had made between his brother and him; and the other was called Zarab <sup>b</sup>.

JOSEPH in the mean while was got into such favour with the keeper of the prison that he entrusted him with the care of all the prisoners. Two of them, men of some distinction; viz. Pharaoh's chief butler and baker, being very sad and thoughtful one morning about a dream which each of them had, Joseph being informed of the cause and the dream, gave each of them its particular interpretation, telling them also the precise time when they should see them fulfilled. Accordingly three days after the butler was restored to his place, and the baker hanged (S). Joseph took this opportunity of addressing himself to the former, and to beg his assistance and interest to get him out of prison, telling him at the same time how inhumanly he had been sold out of his country, and falsely accused by <sup>c</sup> his mistress, and what else he thought proper to move him to comply with his request.

BUT the butler being got at liberty and restored to his place, never remembered his fellow prisoner for two whole years, till a remarkable accident forced him, as it were, to call him to mind. The king his master had had two very frightful and portentous dreams in one night, the meaning of which he had in vain enquired of all his Egyptian wisemen, none of whom could give him the least light into them. The uneasiness which appeared in Pharaoh's countenance, and the search he ordered to be made for some more learned interpreters, did soon make our courtier recollect what Joseph had foretold him in the prison. He went therefore instantly to the <sup>d</sup> king, and after an humble apology for his ingratitude and forgetfulness, acquainted him, that two years before there was an Hebrew youth in prison with him who had interpreted his and the baker's dream with a more than ordinary exactness, and seemed to have a much greater talent in that way, than all the wisemen that had been hitherto consulted. Pharaoh was too eager to be satisfied about his own, not to send immediately for Joseph, who having washed and shaved himself, and changed his cloaths, was forthwith introduced to his majesty. He no sooner appeared than the king told him his dreams, and promised him a considerable reward if he could give him an interpretation of them. Pharaoh had dreamed that he had seen seven lusty fat cows feeding on the banks of the Nile; soon after which <sup>e</sup> seven others lean and ill-favoured ones came and devoured them; and yet did neither look the fatter or bigger for it. His second dream was much of the same kind; viz. seven full ears of corn devoured by seven blasted ones. Joseph answered the king with his usual modesty, that the seven cows and seven ears signified the same thing; that the dream being repeated, was only a sign that the thing was to happen immediately after. That the seven fat cows and full ears signified seven succeeding years of plenty, which would nevertheless be quite forgotten in the seven succeeding years of famine, signified by the seven lean cows and blasted ears. He

* Gen. xxxviii. p. tot.

on all the transactions mentioned in this chapter to be so little for the credit of Judab and his sons, that he has suppressed them all. This is one, though far from the only one, of the instances we told the reader of in a former note, of his suppressing any thing that cast a reflection on his nation †: The rest will come in course.

(S) Our translation has rendered the expression which Joseph uses to the butler and the baker, shall lift up thy head, too literally, since they would then imply that both would have the same fate; whereas they proved quite opposite. The words in the original mean, that in three days

Pharaoh would have them brought forth and examined; for the expression here rendered lift up the head, signifies to muster, to call to an account, and to take the sum of any thing; and the sequel shews this to have been the true meaning, since, after such examination, the one was hanged, and the other re-instated. It seems, therefore, probable, by the expression here used, that they had been suspected or accused of cheating the king; and that when their accounts had been examined, and cast up, the one was found guilty, and the other cleared.

† Vid. sup. p. 443.

thereupon

a thereupon advised the king to appoint some wise and expert men over his whole kingdom, who should take care to build granaries, and set officers in every province, to lay up a fifth part of all the corn of the seven plentiful years, against the succeeding years of famine.

THE king and all that heard him, were surprized at the wisdom of this young stranger, who was then but thirty years old, and concluded that he was the fittest person to be set over the kingdom, and to put his proposal in execution. He was thereupon made master and overseer of Pbaraob's house; and orders were given that he should be obeyed in all things, as if he had been Pbaraob himself. The king stopped not here, but took his signet off his finger and gave it to him, caused b him to be clothed in fine linen, and put a golden chain about his neck, telling him that he appointed him super-intendant over the whole kingdom, and the next unto himself in authority: he gave him moreover the name of Zaphnatb-paaneab, which signifies a revealer of secrets (T). And to compleat his happiness, he gave him the daughter of Potipherab, priest, or prince of On, to wife (U); and made him ride in his second chariot, while some men that ran before it cried, bow the knee (W). Joseph being raised to this height of power, took a progress through the whole kingdom, built his granaries, appointed proper officers in every place, and, in a word, ordered all things with such prudence and application, that before the seven years of plenty were over, he found his stores filled above numbering. c During this time he had two sons born of his wife Asenath. The first of whom he called Manasseh, intimating that God had made him forget all his toils; and the next he called Ephraim, because God had made him fruitful in the land of his affliction. Joseph's advancement and glory.
His marriage.
Manasseh and Ephraim born.

THESE seven plentiful years were succeeded immediately by the other seven, neither was the scarcity confined to the land of Egypt, but was felt all over the land of Canaan, and all the nations round about it. As soon therefore as the Egyptians came to be pinched for want of bread, they presented themselves to Pbaraob, who commanded them to apply to Joseph; upon which he immediately ordered his stores to be opened, and corn to be sold to the people, who flocked to him, not d only from all parts of Egypt, but from all the neighbouring countries.

By this time Jacob, who was not exempt from the common calamity, hearing that there was corn to be bought in Egypt, sent ten of his sons to get a supply

<sup>a</sup> Gen. xli. p. tot.

(T) These are not Hebrew words, as some rabbies dream (210), who render it by צַפְנָתַבְפָּנֵאֵב, צַפְנָתַבְפָּנֵאֵב, for though the first word may be derived from צַפַּן Zaphan, to hide; yet the original of Paaneab is not to be found in the Hebrew. St. Jerom, and others, think it signifies the SAVIOUR of the world in the Egyptian tongue (211); but it is most probable, that it signifies the revealer of secrets, and is accordingly so rendered by most Jewish and Christian expositors (212).

(U) As it is not likely that Joseph should be grown so great a courtier in so short a time, as to have forgot his religion, especially since we find him making so ample a profession of it to his brothers seven years after (213); so neither is it probable that he would have married the daughter of an uncircumcised, whether prince or priest. But it was not so with Potipherab, who could not but be desirous to purchase so advantageous an alliance at any rate, and therefore might easily be induced by Joseph to remove that only obstacle, by becoming circumcised. This was therefore a fair opportunity for him to introduce that ceremony among the Egyptian priests, which might, afterwards, be received also by the laity. However that be, we must not mistake the city of On for that of No, threatened with destruction by Ezekiel (214), which was Alexandria. On here was Heliopolis, the chief city of the canton of that name, called by Ptolomy, Onium (215), distant about twenty miles from Memphis, the metropolis of the kingdom †. Neither must we confound this Potipherab with that to whom Joseph had been sold, as St. Jerom has done. 'Tis much more probable that they were two distinct persons, 1. Because the names are differently written; the first Potiphar, and the other Potipherab, or rather Potipherangb, ending with the letter y (Ain). 2. The one is called captain of the guards, the other priest, or prince of On. 3. The former therefore must have his residence in the capital, to be always about the king; the other lived at On, or Heliopolis. And lastly, it is not likely that Joseph would have ventured to marry his master's daughter, who might have proved like her mother, whose incontinency he had so severely smarted for (216).

(W) The Jews, Kimki excepted, unwilling to suppose that so religious a man as Joseph would suffer the ceremony of bowing the knee to be performed to him, have divided the word אֲבֹרָךְ Abrek, and read it אֲבֹרָךְ Ab rak, which, in Hebrew, signifies tender father; by which they understand, that he was a father with respect of his consummate wisdom, and tender with respect of his years (217). And it is certain, that if the word be Hebrew, it signifies both bow the knee, and tender father; but if it be Egyptian, we are to seek for the meaning of it. Josephus says nothing of this circumstance, probably, because, for want of understanding the Hebrew, he was forced to follow the Septuagint, which renders it bow the knee.

(210) RAMBAM. (211) HIERON. in loc. EGUBIN, &c. (212) Targ. ONKEL. in loc. JOSEPH. Ant. l. 2. c. 6. LXX. GROT. JUN. in loc. & al. (213) Gen. xlii. 18. (214) Ezek. xxx. 16. (215) Vid. HIERON. loc. Hebr. † Vid. sup. p. 176. (216) AUGUST. quæst. in Gen. i. 36. CHRYSOST. Homil. 63. in Gen. MERCER. JUN. MUSCUL. & al. (217) Targ. ONKEL. R. JERUD. & al.

from thence, and kept only Benjamin with him. These, upon their arrival into a Egypt, were directed to Joseph, whom they must apply to for an order; and as soon as they saw him, they prostrated themselves before him, and begged they might be allowed to buy provision with other strangers. Joseph knew them immediately, though he was so altered that they could not call him to mind; he put on a severe look, and in an angry tone, asked them whence they came? and upon their answering, from the land of Canaan, he charged them with being spies, who were come to discover the weakness of the land. Such an unexpected accusation forced them to justify themselves; they told him in the most submissive terms, that they were come with no other design than to buy corn for their family, which was very numerous, they being all one man's sons; that they had left another, a younger brother, with their father, besides a twelfth who was now dead. This was what Joseph wanted, who in a surly commanding tone told them, that unless one of them fetched this youngest son, whilst the rest were kept in safe custody, he would not be persuaded but that they were spies, and would punish them as such. To shew that he was in earnest, he sent them all to prison, and kept them there three days; at the end of which he sent for them, and putting on a milder aspect, said to them, this do, and live; for I fear God. Let one of you remain a prisoner with me, whilst the rest go home with provision for your family; and when you bring your youngest brother hither, he shall be delivered up safe, and you justified. He then commanded Simeon, who had been perhaps one of his most zealous enemies, to be bound before their eyes, and sent to prison, whilst he had the pleasure to hear them confess their inhumanity towards their brother, whose bitter cries had not been able to soften them to pity; acknowledging that this misfortune had befallen them as a just punishment for it. Here Reuben had an opportunity of justifying himself, by reminding them of the pains he took to dissuade them from the horrid fact, little thinking who heard him, any more than his brethren; for Joseph spoke to them by an interpreter. At length, having learned all that he wanted to know, he dismissed them, not without contriving a fresh occasion of surprize to them after they were gone, having bid the officer, who was to fill their sacks with corn, to return their money in the mouth of the sacks. Accordingly, when they came to bait, and to give some provender to their beasts, they were not a little frightened to find all their money in their sacks, and failed not to make all the dismal reflexions upon it that their fear could suggest to them; concluding, that the haughty Egyptian lord had done it, that he might have a pretence to enslave them at their next coming. As soon as they were got home they acquainted their father with all these adventures, who, though he was grieved at the detention of his son Simeon, was much more so when he found that Benjamin must go down to redeem him. He withstood all their persuasions as long as he could*, till at length the famine increasing, and the provision being almost spent, Judah prevailed with him to part with his favourite son for a time, promising to bring him safe back, or else to be answerable for him at the hazard of his own life (X). As it was not without the utmost reluctance that Jacob consented to

Joseph's brethren come to him for corn.

Joseph's rough behaviour to them.

Simeon kept bound.

Their money returned.

* Gen. xlii. p. tot.

(X) The whole conduct of Joseph, from his being first brought into Egypt to his discovering himself to his brethren, having been very much canvassed and disapproved, it will not be amiss to enquire how far it deserves it, and how far it may be justified, even abstracting from the hand of providence being concerned in it. First then, he is blamed for not having sent word to his father of his condition, who would have redeemed him at any rate, the city of Memphis, where he was sold, not being above eighty miles, at most, from Hebron, where Jacob dwelt. To this it may be answered, 1. That if he had returned home, his brethren would, in all likelihood, have taken a more effectual way to be rid of him, and, upon the first opportunity, have put their former bloody project in execution. And secondly, that Egypt being the place where he expected the preferment which his dreams had fore-signified to him, it was by no means advisable for him to leave it, but to wait patiently there for the event. Again, he is blamed for his rough and unjust usage towards his brethren, which, it is pretended, savours of the rankest revenge: but it is plain, that if revenge had been the chief motive of his behaviour, he could have indulged it in a more effectual way, without any danger of being called to an account for it: whereas it is plain, he had a much better design in it, namely, either to bring their heinous cruelty towards him into their remembrance, as it actually did †; or, 2. in order to inform himself of the state of his family, especially of his father, and of his brother Benjamin; or lastly, to make them relish his future kindness the better, by the rough usage they had met with before. The last, and indeed the most considerable thing he is blamed for is, his sending for his brother Benjamin, which he knew, his former behaviour considered, would cause an infinite deal of grief to his aged father, if not break his heart: and if he refused to send him,

the

† Gen. xlii. 21, & seq.

this

a this separation, so he failed not to give his sons the strictest charge about him, and to take all the proper measures for their safe return, and to gain the favour of the proud Egyptian lord. He bid them carry double their money, and make ready such presents as they thought would be acceptable to him (Y); and having treated heaven, not without abundance of tears, for their good success, dismissed them; little dreaming what glorious news he should hear at their return, to make him amends for his son's absence. They no sooner appeared before Joseph, with their brother Benjamin, but he commanded his steward to conduct them to his house, where he designed they should dine with him. But they who had abandoned themselves to fear, began to suspect that some ill design was hatching to enslave them upon the account of the money which they had found in their sacks. To prevent therefore, as much as they could, any quarrel arising upon that score, they acquainted the steward with the whole affair before they entered the house; adding, that they had brought it back with them, with a new supply to buy their fresh provisions. The steward seeing their concern, bid them not be under any apprehensions about it, for they should never be asked for it again. He then brought them into the house, ordered them water to wash their feet, and provender for their beasts, and at the same time he brought Simeon unbound to them. He afterwards acquainted them, that they were to dine with his lord, who would be back by noon; upon which they set themselves about making ready their presents, which they accordingly laid before him with the utmost reverence, as soon as he came home. Joseph having saluted them round, began to enquire after their father's health, and whether that was their youngest brother that stood before him. Benjamin bowed his head to the ground, and Joseph having blessed him, ordered the victuals to be brought in, and made them sit down by themselves, and to be served according to their rank and seniority, whilst he sat at a table by himself, and his Egyptian guests at another by themselves; it being then an abomination to the Benjamin

and his brethren dine with Joseph.

the whole family must starve at home, and Simeon remain in bonds. As for the latter part of the charge, Joseph had it still in his power to have remedied it, since, if he had found that his other brethren stayed longer than ordinary, he could but have sent Simeon home with what message and supply he pleased. But as for the other part of his behaviour, his causing Jacob to pass so many days, if not weeks, in all the fear and anxiety that so dear a son's absence and danger could cause; it cannot easily be justified any other way, than by supposing that Joseph did certainly foresee what would happen, and that his father's grieving sometime for Benjamin, would be so far from endangering his health, that it would only increase his joy when he saw him again, and give a greater relish to the news of his own advancement and success in Egypt. Without this supposition, 'tis plain, such a sudden transition from an excess of sorrow to one of joy, was of itself sufficient to have deprived him of his life, or of his senses.

(Y) It is to be feared the generality of our expositors have not been very happy in their translation of some of the presents which Jacob sent into Egypt, which has induced some learned critics of a later date (218), to endeavour to give us a more rational account of them, such as the hony, nuts, and almonds, which could be no great rarities in Egypt; nor, indeed, any of the others, except the balm, which was that of Gilead, and of great price all the world over. A small quantity therefore of it was a present worth accepting; but as for rosin, or wax, as many of our interpreters have rendered it, it could not be worth sending.

Bochart, and others after him, do indeed think that it was either rosin or turpentine, rather than balm of Gilead; because Gilead was on one side Jordan, and Jacob was then at some small distance from it on the other: but that doth not prove that there was none to be bought there, or to be sent for upon such an occasion. He adds indeed, that Josephus affirms balm to have been unknown in Judea, till the queen of Sheba brought some of it to Solomon from Arabia Felix: but Josephus may be mistaken. Besides, how came Gilead to be so famous for it afterwards? The queen hardly brought the trees there, and if Solomon had sent for them afterwards, he would have planted them, in all likelihood, nearer to him: but whatever it was, 'tis plain that rosin and turpentine could not be a present worth Joseph's acceptance. The next is hony, which was indeed very much admired by the ancients, as well Jews as Gentiles, for a delicious food (219); but unless that of Canaan was better than ordinary, it was hardly a present worth sending to an Egyptian prime minister, since 'tis morally impossible that country should be without it. It is more likely, therefore, that they were dates, which are called by the same name דבש (Debsch) as the Jewish doctors observe, and which, when full ripe, yield a sort of hony not inferior to the other. The Arabick calls dates Duboor, and the hony of them dibo or dibis, to this day; and it is plain that Judea abounded in palm-trees of all sorts, more especially about Jericho, if we may believe Josephus and Pliny. The next is what we translate spices; but the Hebrew word נכמל Nakhel, doth rather signify storax than spices, being a precious aromatick gum, that was put into all their rich spicy ointments (220). Myr, or as it is in the original מולך Lot, is rather the stacte or ladanum of the Chaldee and Septuagint, the last name coming nearer the Hebrew word. It is thought to be the gum of the cypress-tree, and was one of the aromatics in the perfume prescribed by God to Moses (221).

(218) BOCHART Hierof. l. 4. p. 531. & seq. LE SCENE'S Essay. Essay towards a new translation of the Bible, and others. (219) 1 Sam. xiv. 27. 2 Sam. xvii. 29. Cant. v. 9. HOMER. Iliad. λ. ver. 630. Odyss. η. ver. 69. SUTTON. de NERON. c. 27. & al. (220) Vid. BOCHART. Hierof. ubi supr. (221) Exod. xxx. 34.

Egyptians to eat with the Hebrews (Z). Joseph, according to the custom of the country, and of those times*, sent dishes from his own table to all his brethren, and they were not a little surprized to see how exactly he served them according to their seniority; but much more so, when they saw Benjamin's portion five times larger than any of the rest, which was an usual mark of honour to the person to whom it was sent. After they had eat and drank plentifully, they began to think of taking their leave, and of going about their other affairs†; but Joseph had yet one fright more in reserve for them before he discovered himself. He bid his steward to put his drinking-cup into Benjamin's sack, and to overtake them at some distance off the city, and after a thorough search, to bring the pretended thief back to him. The thing was punctually executed, and we may easily imagine their surprise and concern when the silver cup was produced out of the sack of their younger brother. They made all possible haste to load their asses again, and returned to Joseph, who received them with a warm reprimand for thus requiting his kindness and civility to them; which he concluded however with assuring them, that, though he might justly punish them all, yet the person only upon whom the cup was found should remain a slave, whilst the rest might go home in peace. After they had expressed their grief and shame in the humblest manner they were able, Judah, who had taken Benjamin under his care, having recovered himself from his surprize, addressed himself to Joseph in the most submissive and pathetick terms. He acquainted him with his father's extreme fondness for the lad, the great difficulty they had to persuade the good old gentleman to part with him, and the danger of his grieving to death for the loss of him. He likewise offered himself at the same time as an equivalent for his brother, with such zeal and concern, that Joseph was no longer able to contain himself. His‡ bowels began to yearn, and his tears to flow so fast, that he was forced to send all the by-standers away, whilst he made himself known to his brothers. He no sooner had told them that he was Joseph their brother, which was all that his full heart would let him utter, but they were all struck with such mixture of joy and surprize for a considerable time, that they could make him no answer; neither did they dare even to look towards him, to convince themselves whether it was really he or an illusion. By this time Joseph having recovered himself, desired them to draw nearer unto him; he embraced them all round with a surprizing tenderness, and to dispel all their further apprehensions, he told them that their selling him into Egypt having been directed by an unseen providence, and proved the means of so much good both to himself, to them, and to all Egypt, he would be so far from resenting it, that they should never hear it so much as mentioned by him from that day. Whilst this was doing some of the Egyptians, one of whom might be the interpreter, went and acquainted the king and the whole court, that Joseph's brethren were come to buy corn. Joseph had no design to make a secret of it, when he sent the Egyptians out of the room; he only wanted to be without witnesses whilst he discovered himself to them, dissipated their fears, acquainted them with his good fortune, and tried to persuade them to bring his father down with all their families and cattle; seeing there were yet five years of famine to come, during which the earth would hardly return the seed it had received. However the news had pleased Pharaoh so well, that he sent for him, and told him, that since his father had such a numerous family, and the scarcity not half over, he might send for them, and place them in what part of the country he thought fit; promising him that they should never want provisions nor any other favour he could shew them. He likewise

Joseph's cup found in Benjamin's sack.

Judah's speech to Joseph.

Joseph discovers himself.

Pharaoh's orders to Joseph.

* Vid. XENOPH. in vit. CYR. lib. 8. † Gen. xliii. p. tot. ‡ Gen. xliv. p. tot.

(Z) This extreme aversion of the Egyptians to eat with the Hebrews has been variously accounted for. Some attribute it to the excessive pride of that nation, which despised all but themselves; others to the Hebrews being shepherds, and so eating of the sheep, and other cattle, which the Egyptians worshipped (222). Accordingly we read in another chapter (223), that shepherds were also an abomination to the Egyptians, whether Hebrews, or otherwise; and Moses tells Pharaoh, that they could not sacrifice in Egypt what was an abomination to them (224); that is, to kill and eat part of those beasts which they worshipped (225): but the most probable reason of this aversion to shepherds, and to the Hebrews, as such, was the great oppression and tyranny under which they had groaned, when the Hyksos, or king-shepherds, as the word signifies, poured in upon them, enslaved, and held them in subjection, above five hundred years; and of which an account has been given in a former chapter (226).

(222) MUSCUL. MURST. TREMEL. & al. in loc. (223) Gen. xxxvi. 34. (224) Exod. viii. 26. (225) Chald. Paraph. in loc. (226) Vid. sup. p. 245. b. c. Vid. MANETHO apud JOSEPH. cont. APION.

bid

a bid him to send them a fresh supply of grain, and such other things as he thought they might want for their journey, and chariots, to bring their wives, children, and best moveables; telling them that they needed not regard the ordinary stuff, since the good of the land was before them. Joseph gladly obeyed the king's orders, and besides the chariots and provisions, sent to his father ten asses laden with the choicest commodities of Egypt; he likewise presented his brethren with changes of garments, and distinguished Benjamin by the addition of a large sum of money; after which he dismissed them with a strict charge that they should not fall out by the way. It is not to be doubted but their journey was performed more briskly this time than the last. They found their father alive and well, whose first b care was to look out for his favourite son, whom having joyfully received, he thought himself at the height of his happiness. But when they acquainted him with Joseph's grandeur, and told him, that he was the very man who had caused them such mortal frights, the good old man, not being able to bear so much good news at once, fainted away in their arms; and being come to himself, doubted whether it was not a dream. At length when they shewed him Joseph's presents and the Egyptian chariots, his doubts and fears vanished, and he cried out in an excess of joy, It is enough for me that my son Joseph lives, I have now nothing more to wish, but to go down and see him once more before I die<sup>a</sup>.

Joseph sends for his father, &c.

THIS great desire of seeing so dear a son, whom he had so long mourned for, in all his Egyptian glory, spurred him up to hasten his departure, and to overcome all the difficulties which the number of his children, cattle, and all the other lumber of household-stuff laid in his way. However, as his gratitude to God for all the mercies he saw himself blessed with, and his further want of the divine protection to accompany him safe into Egypt, demanded some fresh act of religion
c from him, he chose to go to Beerseba to offer some sacrifices there; both because it was the place where Abraham and Isaac had lived so long and so happily, and because it was in his way to Egypt, being the utmost boundary of Canaan towards the south. Here God appeared again unto him, and bid him not fear to go down,

Jacob goes down into Egypt.

d since he would be with him and protect him, and in due time bring his posterity out of it to enter into the possession of the promised land; adding moreover, that as for him, he should have the comfort to live near his son Joseph, to die in his arms, and to have his eyes closed by him. Jacob thus comforted and encouraged, hastened his way to the metropolis of Egypt, and when he came within some small distance from it, he sent Judab before to acquaint Joseph with his arrival, and to desire him to come to him in the land of Goshen, where he had promised to settle them (A). Joseph was no sooner informed of it, than he got up into his chariot, and went to meet his father; and their mutual joy upon this occasion was such, as is better imagined than expressed. As soon as this tender greeting was over, Joseph e told them, that he would go out of hand to give Pharaoh notice of their arrival, who would no doubt have the curiosity to send for them and to enquire after their occupation; in which case, he charged them to tell him, that they, as well as their fore-fathers, were shepherds from their youth. This was indeed an occupation which the Egyptians abominated, as we have seen before †; but Joseph had his ends in it, being probably afraid lest Pharaoh should detain them in his service, instead of sending them into the land of Goshen, where he was desirous to place them. Accordingly, when five of his brethren were brought before the king, and were asked what their profession was; they answered him as Joseph had bid them, adding, that the famine, which raged in Canaan, had forced them to come with all their cattle into Egypt, and begging that he would be pleased to appoint them the

Joseph acquaints Pharaoh with it.

<sup>a</sup> Gen. xxxv. p. tot.

† Vid. sup. p. 456. (N).

(A) It is a wonder how the Septuagint came to place the land of Goshen in Arabia, at least, some copies have it Goshen in Arabia, since that was further off from Egypt than the land of Canaan. St. Jerom thinks, that it was the same as Tchais in Ethiopia, or bordering to it (227): but that was too long a journey for Jacob, neither would Joseph have been near enough to have seen and supplied his wants: whereas he gives it as a reason to his brethren, in the former chapter, for his choosing this land, that they might be near him: but this Goshen was situate between the Red Sea and the Nile, upon the borders of Canaan, not far from On, or Hieropolis (228), where his chief habitation was. It was a fruitful spot of ground, and fit for cattle, and therefore Joseph tells us, that Pharaoh kept his own there (229). It was separate from Egypt, and therefore fittest for Jacob and his family, which would be out of all danger of interfering with the Egyptians (230).

(227) HIERON. loc. Hebr. JUN. MERC. & al.

(228) JOSEPH. Antiq. l. 2. c. 7.

(229) Id. ibid.

(230) Vid.

Jacob stands before Pharaoh.
Year of the
Flood, 1293.
Year before
Christ, 1706.

land of Goshen to dwell in; which Pharaoh readily granted. Joseph likewise pre-<sup>a</sup> sented his father to him, who wished his majesty abundance of happiness; and being asked how old he was, answered an hundred and thirty. Here the king expressing, perhaps, some wonder, to see a man so old, and in so good a case, Jacob added, that his life had been so full of trouble, that he came vastly short of the years of his ancestors. After this Joseph conducted him and the whole family to the land of Goshen; where he took care to supply them with all the necessaries of life, during the whole time of the famine. Pharaoh likewise ordered Joseph to chuse some of the ablest of them, and to commit the care of his cattle to them, which he accordingly did<sup>b</sup>. It will not be amiss to give here the names of Jacob's children and grand-children, which came down with him in-<sup>b</sup> to Egypt. As to the difficulties in adjusting the account of them, and reconciling it with some other places of scripture, we chuse to give them to our readers in a note, rather than interrupt the thread of the history (B).

<sup>b</sup> Gen. xlii. p. tot.

(B) Moses makes mention of two numbers of souls in Jacob's family, exclusive of his daughters-in-law, viz. sixty-six (231) and seventy (232);
he doth likewise reckon thirty-three souls to Leah, including Dinah (233); and to Zilpah her hand-maid sixteen souls, including Serah Asher's daughter and Beriab's two sons (234). To make which reckonings agree with the fourteen of Rachel (235) and the two first sums of sixty-six and seventy;
it is to be observed, first, that in the number sixty-six Jacob is not reckoned, but only the souls that came out of his loins; but in the number of thirty-three he seems included, else we shall find but thirty two, viz. Leah's twenty nine sons, two grandsons by Pharez, and Dinah, in all thirty two; but that Jacob is reckoned in this number seems intimated by the eighth verse of the chapter in the words Jacob and his sons, viz.
by Leah. Accordingly Josephus gives us a list of them to the number of thirty-two, including Dinah; yet sums them up thirty-three, without acquainting us that he includes Jacob; though 'tis plain by the amount that he doth. This being premissed, the whole account will stand thus:

Leah	33 including Jacob .
Zilpah	16
Rachel	11 exclusive of Joseph and his 2 sons.
Bilhab	7
<hr/> 67 out of which deduct Jacob, because Moses reckons here only those that came out of his loins, and there will remain sixty-six.

To which add Jacob, Joseph, Ephraim, and Manasseh; because this second reckoning is of all the souls of Jacob's family, in which case he may be included, and the whole amount will be seventy souls (236): But if we reckon Serah, Asher's daughter, as Josephus has done (237), and, in all probability, Moses too, since he mentions her in his list, we need not include Jacob in the number;
for it will be seventy complete without him.

It is true that St. Stephen (238) reckons the whole number of them seventy-five, which disagrees with that of Moses; but it must be remembered, that the apostles and first preachers made use of the Septuagint version, as being the only one then universally understood by the Jews; which version adds five more to Manasseh and Ephraim, namely, Machir and Gilead, sons of Manasseh;

Sutalam and Tuban, sons of Ephraim; and Eden, Sutalam's son. But besides that they differ from the Hebrew, by reading eighteen, instead of fourteen souls to Rachel (239): they likewise differ from themselves; for fourteen, and the five which they add, will make nineteen, and not eighteen.
Some ancient fathers, thinking this knot insoluble, have endeavoured to pick some mysteries out of it (240); but we need not be at any trouble to free the Septuagint version from error, which doth, in so many instances, differ from the original. However, there is still another rational way to account for this difference between St. Stephen's reckoning and that of Moses, which is as follows. That St. Stephen follows the first number of Moses, viz. sixty-six; out of which he excludes Jacob, and Joseph and his two sons, to which he adds nine of their wives; for Judab's wife was already dead, and Benjamin is supposed to be still unmarried, and Joseph's wife out of the case: so that if we add these nine wives, which, though not of Jacob's blood, yet belonged to his family, and to Joseph's kindred (which is the expression St. Stephen makes use of) to the number of sixty-six, it will amount to seventy-five (241).

Some ancient and modern writers have supposed, that all these grandsons were not born when Jacob went down into Egypt, but either soon after, or, at least, during his life; for which reason, they think Moses made no scruple to set them down with the rest (242). So far are they from thinking, for instance, that Benjamin had ten sons by that time, being but a little turned of thirty, that they think he was hardly married. The same thing they suppose of Pharez's two sons, alledging, though fallsely, that Pharez was but one year old at Jacob's departure (243). But all these suppositions are point blank contrary to the text; and, if Moses must have reckoned all those that were born in Egypt before Jacob's death, we don't know why he might not almost as well have reckoned seven hundred as seventy; since they must have increased very fast there, and married very young, else they could hardly from seventy have increased to upwards of six hundred thousand in the space of two hundred and fifteen years, which was all the time of their abode in Egypt. It will therefore be more reasonable to say, according to Moses's account, that Pha-rez's two sons were then born, though very young;
for Pharez, being begotten of Judab in the thirtieth year of his age, might take a wife at fourteen

(231) Gen. xlii. 26. (232) Ver. 27. (233) Ver. 15. (234) Ver. 18. (235) Ver. 22.
(236) VILLET. cap. xxxvi. (237) JOSEPH. Ant. l. 2. c. 7. (238) Act. vii. 14. (239) Gen.
xlii. 22. (240) AUGUST. Quæst. in Gen. clii. EUCAR. & al. (241) BERRUYER Hist. du peup.
de Dieu, p. 373, 374. 4to Edit. KIDDER in Pentat. (242) CALMET Comm. in Gen. in loc. &
Histoire de Juifs, p. 245. BERRUYER loc. citat. St. AUGUST. Quæst. (243) PERRER.

a

A List of Jacob's sons and grandsons.

A list of Jacob's family.

The sons of Jacob, and their sons,	By Leab	Reuben ; Hanoch, Phalluc, Hezron, Carmi.	{ The two first died in Canaan.
		Simeon ; Jemuel, Jamin, Obad, Jacobin, Zobar, Sbaul.
		Levi ; Gershon, Koath, Merari.
	By Zilpbab	Judab ; Er, Onan, Sbelab, Pharez, Zerab.	{ The two first died in Canaan.
		Issackar ; Tola, Pbuwab, Job, Shimron.
		Zebulun ; Sereb, Elon, Jableel.
b	By Bilbab	Gad ; Ziphion, Haggai, Sbuni, Esbon, Eri, Arodi, Arel.
		Asber ; Jimnah, Isbuab, Isui, Beriab, Serab, a daughter.
		Dan ; Hushim.

The sons of Pharez, Judab's son, Hezron, Hamul.

of Beriab, Asber's daughter, Heber, Malchiel.

By Rachel, Benjamin, Belab, Becher, Ashbel, Gera, Naaman, Ebi, Rosb, Mippim, Huppim, Ard.

In all threescore and six, exclusive of Dinab, Jacob's daughter by Leab, and of Joseph and his two sons, which being added to the number, it will amount to seventy souls.

THREE things are to be observed in the list which Moses has given us in this chapter, namely, 1. That the wives are not set down in it ; because they were not descended from him, any more than his servants and slaves. 2. That he doth not set them down according to the order of their birth, as in other places ; but mentions those that were born of Leab and her maid, and then those of Rachel and her maid. And 3. That the number sixty-six in one part of the list, is only of the souls which came out of Jacob's loins, and the second number of seventy, is that of all the souls which belonged to the house of Jacob ; to which therefore Joseph and his two sons, and a grand-daughter named Serab, Asber's daughter, must be added, in order to make the number of seventy complete.

WHILST Jacob and his family were kept in peace and plenty by the provident care of his son, the Egyptians felt the dismal effects of the famine, which encreasing daily upon them, and Joseph holding up his corn at a high rate, soon drained them of all their money. After this they were reduced to sell their cattle, houses, land, and at length their very selves for subsistence. By this means he bought all their lands and persons for the king's use, and from that time they all became slaves to the crown, except the priests, who had a sufficient quantity of provisions allotted to them out of the royal stores, without being at any expence for it. One would be apt to think, that Joseph's zeal for the king's interest carried him beyond the bounds of common prudence, and that he did not consider, that whilst he took such an advantage over a starving people, he raised the king's power to the degree of an absolute tyranny, under which his family or their posterity would one time or other severely groan, as they effectually did. The text as well as Josephus<sup>d</sup> tell us, that he transplanted the people from the one end of the kingdom to the other ; and that the miserable multitude went some one way and some another<sup>e</sup>, submitting to any misery rather than starving. However, when the seventh and last year of scarcity was come, Joseph acquainted them, that they might now expect a crop against next year, that the Nile would overflow, and and are transplanted from one end of the kingdom to the other.

The Egyptians sell their lands and themselves for corn.

<sup>c</sup> Gen. xxxv. 24. & seq. & alib. Chald. & Arab. vers.

<sup>d</sup> Chap. xlvii. ver. 22. Antiq. lib. 1. c. 7.

<sup>e</sup> Vid. Hebr.

teen or fifteen, and so have two sons before Jacob left Canaan (244). The same may be likewise said of Benjamin, who might have a number of children, and two grand-children, at the age of thirty one. We have already given instances of men, if they may be called so, who have had children when they were some years younger than we suppose these (245) ; so that there is no reason to depart from the plain text of Moses, to fall into more difficult suppositions, than any that are in his narrative.

Another difficulty that is raised against this genealogical list, is the difference of the names here mentioned, and in other places of scripture, where the same genealogy is rehearsed ; as in 1 Chronicles, and Numbers (246) ; but we have already observed, that it is very common for men to have two names in the scriptures, and to be called sometimes by one, and sometimes by the other<sup>f</sup>. Concerning which, the reader may consult our commentators at their leisure ; as well as about the omission of some of these persons mentioned in Moses's list, which are left out by the author of the book of Chronicles (247).

(244) MERCER. VILLET. (245) See before, p. 450 (N). (246) 1 Chron. iv. 24. Numb. xvi. pass. <sup>f</sup> Vid. sup. p. 441. (X). (247) Vid. VILLET. in loc.

the

The fifth part of the product of their lands assigned to the crown.

the earth produce again as usual; that he would distribute fresh lands, cattle, and a corn to them, that they might return to their usual tillage; upon this condition nevertheless, that from thenceforth the fifth part of all the product of their lands should go to the king, and the rest should be theirs. The poor people were glad to submit to these conditions, which were much better than they probably expected. They all set about cultivating the ground that was allotted to them, and from that time it past into a law, that the fifth part of the product of the whole land of Egypt should belong to the crown, which law continued in force for several centuries after, till a new regulation and division was made †. However, Joseph by this means gained the love and esteem both of the king and people.

Jacob's request to Joseph.

Year of the
Flood, 1310.
Year before
Christ, 1689.

WHILST he was enjoying the fruits of his great success and policy, his family b at Goshen, whom he failed not to visit often, did wonderfully encrease both in children and wealth. At length Jacob, by that time he had lived there seventeen years, finding himself to grow old and feeble, and that his end could not be far off, sent for his son Joseph, and spoke to him to this purpose: Though the desire of seeing a son so dear to me as you are, raised to the height of Egyptian glory, joined to the raging famine with which our land was visited, made me willingly come down into this strange country; yet Canaan being the inheritance which God promised to Abraham and his posterity, and where he lies interred with my father Isaac and some others of our family, in the ground which he purchased of the inhabitants; my last and dying request to you is, that you will not suffer me c to be buried here, but that you will swear to see me carried to Machpelah, and there deposited with my ancestors: your great power with the king of Egypt will easily obtain you and me that favour, which is the last I have to ask of you. Joseph did not make his father wait long for that satisfaction; he promised and swore to him that he would fulfil his desire; and Jacob, who in all probability had sat up upon his bed whilst this ceremony lasted, bowed down his head towards his bed's tester, in token of adoration, and gratitude for the satisfaction which his son had now given him (C) ‡.

Joseph brings his two sons to Jacob.

JOSEPH, who could not long be absent from the court, took his leave of his father, not without giving strict charge to some of the family, that, upon the very d first appearance of danger, they should immediately send for him. Accordingly, as soon as word was brought to him that his father was a dying, he took his two sons Manasseh and Ephraim with him, and went to present them to him, begging him that he would give them his blessing before he died. Jacob, at the sight of them, found his strength, as it were, renewed. He sat up upon his bed, and addressing himself to him, spoke with such cheerfulness, and in such strong and lively terms, as shewed nothing less than the dotage or weakness of a dying old man. He began with recapitulating all the glorious promises which God had formerly made to him, concerning his numerous posterity's inheriting the land of Canaan, and concluded with the death of his dear Rachel. How tenderly I loved her, continued he, my whole family can testify, but I design to give her and you a further proof of my affection: you have had two sons born in this strange land, which, according to the usual order of inheritance, should have only the portion of grandchildren in the division of the promised land; but I will do more for them, and they shall from this day be called by my name, be esteemed my sons, and, as heads of two distinct tribes, receive a double lot: thus, instead of the tribe of Joseph, c

Ephraim and Manasseh are made two tribes in Israel.

† Vid. sup. p. 206.

‡ Gen. xlvii. p. tot.

(C) In this place, where Jacob is said to have bowed himself, or rather to have worshipped towards the bed's head; the Septuagint, if it has not been corrupted, seems to have read ἠὺς Μασε, a staff, for ἠὺς Μισσάβ, a bed. So that they have translated it, he worshipped towards the end of his staff; and the Rhemish divines, he worshipped the head of his staff (248). From which, and what the Apostle to the Hebrews says (249), that he worshipped leaning on his staff (where the word leaning is added, to express the meaning of the particle ἠὺς, but in the Hebrew, and ἐν in the Greek; both which signify upon, and presuppose his resting or leaning upon, and not worshipping the top of the staff) they have not scrupled to defend the worship of the cross, of which this staff, they pretend, was the type (250). But without entering into the controversy, it will be sufficient, in order to justify our version, to observe, 1st, That the Apostle made use of the Septuagint, and so quotes it as he finds it there, and not as it was in the original, which the Jews did no longer understand. And 2dly, that he speaks there of a different action, viz. Jacob's blessing Joseph's children, which did not happen till some time after; whereas here Jacob makes Joseph swear not to bury him in Egypt. Here he seems to have kept his bed, and there to have received fresh spirits, and to have sat on it, leaning, perhaps, on his staff (251).

(248) Bibl. Remens in loc. (249) Heb. xi. 21. (250) Remens. Annotat. in Heb. xi. 21, & al. (251) Compare Gen. xlvii and xlviii. Vid. VILLET. c. 47.

they

they shall be called the two tribes of Manasseh and Ephraim. But if you have any more sons after them, they shall only be allotted the portion of grand-children: I have yet one thing more in store for you above the rest of your brethren, viz. the portion which I took out of the hands of the Amorites by my sword and bow. This shall likewise fall to the lot of your posterity, when God shall bring you into that happy land (D). He then desired his two grandsons to be brought to him, which Joseph accordingly did, placing the eldest at Jacob's right and the youngest at his left hand. But he was surprized to find his father cross his design, by crossing his arms and laying his right on the head of the youngest, and his left on that of the eldest. He would have hindered it, thinking that it was done by a mistake; but his father convinced him of the contrary, and in blessing of the lads, which he did with great fervency and tenderness, he not only preferred Ephraim to Manasseh, but gave him much the larger and nobler blessing. The sequel of this history will shew how exactly this prophecy of Jacob was verified in those two tribes, as well as the next grand one, which he pronounced concerning all the twelve s.

Jacob blesseth the younger before the elder.

FOR Jacob having now exhausted his spirits, and finding his death approaching, resolved to consecrate his few remaining hours in foretelling to his sons, whom he had gathered about him, what should happen to them in the latter days; and as no prophecy was ever more punctually fulfilled than this, we shall endeavour to give it to our readers in a more modern and intelligible style, than we have it in our version, without departing from the sense of the original; and where any difficulty happens in our way, we shall acquaint him with it in a marginal note, and endeavour to make it as plain as we can. However, we beg leave to premise here that what Jacob pronounces, or rather prophesies, concerning his sons, is not so much to be understood as foretold of them, as of their tribes; nor of what shall immediately happen to them, but of what was not to have its completion till some time at least after their entrance into the promised land. Thus, for instance, when he says that Zebulun shall dwell along the sea-coasts, or that Naphtali is a well spread tree yielding grafts and fair branches; it is plain that he means by the first, that the lot of the tribe of Zebulun should be by the sea-side; and by the last, that the Naphtalites should prove in time very powerful and numerous. This is what the event has fully verified, and what shall be further proved in the following notes. The good old patriarch, after a most pathetick preface to draw their deepest attention, began with the first-born in these words:

“REUBEN, thou art my first-born, and wast once the first-fruits of my might and my strength, and as such thou wast entitled to the right of primogeniture, the best portion in thy inheritance, to the dignity of the priesthood, and the supreme authority over thy brethren: but all these prerogatives, like the unstable waters, that pass by and return no more, are gone from thee; because thou, little regarding the sacredness of thy father's bed, didst defile it, and alienate it from me<sup>b</sup>; for which crime, though thou continue still to be a tribe in Israel, yet thou

Jacob's last blessing to his twelve sons. Reuben.

<sup>a</sup> Gen. xlviii. p. tot.

<sup>b</sup> Gen. xxxv. 22. Vid. MURST. loc.

(D) There is a threefold question started from this place, viz. 1. What portion this was which Jacob gave to Joseph. 2. How he is said to have conquered it by his sword. 3. If Shechem be the place here meant, why he says that he got it from the Amorites: Whereas Hemor, the father of Shechem, was a Hivite (252). As to the first, it is generally agreed, that it was the city and territories of Shechem; for we don't read of any other conquests that Jacob made; and accordingly we find Shechem mentioned in St. John's Gospel (253), as the place which he gave unto Joseph. 2. How he could say that he got it by his sword and his bow, when he so far disallowed his sons barbarous action towards the Shechemites, as to even curse their resentment which was the cause of it, has puzzled all our ancient and modern expositors to account for, we shall only mention some of the most notable conjectures about it. 1. Some think it was the sword and bow of his innocence (254); others, of his prayers (255); others, of his money (256); others think that he speaks proleptically, and that it was to be conquered afterwards by Joseph's posterity (257): Others again think, that Jacob had achieved some warlike exploit against the Amorites, as Abraham had against the four kings (258). But the most general and probable opinion is, that when his sons had once got that city and territories by the murder of all the inhabitants, he was forced to stand up in his own defence, and to keep the possession of it by force of arms, till he removed to Bethel; and to recover it again by the same means from the Amorreans, who, living intermixed with the Hivites, had taken possession of it during his absence. And this is the reason why he says he got, or recovered it from the Amorites, and not from the Hivites (259).

(252) Gen. xxxiv. 2. (253) John iv. 5. (254) Hieron. tradit. Hebr. (255) Chald. Paraph. (256) Hieron. Ibid. August. (257) Jun. & al. (258) Cajetan. Andr. Masius. (259) R. Sal. N. de Lyr. Mercer. Villet. Berruyer, & al.

" shalt ever be far inferior to the rest of thy brethren, either in number, wealth, a
" or strength (E).

Simeon and Levi.

" SIMEON or Levi might have succeeded to the right of primogeniture, which " their brother's incest has justly deprived him of, had they not proved such in" struments of treacherous cruelty. May my soul be for ever preserved from such " bloody counsels, and my honour untainted from their horrid guilt: For the " fierceness of their anger hurried them to commit murder, and the impetuosity
" of their fury made them break through all obstacles that opposed them. Cur" sed be their fury, for it was violent, and their malice, for it was inhuman. This " cruel disposition of theirs forces me to divide their tribes, that they may never " be rejoined in Israel." Thus far the good old patriarch performed a severe and b ungrateful task, and his prophecy against those tribes was exactly verified in due time (F). Then casting his eyes on Judah with a joy equal to the indignation which he had expressed against his other brethren, he addressed himself to him thus:

Judah.

" JUDAH, thy name signifies praise†, and accordingly thou shalt have the " praise of all thy brethren. They shall fall prostrate before thee, as before their " king and sovereign, and thine enemies shall be forced to submit their necks to " thy yoke. Like a young lion shall my son fall upon his prey, and like an old " lion, or a fierce lioness ready to rush upon it, who shall dare to rouse him up?
" The scepter shall not depart from Judah, nor the law-giver from between his c
" feet, until Shiloh be come, and the people be gathered unto him (G); his portion " shall abound with such fertile vineyards, fruitful trees, and pasture-grounds, that † Gen. xlix. ver. 5, 6, 7.

† Vid. sup. p. 441. c.

(E) The sequel of the Jewish history shews, that the tribe of Reuben did still remain in obscurity, and without any of the marks of distinction which used to be annexed to the right of primogeniture, such as a double portion, supreme authority, and the priesthood. Accordingly the Jewish expositors, especially the Bereshith Rabbah, or large comment on Genesis, tells us (260), that he fell from a threefold dignity, viz. הכבוד והכנור והלכות primogeniture, priesthood, and royal dignity. But because thou art fallen, continues the commentator, thy primogeniture is given to Joseph (who accordingly had two portions allotted to him) the priesthood to Levi, and the scepter to Judah. And where it is said of this last (261), thy brethren shall praise thee, he paraphrases it thus: והיו כל אחיך נקראים על שםך. Thy brethren shall be called by thy name, i. e. they will not say I am a Reubenite, or a Simeonite, but a יהודי Jehudi, a Jew.

(F) Jacob's words imply a double dispersion, viz. of the two tribes from one another, and their being interpersed among the rest. And accordingly Levi had no inheritance among his brethren in the land of Canaan, but had a certain number of cities assigned to it in every tribe. As for that of Simeon, it had properly but a portion of Judah's inheritance (262), if we except some few places which they got upon mount Seir, and in the wilds of the valley of Gedor (263).

(G) The sense, as well as completion of this noble prophecy, being very much disputed between the Jews and us, we have endeavoured to render the latter part of the verse more agreeably to the original, which in its plain and obvious sense affirms that the scepter shall not depart from Judah—till both Shiloh was come, and the nations gathered unto, or brought to his obedience. This version is further proved by the event; for the Jews did not lose their scepter, or Sanhe-

drim, which was their בֵּית דִּין Beth din, or highest court of judicature and supreme legislative power, till the Heathen became converts to Christianity, of whom Cornelius was the first (264): And the Jews themselves own, that this supreme court did still subsist from the time of Moses the founder of it, to the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans. They likewise own, that the word שֵׁבֶט Sheveth, which we translate scepter, doth not always signify the royal power of dignity, but, sometimes, only the legislative; and this has been further proved by two eminent divines (265). The later Jews therefore finding themselves pinched by this prophecy, rather than allow the received interpretation of the ancients, which is agreeable to ours, have fallen into various absurd notions, which they are not ashamed to defend with a zeal peculiar to them. Thus some will have the meaning of this passage to be, that the Messiah shall not come till Shiloh, the place so called, be destroyed, or the Jewish monarchy be at an end (266). Others, by Sheveth understand a tribe, which that word also signifies; and think the meaning to be, that Judah should not cease to be a tribe till the coming of Messiah (267): in which they have been also followed by some Christians (268), because that tribe did visibly subsist as such till the destruction of Jerusalem; but so did that of Levi. However, many of our modern Jews stand stiffly to this sense, and scruple not to affirm, that it has subsisted not only to that time, but even to this very day, pure and unmixed. Others add, that it retains still a kind of scepter or royal power beyond the river Euphrates; and that the Nassi, or head of it, is a prince lineally descended from Judah; whose splendor, dignity, and power over his own tribe, is little inferior to that of a king (269): but credat Judeus. 'Tis certain we have only their bare word for this imaginary kingdom. They likewise disagree not only

(260) Beresh. Rab. sect. 98. (261) Gen. xlix. 8. (262) Josh. xix. 1, & seq. (263) 1 Chron. ix. 39 & 40. (264) Acts 10. pass. (265) Vid. in MEDE's works a sermon on that text, and SAURIN's Discours Historiques, &c. disc. XLI. (266) ABEN-EZRA in loc. & al. (267) Vid. MUNST. in loc. (268) OLEAST. JUN. VILLET. & al. in loc. (269) BENJ. DE TUDEL. Itiner. & al.

- a " he shall tie his ass to the vine and palm-tree, and wash his garments in the juice
 " of the grape, and his teeth with the milk of his kine (H) <sup>k</sup>.
 " ZEBULUN's (I) dwellings shall spread themselves along the borders of the Zebulun.
 " sea, and he shall stretch the number of his commodious havens as far as the city " of Zidon <sup>l</sup>.
 " ISSACHAR, like a strong, but indolent ass, shall choose to carry burdens in Issachar.
 " the midst of his brethren, rather than be deprived of his beloved ease, in the " pleasant land of his inheritance, and prefer servitude and tribute before the fa-
 " tiques of war and conquest (K) <sup>m</sup>.
 b FROM the six sons of Leab, Jacob passes to those of Bilbab, Rachel's maid. He begins with intimating that the sons of the handmaids should have the same privilege with those of the mistresses, and be heads and judges of their own tribes.
 Then alluding to the name of Dan, a judge, he declares, " that he should judge his Dan.
 " people, that is, his own tribe, like the rest of the twelve ; " and then adds, " that like a serpent hid in the highway, or a viper in the sand, which doth not
 " openly assault its enemy, but bites him by the heel ; so Dan should overcome " more by policy and stratagem, than by valour and open force (L) <sup>n</sup>." Here the

<sup>k</sup> Gen. xlix. ver. 8, & seq.

<sup>l</sup> Ibid. 13.

<sup>m</sup> Ibid. 14.

<sup>n</sup> Ibid. 16, & seq.

only with us, but even among themselves, about the meaning of the word מְשִׁיב Mechebek, law-giver. Concerning which we shall refer our readers to the two last-mentioned divines for further satisfaction (270).

As to the word שִׁלֹּם Shilo, though it be almost universally owned to mean the Messiah, yet, as to its original signification, there is no small disagreement. St. Jerom reads it Shalach, from שָׁלַח Shalach, to send, reading ח for ה (271). Others from שָׁלוֹם Shalom, to be peaceable (272), and understand by Shiloh a peace-maker. Others derive it from שָׁלַם Shil, which they will have to signify a son, because שִׁלֹּם Shiloh, or Shilijah, signifies the secundine of a woman (273); but 'tis plain the first of these is no where to be found in the Old Testament; and the second only in one place, where it most probably signifies the secundine (274). A modern critic takes the word Shiloh to signify the end; and the sense of the words to be, that from the time the scepter comes into the tribe of Judab, it will continue in it till that tribe be at an end (275); but his opinion has been lately confuted, among many others, by the above-mentioned Monf. Saurin, in an elaborate discourse on that subject †. Another modern author tells us, that it ought to be derived from Shulab, to fatigue, be tired, suffer, and to be applied to the sufferings of the Messiah (276); but without fatiguing our readers any further, the most probable sense of the word, if the change of a letter be allowed, will be that of the Septuagint, Onkelos, and some others (277), who read it שִׁלֹּם Shelo, that is, he to whom it belongs, † and ה being often interchanged in the sacred book *; and then the sense will be plainly this, that the sceptre, or legislative power, shall not depart from, but be deposited in the tribe of Judab, until the right owner, or he, Shelo, to whom it of right belongs, has made his appearance in the world. This sense seems the most easy, natural, and agreeable to the original, as well as the most applicable to CHRIST, the king of kings. As for the † redundant in שִׁלֹּם Shilo, it is agreeable to the property of the word Ehevi, as the Grammarians speak.

(H) Judah's lot did exactly answer this prediction; it was a fertile land, full of vineyards, fruit-trees, and noble pasture-ground for cattle. It was in this tribe that the valley of Eshcol, or the brook of the grape was, a bunch of which was brought by two of the spies whom Moses sent to search the land, as a specimen of the richness of that soil. Here was likewise the brook or torrent of that name, along whose banks were the most delicious pasture-grounds (278); and some travellers assure us, that there are still very large grapes to be met with in the valley of Hebron, which may be, probably, that along which that torrent runs (279).

(I) Zebulun is mentioned next, though Issachar was elder than he, for which no certain reason can be assign'd, unless we suppose that the patriarch had a prophetick eye to the lot which was to fall to Zebulun, which was, in time, to become famous for being the chief dwelling of the Messiah; for Nazareth and Capernaum were in that tribe, and himself was denominated a Nazarene from the first of these cities (280); but this is but a conjecture. Certain it is however, that if Jacob had been present at the division of the promised land, he could hardly have given a more exact description of Zebulun's lot, than he did then, above two hundred and fifty years before it happened: for it extended from the Mediterranean on the west, to the lake of Genesareth on the east side.

(K) No less wonderful and exact was he in the description of Issachar's tribe, and the lot that fell to it. The Chaldee Paraphrast, who is also followed by the generality of Jewish Rabbies, gives a quite different turn to this prophecy: They read it thus; " Issachar finding that his lot is " fallen in a fertile land, shall subdue the inhabitants of it, and bring them under tribute." But the first sense is more agreeable to the original, and verified by the event: for that tribe had the richest and most fertile spot in all the land of Canaan, but was often infested and subjected by strangers, especially in the time of the Judges.

(L) The word נָחָשׁ Nachash, in the original, signifies a serpent in general; which having no such qualities as are here described, the Septuagint have translated it by the word Cerastra, which is a kind

(270) MEDE & SAURIN. loc. citat. (271) HIERON. quæst. Hebr. (272) MERCER. & al.
 (273) Vid. VILLET. cap. 49 & SAURIN loc. cit. (274) Deut. xxvi. 57. (275) LE CLERC in
 Com. Pentat. in loc. † SAUR. loc. cit. (276) GOUSSET Comm. ling. Hebr. sub voce שִׁלֹּם fatigare. Vid. CALM. sub voce Schilo. (277) LXX Targ. ONKEL. in loc. MORNAY cont. Jud.
 OLEAST. & al. * Vid. 2 Sam. xvi. 10 & 18. Ap. MUNST. in loc. (278) Num. xiii. pass.
 CALVIN, MERCER, JUN. GROT. & al. (279) Vid. CALMET. Comm. in Numb. xiii. ver. 24, 25. (280) Matth. ii. ult. & cap. iv. 13, & seq.

prophetic patriarch breaks out into an ejaculation, I wait for thy salvation, O a LORD. The meaning of which seems to be this, that whether his posterity were preserved by their valour or policy, whether they owed their success to the drawn sword of Judab, or the hidden snares of Dan, yet their safety and happiness did chiefly depend on the gracious promises of God, on whom he did rely. Others think however, that Jacob foreseeing either the grievous oppressions which that tribe was to labour under, as it actually did from the Amorites<sup>o</sup>, from which nothing but a miracle could save them, or their defection from the true worship of God, that tribe being the first that set up the publick worship of idols<sup>e</sup>, did breathe out this short prayer for their deliverance. However, it is not improbable that Jacob might have a much higher view than any of these, and that his comparing Dan b to a viper, might bring into his mind that universal salvation which was to be wrought by the seed of the woman, which was to bruise the serpent's head, and to have his heel bruised by it<sup>a</sup>.

Gad. "GAD, continued he, shall be often infested by bands of robbers and plunderers, but he shall conquer them at last (M)<sup>r</sup>."

Asher. "ASHER's portion shall make him happy; it shall abound with excellent corn and oil, the bread and dainty meats that shall be made of them shall be fit for a king's table (N)<sup>s</sup>."

Naphthali. "NAPHTALI is like a large tree, well-spread, or having grafts, which shoot out pleasant branches." Or, according to our English version, Naphthali, like a c hind newly escaped, or let loose, shall excel his brethren in swiftness, and be remarkable for the sweetness of his eloquence (O)<sup>t</sup>.

THESE four last were the sons of the two hand-maids, from whom he passes with a seeming joy to those of his beloved Rachel; and Joseph, whose turn came a kind of serpent, so called from its having two fleshy horns; its instinct is to hide itself in the sand, and by fastening on the horse's heel, to make him overthrow his rider (281). The Jews think that this prophecy was more particularly fulfilled, when Sampson, who was of that tribe, pulled down the large building, which crushed him and the Philistines to death (282). Others, both Jews and Christians, suppose that Jacob designed to intimate by it, that, though Dan's tribe was but small, he having had but one son, yet it should produce one of the most famous Judges of all Israel (283). As for those who apply this prophecy to Antichrist, as if he was to come out of that tribe, because he is omitted in the Apocalypse in the list of the tribes that were sealed (284), they are scarce worth confuting, since they may as well fetch him out of that of Simeon, which Moses omits when he blesses the rest (285). Besides, Jacob pronounces these words as a blessing, not as a curse, to Dan, whose tribe moreover was dispersed, if not extinguished, a thousand years before Antichrist appeared in the world, if he has yet at all.

<sup>a</sup> Judg. i. 34. Vid. TREMEL. in loc. <sup>o</sup> Judg. cap. xvii & xviii pass. <sup>e</sup> Gen. iii. 15.
<sup>r</sup> Ibid. xlix. 19. <sup>s</sup> Ibid. ver. 20. <sup>t</sup> Ibid. ver. 21.

(M) What was prophesied of Gad was likewise exactly verified. His lot happened on the other side Jordan, where he was continually exposed to the excursions of the plundering Arabs, but by the continual watchfulness and bravery of that tribe, they were not only prevented, but sometimes also caught and plundered in their turn by the Gadites. Others indeed understand it quite otherwise; and it must be owned that the original is somewhat obscure in this place: they read it thus, Gad, being girded for the battle, shall lead an army, and bring it back conqueror, which they apply to Jephtha, who is thought to have been of that tribe; but as this sense is rather too forced, others read it, Gad armed shall fight at the head of all Israel; which they think was in some measure verified, when, having received their portion on one side Jordan, they offered likewise to go and help their brethren on the other side to conquer theirs. But besides that this is also far fetched; these prophecies seem rather to intimate the fate and success of the tribes in general, than any particular action or circumstance of theirs. And therefore we prefer the first reading, and think that the prophecy refers chiefly to the continual conflicts the Gadites had with the Hagarenes, that is, with Nephish, Jetur, and Nodab, whom they at length overcame, and took from them in one battle fifty thousand camels, two hundred and fifty thousand sheep, and an hundred thousand men prisoners (286). This sense is likewise more agreeable to the character which Moses gives of that tribe, who compares it to a lion that leapeth upon his prey (287).

(N) The blessing spoken to Asher is capable of a double sense, and both verified by the event, namely, either that his country should be the most fertile, and produce the noblest corn in the whole land of Palestine, which it actually did; or else, that it should abound with the finest and most delicious oil, fit to be mixed in all kinds of pastry-work, which his portion was also remarkable for, inasmuch that its oil was the most famed of all Canaan's, as shall be shewn in the sequel; for which reason we have chosen to word it in such terms as should express the two excellencies of that noble soil, rather than to confine the sense to either particular. Though Moses in his blessing of that tribe, seems to intimate the latter, when he says, that Asher should dip his foot in oil (288).

(O) We have also given this prophecy in both the senses which the original will bear; but as that which our English version gives us is somewhat

(181) Vid. BOCHART. Hierof. lib. i. col. 28. (282) Vid. MUNST. in loc. VILLET. c. 49.
(283) Chald. Paraph. JUN. in loc. CALMET. Hist. O. T. (284) PERRER. cont. i. (285) Deut.
xxxiii. (286) 1 Chron. vi. 19, & seq. Vid. MERCER, VILLET, JUN. & al. (287) Deut.
xxxiii. 22, & seq. (288) Ibid. ver. 24.

- a next, heard his blessing pronounced in the most pompous and endearing terms.

JOSEPH, said the good old father, shall increase daily more and more, as his Joseph: name doth emphatically imply. His beauty attracted the eyes of the fair sex, the damsels ran upon the walls to see him. (P) Or, according to our Version, he shall multiply like a fruitful bough planted by a well side, whose branches run up and spread against the wall. Men armed with the poisoned darts of rancour and envy, meaning his brethren, have caused him a world of woe; his ruin would have been unavoidable, had not the Almighty, in whom he trusted, proved his strong shield and defence, broken his bonds from off his arms (Q), and brought him out
b of prison, to be a father and protector to the house of Israel; for this the LORD, even the God of thy father shall bless thee with the dew of heaven, and with the fatness of the earth, with the fruit of the womb, a numerous posterity, and the fruit of the breast, and plenty of all sorts of cattle. May all the blessings promised to me and to my forefathers, be doubled upon Joseph's head, even upon his crowned head (R); may they out-top and out-stretch the everlasting mountains, and prove to him more fruitful and lasting than they*.

BENJAMIN, the last of all Jacob's sons, who had been so great a favourite of Benjamin. his father, did probably expect a suitable blessing from him; but whether it were that Jacob foresaw no extraordinary merit or happiness attending his tribe, or that c its being afterwards blended with that of Judah, would make it to share in all its blessings, he contented himself with describing him by his fierce and warlike disposition, who wolf-like should shed the blood of his enemies, and in the evening divide their spoil (S). Having thus pronounced his prophetic blessing to every

* Ibid. v. 22. & seq.

what uncouth and unintelligible, we have endeavoured to make the sense of it a little plainer; though that reading be the most generally received both by ancient and modern expositors; and the first part applied to Barach's overcoming Sisera, and the latter to the sweet words which Deborah and he sang in the noble canticle which was made on that occasion (289); yet as we have observed, that Jacob's blessings had a more general scope, we prefer the first reading, which compares him to a well-spread oak, which is agreeable to the original, and more exactly verified by the event; for no tribe multiplied so wonderfully as this of Naphtali, who had but four sons when he came into Egypt; yet could muster up upward of fifty three thousand men fit to bear arms (290) when they came out of it; i.e. in less than 220 years. Those who make a difficulty against our translating the Hebrew אילא Ailah a great tree, because it is contrary to the Maxorab's punctuation, may find that version justified by the learned Bochart and le Scène, as well as that of the whole verse (291) which is agreeable to the Septuagint, Chaldee, and Arabic versions.

(P) The original has בנות בן Ben porath; which if derived from the root פרה parah he has fructified, as some do, the sense will be, Joseph is a fruitful son; and then the word בנות Banot (daughters) must be understood figuratively of the branches that run along the wall; but we rather choose to derive the word from פאר Paar, to make, or be, beautiful, the R being quiescent in helem, as the grammarians speak, and then the literal sense will be, Joseph is a son of beauty; the daughters ran upon the walls to see him, and this reading has by far the most votes.

(Q) Our English version, and some others, render this verse thus; but his bow abode in strength, and the arms of his hands were made strong: but this interpretation is something forced, and the literal sense runs thus; but he continued in the strength of his bow; and the hands of his arms (not weapons but the arms of his body) יפיו Yaphsu were (not strengthened, as it is there rendered) but broken, knocked in pieces, which therefore may be more applicable to his fetters, in which sense the Septuagint, Vulgate, Chaldee, &c. have taken it. The same word occurs in the first verse of the 68th psalm; let God arise, and let his enemies be scattered; and is therefore rightly rendered there, since it would have been nonsense to have said, let his enemies be strengthened, that verse being the very words which Moses and the Israelites used, whenever the ark was taken up, before they marched from one place to another (292): to which may be added, that the verb פה Phes, has seldom any other signification than that we have given it, nor, in this place, can properly admit of any other.

(R) We have here likewise ventured to depart from the English version, which renders the words נזיר נזיר Nazir Achaz, him that was separate from his brothers; for though the verb נזר Nazar signifies to separate, whence the word Nazarite comes; and Joseph was really separated from his brethren when he was sold into Egypt; yet it is not probable that Jacob would have couched so barbarous and unnatural an action in such soft terms, when the original abounds with the most expressive: besides, Nazar doth rather signify a separating upon a religious account; it is therefore more probable, that he used the word Nazir, which signifies crowned, in allusion to his advancement in Egypt. Persons of his high rank, in all the eastern empires, being dignified with the title of Nazirs, and probably wore some kind of diadem about their heads by way of distinction and grandeur (293). This sense will be more agreeable likewise to the solemn and pompous style which the patriarch uses throughout all Joseph's blessing.

(S) The warlike and untameable disposition of this tribe was sufficiently verified afterwards in tribe (T), he reminded them, especially Joseph, that they should bury him with a his ancestors in the cave of Mackpbelah; and they having renewed their promise to him, he laid himself again in his bed, and soon after expired *, being 147 years of age, seventeen of which he spent in Egypt, in the land of Goshen (V).

(289) Judg. c. iv. & v. p. 101. (290) Numb. i. 43. (291) BOCHART. Hierof. LE SCÈNE. Ety. on a new Translat. & al. (292) Numb. x. 35. (293) Vid. CALMET Hist. Old Test. in loc.

AND now Joseph, who had hitherto suppressed his grief, began to give it full vent; he fell upon his dead father, bathed his face with his tears, and expressed all the filial sorrow that such a loss could inspire; at length remembering his dying charge, he went to get his body embalmed, and to make all other preparations for his funeral. The Egyptians on their part mourned for him as long as the days of his embalming lasted, viz. seventy days, the ceremony of which was thus performed as we have elsewhere seen †: the body was sent to the physicians or embalmers, who first b took out the brain and entrails, and washed them in palm-wine, impregnated with strong in many instances, but more particularly the two following ones; namely, first, in the fierce battles which they fought against the united force of all the other tribes, though for a very bad cause, the abuse of the Levite and his concubine (294), and in which they came off conquerors twice, tho' vastly inferior in number (295); and secondly, in the war, which the house of Saul, who was of that tribe, had with David and the house of Judah, for the kingdom, (296): upon the whole nothing is plainer than that they are described in Scripture as the fiercest warriors, and expertest archers in Israel.

* Gen. xlix. ver. ult.

† See before p. 214.

(T) Some critics have cavilled at the words of Moses, he (Jacob) blessed every one of them with a separate blessing (297); whereas they think the three first might have been more properly called curses than blessings; and this has given others and us unnecessary trouble of answering them. Some authors have been too fond of having recourse to the subtilties of the schools to elude this difficulty: thus St. Ambrose tells us, that they, being rather prophecies than blessings, must therefore be blessings, because they are prophecies (298): and another subtil critic (299) says, that they were called blessings, from the greatest part being such: whereas it is said, that he blessed every one (300); others therefore have bethought themselves of that thread-bare solution, that the same word in the original signifies to bless and to curse, which has been applied to other cases, as well as this, and to as little purpose. Thus, when Job's wife bids him bless God and die, they have thought that she meant curse God and die; whereas 'tis plain she only speaks ironically to him, and means nothing but that he blessed God in vain; since he would die as well as those that let it alone. As for R. Salomon's answer, we mention it only for its absurdity and impiousness, who says that Jacob designed indeed to bless all his sons, but that he was seized with a phrentick fit at the beginning, which made him curse the three first that came to hand. It will be sufficient to say, that he blessed them all, though not alike; and if his severe rebuke to the three eldest, and the punishment he pronounced against them, did bring them to a sense of their wickedness, it was a blessing to them, though not a temporal one; though even in this last sense he may well be said to have blessed them likewise, since he assigned each of them a lot in the inheritance of the promised land, which he had power to have deprived them of; and as Moses did afterwards bless them, 'tis plain he did not think that they had received a curse from their father.

(V) Besides these prophecies of Jacob, which Moses has preserved to us, and which have been sufficiently verified by their events, the Jews attribute some other works to him, such as the treatise, entitled, The Ladder to Heaven; in which there is an explanation of that which he saw in a dream at Bethel; and which the Ebionites adopted as canonical; and a testament called by his name, The Testament of Jacob, reckoned by Pope Gelasius among the Apocrypha's. The Jews do likewise use some prayers every night, which they pretend to have been composed by him: they affirm that he wrote the 14 gradual psalms, and some others, whilst he lived with Laban; all which fables are only fit for a Jewish creed. However, as to the great praises which they give him, no one can blame them for it; and the author of Ecclesiasticus has justly summed up his character in few words, chap. xlv. 25, 26. Some divines, especially of the church of Rome, look upon him not only to have plainly foretold the coming of the Messiah, but to have been likewise a kind of type of him in his laborious and troublesome life; in his flights and travels; in his marriage with Leah, the figure of the Jewish synagogue, and afterwards with his beloved Rachel the figure of the christian church.

The Mohammedans allow him to have been not only a prophet, but also the father of all the prophets, who were all descended from him except Job, Jethro and Mohammed. They likewise believe, that the royal dignity did not depart from his posterity 'till the times of John the Baptist and Jesus Christ, and that the twelve tribes of the Jews did spring from him, as their own twelve tribes did spring from Ismael. Jacob gave name to two places, viz. the well, and the ford of Jacob: the former was still known by that name in our Saviour's time, and we read of a famous church formerly built there in the form of a cross, and dedicated to St. John the Baptist; and that the well was just before the rails of the communion-table, to which sick folks resorted in great numbers to drink some of its water for the recovery of their health. As for the ford of Jacob, it is not easy to guess whereabouts it was; but as for those who think that he forded the Jordan near the place where it empties itself into the sea of Tiberias, they seem to have gone much out of the way, and it is more likely that he crossed somewhere near Beth-san, since he came back by that way, when he returned from Mesopotamia, and that he forded the brook Jabbuck at Mahanaim, and went from thence to Peniel and Succoth, which are near Beth-san. His prayer likewise in which he says, that he had passed over that river only with his staff, and now with two bands, † makes it no less probable that he came back the same way he went.

(294) Judg. xix. p. tot. (295) Ibid. c. xx. (296) 1 Sam. pass. (297) Gen. xlix. 28. (298) Ambros. de benedict. Patriarch. Jacob. cap. ii. (299) PERRER. (300) Ver. 28. † Vid. Gen. xxxii. 10.
aKringent

- a astringent drugs; after which they began to anoint the body with oil of cedar, myrrh, cinamon, and cassia, and this lasted thirty days. They next put it into salt of nitre during the space of forty days longer; so that they allow'd threescore and ten days to compleat the ceremony. This method, we formerly observ'd *, was only used for persons of the greatest rank; the meaner people had a cheaper way, but Joseph was too sensible of his father's merit to spare any cost for him. His deep mourning, making him unfit to appear at court, he begged of some of Pharaoh's officers to acquaint him with his father's death, and with his last commands, who made no difficulty to grant his favourite's just request, and order'd moreover the chief officers of his household, and the grantees of the kingdom, to accompany the
- b funeral pomp. All Jacob's family went likewise along with it, none stayed behind but their wives and little ones. The cavalcade consisted of a great number of chariots, and a vast multitude of men on horseback. † As soon as they had crossed the river Jordan, and were entred into the land of Canaan, they made a halt of seven days at the threshing-floor of Atad, and there performed a solemn funeral ceremony, which made the Canaanites call the place Abel Mizraim, or the mourning of the Egyptians. They then continued their march ‡ till they arrived at Mackpbelah, where Israel's sons deposited him in the cave, and then returned to Egypt with the rest of their company. It was then that Joseph's brethren began to fear his resentments for the former wrongs they had done to him; to prevent which, as much as
- c they could, they sent an humble message to him, to acquaint him that it was their father's earnest request to him, that he would forget all past injuries, and continue them still under his kind protection. Such an injurious and undeserv'd suspicion might have had a quite contrary effect than they desired, had he been of a less generous temper; but Joseph was so far from resenting it, or enquiring into the validity of this pretended last request of their father, which he never had heard of before, though he was the proper person to whom it should have been made, that he could not refrain his tears, whilst the messenger was acquainting him with the concern and dread his brethren were in: to remove which, he sent immediately for them, and received them with the same affection as when Jacob was alive; he ex-
- d cused and comforted them, and gave them such fresh assurances of his future love and protection, that they went joyfully home to their families, though probably, very much amazed at the greatness of his soul, a virtue to which they seem to have been utter strangers.

He outlived his father about sixty years, and when he found his death approaching, he sent for his brethren and told them, with the same prophetick spirit that Jacob had done before, that GOD would, according to his promise, bring their posterity out of Egypt into the land of Canaan: he charged them therefore not to bury him there, but to lay his body in a coffin, and deposit it in some place where they might in due time find it, and carry it away with them, and bury it in the spot

e of ground which Jacob had given to him by his last will. He gave up the ghost soon after †, and his brethren took care to fulfil his last request, having first got him embalmed, after the manner of the Egyptians (W). The sequel of the story

* Ubi sup. p. 215. a. b.

† Gen. l. v. 1. & seq.

‡ Ibid. cap. ult. pass.

(W) The Jewish rabbies have been very fertile in their inventions, and added many particulars to the life and death of this great man, of which there is not the least footstep in scripture. An instance of the first kind is, the bloody fight which he had with one Izephah, the son of Eliphaz, at his father's funeral, who would have withstood their burying him in the cave of Mackpbelah, disputing their title to that ground. Him Joseph and his men having overcome, carried away with them into Egypt. and kept him there a prisoner as long as Joseph lived; but as soon as he was dead, Izephah found means to escape into Italy. This story is quoted by some learned rabbies (301) out of Josephus Ben-Gurion, a fabulous author whom they have substituted to the real Josephus the historian. After his death, they tell us, the magicians of Egypt told Pharaoh, that if he had a mind to keep the Hebrews in his dominions, he must hide the body of Joseph in some place where they should never find it; for it would be impossible for them to go out of Egypt without it; upon which his body was ordered to be put into a ארון של תק כיתום chest that weighed 500 talents, which even according to the Syrian talent, which is but 12 pound, amounted to 6000 pound weight, which they carefully laid in the bottom of one of the branches of the Nile, after they had turned the course of it another way, whilst they sunk it in the mud: They add that Moses was forced to work a miracle to get it out and carry it away (302). Some tell us, that this coffin was carefully laid up in the king's treasury, because his magicians had foretold, that if ever it was carried out of Egypt, the land would fall into most terrible darkness, (301) R. ABR. SEPHARHADI, R. MOS. GERUND. (302) Elle Haddovarim Rabba. f. 28. וזאת הברכה. See also the life of Moses, published by GAULMAIN in French, p. 32. and his notes, l. ii. c. 2.

shews how punctually their posterity fulfilled the latter part of his will, taking his body with them, and burying it in the place which he had appointed (X). He darkness, and be plagued with an infinite number of other evils (303): besides these Jewish fables, Joseph has likewise been thought to have instructed the Egyptians in all those sciences which they became so famous for, by applying to him that verse in the psalms, † that he might instruct his (Pharaoh's) princes, and teach his senators wisdom. In a word, he has been taken for Serapis Osiris Adonis; for Mercury, alias Hermes; for the famous Thout or Hermes Trismegist, the reputed inventor of arts and sciences (304): on the other hand some heathen authors (305) tell us, that he learned several magic arts in Egypt, and in particular that of interpreting signs and dreams, and there is a book of magick still extant, which has been falsely attributed to him, intitled Joseph's Looking-Glass: it is mentioned by Trithemius, Nauaeus, and others. He is thought to have been the inventor of the art of measuring, and contriver of land-marks; which latter is more than probable, because he was forced to distribute the lands again to the Egyptians, after the famine was over, which might put him upon excogitating some kind of boundaries to them. And Artaphanes, quoted by Eusebius, tells us, that the Egyptians had their fields all in common, 'till he taught them to divide and bound them, that every one might cultivate his own inheritance; he adds, that he likewise invented the art of measuring, which procured him the respect and admiration of that people (306). They do shew to this day in Egypt some wells, baths, and other works of that patriarch, but those eastern nations have added so many ridiculous fancies of their own to history, that they do not deserve to be credited (307).

(X) Notwithstanding what was said in the conclusion of the last note, we shall venture to tell our readers, upon the testimony of St. Jerome (308) that the Israelites raised a most noble monument to Joseph's memory, which was still to be seen in his days. It stood in Shechem, in the field which Jacob bought of Hemor, and which he afterwards gave to him, in which field Joseph was actually buried (309).

Mohammed in his Koran Sarat XII. gives us a long history of Joseph, which he has stuffed with many fabulous circumstances, and which the eastern people have still more enlarged upon (310). The Mohammedans pretend to have several books of his amours with Zelickah, Pharaoh's daughter, and his master Potiphar's wife, which they make use of to kindle the love of God in their hearts, it being among them what the canticles are with the Jews and Christians, that is, an allegory of the love of God and a pious soul. As for Mahomet's history, though it differs much from that of Moses, yet the reader may not think it amiss to have a sketch of it. It is to this purpose (311) Joseph having acquainted his father with his dream of the sun, moon and 12 stars falling down before him, Jacob forbid him to tell it to his brethren, lest the devil should put it into their heads to conspire against him, adding that Joseph would be the chosen one of God, &c. but his brethren, seeing that he was better beloved than they, resolved to murder him; to which end they persuaded their father to send him into the fields with them, under pretence that it would be a diversion to him, promising at the same time, that they would take great care of him: Jacob answered, that he was afraid lest they should be careless of him, to which they replied, are you afraid the wolves should come and eat him in our presence, or that we shall not have strength enough to defend him? The father being thus prevailed upon, they took him next morning along with them, and flung him into a well; they came home that same night, and told him, that whilst they were playing and running a race, and Joseph was watching over their garments, a wolf had come and devoured him; and finding that Jacob was hard to credit their story, they shewed him Joseph's bloody shirt; upon which Jacob told them, that they had done the deed, and would certainly answer for it before God; after which he endeavoured to bear his loss patiently.

A caravan which chanced to go by that very day, and wanted some water, let down their bucket into the well, and Joseph laying hold on it was drawn out; they clothed him forthwith, and carried him into Egypt, where they sold him for a little ready money. The person, who bought him, gave him in charge to his wife, telling her that he would one day prove useful, and be instead of a son to them. By that time he had attained the twentieth year of his age, his mistress Zelickah became so excessively in love with him, that she shut him up one day in her chamber, and declared her passion to him: Joseph rebuked her for it, and ran towards the door, but before he could open it, she caught hold on his shirt, and tore it off his back: her husband happened to be behind the door, and she no sooner saw him, but she began to make a loud complaint of an attempt made by Joseph against her chastity, whom she therefore desired to be severely punished. She appealed to a child that was there in its cradle, for the truth of what she said: to which the babe readily answered, that if the shirt was torn before, he was guilty and she innocent; but if it was torn behind, he was innocent, and she accused him falsely. The shirt upon examination, proving to be rent behind, acquitted Joseph, and discovered the ill intention of his mistress.

The whole city was soon filled with the noise of this adventure, and Zelickah, being informed that the ladies spoke of it much to her disadvantage, resolved to invite them to a feast, and whilst they were eating, to introduce Joseph to them. She did so, and he no sooner appeared, but his beauty did astonish them beyond measure; insomuch, that not knowing any longer what they did, they cut their fingers instead of their meat, and whispered to one another, that he must be an angel and no man! By this means she put a stop to their reflections; but it was not long before she made another push at her servant, though with as little success; which so enraged her, that she got him sent into prison, where he expounded the butler and the baker's dream. Here he continued confined nine whole years, after which he was fetched out to interpret Pharaoh's dream, which he did so much to his satisfaction, that he was made superintendant of all his finances.

Mohammed

(303) Testam. XII. patriarch. in vit. Simon. † Ps. cv. 22. (304) Vid. CALMET Hist. O. T. c. xxxv.
 (305) JUSTIN ex TROG. lib. xxxvi. (306) ARTAPH. ap. Euseb. de prepar. lib. ix. cap. xliii.
 (307) Vid. CALM. loc. citat. (308) HIERON. qu. hebr. in Genes. (309) Joseph. ult. 32. (310) Vid. MARAC. notes on the Alcoran. HERSELOT. Diction. in the word Jousouph. (311) Biblist. Orient. Jousouph ben Jacob.

- a was 110 years old, when he died, an age which came very short of that of his ancestors, and might probably be owing to his being forced to a different way of living from theirs, having continued 80 years in that pinnacle of grandeur, to which Pharaoh, or rather his great wisdom and merit had raised him. However, he had the pleasure to see of his offspring to the third generations, which none of his fathers did, viz. Sbuttelab and Tachan, the sons of Ephraim, and Hadan the son of Sbuttelab; as likewise Macbir the son of Manasse, and Gilead, Macbir's son. These five are those whom the Septuagint version adds to the number of the seventy that came down into Egypt, though 'tis plain they were not born 'till some time after*.
- b How the Israelites, after the death of their great patron and protector, became by degrees as dreadful and odious to the Egyptians, as they grew numerous and powerful, 'till they were at length brought under most cruel slavery, will be seen in the next section. In the mean time we hope our readers will not be displeased if we make a short retrospection on their forefathers, and add some few observations on the simplicity of their religion and manner of living, which were neither so obvious, nor could be interspersed in their history, without too frequently interrupting the thread of it. Sure it is, that if we examine them impartially, compare them with those of the most polite and celebrated nations of antiquity, such as were the Egyptians, Greeks, Romans, and many others, and make a candid allowance for the distances of time, place, and other obvious circumstances, they will appear to be the most natural and perfect pattern of civil society, and of a happy life. If therefore their posterity, after they became possessors of that happy land, did so strangely deviate from them, as it will appear by the sequel of this history that they did, it can be attributed to nothing but to that unavoidable degeneracy which their long and horrid thralldom had caused in them, which took such deep root, that neither their forty years wandering in the wilderness, during which time a new generation was as it were sprung up, nor the wholesome laws which providence had calculated for their welfare, nor the example of their forefathers, which Moses had set before them in such lively colours; nor, lastly, all the heavy judgments which their invincible obstinacy brought upon them, could effectually cure.
- d

It must be owned, however, that unless we can divest ourselves of that fond partiality which we have for the customs, our own times and country, we shall be apt to condemn, not only those of the ancient patriarchs, and of the many nations who have closely followed them, but likewise all those who have commended them for it: that part of their religion which consisted in the butchering of a

* Vid. sup. p. 458. (B).

Mohammed goes on afterwards with the story of his brethren coming to buy corn; of his stopping his brother Benjamin, and of his discovering himself to them; and adds, that Joseph hearing that his father had wept so much for him, that he had lost his sight, he gave them one of his shirts, and bid them go home and lay it over his face, and he would recover his sight; after which he charged them to come back to him with their whole family.

By that time the Caravan was got half way homewards, Jacob told those that were with him, that he smelt the smell of his son Joseph, desiring them not to laugh at him, for he was sure of what he said. Accordingly a few days after one of his sons brought him Joseph's shirt, and as soon as he laid it over his face, his sight came to him again: he made all the haste he could to go down into Egypt with his family, and all he had; where Joseph met him, and taking him by the hand, desired him not to be afraid of coming into Egypt. He then made him sit down, whilst his brethren did fall prostrate before him, which made him take notice to his father that now his dream was fulfilled. Thus far Mohammed, whose followers further add, that Joseph was 17 years old when he was sold; that the king who then reigned was Rian the son of Valid; that he was likewise called Pharaoh, which signifies a despotick monarch; that Jo- seph did afterwards instruct him in the knowledge of the true God; but that his successor, named Rabous, the son of Massaab, proved a wicked prince: that the Israelites continued 430 years in Egypt, from the time of Jacob's first coming down, to their being delivered out of it by Moses, who took care to carry away the bones and coffin of Joseph, which had lain buried in the bottom of the Nile.

Ebn Batrick, otherwise called Eutychius, patriarch of Alexandria, tells us, that Joseph married Asimah, the daughter of the Kaben of Aen Shem, that is, the priest, or diviner of the fountain of the sun, which was the name of the city of On, called also by the Greeks, Heliopolis. He assures us likewise, that the Nilometer, which is in the city of Memphis, the description of which has been given before, † the basin and the canal in the city of Cairo, for the discharge of the waters of that river, were Joseph's own works. In a word, they attribute to him all the curious wells, cisterns, aqueducts and publick granaries, as well as some obelisks, pyramids, and other ancient monuments, all which are still called by his name. They add, that he had something shining like a star upon one of his shoulders, which was an indelible character of the gift of prophecy, and a sure token of his future grandeur.

† P. 179. & seq.

number of living creatures; their plainness and simplicity; their wandering and laborious life; their seeming contempt of arts and sciences; their real one of ease, luxury, and high titles; all these, and many more, will be apt to be censured by the lump, and every deviation from it will be looked upon as an improvement in society, and a refinement of their dull insipid taste, which some will be apt to attribute to the increase of arts and sciences, and others more absurdly to religion. But it is not to such partial judges that we appeal, for the justness of these remarks, but to the more thinking and unprejudiced sort, whose judgment is not warped by emulation, custom and example.

AND here we need remount no higher than where we began our history, that is, to Abraham. He had conversed with some of the antediluvian patriarchs, and was well acquainted with their way of living; or rather he had been educated in it, and was so great an admirer of it, that he preferred it to that of those nations he lived amongst, and brought up his children in the same way. For here we must remember, that in those days every family did as it were compose a kingdom or free estate of which the chief was in all respects (if we except the title and a few needless and troublesome formalities) supreme and absolute monarch; and as such made either war or peace, and alliances offensive or defensive with his neighbouring kings, as he thought fit: if there was any difference between them, it was only this, that the latter began betimes to live in walled and fortified towns, whereas the former chose to live more at large, and after the primitive way. In other respects it is plain, they were inferior to none of the cotemporary princes, though they despised those pompous titles, and other marks of royal grandeur, which their neighbours so much affected.

THEIR riches consisting chiefly in a prodigious quantity of cattle, such as sheep, oxen, camels and asses (horses we read of none); they were obliged to have a proportionable number of servants and slaves to look after them. Accordingly we find, that Abraham was able to arm upwards of three hundred of his men-servants for Lot's rescue, besides those he left behind to guard his substance, and his old men, women and children. As for gold, silver, jewels, and such like valuable things, we do not find that he was possessed of any till after his return from Egypt, where Pharaoh had heaped those rich presents on him, though they might probably barter some of the wool of their flocks for bullion, which was already current in those days; but neither this, nor his other kinds of riches, did exempt him or his posterity from a laborious life, to which their chusing to live in tents, for the benefit of often shifting their habitations for the sake of pasture for their numerous herds, did unavoidably oblige them. To this pastoral life they likewise joined agriculture, as often as the fruitfulness of the country, the time of their sojourning in it, and other concurring circumstances permitted it. Thus we find Isaac sowing his land in the country of Gerar, where the situation and the king's friendship invited him to make a considerable stay; but it is plain they always gave the preference to the former, whenever the two kinds proved incompatible; and how laborious that was in those hot countries where water was scarce, and where it rains so seldom, may be gathered from the pathetic complaint which Jacob once made to his father-in-law. Neither was the fair sex exempt from bearing their share in it; and though Abraham's posterity doth not afford us any instance of it in his own family, where we meet but with one female; viz. Dinah, Jacob's daughter, and she only remembered for her fatal excursion; yet if we look back into those of his kindred, whom he left in Padan-aram, we shall find that neither their birth, youth, or beauty, exempted them from going to the well with their pitchers, and watering their flocks at proper seasons. This we find to have been the case of Rebecca, Rachel, and other fair damsels of that country, and of Jethro's daughters some hundred years after them. And how distasteful soever this primitive simplicity may appear to our present age, yet Homer will tell us how much and how long it was imitated by the Greeks, whose politeness is to this day so justly admired; inasmuch, that the chief employment of the seven sons of Edion, king of the Sicilians, was the keeping of their father's flocks; and we find that kind of life extolled, not only in Sicily and Greece, particularly in Arcadia, but likewise in Syria, and other countries above 1500 years after Abraham, in some of the most beautiful pastorals of antiquity.

<sup>a</sup> Gen. xiv. 13. ibid. xxvi. 26, & seq.

<sup>b</sup> Gen. xiii. 6. & seq. ibid. xxiii. 16, & seq.

<sup>c</sup> Gen. xiv. 24, &c.

<sup>d</sup> Gen. xxvi. 11, 12, & seq.

<sup>e</sup> Gen. xxxi.—40, & seq. vid. sup. p. 444.

<sup>f</sup> HOMER Iliad Δ.

<sup>g</sup> Idem Iliad Σ.

- <sup>a</sup> THIS laborious life seldom failed to keep both men and women in a good state of health ; and as they never wanted a good appetite, nor a good digestion, so they were the more simple in their way of living : the milk of their kine, the fruits of the earth were their common diet ; a kid, a fatted calf, or a dish of venison, were reckoned a rich feast ; and one would think, that Homer had drawn the pictures of his Heroes in his Odysses, after that of the patriarchs, so far was he from thinking such a life unworthy of the greatest men : Whoever considers that Jacob had been his mother's favourite, and consequently more tenderly brought up than his brother Esau, will no doubt wonder at his being suffered, at the age of forty, to take a journey of above 500 miles, for so far it was at least from Beer-sheba to Padan-aram, without a servant, or any other conveniency for travelling than his bare staff ; but yet it appears, that he had been so well inured to that laborious life, that he made no difficulty of laying himself down in the open field, as soon as night came upon him, and taking the first stone that came to hand to serve him for a pillow<sup>b</sup>. That he took care to breed up his sons in the same hardy way, is plain by his sending his favourite Joseph at the age of 16 as far as Hebron, to enquire after his brethren, which was above 80 miles from Mamre, where he dwelt. Neither did Joseph's hearing that they were removed about 30 miles further, discourage him from continuing his journey 'till he had met with them<sup>c</sup>.

- THIS laborious life did not only contribute very much to their health and vigour, but was likewise an effectual means to lengthen their days, and to make their deaths sweet and easy. If we except Isaac, who is described rather as a contemplative than a laborious man<sup>d</sup>, and began to fail in his strength much sooner than the rest ; we read of no diseases they were subject to, nor of any physicians they needed, except to embalm their dead bodies. All those, whose age is set down by Moses, lived to above 150 years, except Joseph, whose courtly way of living may probably have shortened his days<sup>e</sup>.

- THEIR conjugal temperance was in no ways inferior to their other virtues, how far otherwise soever it may appear at first sight : Abraham lived in a country where polygamy was allowed, and a numerous offspring esteemed one of the greatest earthly blessings ; he saw himself unfortunately yoked to a barren woman, and though master of vast possessions, yet chose to make a Syrian servant his heir, rather than to marry another ; neither doth he take Hagar to his bed 'till he is persuaded to it by his wife<sup>f</sup>, and has the promise of an heir that should come out of his loins. The children he had since by Keturah, after Sarah's death, shew that his continence was far from being the effect of old age and impotency. Isaac and his promised posterity had the noblest title to all the blessings that were denounced to Abraham ; Rebecca proves barren for a considerable time, and had but two sons at last, and yet we do not find that ever he expressed a desire of taking another wife<sup>g</sup>. Jacob indeed was unwarily drawn in to marry two sisters, and afterwards to take their maids to be his concubines ; but whoever considers how contented he would have been with Rachel alone, that Leah was, as it were, forced upon him ; that Rachel's barrenness and desire of children, and his fondness for her, made him accept of her handmaid ; that when he had once done it for one sister, he could not decently refuse it to the other<sup>h</sup> ; that it was the custom of the country for the wives to adopt their handmaids children, and that it was looked upon as consistent with the laws of conjugal fidelity ; whoever, I say, considers all these, will not lightly tax him with incontinency upon that account : however, it is plain, that the jealousies and discords between the two sisters, and probably between the mistresses and their handmaids, gave but little encouragement to his sons to follow his example, since we do not read of one that did not rest contented with one wife. Judah indeed is justly taxed with incontinency, but it must be remembered that his adventure with Thamar was wholly accidental, and unsought for by him, and that he did not give himself that liberty, 'till after his wife's death<sup>i</sup>. However, we are far from undertaking to vindicate all their actions, much less do we intend to write panegyrics upon them ; for which reason we shall forbear expatiating upon their extraordinary hospitality to strangers ; their faithfulness to their allies, and many other eminent virtues they were conspicuous for, and shall content ourselves with adding a few words concerning their religion, and shewing that that, joined to their primitive simplicity, afforded an excellent pattern for a civil

<sup>a</sup> Gen. xxviii. 11.    <sup>b</sup> Ibid. xxxvii. 17.    <sup>c</sup> Ibid. xxiv. 63. xxvii. 1 & seq.    <sup>d</sup> Gen. i. 26.
<sup>e</sup> Gen. xv. 3.    <sup>f</sup> Ibid. xvi. 2.    <sup>g</sup> Ibid. xxv. 21, & seq.    <sup>h</sup> Ibid. xxix. & xxx. passim.    <sup>i</sup> Ibid.
 xxxviii. 12, & seq.

and a happy life ; and that every deviation of theirs from it doth indeed give us a lively instance of the early depravity of mankind, but casts no reflexion on their excellent and admirable rule of life, which gave every head a full and absolute sway over his whole family, obliged him to breed them up in the knowledge and fear of the true God, and a strict observance to his laws, which was the most effectual means to make them live in that peace and plenty, that ease and tranquillity for which they are so justly admired.

As for their religion, it was not only the freest from idolatry and superstition, but the simplest and purest in the world, or at least, that the world was then capable of. It consisted chiefly in a ready obedience to God's commands, under whose immediate guidance they continually were, in a firm reliance on his promises under all dangers and difficulties, and in a thankful remembrance and acknowledgment for all his blessings and deliverance. This last part seems to have introduced the religious custom of tithes, if they were not of a much older date : accordingly we find Abraham giving the tenths of all the spoils of his late gotten victory to Melchisedech <sup>a</sup>, and Jacob vowed the like portion of all his possessions to God, if he would bless and bring him back safe to his father's house<sup>b</sup>. How these were at first paid, or to whom, is not easy to guess, whether to Shem or Eber, or any of their descendants, who still held the high priesthood ; or, as is most likely, by consecrating a tenth part to religious uses, such as building of altars, rearing of pillars and monuments, and offering of sacrifices to God, since such things as are consecrated to God's worship, are in the language of scripture said to be given to God. These sacrifices have indeed something in them that is shocking and unnatural, as we observed before, and when we consider how soon they began, and how universally they spread themselves, reason will be at a loss how to account for their introduction and progress, any other way than by supposing them to be of God's own instituting, as types of that grand sacrifice which CHRIST was to offer up for the sins of the world : but this is rather a point of divinity than history, and so out of our sphere. In all other cases it is plain, their religion was pure, simple and uniform, and might have continued such after their deliverance out of Egypt, had not their degeneracy and stubbornness obliged their divine law-giver to clog it with a numerous train of rites and ceremonies, in order to prevent their intermixing those of other nations with their own, as the sequel of their history will shew. We shall only add, that as other nations seem to have received from the ancient patriarchs the ceremony of sacrificing beasts to their gods ; that is, of substituting an innocent lamb, sheep, &c. in their guilty stead, without retaining the notion of the design, or typical institution of them ; so it is very probable that the intended sacrifice of Isaac, by the father of the faithful, by which he gave such a glorious testimony of his faith, and reliance on God's promises, may have given birth to the bloody custom of sacrificing of children, which became afterwards so universal, not only among all other nations, but even among the Israelites themselves. The notion of its being enjoined to that patriarch only, as a trial of his faith, might wear off by degrees, and nothing more be remembered of it than the great applause and blessings he received upon that account ; from which they might conclude as it were a fortiori, that if his bare intention proved so meritorious, much more would the real sacrificing of their own children be : and when they had once imbibed the notion, that the main merit of such a bloody ceremony consisted chiefly in the stifling all sense of humanity and natural affection, it was easy for them to infer, that the more they did so by the cruel torments they put the poor infants to, the more it would enhance the value of the sacrifice ; but this we rather chuse to submit to our reader's judgment than to dwell longer upon it.

<sup>a</sup> Gen. xiv. 20.<sup>b</sup> Ibid. xxviii. ult.

A N
Universal HISTORY,

FROM THE Earliest Account of Time to the Present:

COMPILED from ORIGINAL AUTHORS:

And ILLUSTRATED with MAPS, CUTS, NOTES, Chronological and Other Tables.

---

VOL. I. PART II.

---

The SECOND EDITION.

---

Ἰσορρίας δεχάίας ἐξέρχισθαι μὴ καλάνου, ἐν αὐταῖς δὲ ἐνρήσεις ἀκόπως, ἅπερ πτεροὶ σωῆξαν ἐγκόπως. Basil. Imp. ad Leon. fil.

---

---

L O N D O N:

Printed for E. SYMON, in Cornhill; T. OSBORNE, in Gray's-Inn; J. WOOD, in Pater-noster Row; and J. CROKATT.

M.DCC.XL.

S E C T. II.

The history of the Jews from their Egyptian bondage, to their entrance into the land of Canaan.

- <sup>a</sup> WE return now to the Israelites in Egypt, who did so prodigiously increase <sup>The great increase of the Israelites in Egypt.</sup> both in number and strength, during the 215 years of their abode there<sup>a</sup>, (A) that the jealous Egyptians had already long ago looked upon them as a dangerous, if not formidable people. And indeed if we consider to what a prodigious multitude those seventy souls, which came down with Jacob, were increased, in so much that Moses tells us, they amounted to 600,000 men, from twenty years and upwards<sup>b</sup>, all able to bear arms; besides those under 20 years of age, old men from sixty to a hundred and upwards, for they lived even much longer than that, and women, which may be reasonably supposed to have been much more numerous than the men, who were allowed a plurality of wives. I say, if we consider
- <sup>b</sup> this wonderful increase (which in a proportionate and moderate computation, allowing them to have brought 70 wives with them, which is the utmost that can be supposed, will be as 140 to 280,000, that is, as 200,000 to one) we shall not wonder at Egypt's fearing lest they should in a short time cover the whole face of it. Neither need we have recourse to miracles as the Jews do<sup>c</sup>, for this prodigious increase (B). We have already given in a former chapter some tables* of the probable increase of mankind in any number of years; and if this seems to outdo that calculation, it must be remembered, that they had a peculiar promise for it, and a peculiar blessing from God attending them. Neither was their courage or strength less to be feared than their number. The sons of Ephraim had already given a proof of it to the Egyptians, when they made that bold, though unsuccessful, attempt upon the Gathites, in one of the Cantons of the land of Canaan, even before their father's death, who, as we hinted before, lived upwards of 90 years in Egypt. This adventure, though not recorded by Moses, has been preserved to us by the author of the first book of Chronicles<sup>d</sup>, and might easily let the Egyptians see what the united force of twelve such fructifying tribes might do in process of time, when one single one, of so short a standing, could venture upon such a hazardous enterprise. However that be, it is not easy to fix the time when their bondage began, nor how long they had groaned under it, when Moses was born; sure it is, that from or even before that time they began to be more
- <sup>c</sup> and more cruelly oppressed by the Egyptians, whose unheard of treatment towards that oppressed people, might be owing to more causes than one; such as

<sup>a</sup> Exod. i. 7.    <sup>b</sup> Numb. i. 46.    <sup>c</sup> Vid. ABEN EZRAH, & MUNSTER in loc.    * Vid. sup. p. 105.    <sup>d</sup> 1 Chron. vii. 21. OSLAND. in loc.

(A) Moses was so surprised at this wonderful increase of his people, when he came to take an account of them, that he makes use of four of the strongest verbs in the whole Hebrew tongue to express it, viz. פָּרָו pharà, they fructified or multiplied like the fruit of trees; יִשְׂרָצוּ jifrazzà, they multiplied like fishes; רָבּוּ rabbù, they daily increased in number; יַעֲצִמּוּ jatzamù, they grew stronger and stronger (1). Had their hard bondage suffered them to have increased as much in wisdom and greatness of mind, they had not given him so much trouble, as we find they did both in Egypt and in the wilderness.

(B) St. Austin (2) thinks that this prodigious increase of the Israelites was altogether miraculous, in which many of the Jews agree with him. Aben Ezra tells us, that they brought forth 3 or 4 at every birth; and affirms, that a woman may bring forth as far as seven children at once (3). This he seems to have taken from Aristotle (4), or from Trogus, who says, that in Egypt the women were sometimes delivered of 7 children at once: but without having recourse to such prodigious births, which happen but seldom, we need but suppose that the Israelites, both men and women, were very fruitful, that they began soon, and continued long in begetting, which has been shewn in the former section to have been the fact. We see no impossibility for 70 males, in the compass of 215 years, to have multiplied to this degree, even at the rate of one child every year; for, according to Simler's computation, 70 persons, if they beget a child every year, will in 30 years time have above 2000 children; of which, admit that one third part only did come to procreate, in 30 years more they will amount to 9000; the third part of it will in 30 years more be multiplied to 45,000: according to which moderate calculation, in 210 years, the whole amount will be at least 2,760,000. If therefore there was any thing miraculous or extraordinary in all this, it was that they should be able to multiply at that rate, notwithstanding their hard labours and cruel bondage.

(1) Exod. i. 7. PELICAN. & al.

(2) AUG. de civit. lib. xviii. cap. 7.

(3) ABEN EZRA. ap. MUNST. in loc.

(4) HISTOR. animal. lib. vii. c. 4.

They are hated by the Egyptians.

Their cruel bondage.

their contempt of all nations but their own; their hatred of the Israelites both as a shepherds, and as Hebrews, who killed and lived upon those beasts that were worshipped in Egypt; the great difference of religion; envy to see them so successful and the like; but the main and indeed sufficient motive mentioned in the text, was their being grown more mighty than the Egyptians, and the danger there was, least upon any war they should join with their enemies, and drive them out of the land. This last made such an impression upon them, that though they were resolved to crush them as much as possible, if not totally to destroy them; yet they did not dare to come to an open rupture with them, but made it their chief endeavours to weaken them by degrees, by hard labours, taxes (C) and all kind of oppression, as the sequel of this history will soon shew.

THIS terrible persecution, if we may be allowed to call it by that name, began under the reign of a new king<sup>c</sup>, who knew not Joseph (D), or had forgot

<sup>c</sup> Exod. i. 9, 10.

<sup>d</sup> Ibid. ver. 8.

(C) It is to be observed, that the original words סָרִיס שָׂרִי Sari Massim, which we translate task-masters, do properly signify tax-gatherers; the burthens are mentioned afterwards under another name; so that they lay heavy tributes upon them, to impoverish, and heavy burthens to weaken them. Philo tells us (5), that they were made to carry burthens above their strength, and to work night and day; that they were forced to be workers and servers; that they were employed in brick-making, digging and building: that if any of them dropt dead under their burthens, the others were not suffered to bury them. Josephus tells us moreover (6), that they were made to dig trenches and ditches; to drain rivers into channels; to wall whole towns, cast up dikes and banks to keep off inundations; and to erect phantastical pyramids; that they obliged them to learn several laborious trades, and confined them to a perpetual restless labour. Another author tells us (7), that in order to render them more odious to the Egyptians, they made them go differently apparelled. But without troubling ourselves further than with what Moses tells us, we shall find their work hard enough (8); they were forced to work in clay and brick, and compelled at length to go and seek out for stubble instead of straw, without the least diminution of their tasks, of which if they chanced to come short, which could not possibly be avoided, their overseers were severely beaten for it (9). Thus they tried by these three ways to bring them under, viz. by exacting a tribute to lessen their wealth, laying heavy burthens on them to weaken their bodies, and thereby to prevent their generating and increasing.

(D) There was nothing extraordinary in this forgetfulness, taking the words of Moses in their literal sense, if we consider that kings were then only elective, and all the subjects looked upon as their slaves (10). Archbishop Usher mentions seven kings between Joseph's death, and this who knew not Joseph, i. e. in about 60 years, which was more than sufficient to obliterate all his signal services. Some indeed thinking this impossible, there being still so many monuments extant of them, have understood Moses's words in a less strict sense, as if he had not forgot, but refused to acknowledge them. Thus St. Paul is made to say (11), that he knew not that it was the high-priest that caused him to be smitten, when every child might have known him both by his particular dress, and the place where he sat: whereas it is thought that he meant, he did not acknowledge him to be the high-priest, because he had obtained the mitre by bribery (12); but as Moses calls this a new king, probably because he was of another family, if not a stranger, there will be no reason to depart from the literal sense. Who this new king was is not so easily agreed. Cajetan thinks him to have been an Assyrian born, from the words of the prophet (13) My people went down into Egypt to sojourn, and an Assyrian oppressed them. But we don't find, in the Egyptian chronicles any Assyrian kings either before Moses, or for above 1000 years after. Neither could it be Mephres, in whose ninth year Joseph is supposed to have died, and the bondage to have began (14); because Levi outlived Joseph above 23 years (15): whereas the thralldom did not commence till all the patriarchs were dead. Some therefore suppose that it was Amenophis, because Eusebius thinks that Moses was born in the 18th year of his reign, and so doth St. Jerome (16). This king is also called Memnon, the speaking stone, whose statue did use to speak at the sun-rising, and is thought by some to have continued till our Saviour's time (17). Archbishop Usher, after Marcator, thinks it was Rameses Mianus, the latter part of whose surname seems to have been deduced from the forepart of Amen-Opbis, by which name sundry of his predecessors, as well as his son after him, were called. This king, the above-mentioned primate affirms to have reigned 62 years and 2 months; during which, being frightened at the number and strength of the Israelites, he began to oppress them with a cruel bondage, laying upon them, besides their continual labour and tillage of the ground, the building also of royal magazines, storehouses, and the whole cities of Ramfis or Ramesis and Pithom; the former of which took its name from the king, and the latter probably from the queen (18), but we shall find a great difficulty here, viz. how to reconcile that learned prelate with what Pliny says (19), that this Rameses reigned in the time of the Trojan war, that is, about 300 years after the death of Moses. Upon the whole, the reader is desired to remember what we said in the history of Egypt concerning the difficulty of adjusting their chronology, and particularly who those kings were under whom the Israelites suffered this slavery †. As for those

(5) PHILO in vis. Moiss.

(6) Antiq. l. ii. c. 9.

(7) EUPOLEM. ap EUSEB. prop.

(8) Exod. i. 14.

(9) Ibid. c. v. passim.

(10) DIOD. SICUL. l. ii. c. i. Gen. xlviii. 19, 20.

(11) Act. xviii. 5.

(12) LE SCENE Essay d'une nouvelle version &c. al.

(13) Isai. lvi. 4.

(14) VINCENT in loc.

(15) Exod. vi. 16.

(16) EUSEB. HIERON. in Chronic.

(17) PERRER.

SIMLER. & al.

(18) USHER'S annal. p. 12.

(19) PLIN. lib. xxxvi. c. viii.

† Vid. sup.

p. 258. not. l.

- a the great services which that glorious minister had done both to the crown and nation of Egypt. This we need not wonder at after so many years, when Abasbuerus could so soon forget Mordecai, who had so lately saved his life *. Though it must be owned, that had Joseph's merit been never so fresh in their memory, yet that prince's conduct, if politically considered, had nothing strange or uncommon, since it would rather have been a prodigy, if his gratitude to a man, that had been dead above 50 years, had prevented his taking all the cautious measures to secure his own kingdom against the danger it seemed threatened with from a people, who from an indigent family were become such a numerous and formidable host. The religion of the Israelites so opposite to Egyptian idolatry; their strict union
b among themselves; the great riches they had heaped up during Joseph's life; their indefatigable industry in feeding their numberless herds, in trade and agriculture; their bodily strength and warlike temper; in all which, and many other respects, they seem to have been far superior to the Egyptians: all these I say did sufficiently justify Pharaoh's fears, if not in some measure authorise those violent measures which he took against them (E). We have seen in our days christian princes take as cruel and inhuman precautions against their own natural subjects, of whose fidelity and loyal attachment they had much greater proofs than ever the kings of Egypt had from the children of Israel; and yet these persecutions have been justified, nay canonized, whilst Pharaoh's have been branded with the worst of epithets, c and are not mentioned without horror.

- HAD indeed the Egyptian court been less a stranger to the Israelites, they would have had little cause to fear being driven out of their own country, against which these were so far from designing any attempt of that nature, that they never looked upon themselves but as sojourners in it for a while, still waiting for the happy day when God should call them out of it, to go and conquer another land. But perhaps they wisely concealed this secret from the Egyptians, who would be too loath to lose the service of such a numerous people, not to prevent their going by all possible means. Besides, had it been known, there was still some danger of their joining with their enemies, upon any war or invasion, in order to facilitate their escape. Pharaoh indeed makes the great advantage of their servitude a pretence for not letting them go where Moses desired †; but had that been all, it is not likely he would have taken such effectual methods of depriving himself of it, by totally destroying them: for when he found by the experience of Pharaoh's d at least ten years, that neither the hardships he laid upon them, nor all the cruelties which his officers and people used towards them, could prevent their multiplying as fast, if not faster than ever †, he sent for the two chief Hebrew midwives, Shiprah and Pnubah, (F) and strictly charged them, that when they perform-cruel order to the Hebrew midwives.

* Esther vi. 23.

† Exod. xiv. 5.

† Ibid. c. i. 12.

those who pretend that the Israelites continued above 400 years in Egypt, as Genebrard (20); or that they groaned under that slavery all that time, as Josephus (21), they'll send us still farther to seek for a king that will fit them; but we hope we have sufficiently proved their error in our notes in the former section, p. 425. not K, and made it more than probable, that they did not continue there above 215 years.

(E) Josephus, not thinking all these sufficient to alarm the king of Egypt, tells us (22), that there was a certain scribe famous for his predictions, who went and told him, that there was a Hebrew child to be born about that very time, that would prove a scourge to the Egyptians, and advance the glory of his nation, and that if he lived to grow up, he would be eminent for his virtue and courage, and make his name famous to posterity: that Pharaoh was so startled at this prediction, that he ordered the Egyptian midwives, under pain of death, carefully to attend the labour of all the Hebrew women, and to destroy all their males. But as Moses doth not hint any thing like it, the reader may as safely reject as admit it.

(F) Though Moses mentions but two midwives, yet we must not suppose that they could suffice to such a vast number of women. Some therefore think, that these two only attended on the nobler sort of Hebrew women, whose children Pharaoh chiefly intended to cut off (23): whereas his charge was to kill all the males, none excepted. Others think, that the Hebrew women being strong, and easily delivered (24), might probably shift with two midwives; but it is to be considered, that this was not so much the real fact, as an excuse of the midwives, for not obeying the king's orders. It is therefore more probable, that these two were the chief ones, who had the charge and direction of all the rest (25); and that there was such a precedence or superiority among midwives, whatever Cajetan says to the contrary, appears very probable at least from what Plinarch tells us, that among the Grecians, there were some to whom the care of that business was committed, and that publick schools were kept for that purpose (26). Several learned expositors, especially among the Romish (27), following the Septuagint and Vulgate versions, which read המילדות העבריות Hawia-

(20) Genebrard chronogr. p. 11. sub An. M. 2660.

(21) Antiq. l. ii. c. ix.

(22) Ibid.

(23) CAJET. in loc.

(24) Exod. i. 9.

(25) PELICAN. VATABL. OUTRAM. & al.

(26) Vid. JUX. in analys. VILLET. & al.

(27) PERRER. ARET. SIMLER. &c.

They are rewarded for their disobedience,

and rewarded by God for their piety.

ed their office to the Hebrew women, they should destroy all the males, and let the females take their chance. But these women, who feared God, and abhorred such a cruel office, neglected the king's commands, and saved all the children that were born, males as well as females. Pharaoh, being extremely provoked at it, commanded them to be brought before him, and in a threatening tone asked them how they dared to disobey his orders? The women had not their answer to seek, for they readily told his Majesty, that the Hebrew women did not, like the Egyptian ones, want a midwife to deliver them, being lusty and strong, and bringing forth more like the beasts of the forest than like women (G); so that their children were born before they could come to them. Moses tells us, that their piety and mercy did not go unrewarded, and that God blessed them with a numerous posterity (H): not because their having told a lye to the king, made them wor-

* Ibid. ver. 21.

Hamaledoth baghibrioth, the midwives of the Hebrew women, instead of the Hebrew midwives, as the grammatical construction rather requires, have fancied, after Josephus (28), that they were Egyptian midwives, as being most likely to obey the king's bloody command, and that the Israelites had no midwives among them. This last is wholly improbable, and contrary to several places of scripture, besides their being influenced by the fear of God to disobey the king's order, is more applicable to the Hebrew than to the Egyptian midwives. Lastly, their names, which are wholly Hebrew, shews them to have been such; for the word Shiphrah comes from שפר Shaphar, which signifies to be, or to make beautiful; and therefore the Jewish etymologist gives us this reason for her being called so, viz. because שפירת את הילד she shaped the babe into form. The other was called Phuah, from פעה to cry out, either because they generally make the women to cry out lustily, that they may be the sooner rid of their burthen; or because they are most accustomed to the cries of the mothers and the children. And whereas Josephus says, that Hebrew women would have been too partial to their people, the same reason did hold against Pharaoh's setting up Hebrew task-masters over them, which yet we find he did, and the fear of death might as easily influence the one as the other nation to obey the king (29). As for those who think, with some Hebrew Rabbies (30), that these two midwives were Jocbed, Moses's mother, and Miriam her daughter, and that they are here only surnamed, in allusion to their office; they are not worth confuting, since Miriam could not be above six or seven years old when this order was given, as we shall see by and by.

(G) The word חיות chaioth, which we translate lively, doth likewise signify wild beasts, and may be taken in that sense in this place, seeing the midwives wanted to throw the fault upon the pregnant women, who, like the beasts of the field, needed no help to be delivered. A great deal of learned dult has been raised about this answer of the midwives; as, 1. Whether it was, strictly speaking, a lye. 2. Whether, and how far it was excusable in them. 3. Whether the reward mentioned by Moses was given them for the lye, or for their mercy, or both. It is plain, this answer of theirs was the effect of their fear of the king's displeasure, and not of that merciful disposition which they shewed towards the poor children: this last was the virtue here rewarded; whatever betided them for the lye they told, if it was really such; for it is very probable, that the Hebrew women, who were kept more strictly than the loose and masterly Egyptian dames, might have much easier labours than they, and so have less need of midwives. Their answer might therefore be true in part, though not in the whole, and as to their stretching the truth a little beyond its due bounds, upon a good design, they had the examples of Abraham and Isaac, who made their wives pass for their sisters, though they were only so in a far fetched sense.

(H) Our English and several other versions, having followed the Hebrew too literally, have rendered this place, the Lord made them houses; which though it may imply the same sense we have given it, yet it is too obscurely expressed, and has led some expositors, for want of attending to the Hebrew idiom, into some absurd notions. Thus St. Jerom understands it of houses in heaven (31), others of strong houses built by the Israelites, to defend them against the rage of Pharaoh (32). Others, thinking them to have been Jocbed and Miriam, have understood it of the kingdom and priesthood, which were afterwards settled upon their posterity; because Jocbed was mother to Aaron, and Miriam to Caleb (33); but besides that Miriam was too young for such an office, it is not certain she was Caleb's mother; on the contrary, Josephus tells us (34), that she was the wife of Hur. Some again, taking them to have been Egyptians, have understood it of their being incorporated into the common-wealth of Israel (35) as Rahab afterwards was. Others think that their families were enriched by a particular blessing (36); but the truest sense is, that their houses or families were greatly increased. For the word בן Ben, a son in the Hebrew, comes from בנה Banah, to build, because he is as it were the builder of the house or family: in this sense Sarah gives her maid to Abraham, that she might be built, that is, be made a mother by her (37). Accordingly the Psalmist (38) says, who maketh the barren woman to become a house or family, and to be a joyful mother of children (39).

There is still one difficulty more in the text, which is, that the word לָבֵן labem, so them, is of the masculine gender; whereas if it had related to the midwives, it should have been לָלֵב laben, from which some have imagined, that it refers to the Egyptians who built themselves strong houses to put the pregnant Hebrews

(28) Ant. l. ii. c. ix.

PHARAD. & al.
LOM. & al.
AUGUST. THEODOR.
LE SCENE, &c.

(29) S. AUG. lib. contr. mendac. cap. xv. xvi.

(31) Hieron. in cap. lxxv. Isai.

(34) Ant. l. iii. c. 9.

(37) Gen. xvi. 2.

(32) SEPHARADI in loc.

(35) VATABL. PINED. &c.

(38) Ps. cxiii. 9.

(30) RAB. ABR. SE-

(33) R. SA-

(36) AU-

(39) D. KIMCHI PERRER.

- a thy of no better than a temporal reward, exclusive of any other, as some ancient fathers have thought<sup>1</sup>. But Moses records this temporal recompence, as best suiting the carnal people he had to do with, and whom the sequel will show to have had little thought of another life, if they could but make themselves comfortably happy in this.
- HOWEVER, Pharaoh, finding that these underhand stratagems proved ineffectual, resolved to act more openly against the Israelites, and to make the parents become the executioners of their own children. To this end, he issued out an order, under the severest penalties, that every Hebrew male-child, that was born, should be The Israelites commanded to drown all their male children. cast into the Nile, and that none but the females should be suffered to live; by which
- b the people saw themselves obliged either to drown their own children, or to see it done by the Egyptians, as soon as they were discovered, and themselves severely punished for not obeying the king's edict. Such a bloody command could not but cause the greatest consternation in the afflicted Israelites, too prone naturally to despond and despair of God's promises. They thought themselves on the eve of their deliverance from the hardest of slaveries; a glorious deliverer was promised to them, whom they now see condemned to die as soon as born. But God, whose designs could not be frustrated either by the private artifices, or open violence of the king of Egypt, made him the instrument of bringing up that very child whom he took such pains to destroy.
- AMRAM the son of Kobab, and grandson of Levi, had married Jochebed,
- c the daughter of Levi, his own aunt (I), by whom he had had two children before the king's edict, viz. Miriam and Aaron (K) †; but Moses not being born 'till Moses is born, some time after the promulgation of it, and he proving a lovely and beautiful child, God inspired them with a more than ordinary reluctance to obey it; so brews in, that they might not elude the king's design: but if that had been the case, he must rather have built large cities to have sufficed the vast multitude of Hebrew women. Others think, that it was the Israelites, and not the midwives that were so multiplied; because, say they, women cannot be said to build families, but men (40); but the contrary of this is plain, by the blessing which was given to Ruth (41), that she might prove like Rachel and Leah, which two did build the house, or family, of Israel. We rather therefore think it more probable, that the Mem is put for the Nun, which very often happens, and the masculine for the feminine, as we find it in the next chapter (42), where the masculine relative is applied to Jeibro's seven daughters, and many other places besides (43); and that the masculine pronoun is given to the midwives by way of excellency, which is no uncommon thing in the sacred tongue.

<sup>1</sup> GREGOR. lib. viii. moral.

† See Exod. vi. 20.

(I) We have ventured to call Jochebed Amram's aunt, though the Septuagint, Vulgate, and after them many learned expositors, both Papists and Protestants, have thought that she was no more than his uncle Kobab's daughter, and consequently his cousin-german, because the marriage of an aunt was afterwards forbidden in the Levitical law (1). For though the word דוד Dod, in the original, doth sometimes signify an uncle's son (2), and דודא Dodab, an uncle's daughter, or cousin-german; yet seeing Moses tells us (3), that she was born unto Levi, and accordingly calls her Amram's aunt (4) in another place, we thought we might safely give her that name after many learned men (5). And here we cannot forbear taking notice of a mistake which Calmet must have been led into by some Amanunfis, who mentions the learned Usher in the number of those who think that she was but first cousin to Amram; whereas the contrary appears by the very place quoted by him, where that prelate calls her Levi's daughter, and Amram's aunt and wife. Some Hebrew writers (6) pretend that she was born about the time that Jacob came down to Egypt; at which rate she must have been 135 years old when Moses was born, that is; above 40 years older than Sarah was when she bore Isaac: but had Moses's birth been so miraculous, we need not doubt but he would have recorded it, as well as that of Isaac. It is therefore more likely, that Levi begot her in Egypt, in the 100th year of his age, which was nothing wonderful, seeing Abraham begot several children of Keturah, after the 137th of his; and Jacob begot Benjamin when he was 107; and as for Jochebed she may be safely supposed to have bore Moses when she was 68 years old, nothing being more common than for the Hebrew women in those days to bear children at, and even after that age (7); and then we need not to go seek for another Jochebed, to make her coincide with the time of Moses's birth, as some have done, since whatever other of that name were found, she must be Amram's aunt, as the text calls her in the places above quoted.

(K) Though Moses doth mention nothing of the age of his sister, either when she was born, or when she died, yet it is plain she was the eldest of the three, because she was old enough to watch Moses when he was exposed; whereas Aaron was but three years older than he: but that she should be so old as the Jews make her, viz. to have been one of the two midwives mentioned in a former note, is both improbable, and contrary to the opinion of our chronologers and expositors, who make her but ten years old at most, when Moses was born.

(40) SIMLER. JUN. VILLET. in loc.

(41) Ruth iv. 11.

(42) Exod. ii. 17.

(43) VATABL. PISCAT. MUNST. & al. in loc.

(1) NIC. DE LYN. A. MONTAN. CAJETAN. PERRER. CASTAL. & al. in loc.

(2) Jerem. xxxii. 12.

(3) Numb. xxvi. 59.

(4) Exod. vi. 20.

(5) Chald. parabr. JUN. MUNST. PAGNIN. SIMLER. USSER. & al.

(6) CALM. Hist. O. T. lib. ii. p. 296. not. b. USSER. annal. ad An. Mund. 2385.

(7) VATABL. in loc.

Year of the
Flood, 1429.
Year before
Christ, 1571.

and concealed three months, and exposed to the common fate,

and taken up,

and brought up by Pharaoh's daughter.

that they ventured to keep him privately during the space of three months (L),<sup>a</sup> till at last fearing the extreme danger of a discovery, which would have proved fatal both to the child and themselves, they were forced, though with the utmost regret, to expose him like the rest. However, nature, shrinking at the thoughts of his immediate death, made them contrive to make him a small ark of bull-rushes, or rather of the flags of the tree of which the Egyptians made their paper<sup>a</sup>, which was strong enough to hold out the water, and smooth enough to receive the pitch and tar with which it was besmeared, and by its lightness fittest to swim with the child's weight. This ark being daubed with pitch within and without, they put the child in it, and committing him to the mercy of the waves, or rather to the care of providence, they left Miriam his sister, who was then about 8 years of age, at a convenient distance to watch and see what would become of him: The reeds and flags, with which that river abounds<sup>a</sup>, soon stopped the cradle from being carried by the current, and here it was that God sent him a happy deliverer from all future dangers on account of the king's edict.

WHILST his sorrowful mother was retiring from him, providence directed thither the princess, whom he had made choice of to breed him up as her own. It was Pharaoh's daughter, who, being come to the river with a design to bathe herself, spied the ark as she was walking along the shore. Her curiosity soon made her send some of her retinue to fetch it to her. It was not long before her surprise, at the sight of so beautiful a child, was succeeded by an irresistible love and pity for him, whose cries and tears would have reached a heart less gentle and pitiful than her's. She immediately concluded, that it was the child of some of those unfortunate Hebrews who groaned under her father's heavy thralldom; her pity told her, that so lovely a boy deserved a better fate, and that it was her duty, since chance had thus thrown him in her way, at any rate to save him from the common ruin.

PROVIDENCE, which conducted all this scene, put it into her heart to have him educated as her own son, and into young Miriam's head, to approach the princess, and to offer herself to fetch her an Hebrew nurse to suckle him. She was no sooner bid to go, but she fled with all imaginable joy to call the mournful Jochebed,<sup>d</sup> who did not make them wait long before she came and received the dear infant from the hands of the princess, and with him an express order to take the same care of him as if it had been her own. At the same time she told her that as she did not know the boy's name, she would give him that of Moses, seeing she had drawn him out of the water (M); and having promised her an ample reward

<sup>a</sup> JOSEPH. Ant. l. ii. c. 9.
& al.

<sup>a</sup> Isai. xviii. 2. HERODOT. lib. ii. DIODOR. SICUL. lib. i.

(L) This pious concealment is sufficiently justified by St. Stephen, and the epistle to the Hebrews (8), not only on the account of the child's beauty, which is also mentioned by Justin out of Trogus, but also upon the account of their faith, they looking upon him as the future deliverer of their nation. However, Josephus tells us (9), that Amram finding his wife with child, and being solicitous about the king's edict, prayed earnestly to God to put an end to this dreadful persecution, and that God appeared to him and told him, that he would shortly free his people from it, and that the son, that should shortly be born to him, should prove the happy instrument of their glorious deliverance, and eternise his own name thereby — that this made them conceal him as long as they could, but fearing a discovery, they resolved to trust him to the care of providence — who accordingly conducted Pharaoh's daughter to the river's side, and inspired her with such sentiments of pity, that she adopted him for her son. He calls that princess Thermuthis, and after him Epiphanias in Panaris, and others. Artaphanes (10) calls her Meris, and the Alexandrian chronicle Myrrina. Josephus adds further (11), that Thermuthis having sent for several wet nurses one after another, the child did scornfully turn away his head from their breast, and that Miriam, who was then present, told that princess, that if the nurse and the child were of different nations, her milk would never agree with it, but that if an Hebrew woman was fetched, he would probably take the breast from her. Upon which she was bid to go for one, and quickly brought the child's mother, whom he fell a sucking most heartily, to the admiration of the princess, and all the by-standers. Thus far Josephus. The Jews observe further, that the word river, here used, is not נַחַל Nahar, which signifies a great river, such as the Nile was, but יַרְדֵּן Yor, which signifies a river, or rather canal, that is drawn from the great one, to water the country (12); and as the land of Egypt abounded every where with the latter, the Israelites needed not to go far for a place to drown their children in.

(M) Moses is here thought to have Hebraised his name, in order to express the sense of the Egyptian one, which had been given him by Pharaoh's daughter †. The word Mo or Mai in the Egyptian tongue, according to Josephus (12), signifies water; and Yses or Ise signifies preserved, and so Moses one preserved out of the water.

BUT

(8) ABT. vii. 20. Hebr. xi. 13. (9) Ant. l. ii. c. ix. (10) AP. EUSEB. prep. Eb. ix. cap. iv.
(11) Ant. loc. citat. (12) Ibid. † Vid. sup. p. 153.

for

a for her care of him, she returned to the palace without acquainting any one with the adventure, whilst the joyful mother went home to impart to her husband the news of this happy accident.

THIS signal care of providence failed not to make them look upon Moses as a child designed for some glorious purpose, and to give him an education suitable to the idea they had conceived of him, whilst he stayed with them. They brought him in due time to Pharaoh's daughter, who adopted him for her son, and had him brought up in all the kinds of learning which that country was famous for <sup>(N)</sup>. However, it is reasonable to suppose, that his parents had so well instructed him in their religion, and taken such care to let him know both what relation they bore

His education.

b to him, and what hopes they had conceived of his being designed by heaven to be the deliverer of his nation, that he made no other use of the education which the princess gave him, than to confirm himself more and more against the superstitions and idolatry of the Egyptians, and to make himself fit to answer those ends for which he seemed designed by providence. It was this noble motive which made him sympathize with the oppressed Hebrews, and prefer the reproachful and despised name of Israelite to all the pomp and glory of Pharaoh's court. It was this generous love to his people, which made him venture to visit and commiserate them, and where it was in his power to relieve them from their intolerable oppression, though at the hazard of his own life. For having observed one day, an Egyptian

c using an Hebrew with some uncommon barbarity, being perhaps one of those cruel task-masters whom Pharaoh had set over the Hebrew ones, and who used to punish them upon the least default of those that were under their inspection; Moses was so exasperated at it, that he had only patience enough to look about and see that the coast was clear, before he fell upon him, killed him, and buried his carcass in the sand. If what Josephus tells us * be true, that he had before this time been at the head of Pharaoh's troops, and made several successful campaigns against the Æthiopians, who had ravaged and plundered some provinces of Egypt (O), we

He kills an Egyptian.

<sup>a</sup> Act. vii. 22.

<sup>b</sup> Hebr. xi. 24, &c.

<sup>c</sup> Ant. lib. ii. c. x.

But Aben Ezra (13) tells us, out of an Arabic book, entituled, עבודת האדמה, or, the cultivation of land; that Moses was called, מוֹשֶׁה, Monios or Monious, in the Egyptian tongue, signifies drawn out (14), but it is very likely, that if his name had differed so much, and had been altogether Egyptian, Moses would have taken notice of it, as he doth of the new name that was given to Joseph, or as Daniel doth his own, and that of his three friends. It is therefore most likely that the word Moses is derived from the verb מָשַׁח Massach, which signifies to draw out, and is taken in that sense by the Psalmist, Ps. xviii. v. 17. יִשְׁכֵּחַ מַיִם רַבִּים he shall draw me out of many waters. Which verb might probably be common both to the Hebrew and Egyptian tongues, both in sound and signification (14), only with this difference, perhaps, that in the Egyptian it may bein the passive, and signify drawn out; whereas in the Hebrew, it is the participle active, drawing out, and may allude to his bringing the Israelites out of their bondage.

(N) Clement Alexandrinus tells us (15), that Moses was taught arithmetick, geometry, physick, musick, and hieroglyphicks, otherwise called enigmatical philosophy: To which Philo adds (16), astronomy, which he learned of the Chaldeans, and the Assyrian characters from the Assyrians; and that they sent for the best masters from Greece, to instruct him in all liberal arts and sciences: But that was not a time for the Egyptians, who excelled the rest of the world in all sorts of learning, to send for masters from Greece, which rather stood in need of Egyptian teachers; so that when Moses is said to have been instructed in all the learning of Egypt, it plainly implies that he had the best and most learned education that the whole world could then give him. If it be asked how the Egyptians came by all those sciences, as we can affirm nothing certain or new concerning it, we shall content ourselves with referring the reader to what has been already said of it in the description of that country in a former chapter *. An ancient author, quoted by Clement, bishop of Alexandria, and by Eusebius (17), calls Moses the first of all the sages or wise men, and says, that he was the first inventor of the art of grammar, which he taught to the Israelites, from whom the Phœnicians received it, and the Greeks from them.

(O) A great deal of pains have been taken to find Moses suitable employment for those forty years of his abode in Egypt. Josephus has given us several remarkable particulars of his life daring that time, which are not indeed warranted by the text, but yet seem to have been universally known and believed by the Jews of his time, the reader may perhaps be glad of an abstract of them. He tells us, that the princess Thermutis having no children of her own, and having adopted Moses, on the account of the singular beauties of his body and mind, brought him to her father, who took him into his arms, and received him with great tenderness, and taking his crown off his head, laid it on that of the boy; but Moses, instead of being pleased with it, took it off, flung it to the ground, and set his foot upon it: Whereupon, the same priest, who had formerly foretold his birth, cried out that he ought to be put to death immediately, and that Egypt could not be safe otherwise. But Thermutis soon snatched him away,

(13) ABEN EZRA in loc.

(14) SIMLER. OSIANDER in loc. VILLET. in Exod. ch. ii. quest. 17.

(15) CLEM. ALEX. lib. i.

(16) PHILO in vit. Mosis.

* See before p. 225, & seq.

(17) EUSEBIUS. ap. CLEM. ALEXANDR. Strom. lib. i. & ap. EUSEB. præp. lib. ix. cap. xxvi.

shall not need wonder at his martial spirit shewing itself upon such an occasion as this; <sup>a</sup> but as we are not sure, that what this historian says is really fact, seeing Pbilo, who hath purposely wrote Moses's life, and had as great opportunities of being informed of all the particulars of it as Josephus had, is altogether silent about it, and Moses himself is so far from mentioning any such warlike prowess, that he rather describes himself as a man of the utmost meekness and patience; we shall be forced to suppose, that he was stirred up to this bold deed by some divine impulse, as being the person chosen by heaven to be the deliverer of Israel. This seems to be hinted at by St. Stephen, and we may probably suppose that the injury done to the Hebrew was of such a nature, that it either deserved death; or that it could not be prevented but by killing the Egyptian. However that be, Moses was not so safe as he thought himself, <sup>b</sup> for endeavouring soon after to compose a difference between two Hebrews, whose cruel slavery could not hinder them from injuring one another, the most guilty of the two gave him a very saucy answer, asking him, whether he designed to kill him as he had done the Egyptian (P)? Finding therefore that the fact was known, and fearing least if it should come to Pharaoh's knowledge, he would suspect him, away, the king no ways opposing it, and left the old prophet to rave at his leisure, who ceased not to contrive means to be rid of a person so dangerous to the kingdom.

<sup>c</sup> Acts vii. 15.

After this Moses, being grown to man's estate, had an opportunity offered him of showing his courage and conduct. The Ethiopians, who inhabited the upper lands, on the south side of Egypt, had made many dreadful incursions, plundered and ravaged all the neighbouring parts of the country, and beat the Egyptian army which Pharaoh had sent to oppose them in a set battle, and were become so proud of their success, that they began to march towards the capital of Egypt. In this distress the Egyptians had recourse to the oracle, which answered, that they must get an Hebrew general at their head. As none was more promising than Moses, the king desired his daughter to consent, that he should go and head his army; but she, after having first expostulated with her father, how unreasonable it was for the Egyptians to implore the assistance of a man whom they had been so long plotting against, did not give her consent, 'till she had his royal word and oath, that no attempt should be hatched against her son. Moses's first care, as soon as he was at the head of the Egyptian army, was to reach the enemy as soon as possible, and instead of going up the Nile, as was usual before, he chose to cross the country, and thereby shorten the way, and surprize the Ethiopians, who could not expect him to come by that way, because that whole country was infested by flying, and other poisonous serpents, which did even poison the very air. But Moses found out a method to rid his army of that danger, by carrying with them a vast number of birds, called Ibis, in iron-cages, whose nature is to devour all sorts of serpents, and to be friendly to all other creatures†. His project succeeded to admiration, and the birds, being once let loose, made a speedy end of all those venomous creatures, and opened to him a quick and safe passage to the enemy's army, which having taken at unawares, he cut it all in pieces. He afterward entered their country, took several of their cities, and obliged them to retire into the city of Saba, called afterwards Meroë by Cambyfes, where he closely besieged them. The place being strongly fortified, and situated in the middle of an island, kept him employed some considerable time, and the siege would in all probability have lasted much longer, had not Tharbis, the king of Æthiopia's daughter, fallen in love with him, as she saw him fighting with the utmost gallantry and valour from the top of the city wall. She therefore sent privately to him, to let him know, that the city should be surrendered to him, upon condition that he should marry her immediately after. Moses consented to the conditions, and having taken possession of the place and of the princess, returned with his victorious army to Egypt, where, instead of reaping the fruits of his laurels, the ungrateful Egyptians accused him of murder to the king, who, having already taken some umbrage at his valour and great reputation, was resolving to rid himself of him. Moses, having some suspicion of it, made his escape, and not daring to go by the common roads, for fear of being stopped by the king's guards, was forced to go through a great desert to reach the land of Midian*. Thus far Josephus, from whose account we may gather, that there were three motives why Pharaoh and his people sought Moses's death. Namely, 1. Their envy at his great success and consummate wisdom in this warlike expedition. 2. Their jealousy lest he should attempt to make some dangerous insurrection in Egypt. And lastly, the prophecies which that country was threatened with from an Hebrew. To which Pbilo (18) adds a fourth, namely, his being too great a friend and favourer of the Hebrews, whom Pharaoh did already look upon as his most dangerous enemies.

(P) A jesuit, who has lately writ the history of the people of GOD, thinks it highly probable, that these two quarrelling Hebrews were that Jannes and Jambres mentioned by the apostle (19) to have withstood Moses, because they would not acknowledge him to have been a proper judge of their quarrel, though GOD had made him the judge of all his people (20). What induces him to think so is, that their names are Hebrew ones; for which reason he thinks, that they could not be the Egyptian magicians, whom Pharaoh made use of in opposition to Moses. But in order to make these names Hebrew, he must with some Jews call them Jochanan and Mambri, or Jonah and Jambri (21); but we shall shew in the sequel of this history, that these two men, let their right names be what they will, were the magicians who mimicked several of Moses's miracles, though they could not follow him throughout.

† See before p. 182. b. * Ant. lib. ii. cap. x. & xi. (18) PHILO in vit. Mosi. (19) 2 Tim. iii. 8. (20) BERRUYER Histoir. du peuple de Dieu. Tom. ii. p. 25. (21) BUXTORF Lexic. Talmudic. FABRIC. de Apocriph. Vet. Test.

- a of being too much in the interest of the Israelites, and punish him for the death of the Egyptian, he was forced to fly into the land of Midian; not daring to rely too much upon the protection of his adoptive mother, or having perhaps already disclaimed her adoption, as some are inclined to think. It is supposed however, that he had made use of that princess's interest long before, to get that bloody edict against the Hebrew male children recalled, since the sequel of the history shews, that that order had not been put in force for some time. It was well for him, however, he left Egypt so soon; for the news of the slain Egyptian was brought to the king, and in all likelihood aggravated with the blackest circumstances by the courtiers, who could not but hate a man in so high esteem as he was; so that if
- b Pharaoh could have caught him, he would infallibly have put him to death: but Moses was out of his reach, having past those great deserts that lay between Egypt and Midian (Q), and being safely got near hospitable Jethro's habitation. At his arrival in that country he met with much such another adventure as Jacob had in Padan-Aram*, at the well where the damsels used to come to water their flocks. An account of which, and of his forty years abode there, has been given in the history of the Midianites*.

and is forced to fly into Midian.

- How he spent his time in those forty years retirement, save that he kept Jethro's flocks, is what he has not thought fit to acquaint us with. Those, who suppose that he wrote the book of Job during this interval, have certainly this strong
- c argument on their side, that it appears to have been written before the deliverance of the Israelites out of Egypt; otherwise it were absurd to suppose, that either Job or his friends, considering what kindred and country they were of, could be either so ignorant of the wonders which God had wrought in favour of that oppressed people, or so forgetful of them, as not to have urged them in the strongest terms, during their long and intricate controversy about the various dispensations of providence. And indeed were not Job so often mentioned by Ezekiel†, with Noah and Daniel, much might be said for those who look upon this history as a parable, or rather a dramatick piece, written on purpose to comfort the afflicted Israelites under their heavy bondage. But the words of the prophet will not admit of such a sup-
- d position.

We have already taken notice in the history of Edom†, how uncertain and unsatisfactory every thing is that relates to the genealogy of this holy man, or the author of his history; but as we there engaged to give our readers all the probable particulars that can be gathered on that subject, we shall beg leave to subjoin them here in few words.

* Gen. xxix. 9. † Exod. ii. pass. • Vid. sup. p. 301. † Ezek. xiv. pass. * Gen. xxxvi. p. tot. ‡ Vid. sup. p. 312. a, b, c, d.

(Q) We must remember not to confound this land of Midian, of which an account has been already given*, with another of that name, whose chief city was also called Midian, and might be a colony of the other, which was situate by Araon and Arzopolis, according to St. Jerom, who tells us the ruins of it were still to be seen in his days (22). Whereas this, which Moses went to, was in Arabia Petrea, whose metropolis was called Petra, not far from mount Horeb, where he kept Jethro's flocks (23). This mountain was either near that of Sinai, or more probably Sinai and Horeb were two tops of the same mountain (24); the former of which St. Paul places in Arabia (25); though it is more probable that Horeb was the common name of the whole ridge of mountains, on which Sinai was situated; and that it was called Horeb, or as the original has it, Choreb, from the excessive driness of it (26). Philo adds (27), that it was full of bushes, and that at the bottom of the mountain grew that in which God appeared to Moses, which the original calls סִינַי Sinab, signifying properly a bush or shrub, that is so full of thorns, that the birds cannot perch in it without being stripped of their feathers. The Hebrews add, that mount Sinai had that name from it (28). However that be, this mount is also called the Mount of God, not indeed from any religious worship that had been performed there before that time, as Josephus imagines (29), or because of its height and supereminency, as such things are frequently so called in scripture, as the cedars of God, &c. (30) but it seems to be named by anticipation, as it became famous upon many accounts, such as 1. God appearing to Moses in the bush. 2. His being afterwards worshipped there, and shewing himself by the most wonderful visible signs at the delivery of the law (31). 3. The striking the rock with Moses's rod (32). Moses lifting up his hands to make Joshua prevail against the Amalekites (33). 5. The law being given to Moses from it (34). 6. His fasting there twice forty days and nights (35). 7. Bringing the two tables of stone from thence (36). 8. The noble vision which the prophet Elijah had there (37), and some others of less consequence.

* Vid. sup. p. 299 & seq. (22) Hieron. loc. Hæbraic. (23) Exod. iii. 1. (24) Jos. Antiq. l. ii. c. xii. (25) Galat. iv. 5. (26) Cajetan. Villet. Jun. in loc. & al. (27) Philo in vit. Moïsis. (28) Vid. Munst in loc. (29) Ant. lib. ii. c. xii. (30) Psal. civ. 16. (31) Exod. iii. 2. & cap. xix. & xx. pass. (32) Numb. xx. 11. (33) Exod. xvii. 11. (34) Exod. xxiv. & seq. pass. (35) Ibid. xxxiv. 28. Deut. ix. 9. (36) Exod. xxxii. 15, 16, & alib. (37) 1 Kings xix.

A digression concerning Job.

THE most ancient monument we have concerning the genealogy of Job, and which has been received and allowed by Aristeus, Philo, Polybistor <sup>a</sup>, as likewise by several ancient fathers of the Greek and Latin church <sup>2</sup>, is an addition to that history, which is to be met with at the end of the Greek, Arabick and Vulgate versions, and is affirmed to have been taken from the ancient Syriac one, to this purpose; that Job dwelt upon the confines of Idumea and Arabia; that his first name was Jobab, and that he married an Arabian, by whom he had a son named Ennon. As for Job he was the son of Zarab, and the fifth in descent from Abraham by Esau, and reigned in Idumæa. The order of the kings, that reigned before and after him, is as follows; Balac the son of Beor reigned in the city of Denabab; after him reigned Job, called also Jobab; who was succeeded by Asom prince of Teman. <sup>b</sup> his successor Adad; the son of Barad, was he who overthrew the Midianites in the plains of Moab; the name of his city was Jethem. Job's friends, who came to visit him, were Eliphaz king of Teman, of Esau's posterity; Bildad king of the Zeuchites, and Zophar king of the Mineans. Thus far the additions, which have been preserved by Theodotion, in his version of the book of Job <sup>1</sup>. If this genealogy be admitted, and that Job is the same with Jobab, mentioned in Genesis <sup>2</sup> and Chronicles <sup>3</sup>, it will follow that he and Moses were cotemporary, being both but three generations removed from Isaac thus;

Isaac,
Jacob,	Esau,
Levi,	Reuel,
Amram,	Zerab,
Moses,	Jobab or Job.

IT will likewise be plain, that he reigned in the city of Denaba or Dinbabab; for so the author of the first book of the Chronicles expressly affirms <sup>b</sup>; but how to find such a city in the land of Uz, seeing Eusebius and St. Jerom place Dinbabab in the land of Moab, between Areopolis and Heshbon <sup>c</sup>: whereas they affirm the land of Uz, or the place where Job dwelt, to have been according to the ancient tradition of the inhabitants of Palestine, the city of Astaroth Kernaim on the other side Jordan, upon the brook Jabock, between Mabanaïm and Edras <sup>d</sup>, is not so easy to determine. However that be, those who embrace the notion that Job is the Jobab mentioned in those two places of scripture above quoted, and consequently, that he was cotemporary with Moses, have with much straining pumped out two passages in his history, which, they pretend, do make express mention of Pharaoh's pride and overthrow, and of the Israelites passing through the red sea. The first is, where Eliphaz says of the wicked, that trouble and anguish shall make him afraid, and prevail against him as a king ready to battle <sup>e</sup>. Which words they apply to Pharaoh's pride and hardness of heart, though 'tis plain by what goes before and after those two verses, that Job's friend speaks only of the wicked in general, such as he supposed him to be from the afflictions which had befallen him. The other text is, where Job says, that God divideth the sea with his power, and by his understanding smiteth through the proud <sup>f</sup>. And this they think to allude to the passing of the Red Sea, and to Pharaoh's overthrow in it. But here, besides that the word in the original doth more properly signify to still than to divide, it is plain from the tenour of the whole chapter, that Job speaks only of the wonderful power and providence of God in general, and not of this miracle in particular. Besides, it is hardly probable, as we observed a little before, that had this conference between Job and his friends happened after so remarkable a deliverance as that of the Israelites, a more ample and express mention should not have been made throughout the book, than we find in these two obscure passages; especially if we consider that Job's desire of vindicating his own integrity did naturally lead him to it; and that the afflictions, as well as the deliverance of the Israelites, were a full confutation of what his friends alledged against him, that if he had not been guilty of some great crimes, God would never have inflicted such heavy punishments on him <sup>2</sup>. Neither do we see any necessity for making Job to have lived since

<sup>a</sup> Apud EUSEB. præp. l. ix. c. xxv.

<sup>2</sup> Vid. FRED. SPANHEIM invit. Job c. iv. MERCER PINEDA DIER. de STUNICA & al. comm. in Job.

<sup>3</sup> 1 Chron. i. 43. 44.

<sup>4</sup> Vid. CALM. dissert. in Job.

<sup>5</sup> Gen. xxxvi. 32.

<sup>6</sup> Ibid. xxvi. 12.

<sup>7</sup> Ibid. xxvi. 12.

<sup>8</sup> Vid. particularly exp. xxii. 24. & alib. pass.

<sup>9</sup> Job xvi. 24. 25.

- a this miraculous deliverance of the Israelites, in order to adjust the genealogy above-mentioned, since it will be sufficient to suppose that those four generations, on Esau's side, were by some few years shorter than those on Jacob's, which is not at all improbable, seeing the latter were remarkable for their long lives <sup>b</sup>, and then it will be possible enough for Job to have seen an end of all his sufferings, before Moses left the land of Midian; in which case, he being justly supposed to be the most ancient writer, he has been likewise thought the author of this history, by the majority of writers. That his poetick genius was equal to this excellent performance, those few canticles, which he has left us in the Pentateuch <sup>c</sup>, will not permit us to doubt of. However, there is one main objection against this notion,
- b which is, that if Jobab be the same with Job, and he cotemporary with Moses, it will be impossible for the latter to have outlived him by so many years as to be able to give us an account of his death, and of his numerous posterity; for it is said that Job lived an hundred and forty years after his sufferings were ended, and that he saw his sons children to the fourth generation: Whereas Moses lived but forty years in the land of Midian, and forty more after he was come out of it. This difficulty therefore cannot be removed, but by supposing that the three or four last verses of the book were added afterwards by some inspired person, in order to make the history compleat; in the same manner as Joshua, or some other, added the account of Moses's death and burial at the end of Deuteronomy. How far this
- c supposition may be allowed, we shall have occasion to examine more particularly in the sequel of this history.

- BEFORE we close this digression, we shall beg leave to say something of the book itself. Though some learned men have thought it to have been writ originally in Syriac or Arabic, either by Job himself, or by one of his friends <sup>d</sup>; yet it is now universally allowed to have been written in Hebrew. What has given birth to the former notion, is its being so blended with Syriac and Arabic expressions and idioms, as makes it very difficult to be rightly understood <sup>e</sup>. It is justly supposed to be written in verse, from the loftiness of the stile, the sublimeness of the thoughts, the liveliness and energy of expression, the grandeur of its imagery and variety of characters;
- d though the metre and cadence of it be altogether loose and unconfined. Those, who have been most conversant with it, will readily allow, that antiquity cannot produce a more lofty and magnificent, a more florid, eloquent, pathetick and learned performance, whoever the author of it was. A bold critick, indeed <sup>f</sup>, has not scrupled to tax him with ostentation, and with making a vain show of prophane learning and poetick fiction, and for putting such expressions in the mouth of that holy man, as are not only incompatible with his character, but even of a dangerous nature, being, in his opinion, more fitted to corrupt than to edify his readers. But it must be observed, that that learned author was only acquainted with the Greek version of it, which doth indeed abound with expressions that allude too much to the fables and fictions of
- e the poets. Had he been acquainted with the original, he would easily have acquitted it of such an unjust imputation. Besides, it must be remembered, that the eastern nations had a much more lively, strong, and passionate way of expressing their thoughts than we; so that is impossible to come at their true meaning, or to make a right judgment of those hyperbolical expressions, without lowering them very much from their literal signification. The Jews have added several particulars to the history of Job, such as that he was a king, and high-priest in Idumæa, and that he had married Dinah, Jacob's daughter <sup>g</sup>; which latter can hardly be credited, unless we suppose him to have been of much older date than Moses. The Eastern, especially the Arabians, have very much improved upon them, according to custom; but we need not trouble our readers with a further detail of them, those, who are desirous to be informed in that particular, may consult Herbelot's Bibliotheca Orientalis <sup>h</sup>.
- f

WE return now to our Jewish Law-giver in the land of Midian, whom we may reasonably suppose to have had such convincing reasons to look upon himself as the deliverer of his afflicted people, that he could not but have many anxious thoughts about them during that long interval, and think the time long 'till he saw that glorious promised deliverance happily accomplished. Nay, this long delay seems to have

<sup>a</sup> Vid. sup. p. 471, c.    <sup>b</sup> Vid. Exod. xv. p. tot. Deut. xxviii. 31.    <sup>c</sup> Vid. CALM. Diss. in Job.
<sup>d</sup> Hieron. præfat. in Job.    <sup>e</sup> Theod. Mopsuest. Vid. Synod. V. Œcum. Collat. iv. art. 63.
<sup>f</sup> Chald. paraphr. vid. & MAIMON. more Nevoch. & al.    <sup>g</sup> Bibl. orient. sub Art. Ajub.

God appears to him in the burning bush.

made him conceive quite other notions, such as that God had either made choice of a some other instrument to work out their deliverance, or had been provoked by their sins, to suspend it for some longer time. For when God was pleased to appear to to him at the end of forty years, in a burning bush, upon mount Horeb, and by his own voice, as well as by the miracle of the bush not having one leaf consumed though all over in a bright flame (R), that it was the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, that spoke to him and commanded him to go into Egypt, and to execute his designs there; Moses did not leave one plea untried to be excused from the difficult task, whilst God was all that while graciously pleased to dispel his fears, to clear all his doubts, and to give him such promises of his miraculous assistance, as might have emboldened a more pusillanimous person than Moses seems in all other respects to have been.

Commands
him to return
into Egypt.

THE divine vision (S) began with telling him, that the afflictions, under which the Israelites groaned, were grown to such a height, and the cruelties of their enemies so enormous, that the time was now come both for their deliverance, and for their receiving that rich promised land, as a recompence for their long patience and sufferings; bidding him at the same time to go to Pharaoh, and in his name to demand their dismissal, and assuring him that those who sought his life were now all dead, and that he had now nothing to fear from the Egyptians. In vain did Moses plead his weakness and insufficiency for such a work, God told him that it was not to be performed by an arm of flesh, but by his own irresistible power, which should manifest itself by such miraculous deeds, that not only Egypt, but all the world, should be astonished at them. Here Moses objected further, that he very much doubted whether the Israelites had not so far forgot the God of their fathers, that when he came to acquaint them with his commission from him, they would be apt to ask what his name was, in which case he would be at a loss what answer to make to them (T). Here God was pleased to

(R) The word flame in this place is לבת Labath, and not Labebab, which is the common word for flame; and though some Jews do think with us, that it signifies the same thing, yet others will have it, that it is put for לב Lev, or לבב Levaf, which signifies the heart or middle of any thing, and that it is here used to express, that it was only the centre of the bush that appeared inflamed. The large comment on Exodus adds, that God was pleased to appear in that manner at this time, to convince Moses (who was afraid least the Israelites should one time or other be destroyed by the Egyptians, if they were not so already during his forty years absence) that as the bush remained unconsumed in the midst of the flames, so should Israel in the midst of all their fiery trials (38). As to the time when this vision was seen by Moses, St. Stephen (39) tells us, it was about forty years after his flight out of Egypt; that is, in the eightieth year of his age; for so old he was when he came and stood before Pharaoh (40); and it was in the fortieth year of his age, that going to visit his brethren, he committed the fact which obliged him to fly the kingdom, and to go ab aula ad caulam, from the court to the cart. It was in this retirement that he is supposed to have wrote the books of Job and Genesis, for a comfort and support to his afflicted brethren (41).

(S) We need not repeat here what has been said before about these apparitions, whether they were angels speaking in the person of God, which we think we have sufficiently confuted, or God himself, or as the most received opinion is, CHRIST the SON of GOD. All that need be added here is, that this, which appears now in the bush, is the same who was afterwards to be the captain and guide of the Israelites in the desert; that is, not an angel, or GOD the FATHER, but CHRIST himself, as St. Paul affirms (42); for neither the FATHER nor HOLY GHOST are ever called by the name of angel, i. e. a messenger or person sent; whereas the SON is called the Angel of the Covenant by the prophet Malachy (43), as a title of his office, though not of his nature (44). As for those who think not only that it was an angel (45), but pretend to guess that it was Michael that appeared here, as he did afterwards to Joshua (46), and to Daniel (47); it is plain their conjecture is not only contrary to what we have quoted out of the apostle, but even absurd, if not impious. For can they prove that Michael was a created angel, seeing that name signifies one like unto GOD, and can only be applicable to CHRIST? Can a created angel be styled the captain of the LORD's hosts, as he is called in Joshua, or the prince of the people of GOD, as he is in Daniel, which office and title, the apostle tells us (48), belongs only to CHRIST, who is the captain or prince of our salvation? Did ever any angel suffer himself to be worshipped, as that which appeared to Joshua did? Supposing, therefore, that it was the same that appeared to Moses, Joshua, and Daniel, as Perrerus thinks (49), yet it will be far from following, that he was a created angel or ministering spirit; on the contrary it will be plain, that it was CHRIST the king of men and angels, blessed for ever (50).

(T) The Cabbalistical Jews, and after them Josephus (51), and some doctors of the church of Rome (52) think that Moses did not ask for the name of GOD, (38) Ellefbemotb-rab. in loc. PHILO loc. citat. (39) Act. vii. 23. (40) Exod. vii. 7.

(41) PERRER. ex PHILON. VILLET. & al. (42) 1. Cor. x. 4. & seq. (43) Malach. iii. 1.
(44) THEODOR. OSIAND. SIMLER. & al. (45) AUG. de Trinit. lib. iii. c. xi. & Tractat. 3. in Jo- han. N. 17, 18. HIERON. epist. ad Galat. iii. GREG. moral. lib. xxviii. cap. 1. (46) Josh. v. pass.
(47) Dan. x. pass. (48) Hebr. ii. 10. (49) PERRER. & al. (50) VILLET. in cap. iii. Exod.
quæst. 6. (51) Ant. lib. ii. c. 12. (52) GENEBAUD. BELLARMIN. BERRUYER Hist. du prep. de Dieu, Tom. 2. p. 36. & al.

a answer a question which he had formerly refused to Jacob *, though in such terms as might easily convince him of the irregularity and unreasonableness of it;

* Gen. xxxii. 29.

GOD but for the true pronunciation of it, which they think had been lost through the wickedness of mankind: for which reason the former affirm, that the word חַלֵּם Holam, used by GOD presently after (53), being written without a Vau, should not be rendered for ever, but hid, from the root חַלֵּם balam, to hide, not considering, that if that was the case, it should be written חַלֵּם Halum and not Holam. Upon this account the name יהוה is by all the Jews called Schem Hamborash, the unutterable name, which Josephus, in the place just now quoted says, was never known or heard of before GOD told it to Moses, and adds that he dares not so much as mention it: for the same reason the Jews never pronounce it, but use the word Adonai or Elohim, or plainly the word Hahem, the name to express it. Thus in their letters and common discourse, instead of saying the LORD bless or protect you, they say, the Name bless you, &c. and they think that the words used by Daniel in his prayer (54) למען אדוני Lemagham Adonai, do not mean, as we understand them, for the sake of the LORD or the MESSIAH, or, as we express it, for CHRIST's sake, but upon the account of the word Adonai, which they were obliged to use till the MESSIAH came and taught them the true pronunciation of the name יהוה: not but their high-priest did pronounce it Jehovah once a year, on the day of expiation from the time of their return from the Babylonish captivity, to the last destruction of the temple; but they had but few disciples near them that could learn its pronunciation, and during the time of the blessing in which this name was repeated, the priests and levites did sing louder than ordinary, that none else might hear it. But even then they were very far from thinking it the right pronunciation of the Tetragrammaton; for they think, that any man, that could once attain it, might shake heaven and earth with it, work the greatest miracles, and dive into the deepest secrets of the Deity. They tell us, that Moses had it engraved upon his rod, and, by virtue of that ineffable word, wrought all those mighty wonders in favour of his people: that Noah could steer the ark which way he pleased by it, and that JESUS CHRIST having stolen it out of the temple, or as others affirm, brought it with him from Egypt, and clapped it between the skin and the flesh of his thigh, had obtained the power of working all his miracles, which they say any man else might do, that could pronounce that name right (55).

They add, that Simon, surnamed the Just, one of their high-priests, who flourished according to them, about the year of the world 3602, and died 3711, i. e. about 289 years before CHRIST, was the last that knew it; but that the number of prophane people encreasing, they thought it best to substitute another name to it, consisting of twelve letters, which the high-priest made use of when he blessed the people (56). Tarpho, a noted Rabbi, supposed to be the same with the Trypho of Justin martyr, tells us, that being got one day near the high-priest, to hear this blessing, he found that he only muttered the name of GOD in an inarticulate manner, whilst the levites did drown his voice with their singing, that it might not be learned and abused by the wicked. But since Simon Justus, it has been wholly lost, not to be recovered again 'till the MESSIAH come. In the mean time the Talmud has left a most horrid curse against those that shall dare to utter it, because they think the very angels themselves are not allowed to pronounce it †.

The truth is, those, who think that Jehovah is the right pronunciation, are far enough from being sure of it. It is plain, that the ancients did write it very differently from them. Sanchoniathon spells it, Jawo, (1); Diodorus Siculus (2), Macrobius (3), Clement of Alexandria (4), St. Jerom (5), and Origen (6) pronounced it Jao. The Samaritans, and after them Epiphanius (7) and Theodoret (8), Jave or Jabe. Others of the ancients write it, Jahob, Jawo, Jaen, Jabo, and Jahod. Among the moderns, Capellus is for pronouncing it Jawo; Drusus, Jave; Hottinger, Jebwa, Merzer, Jehovab; Cassalius, Jovab, and Le Clerc, Jawob or Jarob. Something like these the Romans had in their Jovis, to which Varro seems to allude when he says, Deum Judæorum esse Jovem: That Jove was the God of the Jews, as St. Austin alledges out of him in the first book of his defence of the gospel, c. xxii. The Moors likewise call GOD Juba or Jubab, and the Mohammedans, Hou, which with them signifies the same as Jehovah, i. e. he who is; which name they write at the beginning of all their patents, passes, and the like, and do often repeat in their prayers. Some of their devotees will sometimes repeat that word so often, and with such quickness and vehemence, that they drop down with giddiness (9). Upon the whole it is plain, that the four letters, of which that great name consists, may be pronounced in all the above-mentioned ways, and several others according to the vowels that are joined with them. Thus much for the pronunciation of יהוה.

As to the uttering of it, besides what we have already observed out of the Talmud and Josephus, we have still another witness of the Jewish excessive and even superstitious respect for that word, viz. Philo, who affirms (10), that after the stoning of the blasphemer to death in the wilderness (11) GOD commanded Moses to publish a new law, that whoever should curse the LORD should be guilty of sin, and whoever should pronounce the name of GOD should be put to death. This is indeed the version which the Septuagint and Theodoret have given us of the 15th and 16th verses of the above-quoted chapter: but in the original it is, whoever curseth his GOD or gods, shall bear his own sin; and whoever shall blaspheme the name of יהוה the LORD shall surely be put to death. This law, continues Philo, is full of the profoundest wisdom, the first part of which forbids the cursing or blaspheming even the false gods of the Gentiles; and for as Justin Martyr rightly observes, names are given only to shew the difference of things: whereas God being one, and there being none other but him, there and the second the uttering of the name of God in a vain or loose manner, or by way of ornament to our speech; which he thinks deserves the worst of punishments. But as to the first part of this law, according to Philo's exposition, that author seems to have forgot that Jeremiah commands the Jews (12), a little before they were carried into the Babylonish captivity, that when they came thither, they should not only speak against the gods of Babylon, but even denounce death and destruction against them all, as being no gods; and that not in their native Hebrew, which was not understood there, but in plain downright Chaldee, the language of that country. And it is observable, that this verse is the only one in that prophet, that is written in the Chaldee, all the rest being in Hebrew. But to return from this digression, it is not easy to determine whether the seventy had lost the right pronunciation of the name יהוה; whether they purposely concealed it under the name of Κύριος, or whether, they did make use of that Greek word at all. For first, they could not but be sensible that the word יהוה was no relative word as Κύριος or Λόγος is; for though we can properly say, Κύριος μου, Κύριος, &c. i. e. my Lord, our Lord, &c. yet יהוה has never any pronoun affixed to it: whereas Elohim and Adonai have, as Elohai, Eloheini, &c. for which reason, even St. Jerom chooses to render it by Adonai, in Exod. vi. 3. and nomen meum Adonai non indicavi eis, where it is in the Hebrew וַיֹּאמֶר יְהוָה לֹא יָדַעְתִּי לְדָם, but by my name Jehovah was I not known to them. Those versions therefore which have rendered that word by Dominus, as the Vulgate, or Λόγος, as our own, don't seem to have sufficiently attended to what we have just now observed; for יהוה not being a relative one, ought not to have been rendered by one that is so. The French Geneva translation has made use of a much better word to express it, viz. L' Eternel, the eternal Being; which name in the first place is not relative (for we cannot properly say, Mon Eternel, votre Eternel, &c.) and secondly, expresses the etymon of Jehovah far better than Κύριος, Dominus, or Λόγος, as we shall shew by and by. But secondly, it is very probable, that the Septuagint left this as well as some other names of God, such as Jab, Sadai, Zabaoth, &c. untranslated, 'till the second revision of that version; and that they concealed the true reading of יהוה under the Samaritan characters (as being less understood by the rest of the world than the Hebrew or Affyrian ones were) or under the Greek capitals ΘΙΟΥ which bore a resemblance to the four letters of יהוה, and yet had a sound so different from it, that they would never lead the Heathen reader to the true pronunciation of it. St. Jerom (13), Origen (14), and Eusebius (15), assure us, that they had seen copies of the Septuagint, written in the two above mentioned ways, and that even in their time, the Jews chote to write that name as often as it occurred, in the old Samaritan letters; their reason for which was, lest that venerable name should be used by the Heathen to ill purposes. Though Origen adds, that these precautions did not prove so effectual; but that they made use of it in their exorcisms, in their charms against diseases, and other superstitious rites (16). And Clement of Alexandria informs us (17), that those Egyptians, who were allowed to enter into the temple of the Sun, did wear the name Jaou about their middle. We find likewise, in some magick verses against the gout mentioned by Trallian, the names Jai or Jaath. Something like this we meet with in Pythagoras's golden verses, where there is an oath by Tetragloss, i. e. by him whose name is spelt with four letters (18); as also the inscription Tu es, in that famous frontispiece of the temple of Delphos, mentioned by Eusebius (19), which alludes to the Hebrew name of God. Such was also that of the Egyptians, I AM, written over one of theirs (20). Cicero gives an instance (21) of some names of the heathen gods, which they did not dare to pronounce, to which Lucan adds that the very naming of them would have shook the earth (22).

(53) Exod. iii. 17. (54) Dan. ix. 17. (55) Vid. Midrash Tehillim in Psal. xii. DRUS. de nomine Tetragrammat. (56) MAIMONID. More Nevochim. Part. I. c. lxii. † LIGHTFOOT ex Barva joma & Exod. & Gemar. tr. Sota. (1) SANCHONIAT. ap. EUSEB. prep. lib. x. c. ix. (2) DIOD. SIC. Bibliot. lib. ii. (3) MACROB. Saturnal. lib. i. cap. xviii. (4) CLEM. ALEX. Stromat. lib. v. (5) HIERON. or some other under his name, in Psal. viii. (6) ORIG. contr. Cels. lib. vi. (7) EPIPH. Hæres. 40. (8) THEODORET in Exod. quæst. 15. (9) HERBELOT Bibliot. Orient. p. 460. sub voc. Hou, & p. 326. sub Esma. (10) PHILO in vit. Mosi. (11) Levit. xxiv. 11, & seq. Vid. & MAIMON. Hilkoth Birk. haeban. c. 14. § 10.

There remains, that we enquire into the signification of the name יהוה, in which we shall not find such a dissimilarity among expositors, as we did about the pronunciation of it. For first, they are all agreed, that it is derived from the root היה bajah, he has been, and denotes God's self-existence and eternal nature. Accordingly in this place we are annotating upon, he calls himself אֲשֶׁר אֵהְיֶה Ehjeheh, Asher, Ehjeheh, I am that I am, or rather I am because I am. Where the verb, though it be in the future, yet according to the genius of the Hebrew tongue, is applicable to the present or perfect tense, and implies his immutability and his continuing the same that he has been, and is to all eternity (23). It is likewise more than probable that God chooses to express himself in the future tense, to shew that he is the only Being that can truly say, I shall or will be what I am, &c. (24). Aretius makes the two words Ehjeheh to be proper names (25); but it seems to be only in the first Ehjeheh, in the sense in which it is taken in the latter part of the verse. I am, Ehjeheh, has sent me, and the second Ehjeheh to be assigned as the cause of the first; namely, I am because I am (26). Neither was this name unknown to the wiser sort of heathens, as we have seen by some of their inscriptions, to which we shall add one more mentioned by Egubinus, written on the doors of the Egyptian temples, and exactly agreeing with this wonderful name of God, viz. I am ubatsoever was, is, and shall be. According to which Thales of Miletum, being asked what God was, replied, that which always is, and has neither beginning nor end. Thus Plato truly says (27), that nothing really exists but that which is immutable; for which, and some other of his wise sayings, he is supposed to have read Moses's books, or conversed with some of his disciples when he was in Egypt; which is not improbable, (12) Jerem. x. 11. (13) JEROM. præfat. in lib. Reg. & in Ezek. ix. (14) ORIG. Fragm. in palæograph. Græc. lib. ii. c. i. (15) EUSEB. in Chronic. ad an. 4740. (16) ORIG. cont. Celsum lib. i. (17) CLEM. ALEX. Stromat. lib. v. (18) VID. SELDEN. de Diis Syr. Synagog. ii. c. i. (19) EUSEB. præpar. lib. xi. c. x. (20) PLUTARCH. Tract. de his inscript. forib. Temp. Delph. cap. ii. (21) CIC. de Nat. Deor. lib. iii. (22) LUCAN l. vi. v. 744. 745. Vid. CALMET. sub voc. Jehovah. VILLET. c. vi. in Exod. Vid. & GUSTAV. PERINGER. dissertat. de Tetragramm. Upsal. 1682. (23) GREG. NAZIANZ. Homil. in loc. S. AUGUST. in loc. Revel. i. 8. (24) SIMLER. VILLET. & al. (25) ARET. in loc. (26) SIMLER. JUN. PINED, MUNST. & al. (27) PLATO in Timæo.

a needs no name to distinguish him*. God therefore said to him I AM THAT I AM, and bid him tell his brethren, that I AM had sent him to them, that he was the God of their fathers, of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, (V) and that he

* Dyal. cont. Tryph.

ble, seeing Aristobulus, who flourished in the Maccabees's time, writes to Ptolemy Philometor, that Moses's books having been translated into Greek in Alexander's time, Pythagoras and Plato had taken many things from them (28). Some divines, and in particular our learned Ainsworth, think that Jehovah is the participle of hajah in piel, and that it doth not only signify to be, but to cause to be, or to give being; by which not only his omnipotence, but likewise his faithfulness and truth, are plainly intimated and implied, as being alone able and sure to make good his promises (29). Upon all these accounts therefore Jehovah is looked upon to be the incommunicable name of God, there being no created beings unto whom it can be properly, or indeed at all applied in any of these senses; whereas those of Elohim, Adonai, Gibbor, &c. have been given to angels and men (30).

We shall not trouble our readers with all the mythical notions which cabbalists have raised from the letters that compose this awful name, nor with the preference they give to it, above all the other names of God, as being as it were, a Monarch upon his throne, and the others only as guards or officers under him (31); but conclude this note with a short enquiry why the word Jehovah is thought ineffable, not only by the Jews, but also by some Christians. First, Genebrard confidently affirms, it is neither a Hebrew nor Christian word or name; that it is neither received by the fathers, nor by the rabbies, nor ever known or used by CHRIST or his apostles. But to this it may be answered, that they all were forced to use the Septuagint version then in vogue, which every where translates that word by Kyrie or Lord, as has been already observed. Secondly, Bellarmin pretends, that because St. Jerom and Origen in his Hexapla after him read it Adonai, and that the vowel points are the same in both; therefore it ought to be read and pronounced Adonai, and not Jehovah. But had these gentlemen considered, that these two words are of different originals and significations, and written with different letters, that the one is relative, and the other not; that the one is communicable, and the other incommunicable; that the points or vowels, being almost universally acknowledged to be of human invention, can be of no authority here, and that their likeness, though not sameness, in both these names, was owing to a superstitious respect which the Masorites had for one of them; that St. Jerom might be too much influenced by his Jewish master, in this, as well as in many other cases; and that both he and Origen have not scrupled to pronounce it Jao, as we have hinted above; that their writing it by Adonai might be more owing to a superstitious fear, than to any judgment or conviction of the unlawfulness of pronouncing that name; and lastly, that they have no where said that it was ineffable; had they I say considered these things, they could never have fallen into that Jewish superstition. As for the general reason that is given on all hands by those of that side of the question, viz. that the right pronunciation having been lost, whether during the captivity, or at any other time or place, it is unlawful to substitute any other instead of it, it may be safely answered, that the design of words or names being to convey ideas into the mind, of those things of which they are but types, the differences will be very small, whether the pronunciation be right or wrong, provided the idea it conveys be right. And we are much mistaken, whatever these gentlemen say, if in this case the pronouncing the word Jehovah, which conveys the most perfect idea we can have of the Godhead, let the pronunciation be never so wrong, is not much safer than their pronouncing it Adonai, which being a word of a vastly inferior signification, and applicable to every man that has any mastery or superiority over another, conveys a much more imperfect idea of the Godhead, and is therefore very liable to be uttered with less awe and respect. This is so true in fact, that one may observe those scrupulous gentlemen, especially among the Jews, who would be ready to swoon at the hearing of the name Jehovah, pronounce that of Adonai, though carrying the same idea, with less seeming reverence, than they would that of a king or lord-mayor; as for the name of God in any modern language, they pay it no more respect than to any common word. But by us Christians though all the names of God ought to be uttered with the utmost awe; yet this, if possible, with a greater, and we ought to be cautious not to use it without a warrantable occasion. And when we converse with Jews, or with such Christians as are against pronouncing of that name, if we make use of the word Adonai in compliance to them, it will be much better than to make them uneasy, or break off conversation by pronouncing it in our own way. The main text which terrifies the Jews against uttering this sacred name is that of Leviticus (32), where it is said, he that blasphemeth (which they read nameth) the name of God, shall be stoned: Where the word נָקַב Nakab, which in its primitive meaning signifies to pierce, and is therefore often used for writing, engraving, or enrolling, doth more properly forbid the writing than the speaking it: For Nakab never signifies to utter, unless it be in a bad sense, as curfing or blaspheming; and therefore if the prohibition is to be stretched beyond that, it must be only against doing it irreverently or lightly, which is a lower degree of prophaning; but as they allow that the name may be lawfully writ, though the word Nakab do signify also to write; nay, since they allow that the high priest may, and doth actually use it in that publick blessing, which is prescribed by God himself (33), Jehovah blefs thee and keep thee, it is plain the prohibition is not against naming, but against blaspheming or using it with contempt or disdain, or to an ill purpose, as to curse our neighbours and the like; all which the verb קָלַל Kallal used in the foregoing part of this prohibition sufficiently shews (34).

(V) It is asked here why God calls himself so particularly the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob,

(28) Ap. PERRER. VILLET. & al. (29) SIMLER. OUTRAM. BURRATIUS. AINSWORTH. & al.
(30) PERRER. JUN. MUNST. &c. (31) PERRER. & al. (32) Levit. xxiv. 16. (33) Numb.
vi. 24. (34) SIMLER. VILLET. MUNST. & al. in loc. Vid. & GUSTAV. PERINGER. ubi sup.

would

and to bring his people out of bondage.

would be remembered and acknowledged by that name throughout all generations <sup>a</sup> as their great redeemer and deliverer : Not, continued he, that Pharaoh will let you go at your first or second asking, nor indeed at all, 'till I have convinced him both of my justice and power, by the terrible punishment I shall send upon him and his land, for their oppression to my people ; neither shall the Hebrews come away altogether unrewarded for their long and cruel servitude ; for I will inspire the Egyptians with such sentiments of pity and humanity towards them, that they shall part with their sumptuous raiments, and choicest jewels to them, and make them thus far amends for their past labours and hardships * (X).

AFTER such ample assurances, one would hardly expect that Moses would have started any new difficulties, at least without receiving some severe rebuke <sup>b</sup> for it ; nevertheless, he freely owns, that his doubts were far from being wholly dispelled ; he knew the temper of the Israelites too well, not to foresee that they would most likely call his mission in question. He therefore begged to be informed what he must do in such a case, and God was pleased to clear this doubt also by two miracles which he wrought in his presence. The first was by turning his rod into a frightful serpent, and then into a rod again. The second was by smiting * Exod. iii. p. tot.

Jacob, seeing he was the God of all the Israelites, as well as of those three : For first, it could not be upon the account of their sanctity, or excellent virtues, seeing Abel, Enoch, and Noah, whose God he likewise was, were at least as holy as they ; nor secondly, to hint unto Moses the mystery of the Trinity, as Perrerus imagines (1), because the word God is there thrice repeated ; for it is rather repeated four times ; viz. the God of thy father, that is, of Amram, the God of Abraham, and so on. It is more probable therefore, that they are particularly mentioned ; because it was to them that the promise of a numerous posterity, of their being strangers in Egypt, and brought out of it, of their inheriting the land of Canaan, and especially that of the MESSIAH, had been made.

And now we are upon the text, it will not be improper to enquire why our SAVIOUR chooses to alledge it against the Sadduces, rather than some others in the Old Testament, which do more fully prove the resurrection of the body ; to this it may be answered, that the objection, being made out of the Pentateuch, was more fitly answered by it, especially to the Sadduces, who as St. Jerom tells us (3), admitted of no other books of the old testament. The main question therefore will be, how these words, I am the God of Abraham, &c. which seem at most to prove only the immortality of the soul, can be urged here to prove the resurrection of the body ? To which some ancient fathers answer (4), that these names being given to them, whilst they consisted of soul and body, and the former of them being here plainly affirmed to be living with God, it follows, that the latter cannot be dead, but asleep for a time, and that they will be re-united and live again, and both together enjoy the reward of their labour. Others say, that if the immortality of the soul be granted, the resurrection of the body must follow of consequence, by reason of the natural desire which the former has to the latter, without which it cannot be said to be perfectly happy ; that this induced Pythagoras, Plato, and other philosophers, who held the immortality of the soul, to provide her with a constant supply of bodies, either by remigration or returning into its own body again, or transmigra-tion or passing into some other body (5). But the best solution seems to be that of St. Jerom (6), that the Sadduces believing neither the immortality of the soul, nor resurrection of the body, both which were received by all the rest of the Jews, the most effectual way to remove the ground of their error was, to prove by this text the being and living of the soul after death (7).

As to those places where God commands Moses to put off his shoes, and of Moses covering his face, we hope we need not acquaint the reader that they were both marks of reverence used then, and since by all the eastern nations. The first of these, viz. putting off the shoes, has a threefold signification in scripture ; viz. first, it was common and usual to put them off in token of mourning and grief, as David is said to have gone from Jerusalem barefoot, when he fled from Abshalom ; whilst his retinue went with their faces covered, in token of respect (8). Secondly, it signified the yielding of one's right to another, and is so prescribed in Deuteronomy (9), and practised by Boaz (10) ; the third was in token of respect and reverence, as appears by this command of God to Moses, and the reasons assigned for it ; viz. that the ground whereon he stood was holy, or sanctified by God's immediate presence.

(X) That some retaliation was due in strict justice from the Egyptians to the Hebrews, for the great services they had done to them, is what can hardly be here denied ; however, we do not pretend here to answer all the objections which have been raised against this action. We think it sufficient to say, that the former were spoiled with the same justice for their unheard of oppression to the latter, as the Canaanites, and other nations were destroyed for their abominable wickedness. God indeed could alone appoint those punishments, and make use of what instruments he pleased to inflict them ; but since Moses gave sufficient proof of his being authorized by God, we cannot see where the injustice is in either case, nor the pretended ill tendency of such a precedent, since it is allowed on all hands, that it is in no case to be followed, unless it be incontestably enjoined by the same divine authority.

(1) PERRER. in loc. (2) Matth. xxii. 31. Mark xii. 26. Luke xx. 37. (3) HIERON. in Job. xix. & alib. (4) IREN. lib. iv. cap. xi. CHRYSOST. in Mat. xxii. & al. (5) TH. AQUIN. cont. Gent. cap. lxxix. (6) HIERON. Com. in Mat. xxii. (7) CAJET. VILLET. & al. (8) 2 Sam. xvi. 30. (9) Deut. xxv. 9. (10) Ruth. iv. 3.

a one of his hands with leprosy, upon his pulling it out of his bosom, and then healing it again by the same way; adding moreover, that if the working of these two miracles, before the Israelites, did not give a sufficient sanction to his message, he should then have liberty to try the success of a third, by taking some water out of the Nile and spilling it upon the ground, which would immediately turn that river into blood<sup>1</sup>.

MOSES had still, he thought, one material objection to make; namely an impediment in his speech, which he said rendered him unfit to speak either before Pharaoh and his court, or even to the Israelites. He had probably raised many more, had not God removed this difficulty also by telling, that his brother Aaron, b who was now by his appointment to meet him, should be his interpreter both to Pharaoh and to the Hebrews, and commanded him immediately to prepare for his journey, and not spend any more time in raising new scruples and objections<sup>2</sup>. There was certainly something very surprising in this reluctance of Moses, as well as in the patience with which God heard him; yet when he found that he had removed all the obstacles which his diffidence had suggested to him, he could not forbear having recourse to prayers, earnestly begging of God, who certainly knew many among the Hebrews more fit for the work than himself, to make choice of some other to execute his command, and leave him to spend the remainder of his days in solitude and obscurity. Had Moses been less sincere, he
c would hardly have recorded this extreme weakness of his, so little to his credit; and which nothing could excuse or extenuate, but this free and ingenuous confession of it. Being therefore afraid, lest he should incur the divine displeasure by a further refusal, he made the best of his way towards Midian, resolved for the future to be as ready, as he had before been backward, to obey the divine command. Moses begs to be excused. Obeys at last, and leaves Midian.

WHETHER he acquainted Jethro with his commission, or, as he tells us<sup>3</sup>, only expressed a desire to go and visit his brethren in Egypt, he easily obtained his dismissal from him, and taking his wife Ziphorah (Y) and his two sons with him, the least of which, being too young to walk, he set upon an ass; with this
d mean equipage, and the miraculous rod in his hand (Z), he began his journey towards Egypt.

<sup>1</sup> Exod. iv. 9.

<sup>2</sup> Ibid. v. 13 ad 17.

<sup>3</sup> Ibid. v. 18.

(Y) This Ziphorah, having afterwards a squabble with her sister-in-law Miriam, in which Aaron took the latter's part, is by them called a Cushite or Ethiopian (11), though it is plain she was a Midianite, being one of Jethro's daughters. To reconcile which, some have affirmed that Midian was in the land of Cush, or at least very near it, from the words of the prophet (12), I saw the tents of Cushan in affliction, and the curtains of the land of Midian did tremble. Others think that it was not Ziphorah, but Tharbis the Ethiopian princess, whom Moses is affirmed by Josephus to have married, and whom he would now have forsaken (13). But it seems more probable that Cushite was a term of reproach or contempt, as Gipsy is with us; and that they called her by that name with no other view. The words therefore might be properly rendered thus; and Miriam and Aaron reflected upon Moses, upon the score of his Cushite, because he had taken a Cushite to wife, there being nothing more frequent than such repetitions in the Old Testament. As for the reason of this quarrel, 'tis likely that Ziphorah had spoken, as they thought, too much in praise of her husband, upon the account of his having conversed so often with God, which made them reply, has God spoken to him alone, has he not spoken to us also? Upon this God called them to the tabernacle, sharply reprov'd Miriam and Aaron, and highly extoll'd Moses's merit, but not a word is mentioned about his wife.

(Z) Concerning this staff, from which Ziphorah is said to have had her name, the Jews tell us a wonderful story; viz. that it grew in Jethro's garden, was called Zaphir, and had the Tetragrammaton written upon it: that it had been created in paradise on the sixth day, and brought away by Adam, and had passed from him to Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob and Joseph, and from him to Pharaoh. That Jethro had been one of his mildest counsellors, and daily advised him to lighten the burthen of the Israelites, whilst Balaam, courtier like, pestered him with contrary councils: that being forced to fly the court, and retire into the land of Midian, he had privately conveyed this miraculous rod away, and stuck it in his garden, where it took such deep root, that no force could pluck it up. That Moses at his first coming having acquainted him with what happened to him in Egypt, Jethro caused him to be closely confined, intending to send him back to the king of Egypt. In the mean time Ziphorah being fallen in love with him, and having discovered her passion to her father, he consented that he should be set at liberty and marry her, if he could pluck up the Zaphir rod which grew in his garden, and at the same time issued out a proclamation, that the man that could pull up the plant should have his daughter in marriage. That immediately a great number of lusty men came and tried their strength in vain; for Moses proved the only man that could perform the feat, which he did with wonderful ease, by virtue of the name

(11) Numb. xii. 1.

(12) Habak. iii. 7.

(13) Hieron. PERRER. JUN. & al.

Aaron's children during his brother's absence.

He goes to meet him at Horeb.

Moses smitten by the angel in the inn.

DURING Moses's retreat in Midian, Aaron his brother had married Elizabeth,<sup>a</sup> the sister of Naasson, both descended from Judab by their father Aminadab, the son of Ezron. He had already had four sons by her, viz. Nadab, Abihu, Eleazar and Jibamar<sup>1</sup>, the first of whom had likewise a son named Phineas, by a daughter of Phutiel<sup>2</sup>. This was the state of Aaron's family, when God commanded him to go to meet his brother<sup>3</sup>; but before he could reach to the mount of God (Horeb) a dreadful accident was like to have happened to Moses, the particular occasion and circumstances of which we are left to guess at, he not having thought fit to commit them to writing. The account we have of it, being but darkly expressed in the original, and having been misunderstood and mistranslated in most versions, and particularly our own, we shall venture to depart from it, where the original and the authority of those, who, by their diligent application to it, have been able to give it a better light, will bear us out, not forgetting to make our explication good by proper marginal notes.

MOSES was upon his first day's journey, as is probably supposed by the small distance between Midian and Horeb, where he afterwards met his brother; when God appeared again to him, and charged him to perform all those wonders which he had shewed him, before the king of Egypt, and to demand of him the dismissal of his people Israel, whom he calls here by way of excellency his first-born, assuring him that he would be with him, and that in case of an obstinate refusal, which he foresaw he would certainly meet with, he would slay all the first-born of Egypt. Moses was by this time got to the end of his first day's journey, and arrived at the inn, when God appeared to him again, but with an angry look, and struck him with a terrible disease (A). Moses doth not tell us,

<sup>1</sup> Exod. vi. 23.

<sup>2</sup> Ibid. v. 25.

<sup>3</sup> Ibid. cap. iv. 27.

name of God, with the true pronunciation of which he was perfectly acquainted, and so obtained Jethro's daughter. They add, that he got the rod into the bargain, by which he afterwards wrought all his wonders in Egypt (14). These absurd fables would hardly be worth mentioning, were it not to shew into what monstrous extremes of credulity men are apt to fall, who have once denied the plainest truths. Were those reverend gentlemen's heads as long as their beards, they could never think that such stories can be of any credit either to their great law-giver, or to the inventors of them. Neither have the Arabians been more sparing of their curious, though fabulous, conceits of Jethro and his rod. As for Jethro, he was, they say, the son of Tafkir, the son of Midian, whom they make the immediate son of Ishmael (15), though Moses mentions no Midian among the sons of that patriarch (16). They tell us that he made a present of this wonderful rod to his son-in-law: that he had the gift of prophecy, and was sent by God to preach the Unity of the Godhead to the Midianites, which, as Mohammed tells us (17), he confirmed to them by miracles, and that when he went up to the top of a mountain to pray, it lowered its head to receive him (18). Another of his commentators adds, that Jethro made it his chief business to reprove the Midianites for their horrid robberies, false weights and measures; but that those incorrigible wretches, instead of taking his wholesome counsels, threatened to drive him and his disciples out of the country; that God, provoked at their wickedness, sent the angel Gabriel to destroy them by an earthquake, in which none were saved but Jethro and his disciples, who went afterwards to meet his son-in-law in the wilderness, as we have it in the book of Exodus (19). They add, that the advice, which he gave to Moses there, got him the name of preacher to the prophets (20).

(A) The reader may remember that we have already hinted something concerning this adventure, in the history of Midian<sup>4</sup>, but reserved the examination of the particulars of it to this place, to which they more properly belong. The greatest part of commentators and expositors have supposed that Moses was troubled with a turbulent wife, which is the case of many a meek man, and that she had conceived such an aversion to the ceremony of circumcision, that he had been forced for peace and quietness to neglect the performing it upon his youngest son, till the danger she saw her husband or the child in (for the text is not plain which of the two it was) obliged her, not without great reluctance and ill language, to perform the operation. We shall therefore endeavour to set this matter in a clearer light, and shew that they have quite mistaken the sense of the original, and that there was neither quarrel nor ill language in the case, but that the ceremony was performed with all the decency and decorum that the solemnity of it and their imminent danger could possibly require.

First then, as to the words, the Lord met him at the inn and sought to slay him, which the Septuagint, Vulgate, and some other versions render (21) the angel of the Lord, &c. it is plain that they relate to Moses, and not to the child, as Tertullian thinks, because if it had been the latter, Moses, rather than his wife, would have performed the operation. This shews likewise that the words import no more than that God smote him with some grievous disease, which so disabled him from circumcising the child, that Ziphorah was forced to do it herself, though otherwise unfit. Those who are acquainted with the genius of the Hebrew tongue

(14) R. R. TANCHUM. MEHAR. & SCIP. SOAMBAT. L. ii. Arch. Vet. Test. (15) HERBLOT's Bibli. Orient. sub voc. SCHOAIB. p. 790. Vid. Gen. xxv. pass. (16) Ex lib. Arab. LEX TARIK. (17) KORAN ARAF. (18) Comment. in supradict. cap. (19) Exod. xviii. 1, & seq. (20) Vid. CALM. sub. voc. Jethro. * Vid. sup. pag. 301. (21) PELICAN, JUN. & al.

a whether the divine anger was occasioned by his incumbering himself with a wife tongue know, that the phrase here used signifies no more. Some ancient interpreters have indeed understood it in a different sense, some thinking that the angel appeared with a drawn sword ready to kill Moses (22). Others, among the Jews, telling us (23), that the vision was a monstrous large serpent which swallowed up Moses's body מרושו ועד חמילה from the head to (the place of) circumcision, where he stuck, by which she guessed at the cause of his danger, and having forthwith circumcised the child with the usual form of חתן רמים לי אתה (which words we mistranslate a bloody husband thou art to me); she observed with joy her husband spewed up again unhurt; upon which she began to exclaim in praise of circumcision, which she saw accompanied with such virtue. All that is worth observing from this Jewish comment is, that Ziphorah expressed no passion against her husband during the whole action, much less in the words she spoke, seeing they were part of a form used in circumcision, as will appear in its proper place.

Secondly, as for the cause of God's anger against Moses, St. Austin and some others (24) supposed it to have been, because he had taken his wife and children with him, the encumbrance of whom did not suit with the business he was sent about; for which reason, say they, he dismissed her as soon as he was delivered from his danger. But unless there had been some indication of God's forbidding it, it is plain it was his duty to take her and them with him, since man is to forsake all other relations to cleave to his wife (25). Theodoret thinks (26), that Moses was afraid to go on, for fear of Pharaoh, but that doth not appear, seeing he was on his journey thither. The true reason therefore seems to be the neglect of circumcising the child, since Moses was delivered from the danger as soon as Ziphorah had performed the ceremony (27).

Thirdly, it is not easy to guess how long, or why Moses deferred the circumcising of the child. Those who follow the Jerusalem Targum, which says that Jethro and Ziphorah took offence at it (28), seem to forget that Jethro was a Midianite, descended from Abraham by Keturah, and consequently that circumcision was most probably adopted by them, as it was by the Ismaelites, and all other descendants of that patriarch. Besides, what has led them into this notion, is their mistaking the words and action of Ziphorah, and thinking that there was a sharp dispute between Moses and her about it, which we shall presently shew not to have been the case. Some think that Moses did not suppose circumcision so necessary in a strange land, especially his children, being only Israelites by the father's side (29). But the most learned of the Jews rather think most probably, that the child was not above eight days old, if so much, and that Moses, being in haste to fulfil God's commands, would not stay to circumcise the child (30), lest he should be forced to wait 'till the wound was healed, which in that hot country and after a journey, might have took up too much of his time. For it is observed, that a fever generally follows on the second or third day after the operation, which must therefore be removed, before the infant could be capable of continuing such a journey. Accordingly we shall find in the sequel, that this same reason is assigned for the Israelites refusing that ceremony, during their 40 years wandering in the wilderness; seeing their frequent journeyings and sudden decampments would have endangered the lives of as many children as were newly circumcised.

Fourthly, We come now to enquire into her behaviour and words after she had performed the ceremony, which have proved the main stumbling-block of most translations. For first they have understood it, that she flung the child's fore-skin at his (Moses's) feet, though the text doth not say whether it was at his, the child's, or the angel's feet, and the words be so far from signifying flinging, especially in anger, that they rather imply a laying the prepice down in a decent or humble manner: For the literal sense is, she made it touch his feet. This has made Lud. Brugensis and some others think that she humbly laid it at the angel's feet, beseeching him that, for the sake of that circumcision-blood she had now drawn, her husband's life might be spared: And that her prayer having been heard, and she seeing Moses free from the danger, congratulated him and herself with the words in the text, which he renders, thou art now become, as it were, a new husband or bridegroom to me by this child's blood (31). But we are going to shew, that the words were neither spoken to Moses nor to the angel; but to the child. Only let it be observed here by the by, that is unreasonable to suppose, that she should fling the child's fore-skin in anger at her husband, who could not be blamed for the misfortune that had happened to him; much less likely is it, that she would have dared to have flung it at the angel, if any such had appeared to him at the inn; whereas, as we hinted before, the words do not imply an apparition, but Moses benignly smitten with a deadly disease.

Fifthly, as to the words, A bloody husband art thou to me, &c. one of our learned divines has fully proved them not to have been spoken to Moses, but to the child (32). He very judiciously observes, first, that the word חתן Chatan, which we translate husband, signifies only a bridegroom, and it is not likely that Ziphorah should call him by that name after having been married so long, and having had two children by him, that appellation ceasing immediately after the eight days of the nuptial solemnity were over. Another observation he makes is, that this word Chatan doth properly signify a son-in-law, and so expresses not the relation the man has to his wife, but to her parents; for which reason it never has any affixed pronoun, unless it be with relation to the latter. The same may likewise be said of the word כלה Calah, bride, or rather daughter-in-law; it being used only with relation to the husband's parents, who alone can properly call the married woman כלתי Calathi, my daughter-in-law, but the bridegroom never calls her by that name to signify his bride; it being certain, that the Hebrew language has no word to express a bridegroom or bride, with respect to the relation they bear to one another. It would therefore have been nonsense in Ziphorah to have called him by the name of Chatan, which neither expressed an old nor a new husband; the question

(22) THEODORET. in loc. (23) Ellefbemotb-rab. R. SAL. & al. (24) AUGUST. Serm. de temp. (25) Genes. ii. 24. (26) THEODORET. in loc. (27) D. KIMCHI RUPERT. TOSTAT. PERRER. MUNST. VILLET. & al. (28) Targ. Jerof. in loc. (29) JUN. SIMLER. PELICAN. PISCAT. & al. (30) FERR. & al. (31) ABEN. EZRA R. TANCHUM. MAIMON. & al. (32) LUD. BRUG. in loc. & in Oper. Criticor. Tom. ix. (33) JOS. MED. sermon on the words.

Ziphorah
circumcises her son, and Moses is rejoiced.

and two children when he was sent upon so glorious and important a message, or a because he had deferred to circumcise his youngest son, either out of regard to his tender age, or in complaisance to his wife, who might fear lest such an operation should make him unfit to travel for a while, if not endanger his life in that hot country. Ziphorah however, taking it in the latter sense, made what haste she could to get a sharp stone, with which she cut off the child's prepuce, laying it at his feet, telling him at the same time, that he was now become a joyful bridegroom to her by the blood of this circumcision. The ceremony was no sooner over, but Moses was restored again, and able to pursue his journey towards mount Horeb, whilst his wife took the two children back to her father Jethro, resolving to wait there 'till a more favourable opportunity offered to rejoin her husband.

Joins his brother at mount Horeb.

In the mean time Moses and Aaron met at the foot of mount Horeb, and after the first embraces of two brothers who had not seen, or perhaps heard from one another during the space of forty years, Moses acquainted him with the commission he had received from God, Aaron expressed a sensible joy at the news, and was so far from conceiving the least uneasiness to see his younger brother thus preferred before him, that he promised to be obedient in all things to the divine will. After this they continued their journey towards Egypt, and being happily arrived at the land of Goshen, their first care was to assemble the elders or heads of the Israelites and to impart to them the joyful news of their speedy deliverance; whilst Moses, to confirm their hesitating belief, failed not to work those miracles before them, by which God had commanded him to establish his credit and authority among them. These first essays were received with incredible joy by the whole assembly, every one of them bowing themselves in token of gratitude and adoration to the divine goodness, which had at length taken pity of their miserable thralldom<sup>b</sup>. But this docile disposition lasted no longer than they thought their deliverance would cost nothing but miracles, and that the care and danger of it would only fall upon Moses and Aaron; but when it came to touch them a little nearer, they became so resty and desponding, that Moses found them as hard to be persuaded to embrace their freedom, as Pharaoh was to grant it to them (B).

Declares his commission to the Israelites.

Delivers his message to the king of the Egypt.

Moses and Aaron, however, did not delay to open their commission before the Egyptian king, but the preamble of it, Thus saith the LORD God of the Hebrews, sounded so strangely in his ears, unused to such an expression, and perhaps to the naming of any other God besides himself, that he could not forbear wondering at their boldness, telling them that he knew no such God, and that as to question then will be, how it could be applied to the child? And herein the Hebrew doctors are best able to help us out, who tell us that it was the custom of the women to call the circumcised child Chatan, חתן, קרא לבן כאשר ימול (33). Kimchi says, that it signifies originally one that gives joy, and is therefore used to express the joy that attends a wedding or the circumcision of a child (34). Accordingly we find, that the Arabians called the circumcised Marbutun, or one that is made a Chatan, in the same manner as we call a baptized child, christened. The words then, used by Ziphorah, ought to have been translated thou art (now) to me a joyful circumcised son. To which if we add the last observation of the same learned author, that that the word Li, which we translate to me, doth more properly signify here by me, as it doth in a great many other places of scripture, the sense will be still more plainly this; thou art now by me made a circumcised child, which was the form of words used in the circumcision, and might be more properly rendered, I do pronounce thee circumcised. Neither is it at all improbable, that this word חתן was originally used in this form, not only to express the usual joy of a child's circumcision, but likewise his admission into the alliance made by God with Abraham and his posterity, or his espousal with the church of God; in both which senses that word is very fitly applied; from which it is most probable, that it was at the child's feet that she laid the fore skin, when she spake the words above-mentioned. This is so far from being a new or peculiar notion of Mr. Mede, that we find several ancient versions expounding it after the very same manner (35); from all which it plainly appears, that there neither was any squabble between Moses and his wife, nor any indecency or ill language used by her.

<sup>b</sup> Excd. iv. p. tot.

(B) Some historians have ventured to give us the name of this Pharaoh. Apion calls him Amasis or Amasis; Eusebius, Cbrencris; but archbishop Usher thinks after Manetho, that it was Amenophis the son of Rameses Miamun, and father of Sesbosis, called also after his grand-father Ramesis. He is also of opinion, that this Amenophis is the same monarch whom the Greeks call Belus the father of Egyptus and Danaus, though the fable writers have confounded him with Belus the Assyrian and father of Ninus (36): The truth is, that we have so little light from history as to this point, that it is very dangerous to affirm any thing about it<sup>c</sup>.

(33) Idem ibid.
UssER. AN. p. 13.

(34) D. KIMCHI in Radic.
* Vid. sup. p. 236. & seq.

(35) Chald. Septuagint &c. al.

(36)

- a the Israelites, they should not find him so easy to part with them. This was indeed what they were bid to expect; nevertheless they ventured to tell him, that they knew that great God of whom they spoke, though he did not; and that he had charged them, that they should all go three days journey to celebrate a festival to him, and that if they should omit complying with his command, he would soon punish their disobedience, either by pestilence or by the sword. Moses could not expect that Pharaoh should concern himself about their danger upon that account; but he was not perhaps as yet commissioned to make use of more urgent motives. He was therefore dismissed with his brother Aaron, with a severe reprimand, for putting such idle notions into their people's heads, and debauching them
- b from their work, bidding them to return to their own tasks, and they should soon know the success of this wise embassy. As this proved the beginning of that famous contest between Moses, or rather the God of Israel and the king of Egypt, so it did likewise the fatal source of new sorrows and complaints to the Israelites. For Pharaoh fearing their excessive numbers, and thinking, or at least pretending that The Israelites idleness and wantonness were the cause of this rambling fit of religion; ordered burthens increased. their task-masters to harden their work still more, and instead of giving them straw to dry their bricks with, to make them wander over the land, since they had such an inclination for a change of air, and to gather themselves stubble instead of it, without diminishing one tittle of their work. This was indeed expecting impossibilities from them, but their merciless task-masters, not regarding it, failed not to punish their overseers, whenever they found them come short of their appointed task. These therefore, not thinking perhaps that Pharaoh could be the author of such a cruel and unreasonable order, went in a body to make their grievances known to him; but he, instead of minding their piteous complaints, only accused them of being grown idle and wanton for want of work, and dismissed them with the utmost unconcern. They were scarce got out of Pharaoh's palace before Moses and Aaron met them, probably to enquire of their success; but if they had not read it in their dejected looks, they could not fail of hearing of it, for the poor overseers had no sooner cast their eyes on them, but they began to inveigh
- d against them in the bitterest terms, as the authors of this new addition of misery, which could terminate in nothing but death and despair. It would have been in vain for Moses to have offered any thing either in his own defence, or by way of comfort to them at that time; he thought it more advisable to apply himself to God, and in the humblest terms to expostulate with him for the ill success of this first message.

- Moses had no sooner made an end of his complaint, but God gave him fresh assurances of his love and compassion for his groaning people. He bid Moses is bid him go to them, and assure them from him, that he would speedily let all Egypt to go again see that he was their God, and would be their deliverer and conductor into that to Pharaoh.
- c land which he had promised to their fathers, to whom he had indeed appeared and been known heretofore by the name of El Shaddai, God Almighty or All-sufficient, though never 'till now by his great name Jehovah (C). But, continued he, I will signalize their deliverance, by such tokens of my justice on that obstinate monarch and his cruel people, that they shall be forced at last to acknowledge the divine hand that smiteth them, and dismiss my people, though ever so much against their will. This was more than enough to give a new life to Moses,

<sup>c</sup> Exod. v. p. tot.

(C) Those who conclude from this passage, that the name Jehovah (37), or the genuine meaning (38), or lastly the true pronunciation of it (39), had been unknown to the patriarchs Abraham, Isaac, &c. and that Moses used it by way of anticipation, and spoke according to the time in which he wrote, when God had made it fully known to his people, seem to forget that Abraham called the mountain, on which he went to sacrifice his son, Jehovah jired. However, it must be owned, that there is a great obscurity in the words of Moses, out of which many Hebrew and Christian commentators † have endeavoured to bring out some mysteries, which we should be loath to vend after them. The most natural exposition is that which renders the Hebrew word Shem by character instead of name, and then the sense will be this; In my character of El Shaddai or omnipotent, was I only known to them; that is, they only relied on my all-sufficient power for the fulfilling my promises to them; but now I'll be known by the character of Jehovah, or performer of those promises (40). Vid. our notes under the word Jehovah, pag. 484. not. T.

(37) KIMCHI, ABENEZRA, OLEASTER, &c. (38) PAUL. BURG. RUPERT. LYRA. CA-
JE. AN. TOSTAT. (39) OLEAST. GLOSS. BERRUYER, &c. † Vid. MAIMON. Mora Novech.
Petirath Moshe cum not. Gualmin. &c. al. GERARD de nat. Dei. § 23. SIXT. SINENS. Biblist. GEIER de lucif. Hæbr. &c. al. (40) SIMLER, JUNIUS, AINSWORTH, &c. al.

though all too little and insufficient to administer the least comfort to his unhappy people, who, sinking under the weight of their oppression, did hardly give an ear to what he said to them. Moses was going away from them, grieved at his heart to behold their misery and despair, when God commanded him to go immediately to Pharaoh, and to renew his demand in his name, not to detain his people any longer at his peril. But Moses was so disheartened at his ill success, that he could not forbear shewing an excessive reluctance to obey. Alas, said he, if my words can find so little credit with thy own people, how can I expect that they will be regarded by that haughty monarch, especially considering with what difficulty I am forced to utter them. To which God was pleased to answer, behold Moses I give thee a miraculous, divine power, over Pharaoh, and thy brother shall be as thy prophet and interpreter to him. And though I suffer his heart to continue hardened (D) 'till thou hast wrought all the miracles I have charged thee with ; yet be assured, that I will bring Israel out of their bondage like a triumphant army, and the Egyptians shall know that I am the LORD. Pharaoh, indeed, will not consent 'till he is forced to it. For since he refused to acknowledge me, and hardeneth himself against my commands, it is but just I should so far forsake him, that though my wonders are multiplied before him, and the whole land is astonished at them, he alone shall continue obdurate and insensible of them. Go then, let your mighty works convince that proud tyrant at least, that your message is from a greater and more powerful monarch than he<sup>4</sup>. Moses and Aaron did forthwith obey, and, having presented themselves before Pharaoh, confirmed their message by the first miracle, and Moses threw down his rod, which turned immediately into a serpent. Pharaoh, though somewhat surprized at it, yet failed not to try what his magicians could do, who were no sooner come but their rods were likewise turned into serpents, so that all the superiority which Moses shewed over them at this time was, that whilst the king and court were applauding their skill, his rod swallowed up those of the Egyptians (E). However,

First Miracle.
Moses's rod turned into a serpent.
The Magicians do the same by theirs.

<sup>4</sup> Exod. vi. p. tot.

(D) We have ventured to depart from our own, and almost all other versions, which seem to make God the chief hardener of Pharaoh's heart, that he might inflict the more severe punishments on him. A notion which, however embraced by the Predestinarians, seems so shocking to reason, that one would sooner choose to say with the fool there is no God, than to believe him capable of such manifest injustice. We shall have occasion to resume this subject in the sequel of this history, upon another occasion, and to shew, that the Jews have been the first breachers of this monstrous doctrine, and by their versions and paraphrases have led the way to others to render these and many other texts of the old testament, in a sense in which neither the original, nor the whole tenour of scripture, nor the notion of a Deity, nor even the context in this particular case could bear them out. For who can deny, but what God did to Pharaoh and the Egyptians, was much more proper to soften than to harden their hearts, especially if we consider that it was not 'till after seeing the miracles, and after the ceasing of the plagues that his heart is said to be hardened? we think ourselves therefore obliged to do justice to those learned criticks, who have been at the pains of clearing the scriptures from charging the great judge of heaven and earth with such foul injustice, by proving, even against the Jews, that the verbs here used are in the conjugations Piel and Hiphil, as they are called by the grammarians, and signify often a bare permission, of which they have given us very many unquestionable instances, which we shall not trouble our reader with here, seeing he may consult the authors themselves, whose names he will find in the margin (41). From all these, and many more, authorities, it is plain that the words ought to have been translated, as we have, that God suffered the heart of Pharaoh to be hardened, as all those who are but ever so little versed in the Hebrew will readily own. As for those places where it is said, for this cause have I set thee up, that I might shew my power, &c. they should more properly have been rendered ; for this cause have I suffered thee to subsist or to stand, &c. that is, I have forbore to cut thee off, or spared thee from the common ruin, &c. which bear quite another sense, and only shew, that though he had long ago deserved to be destroyed, yet God thought fit to let him subsist, 'till he had, by his many wonders, delivered his people in spite of all his opposition.

(E) The Talmud has preserved us a tradition of a proverbial taunt, with which the Egyptians flouted Moses, when he began to work his miracles among them ; thou bringest straw to Affra, a place in Egypt where straw abounded ; meaning that he had mistaken the place when he came to play tricks in a country that was so well stocked with conjurers. Origen says, that they (the Egyptians) did not absolutely deny the miracles of Moses, but only pretended that they were done by some fascination rather than by a divine power (1). And Philo introduces the Egyptian magicians speaking to Pharaoh and his court to this

(41) ARR. MONTAN. de Idiom. Hebr. N. 42. PINED. Can. Theol. Cent. 2. GERHARD de Provid. CALOV. & RUNC. in Exod. HUNNIN. qu. de Provid. 57, 91. MEITZER. disp. Gieff. Tom. p. 745. MESNER Anthropol. dec. 1. PFEIFER dubia V. T. Cent. 1. l. 87. PELLING & WHITBY against Predest. LECLERC in loc. GROT. LE SCENE Essay & al.

(1) ORIG. cont. Cels. lib. iii.

a this advantage made no great impresson on Pharaoh, who might attribute it only this purpose; why are you frightened, we are not ignorant of such things, seeing we profess the same ourselves (2)?

And here since we are entering into a long scene of Moses's miracles, the greatest part of which were imitated by the magicians of Pharaoh, it will not be amiss to enquire who the latter were, by what power they did perform those wonders, and why they came short of some of those of Moses. As to the first, we promised in a former place to prove that they were Jannes and Jambres * mentioned by St. Paul to have withstood Moses, (3), or as Pliny calls them Janne, and Jotapha (4), when speaking of the sect of the magicians, he says, that Moses, Jannes, and Jotapha, were the heads and founders of it. They are celebrated in the Talmud † under the names of יוחנני ומרי Jochani and Mamri. The targum of Jonathan (5) affirms them to have been Balaam's sons, and that they went along with him to Baalac king of Moab. Some Jewish authors call them Janes and Jambres, others Jochanan and Mamre, and others Jonah and Jombres (6), and pretend that they were drowned in the red-sea with the Egyptians, though others think that they were not destroyed 'till the war which Phineas waged against the Midianites (7). The apocryphal book entituled Jannes and Mambres, quoted by Origen (8), and by Hilary the deacon (9), affirm them to have been two brothers; and Numerius quoted by Eusebius (10) gives us this account of them: "Jannes and Jambres, interpreters of the mysteries of Egypt, were in great repute, at the time when the Hebrews were driven out of Egypt, being in the opinion of all men inferior to none in the art of magick. For by the general voice of the Egyptians, they two were chosen to oppose Moses ring-leader of the Jews, whose prayers were of all others the most prevalent with God; and they only were able to frustrate and undo all those most grievous plagues which Moses brought upon Egypt, in the open view and sight of all the Egyptians." Thus much for the names and characters of those magicians.

The Mohammedans, however, have not failed, according to custom, to stuff this part of Moses's history with some of their fables. We shall just give a short sketch of what they have writ of it. They tell us, that Moses having wrought some miracles before the king of Egypt, and very much surpris'd him with them, he was advised by his council to amuse him with fair hopes 'till he had sent for some of the most expert magicians from Thebaide. Accordingly Sabour and Gadour, two brothers renowned for their magick skill, were sent for; but before they repaired to Pharaoh's court, they went to consult the Manes of their father about the success of their journey, acquainting him withal, that the two magicians whom they were sent to oppose had a rod which they turned into a serpent, and devoured all that made head against it. Their father's ghost answered, that if that rod turned itself into a serpent, whilst they were asleep, they must never expect to prevail against them. Upon their arrival at Memphis, their first care was to inform themselves about this material circumstance, and found that their rod did guard them in the shape of a serpent, whilst they slept, and let none come near them. However, this did not discourage them from appearing before Pharaoh, at the head of his other magicians, to the number, as some make it, of 70,000. Besides these, there were two other excellent ones with their disciples, and lastly, the Egyptian high-priest at the head of all the magicians of that country. All these had prepared rods, and cords filled with quick-silver, which, being heated by the sun, imitated the winding of a serpent, but they were soon destroyed by that of Moses, to the great surprize of all the beholders, but especially of Sabour and Gadour, who thereupon renounc'd their profession and embraced Moses's religion, and were put to death for it by order of the Egyptian king, as holding secret correspondence with the Jewish law-giver (11).

From this account it is plain that the Mohammedans looked upon the wonders wrought by the Egyptians rather as a leger-de-main tricks, than supernatural works. However, though this opinion has been likewise maintained by several eminent persons both Jews and Christians (12); yet that of St. Austin (13), that they were done by the power of the devil, has been more universally received, and that for the two following reasons; first, because the scriptures of the old and new testament seem to attribute some such power to evil spirits; and secondly, because Moses expresses himself in such terms as manifestly shew that they really imitated him in all those wonders they wrought. For in this case of their rods being turned into serpents, he doth not say, that they made them appear to be such by a deceptio visus; but that ישריכו איש מסהו ויהי לתנינא they slung down every man his rod, and that they became serpents. And in all the other cases wherein they imitated him, he expresses it thus; ויעשו גם הם and the magicians did so likewise; or, and the magicians, even they, did so likewise. If it be asked why God did suffer them to borrow this power from the devil, to invalidate, if possible, those miracles which his servant wrought by his divine power, the following reasons may be given for it, namely, first, it was necessary that these magicians should be suffered to exert the utmost of their power against Moses, in order to clear him from the imputation of magick or forcery; for as the notion of such an extraordinary art was very rife, not only among the Egyptians, but all other nations, if they had not entered into this strenuous competition with him, and been at length overcome by him, both the Hebrews and Egyptians would have been apter to have attributed all his miracles to his skill in magick, than to the divine power. Secondly, it was necessary in order

(2) PHIL. in vit. Mos. vid. WARREN cont. BURNET, p. 40. * Vid. sup. p. 220 e. (3) 2 Tim. iii. 8. (4) Lib. xxx. c. 1. † Targ. מנחות cap. ix. (5) Targ. in Numb. xxii. 22. (6) BUXTORP. Lexic. Talmud. FABRIC. de Apocr. Vet. Test. (7) Numb. xxv. 17, 18. (8) ORIG. in Matth. Targ. xxxv. (9) AMBROSIAST. in 2 Tim. iii. 8. (10) In ARISTOT. ap. EUSEB. præp. Evang. lib. ix. c. viii. (11) HERBELOT. Bibliot. Orient. p. 648, & seq. MONOSAH ap. CALMET. sub voc. JANNES. (12) JOS. Ant. lib. ii. c. xiii. JUSTIN. MART. quæst. Orthod. xvi. TERTUL. lib. de animâ. GREG. NYSSEN. AMBROS. HIERON. cont. Jovin. lib. ii. & al. (13) AUGUST. lib. xxxviii. quæst. 79, 98, & lib. iii. de Trinitate cap. vii. THEODORET. in Exod. lib. xviii. AQUIN. TOSTAT. LYRA. BURG. CAJET. USSER. sub. An. M. 2513.

Second Miracle, the waters turned into blood.

to his superior skill in magick. This miracle therefore was soon followed by another, which was turning all the running and standing waters of Egypt into blood; so that there was not a drop of water left in the whole land for the Egyptians to drink: How long they continued so Moses has not told us; for what is added afterwards in the last verse of this chapter, that seven days were compleated after the turning of the waters into blood, is rather the space between this miracle and that of the frogs, which they are bid to perform in the beginning of the next chapter. For as the division of the bible into chapters was of later invention, and introduced for the better conveniency of reading it, if we join the last verse of the seventh with the beginning of the eighth, it will run thus; And seven days were fulfilled after the turning the waters into blood, and the LORD spake, and so on, which is the same as if he had said, and seven days after the turning of the waters into blood, God spake to Moses. However, this change continued long enough to kill all the fish, and to oblige the Egyptians to dig round about the river for fresh water to drink, none of the rest being fit for that or any other use. This miracle was likewise imitated by the magicians, but whether upon sea-water brought on purpose, or some fresh water fetched from the land of Goshen, or some of that which they had drawn out of their new digged wells, is not easy to guess; though it is more probable that they staid 'till the waters of the Nile and other places were restored to their former colour and taste. However that be, Pharaoh was not one jot the nearer being convinced; wherefore Moses was again sent to him to threaten him, that if he did not let Israel go, his whole kingdom should be so filled with frogs, that their ovens, their beds and tables should swarm with them; but Pharaoh still despising their threats, and bidding them defiance, was soon made sensible of his rashness. His magicians, indeed, went on to persuade him that Moses was only such another miracle-monger as they were, by imitating also this miracle, and bringing a fresh swarm of frogs. They might indeed have shewed their skill to a better purpose, if they had tried to have removed those insects, of which the Egyptians did not want this fresh supply, but it seems they had not power enough to do that. Wherefore Pharaoh was reduced to send for Moses, and to promise him that he would let Israel go, if he would but deliver him and his country from that plaguy vermin. Whether there was any sincerity in this promise, or whether it was only forced from him by the present calamity, Moses took him at his word, and desiring him to name the time, when he should rid the land of those creatures, did precisely perform his part; so that by the next day the time appointed by the king, there was not one frog left alive in all the land. But whilst his subjects were gathering them up in heaps, in order to carry them off, their stench being like to breed an infection, Pharaoh was thinking how to elude his promise, not considering that he only made way for another plague.

Third miracle, of frogs.

Fourth miracle, of the lice.

For when Moses found himself baffled, he touched the dust with his rod, which was immediately turned into lice, or as some think into gnats, which small insect, they say, is more common, and their sting more tormenting in Egypt than any where else. But our version seems to us more agreeable to the original, and to the generality of ancient and modern translations and expositors. These infected man and beast in such quantities, that one would have imagined that all the dust of Egypt had been turned into lice. Pharaoh sent for his magicians, and bid them try their skill in vain, for either their power proved too short, or was curtailed by a superior hand, so that they were forced to acknowledge, that the finger of God did plainly display itself in this miracle (F). However, Pharaoh, not der to confirm the faith of the wavering and desponding Israelites, by making them see the difference between Moses's acting by the power of God, and the sorcerers by that of Satan. And lastly, in order to preserve them afterwards from being seduced by any false miracles from the true worship of God (14).

* Exod. vii. p. tot.

† Chald. Targ. JOSEPH. ANT. l. ii. xiv. Rabin. fer omni. MONTAN. MUNSTER. VATABL. JUN. BOCHART. GAULMIN. vit Mos. & al. mult.

(F) What has been said under this head in the last note, will easily lead us to an answer to the next question, why the magicians could not go thorough-stitch with all the miracles of

Moses, and in particular in not being able to bring forth lice, when they had been able to bring swarms of frogs and other insects. For without having recourse to the common solution, that this was a creation of a new kind of vermin, which therefore could not be imitated by the devil, and for which we have no warrant from the text, which expressly calls them lice, it will be sufficient to say, that herein Moses shewed his superior power in tying their hands from working a miracle in all respects as easy

(14) RUPERT. PERRER. SIMLER. FERUS. VILLET. TRENEL. & al. in loc.

regarding

- a regarding their words, Moses and Aaron met him the next morning, as he was going down to the river, and told him that his obstinacy would only bring more and worse plagues upon him, the next of which would be such mixed swarms of flies as would darken the air; that God, however, would put a difference between his people and the Egyptians, and that there should none be found in all the land of Goshen, though the rest of the kingdom did swarm with them; adding, that the next day should bring this new plague upon him. Accordingly, by the next morning the air was filled with those insects, whose bite was so venomous and painful, that the mischief which they did to Egypt became intolerable*, and forced the king to send for Moses and Aaron, and to tell them, that he would give them leave to sacrifice to their God, provided it was done within his dominions. To this they answered, they could not comply with his command, without imminent danger of their lives, seeing they should be obliged to sacrifice such creatures as the Egyptians worshipped, who would therefore be ready to stone them, as guilty of the most horrid and abominable sacrilege. They therefore insisted upon going three days journey out of the land, that they might safely perform their God's command. This answer, which gave the king just reason to suspect that they had a mind to go away for good, put him to a terrible nonplus. On the one hand he was very unwilling to hazard the losing the Israelites, and on the other the flies did such an incredible deal of harm, that he heard nothing but complaints on all sides. At length, being become more seemingly flexible, he promised that they should go, provided it was at no great distance from Egypt, and they promised him faithfully to return again in a little time, and, which was still more surprising, begged of them to pray for him. He could not indeed have chosen a more powerful or a more ready intercessor, had not the tokens of God's clemency, as well as those of his severity been equally lost upon him. However, Moses assured him, that he would immediately go out, and intreat the Lord for him, desiring him at the same time to remember his promise to them; but no sooner had his prayer obtained a reprieve, and delivered the kingdom from the plague of those venomous insects, than the king drew on another by his obstinacy and breach of promise<sup>b</sup>.
- d THIS next judgment fell, according to Moses's word, on all the cattle of the Egyptians, the greatest part of which died by the next day, whilst that of the Israelites remained unhurt. But this not touching the king near enough, the next that followed was more effectually felt by him. It was a violent and painful boil which brake out upon man and beast, by Aaron's throwing a handful of the ashes of the furnace into the air. Pharaoh, according to custom, had recourse to his magicians, who being themselves smitten with the boils, and being perhaps afraid of something worse, dared not appear before Moses. Notwithstanding this, Pharaoh continued obstinate, and chose rather to endure the smart of his boils, than the loss of Israel. However, it was not long before Moses was sent to threaten him with a more terrible one, in which the voice of the God of Israel should be heard in thunder, and his vengeance felt in such dreadful storms of hail, as had not been known since the foundation of Egypt. He advised him likewise not to exalt himself against the Israelites, seeing their God hath hitherto preserved him from ruin, only to convince him of his almighty power by all the signs and wonders, and to persuade him to confess and adore him, and prevent thereby the future effects of his wrath; for, added he, if all these judgments will not humble thee, know that God has a great many in store against thee, which shall force thee at last to submit, tho' never so much against thy will. He, who alone did set thee on the throne, might indeed have cut thee off from thy first refusal, but since he hath spared thee hitherto, remember it is either to force thee to glorify him by thy submission, or to be glorified by this and future ages, by the punishment which thy pride and obstinacy do force from him after so many gracious invitations and miraculous warnings (G). He gave him but that one day to consider of it, assuring him that the next day would prove a dismal one to the Egyptians, unless he resolved to dismiss the Israelites

Fifth miracle, of swarms of flies.

Sixth miracle; the cattle of the Egyptians killed by murrain.

Seventh miracle, boils upon men and beasts.

Eighth miracle, hail, storms and thunders.

* Vid. Psal. lxxviii. 45.

<sup>b</sup> Exod. viii. p. tot.

easy as any they had done 'till then. For this was more than sufficient to extort this confession from them, that he acted by a superior power, and that the finger of God was in it (15).

(G) This version, wherein we have departed from all others, and kept close to the original, the reader may see justified in a former note †.

(15) Exod. viii. 19. * Vid. LESLEY's easy Method with the Deists. † Vid. supra, p. 194, Not. D.

before that time, between whom and the Egyptians God would put such a difference, a that the land of Goshen should be entirely free from the terrible punishment with which Egypt would be half undone. However, finding the king still too hardened and incredulous to prevent this new judgment, he forewarn'd him and his court to send for such cattle as they had left out in the fields, since all that was not under some strong shelter would certainly be killed by the hail. Moses was no sooner gone from him, but those, who gave credit to his words, sent to have their servants and cattle safely lodged, whilst the rest, lightly regarding it, left them to perish in the field. For no sooner had Moses lifted up his rod towards heaven on the next morning, but the thunders, lightnings, and hail followed one another so thick, that Egypt was half destroy'd by them. The hail that then fell was of such prodigious bigness, b that it killed man and beast, broke all the trees, and destroy'd all the barley and flax it chanced to fall upon. The wheat only and the rye escaped, because they were not sufficiently grown, for the barley harvest in Egypt begins about the middle or latter end of March, whereas that of the wheat and rye doth not begin 'till six or seven weeks after. As for the land of Goshen, it was found, upon enquiry, to have been as free from this, as it had been from all the former plagues.

The great mischief done by it.

THESE thunders and lightnings, but especially the hail, which was the more extraordinary, because it seldom or never rains in that part of Egypt, so frightened the proud king, that he sent for Moses and Aaron out of hand, and express'd himself in such terms to them, as might have pass'd for sure tokens of a real conversion : he own'd c himself an obstinate sinner, justly punished for his disobedience, and begged that they would but deliver him from the noise of those dreadful thunders, after which he promised not to detain them one moment longer. Moses was too well acquainted with him by this time, to depend upon this promise, which he saw was only extorted from him by his present dread. He made no scruple to tell him so. However, he promised him to obtain a speedy cessation of them as soon as they were gone out, which he accordingly did, and gave the Egyptians an opportunity to examine the mischief that had been done by the hail, which they found to be much greater than they had imagined. This inspired many of them with a real fear of the God of Israel ; but made a quite different impression upon Pharaoh and his council, who no d sooner perceived that the storm was over, but they returned to their old way. Moses therefore was sent to signify to them what judgment they were to expect next, which was to be such an infinite number of locusts, as should cover the face of the earth, and eat up all that the hail had left undestroy'd. There were some about the king then, who took the liberty to represent to him the unconceivable damage which his kingdom had already received ; that Egypt was already destroy'd, and that it was high time the Hebrews were sent away to serve their God. Pharaoh was almost persuaded to let them go, but having sent for Moses and Aaron back, to enquire who of them were to go, and who were to stay, he was so highly provoked at their insisting upon taking with them their wives, children, cattle, and all that they had, that he could e not forbear upbraiding them with their ill intentions, which though concealed with so much art, and cloak'd with the specious pretence of religion, and the service of God, yet did but too plainly shew that they had no design ever to return into Egypt again. He warn'd them of the danger they ran themselves into, and advised them to content themselves with taking only the men with them, and leaving their wives and children behind ; and, having threatened them severely, caused them to be turned out of doors.

Ninth miracle, of locusts.

MOSES was no sooner got out, than he lifted up his rod over the land of Egypt. This was quickly followed by an east-wind, which blow'd all the night, and brought f such numerous swarms of locusts by the next morning as had never been seen before ; and these, spreading themselves all over the land, did in a little time eat up every blade of grass, and every thing that had escaped the storm of hail. Pharaoh did not fail to send for Moses, to own his fault, and beg for one reprieve more ; but having obtain'd it by means of a west-wind, which blew all the locusts into the sea, he continued as inflexible as ever. This new provocation did not go long unpunished, and Egypt was presently after smitten with such horrid darkness, that Moses chooses to express it by a darkness that may be felt *. During the three days it lasted, the Egyptians did neither see one another, nor dare to stir out of their place, but continued fix'd and immoveable, as if they had been thunder-struck, whilst the land of Goshen enjoy'd its usual day-light. The horror of this obscurity, which could not be removed by the g

Tenth miracle, great darkness during three days.

<sup>1</sup> Exod. ix. & x. p. tot.

* Ibid. ver. 21.

- a common methods then used to supply the absence of the sun, caused such dreadful apprehensions in the king and all his subjects, and was so heightened by the dismal outcries of men, women, and children, that their consternation may be much easier imagined than described. However, it made so deep an impression upon them, that as soon as the light was restored to them, Moses and Aaron were immediately sent for, to prevent, if possible, some further and more terrible punishment. The king, according to custom, told them that he was willing to grant their request, and that they might go with their wives and children, but insisted that their flocks should be left behind. Moses after having represented to him the unreasonableness of such a demand, seeing they only knew that they were to offer up a solemn sacrifice to God, but were not yet acquainted what kind of beasts he would choose to have sacrificed to him; observing Pharaoh's unwillingness to consent, told him in express terms, that they would take all their cattle with them, and that not a single hoof should remain in Egypt. We need not to wonder if so proud a king, as Pharaoh was, could not hear so bold a demand without the highest resentment. He caused him to be thrust from his presence with the utmost indignation, threatening him that if he dared to come before him any more, it should certainly cost him his life. Such impotent threatenings had nothing in them that could frighten a man like Moses; who therefore contented himself with saying Amen to his never seeing him more<sup>a</sup>. However, it is reasonably supposed, that it was in this last interview that he foretold the king the finishing stroke of the divine vengeance upon all the first-born of men and cattle throughout all Egypt, which should cause such a consternation among all his subjects, that they should come with bended knees to the Israelites, and beg of them in the most submissive terms to depart out of their country<sup>b</sup>; whilst God would still shew such regard to the latter, that they should enjoy their usual calmness and tranquility, not a dog daring to open his mouth against any of them. Moses had no sooner finished this last prediction, and promised him that, according to his word, he would see his face no more, than he retired to his people into the land of Goshen, where the Israelites celebrated the passover that very night<sup>c</sup>, according to God's command. In this night also Moses reminded them to borrow what jewels, fine raiment, and other precious things they could from their Egyptian neighbours, assuring them from God, that they should find them very willing and forward to accommodate them with the best things they had<sup>d</sup> (H).

<sup>a</sup> Exod. x. p. tot.<sup>b</sup> Exod. xi. 8 & seq. Vid. USSER. Annal. p. 14.<sup>c</sup> Id. ibid. VILLET, &amp; al.

<sup>d</sup> Exod. xi & xii. p. tot.

(H) Before we enter into the institution of the passover, which was attended with the last and most dreadful plague, the death of all the first-born, it will not be amiss to enquire how long a time Moses took in bringing all the plagues upon Egypt, especially because some chronologists have spun it out to ten (16), and others to twelve months (17). But besides, that their reasons are very jejune, and unwarranted by scripture, it is more likely that they happened all within the space of one month; first, because their following so closely one upon another would both more visibly display the power of God, and more effectually work upon Pharaoh to dismiss the Israelites; and this seems to be hinted at by Moses in a former chapter (18). 2. These plagues were so grievous that if they had lasted much longer the Egyptians must have been undone by them; but, 3. we read that the Israelites continued full forty years in the wilderness (19), that Moses was eighty years old before he appeared the first time before Pharaoh (20) and that he was 120 years old when he died, that is, at the end of their forty years travel (21), so that there could not be much time spent in bringing all these plagues. However, archbishop Usher has included them all within the space of one month, from Moses's own account, as follows (22).

About the 18th day of the sixth month, which in the year following, and thence forward, was reckoned the twelfth month; was sent the plague of turning the waters into blood, which ended seven days after (23). About the twenty-fifth day came on the second plague of the frogs, which was removed the day following (24), and about the twenty-seventh day came on the third plague of lice (25).

About the 28th day Moses threaten'd them with a fourth plague, viz. a mixture of flies, and other vermin, which came on the 29th day, and were all taken away on the 30th (26).

About the first day of the next month, which was afterwards made the first month of the year, Moses having forewarned them of another plague to come, the murrain upon the cattle, brought it upon them the day following (27). About the 3d day the sixth plague of boils brake out upon man and beasts, and upon the magicians (28).

About the 4th day Moses foretold them a seventh plague, which he brought upon them on the 5th; which was that of thunder, rain, and grievous hail mix'd with fire, with which their flax and barley were smitten (29), but their wheat and rye remained unhurt, not being yet out of the ground. Whence a judicious author † rightly observes, that this plague happened in the month Abif.

About the 7th day Moses threaten'd them with an eighth plague, and accordingly sent it the day following; this was that of the locusts to devour (16) BOORN. ap. VILLET. (17) Judei fere omnes. Vid. USSER. An. p. 13. GENEBRARD, & al. (18) Exod. vi. 1. (19) Josb. v. 6. (20) Exod. vii. 7. (21) Dent. xxxiv. 7. (22) Annal. p. 14. Vid. etiam PERRER. & VILLET. in loc. (23) Exod. vii. 25. (24) ib. viii. 10. (25) ib. ix. 17. (26) ib. v. 24 & 29. (27) Exod. ix. 3, 5, 6. (28) ib. v. 8, & seq. (29) ib. v. 18 ad 32. † N. FULLER Misael. l. 3. p. 389.

Its first institution.

The order and manner of it.

Unleavened bread.

The Israelites obey, and kill the passover.

HOWEVER, it must be observed that this ceremony of eating the passover, as well as the method of doing it, had been prescrib'd by God to Moses, and by him communicated to the Israelites, during the time in which these transactions pass'd between him and the king of Egypt, though they are postpon'd to the twelfth chapter, to prevent the breaking the series of those wonders which God had wrought by him. The account, which he has given us of this institution, is prefaced with a command from God, that that month, which was then the sixth of the year, according to the common or civil computation, should from thenceforth be the first month in the year in the sacred calendar (K); and that all the other feasts of the year, which were afterwards to be instituted, should be regulated by that of the passover, the celebration of which was to be as follows. Upon the 10th of the month, which was four days before Moses's last message to Pharaoh, every master of a family was to take a lamb or a kid, of the first year, a male without blemish, and keep it 'till the 14th of the same month. And in case his family was too small for the lamb, he was to call in one or more families to the eating of it. It was to be kill'd and roasted on the 14th day at evening, and eat with unleavened bread and bitter herbs; at the eating of it they were to stand with their loins girded, their shoes on their feet, and their staff in their hand. They were to eat it in haste, as people who are ready and impatient to be gone. The head and the feet were not to be sever'd from it, nor a bone of it to be broken: if any of it was left, it was not to be kept 'till the next day, though the eating of unleaven'd bread was to last seven days, but it was to be thrown into the fire and consumed bones and all. This injunction about the passover was to be perpetual, but on this night they were moreover to save the blood of the lamb in a basin, and sprinkle the two side-posts and cross-post of their doors with it, that the destroying angel might leave their houses untouch'd when he pass'd by to destroy the first-born of Egypt, and execute the divine vengeance on their gods, whether it were their princes, who in the language of scripture are often called gods, or those animals which that superstitious nation did worship. This blood upon their door-posts was to be their safe-guard, seeing all those, which were found unsprinkled with it, were to be liable to the common calamity, as well as those who should be caught stragling out of their houses during that whole night. In memory of that great deliverance, they were to keep this feast of unleavened bread seven days, that is, from the 14th day at even, until the 21st day at even; during which, whosoever was found among them eating of leavened bread, whether he was an Israelite or a stranger, was to be cut off from Israel, that is, was either to be put to immediate death, or be cut off by the hand of providence; or lastly, be excommunicated, and thereby rescinded from all the promises made to the seed of Abraham. The first and last of these seven days were to be kept holy, and free from all manner of work. Lastly, no stranger was to be admitted to eat of the passover, unless he first consented to be circumcised. As for the Israelites, they were strictly to remember this great and glorious night, and to instruct their children in the meaning of this institution, that they might likewise perpetuate the memory of it to future ages.

THE people, whom so many dire judgments on the Egyptians had render'd more tractable, received Moses's orders with the utmost respect; and, having paid their adoration to God, went to put themselves in readiness to execute them. These com-your all the rest of the fruit, and which he removed about the 9th day (30).

The month Abib, which hitherto was the seventh month, was from this time forward made the first month of the whole year (31), for a memorial of their departure out of Egypt; from the beginning of which month the Epocha of the Jewish calendar is from thence forward deduced (32), though the end of the former account fell on the middle of the month.

Upon the 10th day of the seventh, and now first month, which was the 30th of April according to the Julian calendar upon Thursday, was instituted the feast of the passover, and unleavened bread, the paschal lamb was then chosen and killed the fourth day after (33).

Moses now brings upon them the ninth plague of three days darkness (34); and upon the 14th day, which was May the 4th, upon Monday with us, and was the last time he spoke with Pharaoh, Moses foretold him the tenth plague which should come upon him, namely, the destruction of all the first-born, which came to pass the night following, and then, turning him about in great anger, departed from him (35). At the evening of this day was the passover celebrated (36).

(K) This month, which is called in the Hebrew Abib, and had been 'till then the seventh month, and continued so to be in the secular year, because from that day forward the first month of the sacred year, in memory of this wonderful departure out of the land of Egypt (37); and from the beginning of this month the Epocha of the Jewish or sacred calendar was from thence forward deduced, though the end of the former account fell on the middle of the month (38).

(30) Exod. x. 4 ad 19.

(33) Exod. xii. 3 ad 21.

(36) Ibid. xii. ad v. 28.

Vid. Uss. Ann. p. 14.

(31) Exod. xii. 2. & xiii. 4.

(34) Ibid. x. 21, & seq.

(37) Exod. xii. 2. with xiii. 4.

(32) Numb. ix. 1, 2. Coll. c. Exod. xl. 17.

(35) Ibid. v. 25 ad 29, & c. xi. 1, 4, 8.

(38) Numb. ix. 1, 2. with Exod. xl. 17.

- a mands may be properly reduced to three heads, viz. First, to gather themselves from all the corners of the kingdom into the land of Goshen; it being unreasonable to suppose that such a vast multitude, amounting to upwards of two millions and a half of souls, as we have elsewhere shewn *, could be all contained in that little spot of ground; so that it required no small dispatch to communicate the orders of their departure to them all. Secondly, To get all the rich things they could from the Egyptians; and this required secrecy, since it is not probable that the Egyptians would have prov'd so generous, if they had suspected that this journey was any other than a religious one, that was to last but a few days. Thirdly, to eat the passover at the time, and with all the ceremonies that had been prescribed; and this was to
- b take up some time, four days at least. However, providence so ordered it, that they were all ready on that night. And the Psalmist tells us †, that, notwithstanding the great number of their old men, women and children, there was not one feeble person among all their tribes.

- THE night, which was to prove so joyful to them, and so fatal to their enemies, being come, and God's commands being punctually obeyed, whilst both sides were in the extremest tranquillity, the Egyptians thinking now all the plagues past, and Pharaoh flattering himself that Moses's threatening against the first-born had proved abortive, because four days were elapsed since it was denounced, whereas he used to give him but one day's warning in the former plagues; and on the
- c other hand the Israelites keeping themselves in the profoundest silence, knowing what horrid slaughter was to be made among the Egyptians; in the middle I say of that very night, God sent his destroying ministers, who suddenly dispersed them-
The first-born of the Egyptians slain by the destroying angel.
 selves all over the kingdom, and smote all the first-born with immediate death, from the first-born who sat on Pharaoh's throne, to the first-born of the imprisoned captive, and even to that of the meanest animal in the land. What tongue or pen can describe the horror and amazement, the dreadful outcries, and mournful groans of that unhappy nation, where every house, none excepted, had one or more dead, and, which was still worse, a first-born, the stay and hope of the family (L). How much more dismal must the proud monarch's condition be, who not only
- d shar'd in the common affliction, but saw his palace besieged by crowds of his unhappy subjects, who upbraided him with being the cause of all these dire calamities! The first expedient he could think of, was to send immediately for Moses and Aaron, Moses and Aaron sent for and ordered to depart.
 who being settled at Rameses, not far from his capital city, were soon brought to him, and found the frightened king, instead of his usual threatening and upbraidings, urgent and pressing for their departure out of his dominions with their children, cattle, and all they had, and to have them go and sacrifice to their God, and implore his mercy for him in their prayers. The Egyptians likewise were no less impatient to see their backs, fearing lest every minute of their stay should prove the last of their own lives. The Israelites found them as ready to lend them the most va-
- e luable things they had, as themselves were to borrow them, and Moses, who was too well acquainted with Pharaoh's changeable temper to stay 'till he relaxed, made all the haste he could to get out of his reach, and having settled the best order he could among that vast multitude, and in the general confusion that then reign'd, he gave the signal for their departure long before break of day. Leaving therefore the Egyptians to mourn for their dead, and loaden with their spoils, they began their march under the conduct of providence, and of his servant Moses, being to the number of six hun-
The number of the Israelites that went out of Egypt.
 dred thousand men able to bear arms, besides old men, women and children, servants
- f first coming thither, to this very day, which was the same day of the same month

* Vid. sup. p. 473. Not. B.

† Pl. cv. 36.

(L) This at least seems to have been the case, as well from Moses's own words, who tells us that there was not one house in which there was not one dead (39), as from his command to all the families of the Israelites to sprinkle their door-posts with the blood of the paschal lamb; but if it be asked how it can be supposed that every house had a first-born, we answer that the Hebrew בכור Behor being often used to imply some excellency in persons who were not really first-born, as in Ephraim, it will be more reasonable to suppose that, where a family had no first-born, the principal person was smitten with death (40), than to suppose with some Jews and Christians, that Moses's words are only applicable to every house that had a first-born (41), or with St. Austin, that providence did so order it at this time, that every house had a first-born (42).

(39) Exod. xii. 30.

(40) CAJET. JUN. WILLET, & al. in loc.

(41) ABEN EZRA, HUG. S.

VICTOR.

(42) Quest. 44. in Exod.

and week, viz. Monday*, the space of two hundred and fifteen years, though Moses's<sup>a</sup> computing it, from the first coming of Abraham into Canaan, reckons it four hundred and thirty years, as has been already shewn*. There was yet one main thing wanting, viz. the securing of a sufficient quantity of provisions for all that multitude, and perhaps they expected to have had time enough to have got it before their march, but the Egyptians drove them away with such desperate eagerness, that the people were forced to carry their paste with them unleavened, with which they baked themselves cakes upon the coals; and what other provision they could get, they took with them undressed, and marched from Rameses, Moses's dwelling place, to their first encampment at Succoth†. Josephus tells us‡, that their dough and other victuals, which they carried from Egypt, lasted them a whole month; but it is not likely that they would load themselves with a whole month's provision, which in all probability they knew not how to preserve so long from stinking, when they had so much better things to carry out of the spoils of the Egyptians. As soon as they were arrived at Succoth, Moses made them encamp according to their tribes and families, which was likewise the order in which they had been directed to march, and of which we shall give a fuller account in the sequel. It is to be observed here, that the distance from Rameses to the utmost borders of Egypt, on the side of the land of Canaan, was not much above threescore miles, so that Moses could in a few days march have brought them out of Pharaoh's territories, yet God did so order it, that they were full forty years before they set their foot upon the borders of the promised land.

Their first encampment.

The first-born of Israel consecrated.

The law concerning it.

Joseph's bones carried out of Egypt.

WHILST they continued at Succoth, Moses was commanded by God to consecrate unto him all the first-born of men and beasts, as of right belonging to him. The first-born of men were to be redeemed at the price of five shekels, namely, that of the sanctuary, which was worth double the common one, that is, about two shillings and six-pence; so that the whole sum amounted to about twelve shillings and six-pence; which money was afterwards to be given to the priests. This redemption was founded not only upon the right which God has over all his creatures, but more particularly upon the account of his having spared the first-born of the Israelites, when he smote those of the Egyptians, which was as it were the seal and finishing stroke of his wonderful judgments on that tyrannic nation. This law, concerning the first-born of men, did not at all regard the women; for if the first-fruits of a marriage prov'd a female, no redemption was to be paid for her. Secondly, as to that of beasts, it extended only to the clean, the unclean ones were to be either redeemed by a clean one, as an ass by a lamb, or to be killed and flung away. They were ordered to teach the reason of this law of redemption to their children and grand-children, that their posterity might never be at a loss to account for it, nor the wonders which were wrought in favour of them be forgot. Among all the other cares which Moses and Aaron had, they did not forget to bring Joseph's coffin and bones with them, pursuant to the oath which that patriarch had exacted from them. The Jews tell us, they placed them in a new sumptuous cart, or open hearse, which they made to march under the guard and conduct of the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh his two children‡. They likewise affirm, that every tribe did bring the bones of the heads of their family with them; but though they are not always to be credited in matters of this nature (M), and Josephus doth not seem to have remember'd any such an act of filial piety, or else he would in all probability have recorded it, yet St. Stephen seems to allude to some such tradition among them, when he said, that Jacob and the fathers went down and died in Egypt, and were car-

* USHER's Ann. p. 14.    * Vid. supra p. 425. (K.)    * Exod. xii. p. tot.    * Antiq. lib. ii. c. 15.    † Vid. Elle Shemoth Rabbab. Sect. וְאֵת הַבְּרִיחַ & Rabbim. mult.

(M) We have already given an account out of the Elle Shemoth Rabbab, of the extraordinary care which the Egyptians took, by the advice of their magicians, to bury Joseph's coffin, where the Israelites should never be able to come at it †. The same comment adds, that whilst these were taken up with spoiling the Egyptians, Moses had been three or four days seeking for it, and that at length, when he began to despair of finding it, an old woman, whom he met by the Nile's side, told him that it was in the bottom of that river, near the place where they stood; but, that the heavy coffin was sunk so deep by that time, that it would be absolutely impossible for him to fish it out. Whereupon Moses having addressed himself to God in a short prayer, and then called aloud to the patriarch Joseph, reminding him of his prophecy, and the oath which he had exacted from them about his bones, the coffin swam to the shore, and Moses having tied a rope round the middle of it, and put his staff through, threw it across his shoulder, and marched away to Rameses with it.

† Vid. supra p. 467. Not. W.

- a ried over into Sychem, and laid in the sepulchre which Abraham bought of the sons of Emmor *. However that were, Moses had still another care, which was to settle the order of their march in so regular a method, that there might be no confusion or squabble among that vast and mix'd multitude, and that they might be ready to face about and stand in their own defence, in case of a pursuit (N), or of their meeting with any difficulty or obstruction from the nations through whose territories they were to pass. To prevent therefore these, or any other accidents which might make the people run resty, and take it into their heads to return to Egypt, God was pleased to forbid Moses to take the nearest way to the land of Canaan, which was through that of the Philistines, and ordered him to wheel about b along the coasts of the red-sea towards Arabia-petrea. He likewise made them march not like runaways in confusion and disorder, but like a regular army in battle-array, in which order they went from Succoth to Etham, towards Arabia-deserta, which is therefore called in the original the wilderness, near the borders of which Etham was situate, where they arrived on the second day after their departure out of Egypt. This rout Moses seems to have chosen, designing probably to get to mount Sinai by the point of the red-sea<sup>1</sup>; but God made him take another on the next day, and to turn towards Pi-habiroth, which lies between the red-sea and Migdol and Baal-zephon (O). And here God was pleased to shew his care for them in a new miraculous manner ;

Orders of their march.
Second encampment.

* Acts vii. 15, 16.

<sup>1</sup> Exod. xiii. p. tot.

(N) The word, which our version renders harnessed in the text, and by five in a rank in the margin, is in the original חֲמִשָּׁה בְּרֶגֶל Chamushim, which cannot well be rendered literally in English, it signifying properly five or fifty, or disposed in a fifth order or manner, or in some way that has relation to the number five, and has puzzled most expositors, both Jewish and Christians. Some understanding it of their going חֲמִשָּׁה צֻרִים, or five in a rank (43), which would have made it such a defile in that numerous army, as would have taken up near an hundred miles in length, according to Oleaster's computation; others of their being armed with five different sorts of weapons (44); which is monstrous, since that were enough to have made them sink under the weight of them. Besides, it is not at all probable that the Egyptians would have suffered them to carry any arms with them, except what they took by stealth, and therefore the vulgar version, which translates it armed, cannot be maintained, much less that of the septuagint, which renders it by חֲמִשָּׁה יָמִים, the fifth generation, it neither being agreeable to the Hebrew, nor indeed true in fact. Those who render it that they marched in five columns, four of which consisted of three tribes, whilst Moses and the elders marched in the fifth, and in the center of all the rest (45), are still more out of the way, the thing being impracticable in those mountainous parts. As for those who translate it in battle array (46) they must confine the word to the six hundred thousand fighting men, for as for the women, children, and mix'd multitude that went with them, which was at least three times as numerous, they cannot be supposed to have marched in that regular military way. The best reading therefore seems to be that of Kimebi and Pagninus, that they went accincti, girded or trussed up. The word Chamushim being most likely derived from elemesh, the fifth rib, which is the place of girding, and is often used in that sense. But be the meaning of the word what it will, it is certain from Moses's account that their march was more like that of a disciplined army, than that of a band of fugitive slaves.

(O) We know but little of the geography of all these places. As for the Succoth here mentioned, we must not confound it with that which Jacob called by that name when he came out of Mesopotamia (47), tho' the former may have been so called in imitation of the latter, upon account of the booths or tents which the Israelites set up there. Josephus calls it Latopolis, where he says Babylon was afterwards built, when Cambyfes invaded Egypt (48). It is thought by many to be that region which was called Trogloditis, by the red-sea (49). As for Rameses, though there seems to be mention made of two, and they differently pointed, yet if they differ at all, it is only that the one was a province and the other the chief city of it (50). Etham is supposed to be Buthe of Herodotus. And Pi-habiroth, the city of Heron on the extreme part of the Arabic gulph, or the Phagroriopolis placed by Strabo (51) near the same place. All that we know of Migdol is only that it signifies a tower, Baal-zephon seems wholly unknown to the ancient geographers. The Jewish Rabbies, and after them Grotius, believe it to have been an idol set up to guard the confines of Egypt. The former add, that it was a brazen dog, and that it discovered the flight of the Israelites by its barking. The truth is, they are too apt to give into etymologies, though they are known to be the most uncertain and fallacious helps; for according to them Baal-zephon signifies either the Hidden Lord, the Northern Lord, the Centinel Lord, or in a more figurative way, the Lord, or keeper of secrets. But who can depend upon such wild fancies? Eusebius takes it, not for a statue, but a town, and places it (52) near Chysma, though St. Jerom has omitted it in his translation. It stood, according to him, on the most northern point of the red-sea, where the ancients, especially the Jews, think the Israelites passed it, and where there stands to this day a Christian monastery (53).

(43) THEODORE. A. MONTAN. & al.

(44) Rabbin. aliquot ap. MUNST in loc.

(45) R. AB.

SEPHARAD.

(46) JUN. SIMLER, & al.

(47) Gen. xxxiii. 17.

(48) Ant. lib. ii. 15.

(49) Vid. SIMLER, WILLET.

(50) Id. ibid.

(51) Lib. xiv. ap. CALM. Dissert. in loc. & WIL-

LET in loc. (52) Loc. Hebr.

(53) Vid. CALM. Hist. V. T. Comm. in Exod. xiv. & Dissert.

on the passage of the red-sea. RADZIVIL RHELAND & al.

The miraculous pillar of fire and smoke.

They are led by the miraculous pillar.

GOD makes them wheel about towards Pi-hahiroth.

Pharaoh pursues after,

and over-takes them.

Moses comforts the despairing Israelites.

for though he might have notified to them when and whither to march, or where to halt and encamp, as he did his other commands, by the mouth of Moses and Aaron, yet considering the untractableness of the people's temper, and how apt they would be to murmur against them at every supposed wrong step, he condescended to conduct them himself by a more visible way, namely, by a pillar of light in the night-season, and by a column of smoke in the day-time. This column of fire, which served to them instead of the light of the sun, as well as that of smoke, which directed them in the day-time, never forsook them during their forty years wandering in the wilderness; but was their constant conductor throughout their forty-two encampments, and directed them when and whither to march, according as they saw it move before them, or when and where to halt when they perceived it to stop. But whether it was given to them at their first, second, or third march, at Succoth or Etham, is not easy to guess at by the text.

It was natural for them, as we hinted before, to have gone from Etham round the cape of the red-sea, and marching a-cross the wilderness, to have gained the east-border of Jordan, and so to have reached to mount Sinai; and this seems to have been what Moses aimed at, probably with an intention to have offered up some sacrifices there, agreeably to what God had formerly told him, when he was sending him into Egypt; but God, who knew what was transacting at Pharaoh's court, and what measures that monarch, and his no less infatuated subjects, were taking to pursue, and bring them back by main force, commanded them to wheel about, and to march from Etham towards Pi-hahiroth; which is between the sea and Migdol, over-against Baalzephon; and to encamp before it. For by this time the Egyptians began to repent of their too great easiness in parting with the Israelites, and losing the benefit of their servitude, and in hopes that they might easily catch them intangled between the mountains, and fatigued with their march, had prepared a considerable army, together with six hundred of their choicest chariots, besides all the chariots of war that could be found in Egypt, and a vast multitude of officers and soldiers, who were all in full march after them. Moses has not given us any further particulars concerning that army; but Josephus who seldom fails to improve the text, whenever it makes for the honour of his nation, makes it amount to six hundred chariots, fifty thousand horse, and two hundred thousand foot<sup>a</sup>, and Ezekiel, the poet quoted by Eusebius, hath increased the whole to a million of men. But whatever the army was, Pharaoh put himself at the head of it, and led it with such speed, that he overtook them at Pi-hahiroth, and incamped there in full sight of the Israelites; but whether it were that his army was too much fatigued with their march, or that he thought himself sure of them, there being no visible way for them to escape him, unless they flung themselves into the sea; or lastly, that providence prevented his immediate falling upon them; Moses assures us, that nothing hostile was undertaken against them that night. It is however most likely that seeing them hemmed as it were by sea on one hand, by impassable mountains, and his own army on the other, and for want of arms, as well as courage, as incapable of fighting, as they were of flying, Pharaoh might think it more advisable to force them to yield themselves prisoners by famine, than to cut them in pieces, as he might easily have done, since by the one he reduced them to their former slavery, but by the other he ran the risque of losing a considerable part of them.

On the other hand, the pusillanimous Israelites, inured to bondage, and strangers to the valuable blessings of freedom, could not behold the Egyptian army incamped so near, without the utmost consternation and dread; so that instead of having recourse to that mighty arm, that had so visibly stretched itself in their favour, they ran in a tumultuous manner to Moses's tent, and asked him, whether he thought that there were not graves enough in Egypt, seeing he had brought them to be butchered in the wilderness? and whether it would not have been much better for them to have continued under their Egyptian slavery, which how cruel soever, they had often told him, was preferable to the danger of falling into the hands of their cruel tyrants after such a flight, since it was plain now that they had nothing to expect but the most cruel death, in that dismal place. However, this ungrateful language, to which Moses had already been used, tho' nothing so much as he was afterwards, rather moved his pity than his anger. He consider'd it as the effect of their extreme danger and cowardly temper, and, instead of upbraiding them with it, comforted them with the assurance that this would be the last time of their seeing the Egyptians. He exhorted them to stand still, and see the hand of God fight for them, instead of provoking him to withdraw it by their unreasonable murmurings and despair.

<sup>a</sup> Ibid. v. ult.

<sup>b</sup> Ant. I. ii. c. 15.

- a He had no sooner dismissed them, than he went and made his application to God, who was immediately pleased to order the people to begin their march towards the sea, directing him at the same time to stretch out his rod over it, and assuring him that the waters of it would forthwith divide themselves, and make way for them to go through it as on dry land; whilst Pharaoh and his whole army, venturing to pursue them, should be finally overwhelmed by its waves. Moses obeyed, and whilst a strong east-wind was dividing that arm of the sea, to open a passage to them, and the Israelites were beginning their march towards it, the angel of the Lord, who conducted them in the pillar of fire, removed from the front to the rear of their army, and stood between them and that of the Egyptians, that Pharaoh might not be sensible of their moving, and prevent it by falling upon them too suddenly. The column of fire produced a double effect, giving light to the Israelites in their march, and casting a darkness over Pharaoh's camp, to prevent his perceiving what was doing in that of the Hebrews. Whilst these were passing through the sea, the sacred historian tells us, that the waves arose in heaps and stood as a wall on each side of them (P). By this time the
- The red sea is divided.*
- b

(P) It will not doubtless be expected that we should here enter into a detail of all the various and endless questions with which the generality of commentators have amused themselves, with respect to this wonderful passage, concerning which Moses has left us wholly in the dark. But we cannot at the same time reasonably dispense ourselves from making a short enquiry into the main and most material point, namely, whether it was really miraculous or not; that is, whether the sea was really divided by a supernatural power, or whether Moses and his host did only coast some part of it, or, at best, cross only a small nook at low water, and timed it so well that Pharaoh, endeavouring to do the like, did perish in the attempt. This is so far from being a new question, that Artapanes, an antient writer (54) assures us, that both these opinions were held by the Egyptian priests; that is, the former by those of Heliopolis, and the latter by those of Memphis. The last of these has been also followed by many eminent men both Jews and Christians (55), who, without denying the main part of this transaction to be miraculous, have fallen into the notion of the Israelites not passing through the sea, but only coasting it along, and making it as it were a semicircle round the sea-shore at low ebb or crossing it only at one narrow point, whilst the sea was gone off, only to extricate themselves from some difficulties which appeared to them insurmountable: but which we shall forbear inserting here, because they would lead us too far, and swell this note to an unreasonable bulk. We shall therefore content ourselves with observing, that such an opinion cannot be maintained without a manifest deviation, 1st, from the express words of Moses, and several other places of holy writ, where this transaction is mentioned: 2. from reason and experience, founded upon the knowledge we have of the ebbing and flowing of the red-sea, and the impossibility of such a numerous host's performing such a coasting, or crossing, in so little a time as that admits of: 3. from the known character of Moses as a bare historian, and from some concurring testimonies of antiquity to his account: and lastly from the far greater majority of authors of all religions and ages, who have all along maintained, and some of them proved the contrary opinion. As to the first, nothing is plainer than that the whole tenor of Moses's account is point blank contrary to such a notion. We need mention but some few passages of it; such as, that upon his stretching out his rod by God's command over the waters, a mighty wind arose and divided them; that they stood up on heaps, and were as a wall on the right and left; that the bottom of the sea was dried up, and that the Israelites marched through it as on dry land, and the like (56). That God divided the red-sea into parts, or divisions, and made Israel pass through the midst of it. That he led them by the right hand of Moses, dividing the waters before them, to make himself an everlasting name; and that he led them through the deep as an horse in the wilderness. That he did walk, or rather caused Israel to walk, through the sea (57); and many more of the like nature, to say nothing of the apocryphal books, which abound with the same expressions. If it be objected, that the last quoted passages out of the psalms and prophets are poetical, and consequently not to be taken in their literal sense, all that can be inferred from thence is, that they convey to us loftier ideas of this wonderful event, than Moses, whose style is far from being swollen, has done in his account of it; but it would be unreasonable to say, that they were only designed to express a transaction so purely natural and easy, as the other side supposes it to have been. Upon the whole, the scriptures representing this action, with all its circumstances, as altogether miraculous, men must either reject their authority, or else allow that this passage was more than a bare coasting along some part of the sea, or crossing it at some narrow nook, when the waters were retired.

Whether Josephus designed to lessen the miracle, or to make it appear more credible, when he tells us (58), that the Pamphiliæ sea did open a way to Alexander in his expedition against the Persians, is not very material; for though we should grant that to be the right meaning of his words, and that he might have met with that account in some book then extant; or even that Q. Curtius intimates something like it, when he says (59), that that conqueror had opened a new way by the sea; yet Strabo will soon set us right, who tells us, that there is a hill upon the Pamphiliæ sea, called Chymar, by which there is a passage along the sea shore; the waters of it so abating, when the sea is calm and still, that the ground is left naked, which at the flowing of the waters is covered again; and that Alexander, coming that

(54) Ap. EUSEB. l. iv. c. 27. (55) MAIMON. ARENEZ. & al. Rabbin. ap. FAGIUM. GREGOR. TURON. Hist. l. i. c. 10. T. AQUIN. in 1 Cor. i. TOSTAT. qu. in Exod. xiv. Ch. xix. LUD. BURGENSE in loc. GENEBR. in Chronic. ad ann. 2239. GROT. in ver. 19. Exod. xiv. VATAB. in loc. LE CLERC Differt. de trajeâ. Mar. Idum. & al. mult. (56) Exod. xiv. & xv. pass. Num. Deuteron. &c. (57) Ps. cxxxvi. 13, 14. & alib. Isa. lxiii. 12, 13. Habak. iii. 15. (58) Ant. l. ii. c. 16. (59) Lib. v.

Egyptians, perceiving that the Israelites were marching off, and that the cloud which a

* that way, set forward before the waters returned; but that, it happening then to be winter, the waters recoiling before he had past it, he was forced to wade all that day through the waters up to his middle (60). 'Tis plain therefore, that there is no parity between the passage of the Israelites, and the coasting of Alexander, whatever the Jewish historian's design might be in mentioning them together.

2. We come now 2dly, to shew that the notion of Moses leading them along the sea-shore, or through a narrow point, is contrary to reason and experience. And here we do readily grant, that the red sea doth ebb and flow like other seas that have a communication with the ocean; that is, that the waters of it rise towards the shore during six hours, and after having continued about one quarter of an hour at high water, they ebb down again during another six hours. Those, who have examined it with the greatest exactness, do likewise assure us, that the greatest distance, that it falls from the place of high water, is about three hundred yards, and that during the time of low water one may safely travel it (61), as some have actually done (62). We purposely omit several other minute circumstances urged on both sides of this question, to avoid prolixity. But from what is here premised and allowed on all hands, it is evident that these three hundred paces, which the sea leaves uncovered, during the time of low water, can continue so but during the space of half an hour at most; for during the first six hours the sea doth only retire by degrees, and in less than half an hour it begins again to flow towards the shore. The most therefore that can be allowed both of time, and space of passable ground, in a moderate computation, is about two hundred paces during six hours, or one hundred and fifty paces during eight hours. Now it is plain, that a multitude consisting at least of upwards of two millions and half of men, women, children and slaves, as we have proved it before †, encumbered besides with great quantities of cattle, household-stuff, and the spoils of the Egyptians, could never perform such a march within so short, we may say, within even double that space, though we should allow them also double the breadth of ground to do it on. This argument will hold equally good against those who suppose that they only coasted along some part of the sea, and those who maintain that they crossed that small arm or point of it, which is towards the further end near the port of Suez, seeing that six or eight hours could not have sufficed for the passage of so immense a multitude, allow them what breadth of room you will; much less for Pharaoh's entering so far into it with his whole host.

It will not be amiss here to observe, not only how improbable it is that the Egyptians should be all ignorant of the ebbing and flowing of the sea; but how absurd it is to suppose, that they should all obstinately persist in pursuing the Israelites through it, when they perceived it, as they must have done, gradually returning upon them, till they were all swallowed up by it. Besides, who can suppose that the Israelites venturing into the sea was a premeditated thing? or even that Moses could entertain the least suspicion that the Egyptians would be so soon at their heels, they who had been so lately and so severely plagued for detaining them, and were so urgent for their departure? Sure it is, that if he had any such thought, he acted most impolitically, in bringing them into a place, where they were hemmed in by the sea on one hand, and the mountains on the other; seeing, had Pharaoh, upon his arrival at Pi-babirah, immediately fallen upon them, as it was natural to expect, they must have been obliged to flounce into the sea long before the tide had opened a passage to them, if not at the very time of high water, in which case they must have been all either drowned or cut in pieces.

3. And this brings us to our third observation, that such a notion is repugnant to the known character of Moses, even as a bare historian; and that it calls in question, not only his avowed modesty and veracity, but even his sense, conduct, and experience. For on the one hand, who can imagine that the maintainers of it can pay any regard to his relation, when he tells them, that God alone, who knew what past in Egypt, did unexpectedly make them take this new rout? When he describes his own surprise and the people's consternation at the sight of the Egyptian army? When he assures them that God did interpose his miraculous power on their behalf, and in a word that he divided the sea to make a free passage for them, and to overwhelm their enemies? What notion must they have of his sincerity, when he makes all Israel resound the praises of God, as the sole author of a deliverance which was entirely owing to his own cunning and policy. On the other hand, what must they think of his conduct and experience, that could be guilty of such an oversight, as leading them into the very mouth of the extremest danger, and so weak as to betray it, though cloaked with the pretence of a miraculous power and direction? We shall only add, that he must have been the most imprudent, and withal the most conceited man alive, that could take into his head, to make such a vast, and not over credulous multitude, believe that their passage was altogether as miraculous as he affirms it to have been, when they could not but be well assured of the contrary; much less appoint a solemn festival of seven days, and enjoin it to be observed by them and their posterity to all future ages, in memory of their pretended miraculous passing through the sea; when the experience of a much shorter time, than they continued along that coast, could easily have convinced them that there was nothing in it but what was natural, and what happened every day. These absurd consequences, which naturally flow from that opinion, are so evident, and the system itself has been so fully confuted long ago by the learned Diodorus Tarsensis, Chrysostom's master, that it hath met with few more advocates, than these we have mentioned in the margin. And even among these, we have already observed, that the greatest part, especially Grotius and Le Clerc, do acknowledge still, that a divine power interposed itself in raising and continuing that mighty wind, and causing thereby the waters to retire much further than usual, and to recoil with greater force upon the Egyptians.

We observed further on this head, that this opinion was contrary to several concurring testimonies of antiquity. We have already mentioned that of Josephus, and of the Heliopolites, who acknowledged the miraculousness of this transaction, and whose authority ought to be of greater weight than that of the Memphites, because such an acknowledgment of the divine interposing power can be ascribed to nothing but the force of truth, and notoriety of the fact, whatever motives

(60) STRAB. lib. xiv. vid. VILLET. in Exod. xiv. 17.
(62) THEVEN. chap. 25. † Vid. supr. p. 473. a. b.

(61) BARNIER, MORIZON. & al.

- a conducted them was removed towards the sea, resolved upon a close pursuit after them; not considering, or perhaps dreaming, that they were launching into another element; much less could they suppose that it would prove as fatal to them, as it was friendly to those whom they so eagerly followed after. For it doth not appear by the text, that the Egyptians were sensible that they were entering into the sea, and it is more than probable that they were too eager after their pursuit, and had too little light to perceive the danger they were running into, unless we will suppose with the Jewish historian, * that because they saw the Israelites march safely through the sea, they vainly hoped they might do so too, and were not undeceived till it was too late. However that were, 'tis plain that
- b their insolent conduct, after so many warnings, did justly deserve the punishment they were shortly to undergo; for by the next morning-watch, that is, by break of day, which is about four in the morning with us, God, looking upon them through the pillar of fire, soon let them feel that such a miraculous way was not opened in their favour, but for their destruction. They began to find their chariots go more and more heavily, and had so many indications of God's fighting against them, as made them resolve upon turning about, and fleeing from those whom they so eagerly pursued. But all their haste could not save them, God com-
They are all drowned.
- c manded Moses to stretch again his rod over the sea, and he had no sooner obeyed, but the waves, which had been till then miraculously suspended, fell in again by their own weight, and overwhelmed Pharaoh and his host, so that not one of them escaped from the common ruin; whilst the Israelites beholding, with wonder and amazement, the carcases and the rich spoils of their enemies thrown upon the sea-shore, began, at least for the present, to fear the Lord, and to believe his servant Moses.

We took notice in a former note, that the exact situation of the places, from which the Israelites set out at their entering into the sea, and at which they came out, are so much unknown to us, that it is next to impossible to describe their rout with any tolerable certainty *. For should we so far depend upon Eusebius, as to believe Baalzephon to have been Clyfma, and that the ancient tradition
The place where they crossed the red-sea uncertain.

d were true, that it was at this latter that they passed the sea; yet the generality of geographers differ so much in their placing it, that we are still to seek for the side on which it stood, whether on the north, on the east, or south, or west

* Jos. Ant. lib. 2. c. 16.

* Exod. xiv. per tot.

* Vid. sup. p. 503. note (O).

tives their brethren of Memphis might have to disown it. We shall content ourselves with just mentioning one more. Diodorus Siculus (63) tells us, that the Ichthyophagi, who inhabited along the coasts of the red-sea, towards the further end of it, had a constant tradition, that that sea had formerly been divided by a strong wind; and that the waves being parted into two heaps, the bottom, which was left naked, had appeared full of verdure. This can hardly be applicable to any thing but to this transaction we are upon.

4. We have dwelt so long upon the three first heads, that we hope we shall be easily excused from enlarging further on this last, by multiplying authorities on our side of the question, seeing what has been alledged against the other is so full and strong, that were the majority as much on their side, as it is on ours, yet would it not outweigh the arguments that have been brought to confute it.

We shall only add, that among those who acknowledge a divine power to have interposed in this signal transaction, some have endeavoured to reduce the miracle into a very narrow compass, whilst others, setting no bounds to their zeal, have multiplied it even beyond all measure.

Of the former sort are those who have attributed the dividing of the sea, and the standing up of the waves, to a vehement cold wind, which froze them as fast as it blew them up; after which a warmer one, being suffered to rise, did both thaw and blow them into their former station. Of this sentiment were, 1. the seventy interpreters, who translated the words of Moses's song (64) וַיִּפְּץ יְהוָה בְּרוּחַ קָדְשׁוֹ, the waters were frozen, or, as our version words it, were congealed. 2. The Chaldee paraphrast. 3. The author of the book of Judith (65). 4. Some of the versions of the septuagint; and lastly, among the many moderns, father Martianay, in a specimen he has given us of some curious discoveries which he had made in the sacred text, mentions this as one of them, that the waters of the red-sea were frozen. A Jewish Rabbi has fancied that the sea was not divided but frozen hard enough for the Israelites to go over it, though it thawed under their pursuers (66). On the other hand, Origen, to magnify this great miracle, has preserved us an ancient tradition among the Jews, which affirms, that God opened the sea in twelve different columns, that every tribe might pass separately; in which he has been followed by several ancient and modern writers. This tradition seems to have been founded upon that verse of the psalm (67), which says, that God divided the sea into parts, or divisions; but we don't think such ill grounded fancies worth mentioning, much less that of Sadulius, who goes so far as to think that God did even overturn the rocks, and root up the plants that grew in the bottom of the sea, lest they should obstruct the quick passage of the Israelites.

(63) Lib. iii. c. 3.

(64) Exod. xv. 8.

(65) Judith v. 13.

(66) R. SAM. MAROC.

Lib. de Advent. Messiae, c. 15.

(67) Psalm. cxxxvi. 13.

shore of the Arabick gulph†. For which reason, we hope the reader will excuse us a from giving into uncertain conjectures. Those who can give credit to the report of several grave travellers, * who affirm from their own knowledge, that the ruts of the chariot-wheels are still miraculously preserved, not only upon the sand, but even as far into the sea as the eye can see through it, notwithstanding all endeavours to deface them, which they attribute to a petrifying quality in the waters of the sea ; these, I say, need not be at a loss where to set the boundaries of that passage. As for us we are contented with having proved in the last note, that they passed it some where without troubling ourselves with what is of less moment, and can never be known with any probability. We return to the Israelites, whom we left rejoicing and praising God for their happy escape. b

Moses's song
for this deliverance.

HOWEVER Moses knew them too well, to hope that this religious fit would last longer than every thing went to their liking. He therefore took hold of this happy disposition he observed in them, to celebrate this miraculous victory, and to inspire them with the deepest sentiments of gratitude to their almighty deliverer. To this end he composed a hymn, in which he extols the greatness of God's power displayed in this signal victory, and his amazing mercy towards his people: And having divided the Israelites into two great choirs, he placed himself and his brother Aaron at the head of the men, and his sister Miriam at the head of the women, and whilst the former did sing the canticle, the women answered alternately to each verse, with repeating the first words of it, I will sing c to the Lord, for he has greatly triumphed, and has overthrown the horse and its rider into the sea. Their musick was likewise accompanied with dances, and the sound of such instruments as they had brought with them from Egypt. Thus was the seven days festival, which had been ordained in memory of this signal deliverance, joyfully concluded, and the first and last day of it, which were to be observed with more than usual solemnity, signalized the one by the death of the Egyptian first-born, and the last by their miraculous passage through the red-sea, and the total overthrow of Pharaoh and his host.

The Israelites murmur for want of water.

AND now the Israelites began to think themselves freed indeed, and on the eve of their compleat happiness ; a few days march would easily bring them into d the borders of the promised land, and the conquest of it could not but appear easy to them, who had God for their protector, and Moses for their guide. And indeed, had the latter had no other difficulties to surmount, than the ruggedness of the way, and the irreconcilable hatred, and vigorous opposition of those warlike nations that inhabited it, Canaan would soon have been in their possession. But their stubborn and ungrateful temper, their continual murmurings and rebellions against their heaven-appointed chief, joined to an invincible fondness for idolatry and superstition, proved not only a constant obstacle to their hopes, but an endless source of misfortunes to them, and of grief and vexation to their leader, though otherwise famed above all men for his meek and gentle disposi- e tion. It was not long before they began to give fresh marks of their untractableness. They had scarce travelled three days from the red-sea into the wilderness of Shur, before their excessive thirst, and want of water, put them out of all patience ; infomuch, that when they came to discover those of Marab, and found them too bitter to drink, instead of having recourse to God by prayer, they filled the air with their complaints against him and his servant Moses, who, fearing the ill consequence of this murmuring, addressed himself to him in the humblest manner, and was directed to a tree, which, whether by any intrinsic virtue, or by a new miracle, did sweeten the waters as soon as he had cast it in. The people indeed ceased to murmur as soon as they had quenched their thirst ; but as this f was neither a satisfaction for their late riot, nor a security against future relapses, God was pleased to make a further trial of their future obedience, by giving them here some new statutes, and to add a promise, that if they observed them with an upright mind, instead of those plagues which he had inflicted on the Egyptians, he would shower down continual blessings upon them. In memory of the bitter waters, the place was called Marab ; from which they went and encamped at Elim, where they found twelve fountains of water and seventy palm-trees, and there continued about three weeks ; that is, from the twenty second † Compare EUSEB. loc. Habr. ATHANAS. Hist. ARRIANOR. Tom. I. p. 385. PHILOSTORGO. Hist. Ecclesiast. lib. 3. c. 6. COSMAS, lib. 5. p. 194. TABUL. PUTINGER. Itiner. ANTONIN. THEVENOT's Voyages, part 2. c. 33. and others. * PAUL OROS. GREG. TURON. & al. ap. CALM. Dissert. in loc.

- a day of the first month, on which they came thither from Marah, to the fourteenth of the second month, on which they decamped from it †.

FROM Elim, the whole camp marched towards the wilderness of Sin: by which rout they removed still farther from the frontiers of the promised land; but as they were directed by the miraculous pillar, they were forced to follow whithersoever that went. Here, their provisions becoming exceeding scarce, they began to murmur A new murmur for want of provision. more violently than ever, repenting from their hearts that they had suffered themselves to be decoyed from the flesh-pots and plenty of provision, which they enjoyed in the land of Egypt, into a barren wilderness, where they could expect nothing but to die with hunger.

- b This tumultuous carriage had something monstrously ungrateful, because it was levelled at God himself, whose directive column they had followed into that desert place. Nevertheless, he was pleased to pass it by, and to give them fresh assurances of his favour, by promising to rain down bread from heaven upon them; and, in order to make a further trial of their obedience, he commanded Manna promised. them to go and gather a certain rate every morning, and on the sixth, to provide double that quantity, because they were not to expect any to fall on the seventh, which was afterwards to be kept holy. Aaron, in communicating this message to the people, failed not to give them a severe reprimand for their murmurings, which, he told them, did cast the greatest reflection upon God, seeing it was he, and not Moses, who had brought them out of Egypt. He had scarce made an end of speaking, c when the people, looking towards the wilderness, beheld the glory of God displayed out of the cloud, from which God confirmed again what Aaron had promised to the Quails promised. people, assuring them that they should that very evening be satisfied with plenty of flesh, and on the next morning they should find that heavenly bread which he had promised to send them.

If this glorious sight gave some weight to Moses's words, much more did the event add to it, when they saw them verified on that very evening, by whole And sent in abundance. clouds of quails, which came pouring down upon them out of Egypt, and alighted in such quantities, that they quite covered their camp (Q); and on the mor-

- d row the manna, which rained down round about them by the break of the day. This last did not indeed fall close to the camp, but at some distance Manna falls at some distance from the camp. from it towards the wilderness. Before sun-rise therefore, the Israelites followed Moses towards the place, where he shewed them a kind of white dew, like unto a small hoary frost, which covered the face of the earth, and which he told them was the bread which God had promised to feed them with during their abode there; commanding them to gather an Homer for every head, which is about five pints, or forty three eggs †. The people no sooner saw this new bread, but they cried to one another, what is this, and whence cometh it? for they were surprized at the strangeness of it; and from thence they gave it the name of Man, e or Manna (R); they were however so eager for it, that they gathered it at ran-† Exod. xv. per tot.

† LE SCEN. Essay on a new translat. pag. 179. R. SALOM.

(Q) It must be remembered here, that this was about the middle of April, which is the time in which that bird is observed to cross the red-sea in vast quantities; the same is also observed to this very day by those who frequent those parts, and incredible multitudes are caught there about this time. The miracle therefore consists not so much in the prodigious number that fell into Israel's camp, as in the directing them thither, and on that very evening, according to God's promise, and Moses's prediction. The same may be said also tho' we should render the Hebrew, שבלו, Sbelaw, locusts, as the learned Ludolph has done, who in his treatise of locusts, at the end of his appendix to his description of Abyssinia, has offered some probable arguments, that these were such, and not quails. He adds, that they were in great plenty both in these parts, and all over Africa, and that they were esteemed a delicious food. We own indeed, that the word is, even by the confession of all the Jews, of very uncertain signification, and may as well signify a locust as a quail; but what inclines us to prefer the latter sense, is, that the psalmist, † speaking of them, calls them עוף כנף, Hoph canaph, winged, or feathered fowl, which, we apprehend, is not so applicable to those insects, much less the words שער, Sbeer, flesh, and צדד, Tzedab, which signifies all sorts of venison, as well of fowl as of beasts, which the same inspired poet makes use of there.

(R) We have ventured to depart from our own and several other versions, which make the Israelites call this new food Manna, because they knew not what it was; for tho' commentators have taken a great deal of pains to puzzle the text by their various etymologies of that word, yet that of the Septuagint, which renders it τί τούτο ἐστίν, what is this? seems to come nearer to the Hebrew, and to be most agreeable to the text, and is likewise followed by Josephus, and a great number of others (68) מן הוא, Man hu, in the original signifying what, or whence is this? Not so easy is it dom, without stinting themselves to the quantity which Moses had prescribed, <sup>a</sup> but when every one came to measure what he had gathered, they found to their no small astonishment, that they were to carry home but one Homer for every head; whether it were, that they were made to gather it in heaps, and divide it afterwards at an equal rate, or that providence ordered it so, that the most greedy should have his quantity miraculously lessened, whilst the more moderate had theirs increased; or, which is more likely, that Moses made those that had gathered more than their measure, to refund the overplus to those who had gathered less; that so the same proportion might fall to every man's share.

† Psal. lxxviii. 25. & seq.

(68) Antiq. l. iii. c. i. Rabbin. fere omni. St. JEROM. FAG. MEER. PISCAT. GROTIUS, DRUSIUS, LE SCEN. & al.

Some is kept till next day and stinks.

A double quantity gathered against the sabbath.

As soon as they were got into their tents, they went about grinding it according to Moses's direction, some with mills, others in mortars, and made themselves a <sup>b</sup> sort of cakes, whose taste resembled that of wafers made with honey, or with fresh oyl, as it is said in another place <sup>c</sup>; from that they came to other ways of dressing it, by frying, stewing, boiling, and the like. As for that which remained ungathered upon the ground, the heat of the sun did immediately dissolve it. In the mean time Moses, who had given them express charge not to leave any till the next morning, had the mortification to hear that some of the people, whether out of curiosity or precaution, had ventured to save some of it, and had found it stinking and crawling with worms. He failed not to reprove them for it, and to advise them to be more careful of his directions for the future, seeing they did but provoke their heavenly benefactor by their disobedience; but their stubbornness was not to be cured by threaten- <sup>c</sup> ings, and it was not many days before they made him sensible of it. The sixth day being come, they went according to order to gather a double quantity, to serve them for that day and the next, on which he had told them there would be none to be found, because it was to be a day of Sabbath, or of rest unto them. But they, as if they had given themselves up to mistrust every word that came out of his mouth, could not be at rest till they had gone into the wilderness, and satisfied themselves of the truth of it. This forced a fresh reprimand from him, in which, after some expostulations, he expressly forbid them to go out of the camp, during the whole seventh day, under pain of death. For a memorial of this miraculous bread (S), Moses was ordered to preserve an Homer full in a vessel, to be afterwards deposited in <sup>d</sup> the ark of the covenant, and to be preserved in it as a witness to future ages, which command was left to Aaron to execute as he accordingly did <sup>b</sup> soon after.

<sup>a</sup> Num. xi. 8.

<sup>b</sup> Exod. xiv.

to know the meaning of the word of Gad, which we translate coriander-seed, though, according to the literal sense of the original, it should be rendered, and it was white like the seed of Gad, whereas coriander is of a brown colour. Some Jeus therefore translate it mustard-seed, because one sort of it is whitish (69), and Abenezra frankly owns, that he knows not what seed it is (70); but since it is said in another place, that it was of the colour of Edellium (71), which the learned Bochart and others have shewn to signify a kind of pearl, we may easily suppose, that the word Gad doth not signify coriander, but some other small white seed, and that the manna, shining like unto a hoary frost, did very much resemble a small pearl.

(S) We have ventured to give it that epithet, not that we believe, with the author of the book of wisdom (72), that it was prepared without labour, since they were forced to pound and dress it; or that it was capable of satisfying every stomach, by suiting itself to every particular taste, since, had that been the case, the Israelites could never have come to loath it, as they afterwards did (73); much less do we attribute all those wonderful qualities to it that the Jeus do; but we think it was miraculous upon the following accounts; 1st, because it fell but six days in the week; 2. that it fell in such prodigious quantity, as sufficed near three millions of souls; 3. that there fell a double quantity every Friday to serve them for the next day; 4. what was gathered on the first five days stank and bred worms, if kept above one day, and that which was gathered on Friday lasted two days; lastly, it continued falling whilst the Israelites abode in the wilderness, but ceased as soon as they came out of it, and had eaten of the corn of the land of Canaan (74). Abenezra indeed says, that Man was an Arabick word, and that he had seen in the kingdom of Ḥam, whatever kingdom that be, something very like manna, that fell only during two summer months of the year †, but as he adds, that it is rather fit for physick than for food, it is plain it must be that which we know by the name of manna, which is a kind of honey condensed, and is to be seen to this day in the deserts of Arabia, during the heat of the summer, and is gathered in great quantities off the trees, rocks, grass, and even the sand: but it is plain, by what we observed of the miraculous sort, that this has nothing common with it but the name.

(69) Vid. MURST. in loc.
(72) Wisd. xvi. 20.

(70) ABENEZ in loc.
(73) Numb. xi. 6.

(71) Vid. MURST. BOCH. & al.
(74) Josb. v. 12.
† Ub. sup.

- a It is not easy to conceive how a nation, that had so long and so often experienced the miraculous care and goodness of God, could ever fall again into fresh murmuring and disobedience; and yet they had no sooner left this desert of Sin, and advanced a few days journey towards mount Horeb; but when they came to Rephidim, and found the place destitute of water, they began to fill the air with their complaints, and, surrounding the tents of Moses and Aaron, asked them in a tumultuous and threatening manner, where they must have waters to quench their thirst? Moses strove in vain to quell their fury, and to persuade them to wait God's leisure; his words did but enflame them the more, till at length, observing them to be grown desperate, and ready to stone him, he had recourse to God, who was soon pleased to dissipate his fears, by promising to signalize this place with as miraculous a water, as he had the last with a miraculous food. He commanded him to gather the elders of Israel, and all the people, and to take them up to mount Horeb, and assured him, that upon smiting the rock with his miraculous rod, the waters would immediately gush out of it in such plentiful streams, as would be more than sufficient to allay their thirst. Moses obeyed, and God vouchsafed to perform his promise, and to send them plenty of water (T); and in memory of this new murmuring, and of the people's questioning whether God was really among them or not, the place was called Massah, (tempting) and Meribah, (contention.) †
- b and ready to stone him, he had recourse to God, who was soon pleased to dissipate his fears, by promising to signalize this place with as miraculous a water, as he had the last with a miraculous food. He commanded him to gather the elders of Israel, and all the people, and to take them up to mount Horeb, and assured him, that upon smiting the rock with his miraculous rod, the waters would immediately gush out of it in such plentiful streams, as would be more than sufficient to allay their thirst. Moses obeyed, and God vouchsafed to perform his promise, and to send them plenty of water (T); and in memory of this new murmuring, and of the people's questioning whether God was really among them or not, the place was called Massah, (tempting) and Meribah, (contention.) †
- c ABOUT this time, the Israelites being attacked in their rear by the Amalekites, Moses was forced to depute his servant Joshua, at the head of a sufficient force, to make head against them, whilst himself went up to the mount to intreat God for his success. * Accordingly, on the next morning he went up with his brother Aaron and Hur, of whom we shall speak by and by, to a neighbouring hill, when they could have a full view of the field of battle, and held up his hands in prayer, whilst Joshua was fighting with the Amalekites. He held up likewise his own miraculous rod in his hand, and God was pleased to shew a singular regard to his intercession. For whilst he held his hands up, Joshua prevailed, but when he let them down to rest them, Amalek got the advantage. At length, when he found them grow so heavy, that he could hold them up no longer, Aaron and Hur were forced to set him upon a stone, and to stay them up on each side, till the going down

A new murmuring for want of water.

They flew from a miraculous rock.

† Exod. xvii. 1. & seq.

* Ibid. ver. 8. & seq.

(T) St. Paul, speaking of this miraculous rock, which he applies to Christ, says, that it followed them (75); from which some will have it, that it accompanied them, and served them upon all necessary occasions, to the very end of their wandering (76); and that either the waters, which gushed out of it, formed themselves into a kind of river, which followed them through all their encampments (77), or that they carried the rock in a cart wherever they went, and that it continued flowing with water (78). Some even affirm, that it keeps running to this day, and waters all that valley which was dry before (79); but had any of these been the case, there would have been no occasion for smiting that rock in another place, as Moses did for the same purpose (80), for we shall shew by and by, that this was a quite different action; nor likewise for digging of wells for water soon after this last miracle, as we find they did (81). There was therefore no necessity of fetching a parallel from what Ælian says of the king of Persia, that the river Cboaspi did always follow him (82), because he always carried some of its water with him; in order to give a more favourable sense to the apostle's words, by supposing that the Israelites did the same by those of the rock. St. Paul here speaks of a spiritual rock; and the two instances, we have just now mentioned, will not permit us to suppose, that they were always supplied by the natural one.

However, seeing the two actions of smiting

the rock have been confounded by several commentators, it will not be amiss to shew the contrary; before we dismiss the subject. Now that Moses smote the rock at two different times, and in two different places, is plain; 1st, because the first happened at Rephidim, in their eleventh station, and the second in the desert of Sin, in the thirty third station: 2. the one happened in the first year after the Exod, and the other in the fortieth; for, in the very next station, Aaron died in the fifth month of the fortieth year (83). In the first, the rock was smitten with the rod with which Moses wrought his wonders in Egypt, and in the last with the rod of Aaron, that had budded, and had been layed up before the Lord in the ark, from whence Moses is said to have taken it (84). Lastly, the first happened before the extruction of the tabernacle, and the last after it; for it is said, that upon the people's murmuring for want of water, Moses and Aaron went to the door of the tabernacle, and fell upon their faces there at the sight of the glory of God (85). We might add, that the first was performed without any dissidence, anger, or indecent words; whereas, in the last, Moses smote the rock twice, and spoke some unbecoming words, which so displeased God, that he condemned him to die in the wilderness, without setting his foot into the land of Canaan. From all which it appears, that these were two different actions performed at great distance of time and place (86).

- (75) 1 Cor. x. 4. (76) CALM. com. in loc. BERRY. & al. (77) Itā Rabbī. mult.
(78) CANTACUZEN. in sap. cap. 11. & Rabbī. aliquot. (79) TOSTAT. qu. 3. ap. VILLET. cap.
17. qu. 10. (80) Numb. xx. 11. (81) Ibid. xxi. 16. & seq. (82) ÆLIAN. Hist.
var. lib. xii. c. 40. vid. CALM. Hist. V. T. in loc. (83) Conf. Exod. xvii. 1. & seq. & Numb.
xxxiii. 14. 36. & 38. (84) Numb. xx. 9. & seq. (85) Ibid. ver. 4. & seq. (86) Ibid.
ver. 11, 12. Vid. SIMLER. JUN. VILLET. & al. in loc.

Amalek discomfited.

of the sun. The consequence was, that Israel gained the victory, and Amalek was a discomfited, as we have seen in a former chapter †. This Hur is thought to have been of the tribe of Judah, and the son of Caleb the son of Efron, different from Caleb the son of Jephunneh; and so to have been the grandfather of Bezaleel, so famed for his fine workmanship in the tabernacle, and other utensils for the service of God. Josephus thinks that Hur had married Miriam, Moses's sister, others think that he was her son; but the generality of antient fathers think that she died unmarried. As for Joshua, he became famous from this time, both for his valour and conduct, and for his zeal for God and his people; upon all which accounts, Moses made choice of him for his successor, to lead the Israelites into the promised land. In the mean time Moses was ordered to record this signal victory, and to vow a lasting war against the Amalekites, till their very remembrance was quite blotted out. He also reared up an altar unto God, and called it Yehovah Nissi, (the Lord is my banner;) to intimate, that God, who had made them denounce this war against Amalek, would not fail to crown it with success (V)*.

Jethro comes to Moses.

THE defeat of Amalek opened a way for the Israelites to mount Sinai, where their abode proved not only the longest, but the most famous of any other by the wonderful promulgation of the law, and the appointment of the principal ceremonies which they were afterwards to observe. But in the mean while, God, who foresaw what an addition this would be to Moses's other cares and fatigues, did in good time conduct his hospitable father-in-law, with Ziphorah and her two sons, to the camp of Israel, where, after their mutual embraces, and sacrifices offered to the God of Israel, Jethro, observing with what patience his son-in-law stood to hear the people's complaints from morning till night, and fearing lest he should in time sink under it, gave him that excellent and salutary advice of chusing a competent number of elders, who should help him to bear such a part of the burthen, as must otherwise have proved too heavy for him; an account of which, we have already given in the history of Midian*. Moses having thus eased himself of a great load of care, by the appointment he made of those inferior judges, some of which he set over thousands, others over hundreds, and others over tens; and reserving only the most momentous causes to come before him; did soon after take leave of his father-in-law (W), and gave the signal for their march from Rephidim, to the wilder-

† Vid. supr. p. 320. b.
AMAR. exhort. ad virgin. & al.
* Vid. supr. p. 301, & seq.

c Ant. lib. iii. c. 2.
Exod. xvii. ad fin.

d NISSEN. de virginitat. c. 6.
Ibid. xviii. pass.

(V) We have seen, in a former chapter †, that Amalek was descended from Eliphaz, Esau's first-born; as his descendants therefore were so nearly allied to the Israelites, it was inhuman in them to fall upon them, when they saw them reduced to so low a condition through the fatigue of their march, the vast heat of the season, and the excessive drought they laboured under, especially, since it doth not appear, that they had begun any hostilities against them. But though they did richly deserve the defeat which Joshua gave them for their barbarity, yet as for the anathema which God himself pronounced against them immediately after it, it seems to have been for some other crime which carried in it a greater degree of guilt, and may be justly supposed to have been an innate hatred against the Israelites, from the remembrance of Jacob's depriving their progenitor both of his birth-right and blessing; upon which account they did not scruple to take this ungenerous advantage over them, in order to prevent if possible their getting possession of the land of Canaan, for the conquest of which they saw them now in full march. Josephus indeed (87) seems to attribute this action of theirs to a fear of being driven out of their country by the Israelites; but besides that it is not likely they should be ignorant of the land of Canaan being promised to the sons of Jacob, and consequently that they should have any thing to fear upon that account; it is plain, that if that had been the only motive of their falling upon them, there could have been nothing so criminal in it as to entail the heavy curse, of a perpetual war against them and their posterity. But if they did it with a view of preventing their possessing the promised land, and consequently of frustrating the designs of providence towards them; as the same motive was like to last as long as they continued a nation, so there was the same necessity for entailing that anathema against them. And this seems implied in the last words of this chapter, in which Moses gives us a reason for vowing this war against them. They are indeed somewhat obscure, but in their literal sense may be rightly rendered thus; because his (that is, Amalek's) hand is against the throne of God, therefore the Lord will wage war with Amalek from one generation to another, that is, till he ceases to be a nation. We shall only add, that this place is supposed by the Jews, to have been called Rephidim, that is, רפדימ, from Rapba, to loosen, and jad manus, alluding to the weak condition they were in, when the Amalekites fell upon them.

(W) We have already given our opinion concerning Jethro's departure, and his leaving one of his sons with Moses, with some other particulars relating † Vid. supr. p. 317. c.

* Vid. ibid. p. 305. & seq. 439. & seq.

(87) Ant. lib. iii. c. 2.

a nels of Sinai. This happened about the beginning of the third month after their departure out of Egypt <sup>a</sup>.

THEY were no sooner come within sight of that celebrated mountain, but his next care was to order their incampment so, that there might be a considerable space left between it and the camp. He knew that this was to be the scene of the most glorious wonders that ever mankind beheld, and the place from whence those laws were to be delivered to them with a suitable awfulness and majesty, which God, who knew the genius of that perverse people, had calculated for them; and therefore he wisely fixed their situation so, as that they might be all eye and ear witnesses of the divine presence; and at the same

They encamp near mount Sinai.

b time prescribed such limits to their curiosity, as should strike them with a suitable awe and reverence. Whilst they were pitching their tents according to his directions, Moses went up to the mountain, and God, who had called him thither, commanded him to remind the Israelites of all the wonders he had wrought in their favour, and to assure them, that as he had hitherto bore them as an eagle doth her young on her wings, so if they proved obedient to his laws, he would still look upon them as his peculiar people, a favourite nation, and a royal priesthood. <sup>a</sup> Moses was not long before he came and called the elders of Israel, to whom he repeated all these endearing expressions, charging them at the same time to go and acquaint the people with the gracious message, c who no sooner heard it, but they promised all possible obedience to God's command. He returned immediately after to the mountain, where he was commanded to sanctify the people, and to prepare them for the glorious scene against the third day, by making them wash their cloaths, and abstain from all nuptial commerce, after which he promised to come down, in a conspicuous manner, and deliver his law in their hearing, with such a glorious and dreadful voice, as should at once convince them of both of his divine presence, and of his being the author of all those laws, which he was afterwards to deliver to them in his name. He likewise renewed his charge to him, to fix such bounds to the people as should keep them from approaching the mountain under the severest d penalties, and to assure them, that if either man or beast offered to transgress them, they should be immediately stoned, or shot to death. The signal, for their coming out to this glorious sight, was to be when they heard the sound of the miraculous trumpet: accordingly, on the third day, the people having prepared themselves pursuant to the divine injunction, and being in the utmost expectation for this wonderful sight, they saw, by break of day, the mountain surrounded with the thickest cloud, out of which came forth such thunders and lightnings, as filled them with terror and amazement. The sound of the trumpet being heard, Moses brought the people out of their camp towards the mount, as far as the barrier which he had set to them, and there they observed

e the top of Sinai covered with fire and smoke, whilst the foundations of it seemed to shake under their feet. In the midst of this dreadful scene, the trumpet being heard still louder and stronger, God called to Moses, who immediately went up, and was soon buried in the cloud. Here the divine voice commanded him to return and repeat his charge to the people, that none should presume to transgress their bounds, no not even the priests, who were afterwards to be consecrated to his service, since immediate death was to be the transgressor's portion, let him be who he would. Moses answered, that he had given them such strict charge, that there was no danger of their transgressing it; but he was ordered to go down immediately, to see that none ventur'd to disobey, and then commanded to bring his brother Aaron with him when he came up again. † He had no sooner obeyed, and

The mountain covered with fire and smoke.

<sup>a</sup> Vid. ann. USSER. in loc. RIVERA de Templ. lib. v. c. 7. & al.

† Ibid. ver. 9. ad fin.

<sup>b</sup> Exod. xix. & seq.

lating to this history †; but though it seems by the text, that he left also Ziphorah and her two sons with him; yet, whether it were that Moses took more care of his people than he did of his children, or that he loved these too well to promote them to any pitch of power or grandeur, which himself had so long felt the heavy load of; sure it is, that we hear no more of them from this time than if they had been no more; neither of them, that we can find, having been promoted to any charge worth taking notice of; and indeed the sequel of the history shews, that their father was so far from aiming at enriching or aggrandising his family, that he seems to have given himself up wholly to the service of God and his people.

† Vid. supr. p. 302. (I), (K).

The decalogue
deliver'd.

repeated his orders to the people, than the thunders and trumpets ceased, and God a was distinctly heard from the midst of the fire and smoke, which continued all the while to pronounce the ten principal laws, which were to be the foundation of all the rest, and which Moses was afterwards order'd to write upon two tables of stone. <sup>1</sup> (X) In the mean time the people, astonish'd at what they saw and heard,

<sup>1</sup> Exod. xix. per tot. c. xx. per tot.

(X) Concerning these ten commandments, which are so well known that we think it needless to insert them, several questions have been raised, which we shall but just touch upon, they being of such a nature, that nothing certain can be concluded about them. The first is, by whom they were deliver'd? whether by an angel deputed by God, who, consequently representing the godhead, assumes the name of the Lord God who brought Israel out of bondage? or whether by God himself? and if the latter, whether by God the father, or by Christ himself? Concerning all which we refer our readers to what has been said in another place upon the like occasion†.

The next is, whether in these, or any other of the Jewish laws, Moses was permitted to imitate those of the Egyptians, as some learned men have affirmed (1)? or, as the far greater part do think, the Egyptians have borrowed theirs from him? And here we need not repeat what has been said upon that head, when we were upon the subject of circumcision*; as to what relates to the ceremonial injunctions, we shall have occasion to speak of them by and by. At present we shall content ourselves with saying, that admitting them, in some cases, to have borrow'd from each other, and in others, to have gone point blank counter to one another, out of a spirit of contradiction and antipathy, which is the most probable supposition, it will still follow, that such of the Mosaic laws, as are contrary to the idolatry and superstition of the Egyptians, such as the second commandment, and a vast many more, could be enjoined by God with no other view, than to cure the Israelites of those vicious habits and propensities which they had contracted in Egypt. As to judicial, or even ceremonial laws, tho' we should allow Moses to have been permitted to have used his discretion, and to have adopted such as he approved of, yet it will by no means follow, that all that bear any resemblance were first received from the Egyptians, seeing very many of them are so contrary to the main and constant design of the Jewish law-giver, to keep the Israelites from intermixing with other nations, that if the Egyptians had been the first inventors of them, he must certainly have thought it most advisable to give them such as were quite opposite to them.

Waving therefore all these fruitless disquisitions, how far the Egyptians, the Greeks and Romans did frame their laws from those of the Jews, or how far the twelve tables of the Romans were a copy of the decalogue, we shall endeavour to render the remaining part of this note somewhat more useful and instructive, by reclusifying the sense of some words in the second commandment, which, for want of having been rightly understood, have led some into monstrous errors, and have made others chuse to reject the authority of holy writ, rather than adopt them. The place we mean is, where God is said to punish the sins of the fathers upon the children, to the third and fourth generation (2); words, which convey such a derogatory idea of the Deity, that if the original could possibly be capable of another sense, it ought, by all means, to be prefer'd to this; which is not only contrary to reason, and to the whole tenor of scripture, but is so fully confuted and condemn'd by the prophet Ezekiel (3), and by many other express places of scripture. We shall beg leave to mention but one of them, and that out of the same book of Exodus, which being parallel to this, it will follow, that, if this sense, we are now confuting, be admitted, Moses must have introduced God speaking absurdities and contradictions. The place is, where God vouchsafes to favour Moses with a sight of his glory in the mountain, by a visible delect in the cloud, and proclaiming the name, or rather the attributes of God, in the following terms; (4) the Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, long-suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth, keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity, transgression and sin, and that will by no means clear the guilty; visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children, and children's children, unto the third and fourth generation. For it is manifest, that if the latter words be understood in that sense, that is, if he punishes the sins of the fathers upon the children, &c. then the former part can hardly be admitted to be true; that he is the Lord God, merciful, gracious, just and faithful. How the Jews, therefore, came to understand them in a sense so absurd, so unreasonable and antisciptural, and so fully and expressly confuted and condemn'd by God himself, will be of small moment to enquire, since this is far from being the only instance, wherein they have done so; tho', if we may be allow'd to offer a conjecture, it is not unlikely, that the peculiar regard, which God, for reasons vastly disparate from their fond conceit, was pleas'd to shew for their nation, and the terrible punishments, which he inflict'd upon others, tho' scarce more wicked than they, might lead them into the notion, that the one was favour'd for the merit, and the other punish'd for the wickedness, of their progenitors: and this is so much the more probable, because, even to this day, they impute all their present sufferings, not to their manifest wickedness, which they are wholly blind to, but to the idolatries of their fore-fathers, both in the desert and in the promised land. However, as to them it is plain they extend'd these punishments no farther than to this world. The wonder is how Christians, who believed them to have a further reach than this short life, came to adopt a version even from the earliest ages of the church, which they were sensible could not be maintained, without having recourse to far fetched distinctions and subtilties. But the wonder will cease when we consider, 1st, their incapacity of drawing a better sense from the Hebrew text, for want of being acquainted with it; and 2dly, their great esteem for the septuagint version, whose authority they equalled even to the original. Its sense therefore of this and other such like texts being once received as authentic, they took different ways to justify it, and with it the divine justice and goodness. Some by confining those rewards and punishments to this life only. Whilst others, bolder and more uncharitable than the very Jews, have even dared to extend them beyond it, from a mistaken presumption of God's uncontrollable power over his creatures removed further off, and as soon as the divine voice had ceased speaking, his creatures. *† But since the Hebrew has been better understood, and those texts been found capable of a much better sense, we hope our readers will be glad to have it proved to their satisfaction.

† Vid. sup. p. 429. note (T).

(1) Vid. SPENCER de leg. rit. Hebr. l. iii. dissert. 1. & seq. MARSHAM. Canon Egypt. S. Secul. 2. ATHAN. KIRCHER, LE CLERC, & al. * Vid. sup. p. 427. note (R). (2) Exod. xx. 5. (3) Ezek. xviii. pass. (4) Exod. xxxiv. 5, 6, & 7.

In the first place then, we beg leave to observe, after some eminent critics (5), that the prepositions, by lamed and by hal, which are here rendered upon, do also signify by, and in favour of; so that the words before us may be properly rendered punishing the iniquities of the fathers by, or in favour of, the children, &c. In the first of these senses David's murder and adultery was justly punish'd by his favourite, tho' wicked, son Abraham (6); and the latter doth perfectly answer the wise methods of providence, with respect to the wicked and innocent; the former of which he doth often punish for the benefit and determent of the latter. The reader may, if he pleases, see these versions justify'd by the authors just now quoted, and therefore we shall insist upon them no longer; but as those, which vindicate the divine justice, mercy, and goodness of God, ought by all means to be prefer'd to those, which give impressions that are derogatory or injurious to the godhead, we shall beg leave to offer one more, which seems to us still more natural and agreeable to the design of this second commandment, but which, not having as yet appear'd in print, we can quote no author for.

It is manifest, that the main end and design of the first and second commandment was, expressly to forbid all idolatry whatsoever, one kind of which, we find, had been very rise long before, namely, that of Teraphims, or household-gods * of which we have already given some account †: Their shapes varied according to the fancy of those that made, or those that bespoke them, and to them they used to apply for good success, and preservation against all misfortunes, both for themselves and families. These, therefore, being look'd upon as the chief dispensers and preservers of lands, houses, and all other inheritances, what makes it more than probable, that this prohibition is in a special manner levell'd against this kind of idolatry, is, first, the reason that is immediately given, that the Lord is a jealous God, who cannot, consequently, suffer the glory of his benefits to be given to a senseless idol. Secondly, because the words, לֹא יִשְׁכַּח לֵבָנוֹ poked haron, as they are pointed, or poked ben, if read without the points, may be properly render'd disposing, or dispensing the habitations, or estates of the fathers, &c. And, lastly, because idolatry in general, or the worship of false gods, had been forbid in the first commandment; thou shalt have no other gods but me; and consequently, the second must have been design'd against some such particular sort as that we are speaking of.

It remains to prove, that the original will properly bear this version; and here we beg leave to observe, first, that the verb פָּקַד pakad, which is render'd to visit, is known to imply, in its proper sense, such a visitation as that of a monarch, chief magistrate, or prelate, who takes his progress thro' his territories, to rectify abuses, to administer justice, and to dispense rewards and punishments, as occasion requires. And secondly, that the word לֵבָנוֹ ben (which we venture to read without its points, because, they being now universally allowed to be of late and human invention, they may be safely set aside, whenever we see good reason for so doing) doth likewise signify an habitation, or dwelling-place, it being an ancient, obsolete word, from which its derivative מִבְּנוֹ Mabon, by the addition of the letter מ Mam, one of the formatives of nouns substantive, is still used, and confin'd to that particular signification throughout the old testament. This being granted, the sense will run thus: for I, the Lord, thy God, am a jealous God, disposing, or distributing the habitations, or estates of the fathers to the children, unto the third and fourth generation, even, of those that hate me, but showing mercy to thousands in them that love me, &c. where we beg leave to observe further, that the word generation not being in the original, the words, third and fourth, which are here in the plural, may as well be understood of a distribution of estates into thirds or fourths, or, of their being multiply'd to a third or fourth degree, or increased to three or four times their bulk, or value. But, as for the mercies, which God keeps in store for those that love and obey him, they exceed them לְעֹלָם לְעֹלָם Lealaphim, by thousands of degrees; which is as much, as if he had said, they are numberless and endless.

But that our readers may be satisfy'd, that those places of scripture, which are urged as parallel to this, by those who maintain the unreasonable doctrine we are now opposing, are either misunderstood, or misapply'd by them, we shall beg leave to subjoin an instance of each, by which he will be able to judge of the rest. The first they urge is, where Solomon says, that God made all things for himself, and the wicked for the day of evil (7); from which they have infer'd this blasphemous doctrine, that God created the wicked on purpose to damn them. But, whoever will be at the trouble of consulting the original, will find, that the word לִמְעַלְמָהּ Lamaghaem, which is here render'd for himself, is not from the particle לְ Lemaghan, for, with its affix, for then it ought to have been differently pointed; but setting aside the points, it is equally capable of two other meanings, even according to the grammatical construction, and may signify to answer; and so the sense will be truly this; that God hath done or ordered all things to answer one another, even the wicked to the day of evil; by which is meant no more than, God has so order'd all things, that punishment shall be as much the natural consequence of wickedness, as reward is of virtue (8). The same word may also signify a furrow, or channel; and so the sense will be, God hath ordered every thing to run into its own channel (9), and the wicked to that of the evil day, or punishment.

The other place, which is rather misapply'd, is, where God says, that he will have mercy on whom he will have mercy (10). For, besides that the words are capable of another sense, *† it is plain from the occasion of them, that they have nothing to do with the point in hand. Moses prays to God, that he will shew him his glory, and God promises, that he will grant him his request; and then adds, that he will be gracious to whom he will be gracious; which, therefore, can import no more, than that he will shew such singular favours to whom he pleases; but it neither follows, nor is it any where said, that he will punish whom he will, without any regard to their desert. Those, who think that St. Paul applies them in a quite different sense (11), we refer to those authors who have writ ex professo on that subject (12); some others of the like nature, such as what is said of the sons of Eli (13) &c. will be explained in the sequel of this history.

W

*† Vid. sup. p. 439. T. (5) LAURON de l'impie'te du peche. LE SCEN. Essay on a new vers. p. 107. LE CLERK in loc. WHITBY, PELLING, & al. (6) 2 Sam. xi. pass. xii. 10, & seq. xvi. xvii, & xviii. pass. * Vid. Gen. xxxi. 19 & seq. Judg. xvii. xviii. pass. † Vid. sup. p. 443. note (b). (7) Prov. xvi. 4. (8) Vid. LE SCEN. Essay on a N. Test. p. 109. (9) Vid. Plat. cxxix. 3. (10) Exod. xxiii. 19. *† See before p. 434 (D) (11) Rom. ix. 15. (12) Vid. PELLING, WHITBY, & al. against predest. (*) 1 Sam. ii. 25.

Some ceremonial laws instituted.

they approached Moses, in the height of their fear and surprise, and besought him a that he would for the future speak to them in God's stead, lest, if they should hear his dreadful voice again, they should die with horror and amazement; assuring him at the same time, that they were ready to receive and obey whatever laws or ordinances God should enjoin to them by his means, since they were now fully convinc'd of his divine commission. Moses readily approv'd of that awful regard which they express'd, as well for the miraculous presence of God, as for his commandments; and assur'd them that this wonderful scene was not exhibited to them with a design to create a slavish dread, but a filial confidence and submission to such laws as his providence should hereafter enjoin them, as a particular token of his care and benevolence towards them above all nations of the earth. He had no sooner dispell'd their fears b by these words, than he went up again to the mountain, where, for that time, God was pleased to add a few ceremonial laws to those moral ones which he had couched in the decalogue; all which, as well as those which he received afterwards from time to time, we shall refer to another place in this history, where, to avoid prolixity and repetition, we shall give them all in one body. For the same reason we shall avoid following the divine historian too close in all the intercourses which he had with God; in all which the observance of the same laws, both moral and ceremonial, is inculcated over and over, the same assurances of the divine favour and assistance upon their obedience, and severe threatenings in case of their disobeying, and the same promises of their possessing the lands of the Canaanites, Amorites, Hittites, Hivites, Perizzites, Girgashites, and Jebusites, are repeated almost upon every fresh occasion; and which, tho' penn'd by Moses exactly as they happen'd, need to be mention'd here but once for all. Besides, the laws themselves, whether they be consider'd with a moral, religious, ceremonial, or political view, are so blended and intermixt together under the names of laws, statutes, ordinances, judgments, testimonies, commandments, precepts, and the like; that unless they are reduc'd under their several heads, a common reader would be rather confounded, than inform'd in the design and injunction of them. What might induce providence to deliver them in that seemingly irregular method, is not easy to be guessed at, unless we suppose, that a more methodical manner would have favour'd too much of human wisdom. But as to the so frequent repetition of them, the reader will find sufficient occasion for it, since it is but too plain by the sequel, that neither that, nor the grievous punishments, that beset them almost upon every disobedience, prov'd powerful enough to bend their stubborn necks, or cure them of their intractable disposition. All that need be said here concerning those laws and ordinances is, that some related to the immediate worship of God; such as were, the building of the tabernacle, with all its grand apparatus of utensils for use and ornament, their sacrifices of all sorts, the consecration of their priests and Levites, the holy oyl to anoint them, their habit, office, privileges, revenue, and the like; the festivals, offerings, tithes, vows, purifications, laws concerning clean and unclean things, diseases, meats, and some others to the like purpose. Some of which are rightly look'd upon as typical (Y); others, as topical, or confined to that cli-

We shall close this note with observing that, tho' the Jews reckon'd the same number of commandments as we do, and call'd them by way of excellency the ten words, from which they had afterwards the name of decalogue; yet they join the first and second into one, and divide the last, which is against coveting, into two: as for that against stealing, they understand it of stealing of men, or kid-napping, alledging that the stealing of another's goods or property is forbid in the last commandment (13).

(Y) We could willingly excuse ourselves from entering any farther into this unpleasant controversy, after what has been said already at the beginning of the last note and elsewhere † upon this subject, there being so little likelihood of pleasing either of the opposite sides, much less of reconciling them. Each party is fond of their own extreme, and value themselves upon being direct antipodes to the other; little dreaming that truth lies in a middle between them. The reader may easily remember what we have hinted, about the probability of the Hebrews and Egyptians borrowing something from each other; all therefore that needs to be added is that those, who pretend that the former had all or most of their ceremonies, tabernacle, ark of the covenant, altar, &c. from the latter, because they find that these did afterwards use the same kind of religious utensils*, do entirely go counter to the express tenor of the epistle to the Hebrews, which mentions all these, and many more, as instituted on purpose by God himself, to typify those better things which he reserv'd for the times of the gospel (14). 'Tis plain from the tenor of the old and new testament, that the paschal lamb, passage over the red-sea, the lifting up of the serpent by Moses, the Israelites wandering in the wilderness, their entering into the land of Canaan, and many more of the like nature, were all typical and figurative, and are applied as such by the writers of the latter. But on the other hand, those who scrupulously deny, that they imitated them in any particular, have given such a mate (Z), and others as political; but all of them, to all appearance calcu-

(13) Rabbin. ser. omni. Vid. MUNST. in loc. † Pag. 427 & seq. sub not. (R) * MAIM. SPENC. LECLERK ub. supr. (14) Vid. Hebr. pass. partic. ch. ix.

such an unmeasurable scope to their fancies, in order to prove the relation between those types and their pretended antitypes, that they have not left one pin of the tabernacle, one bell in Aaron's garment, neither kettle, fork, or spoon, without one. This enthusiastic spirit of typifying every thing display'd itself more particularly, soon after the reformation. We shall beg leave to subjoin one instance of it, not so much for the singularity or brightness of it, as to shew how far every thing may be moralized, when men have once got into that vein. Two eminent protestants, the one a Lutheran, and the other a Calvinist, had been wrangling a considerable time about the precedency of each of their patriarchs without any seeming advantage, when one took it into his head to make Luther the antitype of Aaron, seeing he was the first that had set up and lighted the grand candlestick (of the reformation) in the tabernacle: the other, not being able to disprove the fact, had recourse to the same typical reasoning, and affirmed, that if Luther was Aaron's antitype upon that score, Calvin was much more so, since it was manifest, that if he had not taken the snuffers into his hand, the lamps would have given such a dim light, that few people would have been the better for it. We can easily join our wishes with the great critic, from whom we have this story (15), that, where people can feed their religion with such airy diet, it may do them much good; but we can by no means think with him, that the despicable figure, which the Jews then made, is an invincible objection against the proud Egyptians, who hated them above all nations, borrowing any of their ceremonies; seeing the same argument will equally hold against either side; and the superstition, common to them both, might easily get the better of their pride and hatred. What wild notions men had then, and long enough since, of the godhead, may easily be gathered from that saying of the Syrians (16), their gods are gods of the hills, and there prove stronger than ours; but if we get them into the plain, ours will get the better of them. Might it not therefore be natural for the Egyptians, as we hinted once before †, to enquire how such a poor slavish people, as that of the Hebrews, came to be in such high favour with their God, that he should fall thus severely upon their own, and so many other brave nations, on their behalf? They could scarcely attribute it to any merit or excellency in them, and therefore might easily conclude them to have found out some way of gaining his friendship by their sacrifices, and manner of worshipping him; which, if they but once attained to, could not fail of much greater success. Add to this, that if the priests were consulted about it, as it is most likely they were, they could not be against embracing such a sort of worship, which, however it proved to the laity, could not but be gainful to them: now if this be granted to be a natural supposition, the objection falls to the ground, and there is an end of our author's pretended impossibility. As for what is added on that side of the question, viz. that the Egyptians sacrificed horses and hogs to their gods, whilst the Hebrews offered nothing but sheep, or at best, oxen, this difference, allowing the case to be fact, might easily proceed from some remaining leaven of their old superstition, which could not suffer them to sacrifice such beasts as they had been used to worship. They might likewise probably enough attribute the Hebrews not sacrificing any thing above an ox to their fordidness, that creature being of far less value than horses, and so be induced not only to imitate, but to out-do them, by offering a more valuable sacrifice than they. Upon the whole, the Egyptians, being generally allowed to have been the first introducers of idolatry, may be reasonably supposed to have been likewise the inventors of a great deal of superstitious trash, and the Jews, who had been as it were formed in their country, to have contracted such a particular fondness for it, as not to be easy without having something like it among them. We beg leave to anticipate so far upon their history as to bring one instance of this once for all, and with it to dismiss this intricate point. Moses promised the people, that God would send his angel to them to guide and protect, and to prepare the way for them. Moses goes up into the mountain, and continues there forty days, by which time they gave him over for lost: uncertain what to do, and fearful lest the Amalekites, or some other nation, should fall upon them, they grew impatient for this promised conductor, and, being ignorant what kind of one God designed for them, interpreted it in an Egyptian sense, and in a tumultuous manner gather about Aaron, and insist that he should make them such a one. Aaron, who guessed their meaning, calls a golden calf, no doubt in imitation of the Egyptian apis; for without the assistance of their mythology, a calf would be one of the last creatures that one would chuse to make a symbol of the deity ‡. He sets it up in the midst of the camp; and the people, highly pleased with it, begin to pay the usual worship of sacrifices, dancing, &c. to it: in the mean time Moses comes down, and surprises them in the height of their joy, upbraids both his brother and them with their folly and ingratitude, and destroys the Egyptian idol. After this he returns immediately to the top of the mountain, complains of their idolatry and stubbornness, and intreats God to pity and forgive them, and God, who saw that their minds were bent upon some outward symbol, in compassion to their infirmity, commands him to make an ark; which, though differing in the main from the Egyptian idols, yet should still retain something of a resemblance in the cherubim that covered it, which had at least the head of a calf, as shall be shewn in its proper place. Who doth not see by all this, that God did only comply so far with the carnal genius of that untoward people, as to give them a visible symbol, without condescending so low, at the same time, as to permit such a close imitation of what they admired in other nations, as might in any wise prove a snare to them in process of time? If it be asked, how so polite a nation, as that of the Egyptians, came to chuse a cow, or a calf, to represent the deity? we can only add to what has been said before * the conjecture of some ancient and modern authors, such as Suidas in his Saxanis, Rufin in his ecclesiastical history, Perreius and Kercher in their hieroglyphics, Hottinger and others, who all seem probably enough to think that it was in honour of Joseph, and in memory of the seven cows, which represented the plenty by which he preserved that country from perishing; and this seems the more probable, because several of the most ancient authors, besides those above quoted, agree, that this ox or cow was represented carrying a bushel upon its head, which might be designed to signify the plenty of corn, which that patriarch caused to be layed up; all which we willingly submit to our reader's judgment.

(Z) It cannot be denied, but several of the Mosaic

(15) I. E. CLERK'S Bibl. A. & M. tom. XII. p. 313.
p. 427. note (K).

† Vid. supr. p. 398. note (H). & alib. pass.

(16) 1 Kings xx. 23.

* Ibid. p. 206.

† Vid. supr.

lated with a wise design of preserving them, both in their obedience to God, <sup>a</sup> and from all intermixture with other nations, and from adopting any part of their idolatrous worship into their own. Besides these, Moses received a great number of political laws properly so called, which related to the welfare and preservation of their commonwealth: of this nature were those which ascertained every man's property, and appointed proportionate punishments to the invaders of it. Such were also those of the Jubilee, which restored every man, once in fifty years, to his paternal estate, however alienated during that time: the cities of refuge to secure the life of a man, who had innocently slain another: such were also the great court of judicature, known afterwards by the name of Sanhedrin; their other courts of judicature, choice of magistrates, and others to the <sup>b</sup> same end; all which were delivered at several times, and upon divers exigencies by God to Moses, and by him committed to writing in the same order in which he received them <sup>c</sup>. Neither were all these laws given to him in the mount, though the main part of them was; for after the setting up of the tabernacle, God was pleased to appear, and to deliver his oracles to him from thence. One thing however is remarkable in that last intercourse we have been mentioning, namely, the promise which God made to Israel <sup>1</sup>, that he would send his angel to facilitate their way, and to bring them to the promised land; and that if they proved obedient to his voice, and kept themselves from the pollutions of those nations which they went to conquer, he would inject a panicky fear upon <sup>c</sup> them, so that they should not be able to resist them; adding, that they should not make a complete conquest of them at once, lest the wild beasts should prove too strong for them; but that they should carry it on gradually, till they had extended it from the red-sea unto the sea of the Philistines, and from the desert unto the river <sup>m</sup>.

The covenant between God and the people ratified.

IMMEDIATELY after this, Moses reared an altar to God, and offered burnt sacrifices and peace-offerings upon it, and having caused the contents of this new covenant to be read to all the people, and exacted a solemn promise from them, that they would keep it faithfully, he ratified it by sprinkling the altar, the book, and the people, with the blood of the victims, and then ordered twelve pillars <sup>d</sup> to be erected, one for each tribe, as a standing monument of this alliance be-

<sup>a</sup> Exod. xxiv. 4.

<sup>1</sup> Ibid. xxiii. 20. & seq.

<sup>m</sup> Ibid. ver. 31.

Mosaic ordinances and prohibitions are of this nature, and were very necessary and beneficial, not only in Canaan, but in all hot countries. Such were those that related to all kind of cleanliness, that forbid the nuptial commerce at certain periods, and all intercourse with persons that had the leprosy, or any other infectious disease, and the like. But some learned men have gone further, and have fancied, that all forbidden meats, such as swine, hares, rabbits, ducks, &c. were, if not wholly, yet for the greatest part prohibited upon the same account, namely, as being unwholesome and detrimental to health in those hot climates. To prove this some have taken no small pains to shew that we have not a right understanding of all those creatures that are thus forbid: they instance out of Berbar (17), that the שפן, Shaphan, which we translate a rabbit, is a kind of rat that lives upon the rocks, and consequently, that the word should be translated a rock-rat, which animal he observes is of the bigness of a squirrel, and that Palestine and Arabia abound with it. We shall not trouble ourselves with enquiring how far we do misunderstand the names of those creatures, the eating of whose flesh Moses forbids, nor how far some or any of them be really unwholesome to eat. It is certain we are not mistaken in that of the swine, which, whatever be pretended to the contrary, is both commonly and safely eat in all hot countries, except by the Turks, whose law has copied this, among a great many things from the Jewish. The Rabbies indeed will have it, that it was forbid by reason of its extreme nastiness, both in its eating and wallowing in all manner of filth (18); but yet it is plain, that it never was accounted unwholesome upon that account in the hottest country we know of. We shall therefore venture to offer what we think is a more probable reason, why swine, hares, geese, &c. were forbid by Moses, namely, to prevent thereby as much as possible the Jews having any intercourse with other nations, either by being present at their feasts or common festivals, or contracting affinities with them, by inspiring them with an abhorrence against their most common meats by this express prohibition, and allowing them at the same time the use of a sufficient quantity of others to live comfortably by. It is also worth observing, that of all the meats forbidden by the Mosaic law, the Jews had the swine in greatest detestation, inasmuch that they rather chose the most cruel deaths than to save their lives by eating it. † How they came to contract such an extreme aversion to it, above any other, can only be imputed to the inferring it more commonly eat by other nations, than any of the rest, it being justly looked upon as the most friendly and nourishing to our bodies of any other flesh, and to all appearance designed so by providence, since they are the most useless and offensive creatures in any shape or place, but in the dish.

(17) LE SCHEW. Ess. on a N. Transl. p. 124. (18) Middrash Tanbura. Middrash Tebillim. supr. verb. Psal. cxlvi. 7. Vid. Ḥ MAIMONID. More Nevoch. part iii. cap. 48. MEYER, de tempor. sacr. Hebr. cap. xi. § 15 & 16. † Vid. Maccab. vi. 18. & seq. & alib. pass.

- a between God and them. When he had made an end of this ceremony, he took with him Aaron, Nadab, Abihu, and seventy of the elders of Israel, some part of the way towards the mountain, where they beheld the God of Israel in a kind of vision, with a pavement of sapphire-stone under him, exceeding the very sky in brightness, and after he had committed the care of the people unto them, he took Joshua up into the mountain with him, and stayed there full forty days. It was during this interval, that God gave him the two tables of stone, whereon were written the ten commandments by the finger, that is, as the generality of expositors understand it, and indeed the original doth properly imply, by the immediate command and direction of God himself (A). With these he gave him also the whole plan of the Jewish religion, of the tabernacle, and all the utensils belonging to it, and several other laws concerning the priests, Levites, and laity, and lastly an order for exacting a free will-offering from all the children of Israel, according to their abilities, of gold, silver, brags, scarlet, silk, wool, oyl, spices, and all other necessary materials for the tabernacle, ark of the covenant, priestly robes, and all other things that were to be appointed for the public worship. The care of making all these things was to be committed to Bezaleel, of the tribe of Judah, and Aboliab, of the tribe of Dan, two persons whom God had endowed with an extraordinary skill and wisdom to contrive and execute all these grand designs, according to his directions.

Moses takes 70 of the elders up towards the mountain.

Goes himself into the cloud.

* Exod. a cap. xxv. ad cap. xxx.

* Ibid. xxxi. pass.

(A) What character these tables were written in, whether in that which we now call the Samaritan, or in the Assyrian, shall be considered when we come to speak of their writing; and therefore all we shall observe at present, concerning them, is, that Moses tells us, that they were writ, or engraved, מִצִּדּוֹ וּמִצִּדּוֹ, Mize umine, on this and on that side (19). From which their Talmud tells us (20), that the letters were cut through and through, so as to be seen and read on either side. And when the question is put, how it was possible for the middle part of the  $\square$  final mem and  $\square$  samech to support itself? the Talmudist answers, that it was kept suspended by a miraculous power: we are far enough from crediting such fables, against the plain meaning of the text, which, at most, imports only, either that they were written on both sides, that is, front and back-side, or more probably, that they were so on the two faces, like the two pages of an open book, in which sense Moses's words are generally taken; but what we would observe from it is, that the compilers of the talmud never could dream of the Samaritan being the ancient Hebrew character, because those two letters are of a quite different shape, and needed not such a miracle to support the middle, more than any other letter. It is therefore a wonder that those, who have embraced this notion, should quote the talmud for it (21); But such has been their prepossession in favour of that old character, that they have mistaken an objection for a positive text, and overlooked two or three express answers which immediately follow it. But of this we shall have a more proper occasion to speak in the sequel. As to other particulars relating to these tables, such as their number, which some eastern authors have multiplied to ten, and others to seventeen (22); though the Talmud, and all the Jewish rabbies do constantly call them the two tables of the covenant (23): their shape, bigness, what material they were made of? which some rabbies take to have been some precious wood, others, some precious stone, as a ruby or carbuncle: in what order the ten commandments were writ? whether all the ten upon each table, or half, or some part upon one, and the rest upon the other? these, and other such nice enquiries we purposely forbear, because the scriptures leave us wholly in the dark about them. However, we beg leave here to vindicate our sense of those expressions of Moses, that these tables were written by the finger of God, that they were the work of God, and that the writing was the writing of God, and the like. For though a great many expositors understand them literally, as writ by God himself, others by an angel, and others by the spirit of God, which is sometimes called the finger of God (24). Yet we think it plain, by comparing the words with what Moses says in another place (25), that God commanded him to write the words of the covenant upon the second tables, as they had been written in the first, which he had broken, and that he did so accordingly; and what he repeats, or rather recapitulates, in Deuteronomy (26), that he (God) wrote on the second tables, according to the writing of the first, the ten commandments; it is plain, I say, that the words can imply no more, than that they were writ by the command and direction of God, and that Moses was the person that wrote the first, as well as the last; though the common opinion of antient and modern expositors is, that God wrote the first, and he the last (27).

The Mohammedans tell us, that God commanded the angel Gabriel to take the heavenly pen, which is the naming of the name of God, and to dip it into the river of light, and to write the ten laws upon the tables. And that after Moses had broke them, the angels carried the fragments up into heaven again, except one piece about half a yard long, which was afterwards deposited in the ark (28).

(19) Exod. xxxii. 15. (20) Talmud. Megillath. (21) MORIN. Dissert. in pensat. Samaritan. Walton. prolegom. Whiston. &c. al. (22) Vid. HERBELLOT's Bibliot. Orient. in loc. (23) Talm. tract. sanhedr. vid. etiam. מִצִּדּוֹ וּמִצִּדּוֹ, Cantic. מִצִּדּוֹ וּמִצִּדּוֹ. (24) Vid. Exod. viii. 19. Luke xi. 26. & alib. (25) Exod. xxxiv. 27, 28. (26) Ch. x. 4. (27) CYRIL. lib. de S. Spirit. AUGUST. quæst. in Exod. 186. JUN. VILLET. Rabbis. vid. MUNST. &c. al. in loc. (28) Vid. Bibliot. Orient. p. 649.

Is given over by the people.

The golden calf set up.

In the mean time, the people, who had seen Moses go up and enter into the cloud, whilst the top of the mountain was all in flames<sup>a</sup>, after they had waited above a month for him, began to give him over for lost. In this uncertain condition, they assembled themselves in a riotous manner about Aaron's tent, and told him that, as they wholly despaired of Moses's return, they expected that he should make them some gods to go before them; and such was his extreme weakness and cowardice, that he doth not seem to have hesitated one moment, whether he should refuse to comply with their request, but to have directed them immediately to bring him sufficient quantity of their gold ornaments, to make them a golden calf. † A learned Romish writer has indeed taken a deal of pains to vindicate this mean action of the Jewish high priest, in compliment to the Pope to whom he dedicates the work<sup>c</sup>, which was however universally condemned, even by those of his own church. And indeed the most that can be said in Aaron's defence is, that he did not perhaps think the people, especially the women and children, would be so ready to part, or as he expresses it to tear off from them their ear-rings and other ornaments, as they proved. However when he found how quickly his orders were obeyed, he made no scruple to be as quick as they in answering their request, so that in a little time the calf was finished and set up. The greatest part of the Jews throw the fault of this whole transaction upon the Egyptians that were come out with them, and who, they pretend, first put it into the people's head to ask for these gods: they add, that Aaron had no hand in the casting of it in that form, but that it was done by some Egyptian conjurer, by dint of magic, which they prove from the short time he took in making it, and from Aaron's words to Moses: they gave me (their gold) and I cast it into the fire, and there came out this calf. But we may justly affirm, that they, who undertake to vindicate Aaron's weakness, whether Jews or Christians<sup>d</sup>, do act with less modesty than Josephus, who saw too plainly, how vain it was to offer any excuse for an action so severely reprov'd and condemned by Moses himself, and therefore hath chosen wholly to suppress it, rather than to record a deed so little to his predecessors credit, however gloss'd or palliated. Had not Moses had a greater regard to truth, than to the honour of his brother, we should have lost this, among many other pregnant testimonies of his faithfulness and sincerity. However, the people were so eager for this new god, that they willingly parted with their gold ear-rings to Aaron, who lost no time to have it cast according to his promise (B); and having set it upon a pedestal, in full sight of all the camp, and reared up an altar before it, told them in their own dialect, that these were the gods which brought them out

<sup>a</sup> Vid. Exod. xxiv. 16, 17. † Ibid. 32. pass. <sup>c</sup> MONCEUS de Vitul. Aur. ap. Oper. Critic. vol. II. p. 4415. vid. etiam BAYL. Dict. sub. voc. Aaron. <sup>d</sup> BERRUYER's Hist. du peup. de Dieu. in loc. CALM. & al. Exod. xxxii. 21.

(B) Our version, and several others, have given us a very uncouth account of the casting of this golden calf, by making Aaron fashion it with a graving tool; after he had cast it in a mould (29): that of Geneva is still more ridiculous, which makes him engrave it first, and cast it afterwards. For to say nothing of the improbability of that kind of engraving being known so early, when we meet with nothing like it in all the fine works of Solomon's temple so long after, which was wrought with more art and greater deliberation, it is plain, that Aaron could not have time enough to get the mould ready, and metal melted, and the idol cast, and engraven, especially if, as the Jews affirm, he set it up on the very morrow after they had brought him the metal. The mistake is owing to their not attending to the various sense of the verb צור, Tzur, which signifies, to tie up, and bind, as well as to shape, and form, nor to that of the word חרש, Cherret, which though it may properly enough be rendered a graving tool in one or two places where it is used; yet in others signifies a bag: accordingly,

Naaman, the Syrian, is said to have tied up two talents of silver in two bags (30), in which place these two words צור, Tzur, and חרש, are used. We think them therefore in the right, who have rendered the verse now in question, and Aaron received them (the gold ear-rings) and tied them in a bag, and got them cast into a molten calf (31).

As for the calf itself, some ancient fathers have been of opinion, that it had only the face of one, and the form of a man from the neck downwards (32), in imitation of the Egyptian Isis (33); others have thought it to have had the head of an ox, and no body joined to it. But however, the most general opinion is, that it was a whole calf in imitation of the Egyptian Apis. But whatever the shape of it was, it is plain from some of the prophets (34), and especially from St. Stephen's words, in their hearts they returned into Egypt, and forced Aaron to make them a molten calf (35); that they learned this kind of idolatry, and contracted their incorrigible propensity to it, during their abode in Egypt.

(29) Exod. xxxii. 4. (30) 2 Kings v. 23. (31) LE SCHE. Essay on a N. Verf. (32) Vid. Hieron. LACT. AUGUST. AMBROS. & al. (33) Vid. HERODOT. lib. ii. cap. 41. (34) Isai. Exek. Amos & al. pass. (35) Acts vii. 39. & seq.

a of Egypt, and appointed the next day as a solemn festival to their new made deity; which they began with offering burnt sacrifices and peace-offerings to it, and concluded with feasting and dancing.

In the mean time, God, who beheld what passed in their camp, and that the ungrateful Israelites were rendering themselves more unworthy than ever of his care and protection, informed Moses of it, who by this time had spent full forty days in fasting and prayer; but with such threatening expressions against those idolaters, as made him fear that some heavy punishment, if not total destruction was going to fall upon them. But though God did all this while comfort him with promises of making him the father of as numerous a nation, as that of the Israelites then was, yet he b rather chose to intercede for them, and ceased not to sue for their pardon till he had obtained a kind of promise of it from him. After this taking the two tables, and his servant Joshua with him, he came down from the mountain. He was scarce got to the foot of it, before he was surprized with their strange shoutings, which, as he rightly guessed, were neither like those of a flying, or a pursuing army; but to his great grief he soon beheld the sad cause of it, the calf which his brother had set up, and the people dancing round it. His concern was so great, that he vented the first emotions of it by breaking the two tables, after which he went and upbraided his pusillanimous brother in the strongest terms, for having so easily yielded to the people's shameful desire, assuring him that he had not only brought a horrid sin upon them, c but had now made them naked to their shame in the midst of their enemies, meaning thereby, that he had publickly exposed their idolatrous and stubborn disposition to all the world, and layed them naked and open to the artifices, which their enemies would make use of to make them forfeit that divine protection, which alone could bring them safe into the promised land.

AARON failed not to lay the blame on the tumultuous people, which he said forced him to comply with their request; but Moses, instead of listening to his excuses, set himself immediately about the destruction of the idol, and the punishment of such of the delinquents, whom his presence had not yet driven away from the place where it was set up. He caused the calf to be taken down, to be d burnt and ground into powder, and cast into the water, of which he afterwards made all the people to drink (C). Whilst this was a doing, he cried aloud, who is on the Lord's side? and finding that the sons of Levi did immediately join themselves to him, he commanded them to gird on their swords, and to go and slay all, indifferently, whom they should still find at that idolatrous feast, without regard to age or quality, kindred, friendship, or acquaintance. These went forthwith from Moses's presence, and punished with immediate death about three thousand of those wretches, whom they caught straggling about in the midst of their mirth. Some copies of the

Moses comes down from the mount.

Breaks the two tables.

The Levites kill 3000 delinquents.

(C) This action of Moses, of melting, grinding, and powdering, the golden idol, in order to make the people drink it with the water into which he threw it, has been as strangely canvassed by several alchemists, as well as by our infidels, as it has been oddly defended by cabbalists and enthusiasts. The former have cried it down as unphilosophical and contrary to the known qualities of gold; the other have cried Moses up as having attained to the grand secret of transmutation †. These indeed are scarcely worth answering; but with respect to the former, it is plain, that gold may be reduced to a fine and almost impalpable powder, and it is no more than all our refiners know how to do. The Egyptians and other nations might likewise know some things concerning that metal, which have been since lost, by people's running into favourite hypotheses, perhaps upon some experiments not rightly understood, or not sufficiently bottomed. Nothing has been more commonly received than the notion, that gold cannot be destroyed; and yet the royal academy at Paris have a burning glass that will vitrify it in an instant, by evaporating all the sulphur of it, which crackles and flies up in a thick smoke, whilst the glass that remains can never be reduced into any other form. And Borrichius assures us, that he has, by a constant trituration of that metal in some simple distilled water, during the space of thirty days, raised this sulphur up to the surface of the water, upon which it appeared like a fine red oyl, whilst all the rest that subsided was only a greyish powder, which could never be reduced into any other form, but appeared, in all respects, the same with that which he had got out of baser metals by the same method of trituration; though none of the latter, not even silver, ever afforded any thing like that beautiful oyl which gold did (36).

The rabbies, however, pretend, that the reason of Moses's making the people drink this gold-powder, was in order to know the idolaters from the rest, for that, as soon as they had drank it, the beards of the former turned red. The cabalists add, that the idol weighed 125 quintals, or hundreds, which they gather from the Hebrew word מַסֶּכֶת, Masseket, whose numerical letters make 125. But why quintals rather than pounds, ounces, or talents, they give no reason for (37).

† Vid. Aur. tract. de lap. philosoph. SEN. ZADIK. de chemia. Arcan. Hermet. philosoph. & al.
(36) Vid. B. SIGON. N. Method. (37) R. TAUCHUM in Elle Shem. Rab. fol. 42.

Their zeal is rewarded.

Moses returns to the mount.

septuagint and the vulgate say twenty three, and others thirty three thousand; but besides that the original mentions no more than three thousand, and those versions are acknowledged by several eminent men of the church of Rome to be corrupt in this place †, it is hardly probable, that they could make so great a slaughter in so short a time. This timely zeal of the tribe of Levi, against those idolaters, did not go unrewarded: for it did not only wipe off that blemish which their progenitor had entailed upon them, for the bloody massacre of the Shechemites, but, in a very short time, procured them the Levitical priesthood; which, though subordinate to that of Aaron and his posterity, did entitle them to the tenths of all kinds of beasts, fruits, and grain in Israel; to the inferior ministry of the tabernacle, and afterwards of the temple; to a place in the judicial courts of every city and town; to the property of thirty-five cities, with all their lands, some of which were appointed cities of refuge; and to several other privileges and immunities, of which a further account shall be given in its proper place. In the mean time the people, who were witnesses of this dreadful example on the delinquents, and heard with what severity Moses had reproved his brother, were under the greatest consternation; at the sight of which, it is probable, his anger was in a great measure disarmed, since he contented himself with upbraiding them with their ingratitude and extreme folly, comforting them moreover with a promise that he would go up to the mountain again, and try how far his prayers could prevail with the divine mercy, and avert the punishment which they had deserved. He went up accordingly, and interceded so powerfully for them, that he at length obtained, not only their pardon, but a renewing of God's former promise of bringing them into the promised land under the conduct of his angel. However, both the pardon and promise were so far conditional, that the people were to make some atonement for their rebellion, by a solemn and publick act of humiliation, and a promise of being more obedient for the future; for in case they should, by a further relapse, bring down a fresh punishment upon themselves, this idolatry was likewise to be punished along with it (D)*. One of these conditions the people immediately embraced, and a solemn day of humiliation was kept throughout the whole camp, during which they divested themselves of all their gaudy apparel and costly ornaments: and in memory of this sin, and of the breaking of the two tables, the Jews have observed that fast yearly to this day. At the same time God, to administer some comfort to Moses, whom he saw struggling under such a heavy load of grief and care, and, as a further mark of his particular favour, was pleased, at his request, to grant him a sight of his glory, that is, as the context explains it, a sight of that angel, or rather divine conductor, under whose direction and care they were to go and conquer the promised land (E).

† CAJET. VATABL. LIPPOMAN. A. MONTAN. & al. vid. 1 Cor. x. 8. * Exod. xxxv. per tot. Ibid. ver. 12. & seq.

(D) The Jews have understood these words in so unlimited a sense, that they tell us upon the authority of one of their greatest rabbies, quoted by the Talmud (38), that God doth not inflict a punishment upon the world for any crying fault, in which there is not one twenty-fourth part of this sin of the golden calf put into the scale with it: but another (39), afraid lest that proportion should have been long since exhausted, hath confined it to the Israelites, and allows but about one ounce of the golden calf to go into the dose of every such punishment; so that it can hardly fail of lasting a considerable while, especially if the calf weighed so many hundred weights as they tell us it did. However, it is plain by the text, that God did only design to deter them from relapsing into the like crime, by threatening that in such a case he would inflict a double punishment upon them.

(E) It must be owned, that the account, which Moses gives us of this divine vision, is none of the clearest, insomuch that some of the expressions he uses, such as that he should not see God's face, but only his back, &c. have induced some free-thinkers to tax him, and all the Jews after him, with being Anthropomorphites, 'till they learned a more refined divinity from the Babylonians during their captivity. But it must be remembered, that Moses spoke to a gross and carnal people, in a language far from copious, especially in words or idioms suitable either to the deity, or to the dignity of the present glorious manifestation; and that it is therefore no wonder if he borrows his expressions from outward and sensible objects and actions. It is plain, that those who wrote in Greek, which is vastly more rich than the Hebrew, even the very writers of the new testament and the primitive fathers, who were the farthest from having any such absurd ideas of the godhead, have been forced to make use of the same figurative expressions in many places of their writings, for want of more proper and adequate ones, which were equally wanting in that as in the other tongue. Neither doth it appear that the Jews themselves understood Moses's words in that gross sense; on the contrary it is plain, that

(38) R. ISAAC in Talmud. Tract. Sanhedr.

(39) MOS. GERUNDENS. vid. MUNST. in loc.

- a MOSSES stayed in the mount another forty days and nights, during which, he tells us, he neither eat nor drank (F), but spent his whole time in praying and making two other tables, like unto those which he had broken, and in receiving some further instructions from God; after which he came down again to the people, who were not a little surprised to observe, that his face had contracted such a glorious lustre during his recess, that they could not intently behold it. This obliged him to cover it with a veil whenever he was to speak to them, which he took off whenever he went to receive God's commands*. By this time the people were become a little more tractable, and he had no sooner acquainted them, among other things, that God expected they should every one bring a free-will-offering of all sorts of materials for the tabernacle, ark, utensils, priestly garments, and the like; but both men and women shewed the greatest eagerness and readiness to contribute their richest jewels, metals, and other precious things <sup>A general offering of all the people.</sup> which they had got out of the spoils of the Egyptians and Amalekites; so that in one day he beheld them laying at his feet a more than sufficient quantity of precious stones, gold, silver, brass, shittim and cedar-wood, silk, cotton, linnen, and finest wool died in purple, scarlet, and other colours, a great number of skins of rams, badgers, and goats richly died, besides a large quantity of the richest oyls, spices, ointments and perfumes. All these he distributed to proper artists to be wrought in the richest manner, and made Bezaleel and Abolibama overseers of all the work*. These two
- b shewed such diligence, and employed so many hands in the work, that the tabernacle, and all its rich furniture and costly apparatus, were finished, and set up at the foot of mount Sinai, in less than six months. Aaron and his sons, being solemnly consecrated priests, began to offer up all kinds of sacrifices upon the new altar, according to the law of Moses. Soon after this, the heads of each tribe appeared <sup>Aaron consecrated high-priest.</sup> before Moses and Aaron, and presented a very considerable offering to God, in six waggons drawn each by two oxen, all which were received by Moses, and set aside for the service of the tabernacle†. Thus was this pompous worship begun, in the framing and instituting of which God was pleased to comply with their gross and carnal minds, which he saw was incapable of being affected with a purer and more
- d spiritual one*.

Aaron had not been long installed in his office of high-priest, before he had the mortification of seeing his two sons, Nadab and Abihu, struck dead by fire <sup>His sons killed by fire from heaven.</sup> that they had a notion that this angel or divine appearance, which directed them through the wilderness, was the Messiah, who did then take a visible form which they called the Shekinah, from שִׁכְנָה, Shakan, to dwell, under which he delivered his oracles and commands to them. By this Shekinah, some understand all the appearances which God took from the beginning, and others, only the Shekinah of fire and water, or the fiery and cloudy pillar spoken of a little higher. But they all agree, that it was the כֶּסֶד הַכְבוֹד, Kisseh kahabod, the throne of glory, one of the seven things which they affirm to have been created before the world (40).

* Exod. xxxiv. per tot. * Ibid xxxv. 20, 21. & seq. † Numb. vii. 1. & seq. * Exod. from Ch. xxxvi. to the end.

But, to disculpate at once the Jewish law-giver from such an imputation, we need but call to mind the glorious descriptions he gives almost every where, especially in Deuteronomy, of the god-head; what pains he takes to deter the Jews from making any representation of it under any form whatsoever, by reminding them, that when God vouchsafed to display his glory upon mount Sinai at the delivering of the ten commands, they saw no shape nor likeness, but only heard his dreadful voice. These so frequent inculcations may therefore be reasonably looked upon as a key to them, how to understand all those other expressions which he had been forced to accommodate to their capacity, that is, not in a literal sense, but in such a one as was worthy of the deity, and the dignity of the subject.

(F) Buxtorf quotes a Jewish proverb out of the large comment on Exodus, with respect to this miraculous fasting of Moses, which is to this purpose: 'that above, where there is neither eating nor drinking, Moses stayed 80 days, and became like the angels; and below where men do eat and drink, ministering angels came down, and eat and drank like them (41). By this one would be apt to think they attributed both the one and the other, rather to a change of climate, than to a miracle. But without enquiring whether Moses, and afterwards Christ, were miraculously supported without any kind of sustenance or not, we beg leave to observe, that the words which Christ quotes from Moses, that man doth not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceeds out of the mouth of God †, contains an hebraism which cannot be retained in a version, without conveying a wrong idea. Word, in the original, doth often signify thing, and is used in that sense by the writers of the new testament who, following their native idiom, make still use of that term to express any things or transactions. The text ought therefore to have been rendered, Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every thing that God has appointed or ordained for his nourishment †*; since it is plain, that Moses speaks, in the place quoted, not of his fasting, but of the manna which God gave the Israelites instead of bread.

(40) Vid. Chald. Paraph. in loc. & in Genes. i. 1. RAYM. MART. pag. 8d. DUPLESS. Cent. Jud. MUNT. not. in Gen. i. 1. & al. (41) Vid. BUXTORF. Lexic. sub. rad. DDJ. † Matth. iv. 4. out of Deut. viii. 3. * † LE SCEN. Essay on a N. Verf.

from heaven, for presuming to burn incense in the tabernacle with a strange fire, <sup>a</sup> contrary to God's command; whom Moses therefore ordered to be carried forth with out of the camp, and buried without any mourning or funeral pomp. Presently after this, he expressly forbade Aaron, and all his successors, to drink either wine or any intoxicating liquor, whenever they went into the tabernacle, lest they should incur the same fate with his two sons; from which the Jews do conclude, reasonably enough, that these two, being drunk when they went to burn incense, took some strange fire with them, instead of that holy one which God had ordered to be preserv'd in the tabernacle, and had been taken from that which fell miraculously on the first victims, that were offered upon the new altar, and had consumed them in the presence of all the people <sup>b</sup>.

The rebellion
at Taberah.

Moses had not long after a fresh occasion to observe how short-liv'd their tractable disposition was, tho' it had so lately shewed itself and upon so extraordinary an occasion, and that they were just ready for another rebellion, because he had made them take too long a march at their departure from the wilderness of Sinai. He made therefore all the haste he could to intercede for them, and to appease the divine anger which was already kindled, and had shewed its effects in an extraordinary fire which began to consume the extremities of the camp. His prayer was heard, and the fire ceased, upon which account the place was called Taberah, or burning <sup>c</sup>. However, Moses began to find, by this fresh instance of their stubbornness, that the burthen of government was like to prove still too heavy for him, notwithstanding his having thrown off a great part of it upon those magistrates, which he had chosen at Jethro's advice. He went to present his complaint at the tabernacle, where God was now pleased to speak to him from the mercy-seat; and God, to ease him of this load of care, commanded him to make choice of seventy of the most considerable of the elders of Israel, both for wisdom and integrity, to whom he should impart a portion of his spirit (G), and erect them into a supreme court, that they might bear their share of the burthen with him. Moses made no delay to obey God's command, and it was not long before he found the advantage of it; for they were no sooner removed from Taberah, but their very next incampment was signalized with a fresh insurrection. A mixt multitude <sup>d</sup> of the dregs of Egypt and other nations, who had followed the Israelites hitherto, began to murmur at the manna, and to regret their forsaking the garlic, onions, and flesh-pots of Egypt for it, and soon infected the whole camp with a longing after some better food. Moses's tent was beset on all sides with crowds who came, and, in a tumultuous manner, demanded that he should provide them flesh to eat instead of the manna, which their souls did now begin to loath. In this extremity Moses had recourse to God, complained of the unreasonableness of their demand, and that his tender care for them had only made them more rebellious and untractable; adding, that death in any shape was less terrible to him than the persecutions to which he was continually exposed.

The great council of seventy appointed.

A new murmuring for want of flesh.

THIS passionate expostulation shewed indeed something like despair in him, nevertheless God, who saw and weighed the many provocations which extorted it from him, instead of a rebuke, did immediately promise him a speedy remedy. He commanded him to call together the seventy elders to the door of the tabernacle, and whilst his glory drew the eyes of the whole camp towards it, he was pleased to promise them that he would send them such a present supply of flesh, as should serve them, not for a day or two, but for a whole month, till it be-

<sup>a</sup> Levit. x. 1, 2, & seq.
ver. ult.

<sup>b</sup> Num. x. 1. & seq.

<sup>c</sup> Vid. Chald. paraph. Vajicra. Rab. & al.

<sup>d</sup> Levit. ix.

(G) This the Jews, judiciously enough, compare to a candle lighting a great number of others, without losing any of its light. For Moses had such a rebellious crew to deal with, as would not permit him to part with the least portion of his spirit, which he found all too little to govern them (42).

The Talmudists tell us moreover (43), that Moses was greatly puzzled how to chuse these seventy out of the twelve tribes. If he chose six out of each, there would be two too many; if but five, there would be ten too few; and if he chose six out of some and five out of other tribes, he was sure of causing a fresh murmuring, if not a rebellion. At length he bethought himself of the following expedient; he chose six out of every tribe, then wrote upon seventy tickets the word Elder, the other two he left blank, after which he made them draw lots, assuring them, that those that drew the latter were set aside by the Lord. Concerning these two supernumerary ones, see the following note.

(42) Banmidbar. Rabbab. & Targ. JONATH. in loc. (43) Talm. TraB. Sankidr. fol. 17. col. 1.

- a came as loathsome to them as the manna was. At the same time, he imparted to the seventy elders such a share of his spirit, that they all began to prophesy (H); and the same gift continued with them as long as they lived. As for Moses, though his faith had hitherto been unshaken, yet the promise of such a surprizing supply of flesh appeared to him incredible, till he beheld the completion of it. The camp was at that time in Arabia Petrea, at a small distance from the red-sea; from the other side of which, a strong wind brought such infinite flocks of quails, that they not only covered the whole camp, but all the ground round about it for several miles. These birds being probably tired with their long flight, and not able to soar more than two cubits above the ground, were easily caught by the people, and in such quantities, that the least that any one of them gathered was ten Homers (I). Their first care was to glut themselves with them, after which they began to think how to preserve the rest from corrupting. But in the midst of their feasting, God was pleased to smite a great number of them with a sore disease, which carried them off with the meat, as it were, in their mouths: in memory of this severe punishment for their unrea-

Year of the
flood 1509.
before Christ 1490.

A supply of quails sent,
which lasted
30 days.

(H) Moses acquaints us in the same chapter (44), that there remained two in the camp, viz. Eldad and Medad, who were of the number of those that were written, but went not to the tabernacle, but prophesied in the camp; and that, when word was brought of it to him, Joshua proposed to have them silenced, but was highly blamed for envying them the gift of prophecy, instead of wishing that God would rather impart it to all the people. From which words St. Jerom, and others after him, have thought them to have been two of the seventy, who had forbore going to the tabernacle out of modesty (45): but had this been the case, there could have been no cause to wonder at their prophesying, nor for Joshua to have forbid them; so that it is more likely that these were the two that had been set aside by the lots, to whom nevertheless God imparted the spirit of prophecy, though they were not to have a seat in the great court of the seventy.

Some Jews affirm these two to have been brothers to Moses by the mother's side; others, that Amram, having repudiated Moses's mother, took another wife, by whom he had these two sons (46). There is a fragment of a spurious book quoted in Hermas (47), entitled, the prophecies of Eldad and Medad, or Eldam and Medal. As for the Rabbies, they are divided about the purport of their prophecies, some thinking that they foretold the destruction of Gog and Magog; others, the prodigious flight of the quails; and lastly, others, Moses's death in the wilderness, and Joshua's succeeding him.

As to this assembly of the seventy elders, the Jews, and after them Grotius, and some other Christians (48), have affirmed, that it was the same that became afterwards so famous under the name of Sanhedrin, to which even their kings and high-priests were subject. The Rabbies have left no stone unturned to prove that this Sanhedrin had constantly subsisted ever since its first institution by Moses; and that the members of it always assembled themselves before the tabernacle, wherever that was set up, either in the wilderness, or in the promised land, till the building of the temple by Salomon, who, they say, built a stately room or hall in the form of an amphitheatre, one half of which, being within the temple, they were not permitted to sit down in, but only in the other half which was without. They add further, that this supreme court was continued in Babylon during their captivity there, and that, at their return, it had the same place rebuilt in the second temple, and so continued till its total extinction under the Romans. However, as they bring no authority for all these and many other particularities relating to that assembly, except their bare traditions, they are justly rejected by the far greater part of Christians. Certain it is, that we do not find one word of such an high court, either in the times of Joshua, of the Judges, or of their Kings; nor indeed even after the Babylonish captivity, till the time of the Maccabees. And therefore we shall forbear giving any further account of this Sanhedrin, till we come to the time in which it is generally supposed to have been set up. As for these seventy elders, it is likely that they assisted Moses during their abode in the wilderness, and that there was an end of their assembly, as soon as they entered into the land of Canaan. Their other courts of judicature shall be mentioned in their proper place.

(I) Homer, or rather Chomer, is a measure which contains ten Baths, or five bushels; the Jews think חומר, Chomer, to be the same with חומר, Chamor, an ass, because the letters are the same, and consequently, that a Chomer is an ass's load (49). But this prodigious quantity of quails has appeared so incredible to some learned interpreters, that they have chosen to render the word Chomer, an heap; but even this version of ten heaps to each person, or even to each family, in a camp that consisted of near three millions of souls, will appear still too extraordinary, unless it be looked upon as altogether supernatural. To avoid, however, enlarging the miracle beyond what the text seems plainly to import, we have ventured to depart a little from our own and most other versions, which render the words of Moses as if the quails had lain two cubits, that is, above a yard thick upon the ground, which would be still more prodigious: whereas the original may properly enough be rendered, that they flew no higher than two cubits from it; and this quantity was more than sufficient to serve them a month, considering, that not only the camp, but all the ground for a day's journey round it was covered with it, and that flesh was not then eaten in such quantities as it is now, especially such as that of quails, which is too delicious and surfeiting to be eaten at any such rate.

(44) Numb. xi. 26. & seq.

(45) Ep. 127. Mansion 13.

(46) Vid. Tradit. Hebr. in

1 Chronic. iv. 17.

(47) HERM. lib. i. Vision 2. c. 5.

(48) GROT. Comm. pass. & de

Jur. Bell. & Pac. c. 3. art. 20. Vid. SELD. de Synedr. vet. Hebror. lib. ii. c. 13. LIGHTFOOT Hor. Hebr. & al.

(49) Fid. MUSEV. in loc.

A fierce plague destroys a great number of the rebels. Miriam struck with leprosy. Reasonable lust, the place was called Kibroth-bataavab, or the sepulchres of concupiscence; <sup>a</sup> from whence they removed to Cadesh-barneab, and thence to Hazarath <sup>b</sup>. In this encampment Miriam, Moses's sister, having been smitten with leprosy, as a punishment for some ill language she had given him, upon the account of his wife Ziphorah, of which we have given an account in a former note †; Moses, at her's and Aaron's request, obtained a cure for her, yet so that she was to remain without the camp, as a polluted person, seven days <sup>c</sup>; after which they removed again towards Cadesh-barneab in the wilderness of Paran. Here Moses was commanded to chuse twelve proper men, one out of each tribe, and to send them to search the land of Canaan; among whom were Joshua and Caleb. These twelve having received Moses's directions to view the whole land, to examine the strength of its cities and inhabitants, the nature and fertility of its soil and the like, set out upon their progress, which they performed in forty days.

Twelve spies sent to view the land.

AT their return from Rebob, which is at the foot of mount Lebanus, they past through the valley of Eshcol, so called, from the great quantity of the largest grapes with which it abounded, and is still to this day famed for, where they gathered a branch of a vine with a bunch of grapes of a prodigious size, which they threw over one of their staves, and brought between two upon their shoulders by turns, to prevent the grapes being bruised.

Ten of them bring an ill report.

BEING at length happily arrived at their camp, they went and made their report to Moses and Aaron, in the presence of the elders and of all the people. They began indeed with extolling the richness of the land, and shewed them a specimen of it in the bunch of grapes which they had brought with them, together with some of their finest pomegranates, figs, and other fruits; but as soon as they observed, that this account had inspired them with a desire of becoming the happy possessors of it by a speedy conquest; ten of them immediately altered their note, and began to represent it as a thing impossible, by reason of the number and strength of their fortified towns, and the bravery and gigantic stature of its inhabitants <sup>d</sup>. Joshua and Caleb alone remained firm in their report, and the latter, who observed a kind of despair in the people's looks, endeavoured in vain to encourage them, by assuring them, that such a glorious enterprize was nothing less than impossible; the people gave such credit to the cowardly account of the other ten, that they cried out one and all, that they could never hope to overcome such powerful and gigantic nations, in comparison of whom, they looked upon themselves as meer grass-hoppers and reptiles. Their murmuring grew to such a height before the next morning, that a return into Egypt was again looked upon as vastly preferable to such an undertaking, wherein they could expect nothing but to perish by the swords of the sons of Anach, and their wives and children to become their slaves. In this imaginary extremity, they were already consulting how to chuse themselves a leader, who should bring them back to the land of their former thralldom, and this in the presence of Moses and Aaron, and of Caleb and Joshua. But whilst these were endeavouring to divert them from such a base design, <sup>e</sup> by representing to them how easy and cheap the conquest of that fertile land might be to them, whilst they had God on their side, they were like to have been stoned by the tumultuous populace, had not their fury been in some measure suppress'd by the appearance of the glory of God in the cloud, which then covered the tabernacle, from which God was heard to speak to Moses in such threatening terms, as gave them cause to fear that some speedy and terrible judgment would be the reward of their rebellion and ingratitude.

And cause an insurrection.

All above 20 years of age excluded from entering into the promised land.

HERE Moses was forced again to become their intercessor, and made use of such powerful arguments and expostulations, that he did in some measure avert the divine vengeance. However the ingratitude and infidelity of those miscreants, <sup>f</sup> who had beheld his glorious appearance upon mount Sinai, who had been eye-witnesses of those wonders which he wrought both in Egypt and in the desert, and of the punishments which he had inflicted upon other rebels, was of too crying a nature, not to exact some conspicuous mark of the divine displeasure, which might at least serve as a warning to the rest. Wherefore God did then swear, that none of those, that were above twenty years of age, except Joshua and Caleb,

<sup>a</sup> Numb. xi. per tot. xiii. per tot.

† Vid. supr. p. 489. note (Y).

<sup>c</sup> Numb. xii. per tot.

<sup>d</sup> Ibid.

a should ever enter into the promised land ; and that the rest should wander from place to place during the space of forty years (K), till all their carcases were rotted in the wilderness. As for the ten wretches, whose false report occasioned this rebellion, they were all destroyed by a sudden death, and became the first instances of the punishment denounced against the whole nation * : in memory of which, the Jews do to this day keep a fast upon the seventh day of the sixth month, called Elul<sup>t</sup>, answering to our August.

THIS severe punishment, joined to the sentence of exclusion from entering into the promised land, did cause an universal mourning among the people ; however, as soon as they found themselves only condemned to this kind of lingering death, which
b to base minds is nothing so terrible as the immediate one, which they had reason to expect, they took it into their heads, that their crime might be attoned for in some measure, by expressing as great a degree and eagerness for the conquest, as they had against it, and by shewing as brave resolution to attack their enemies out of hand, as they had before their fear and despair of succeeding in it. Being thus fired with an untimely courage, they presented themselves early in the morning before Moses ready armed, and having acknowledged their base cowardice in the humblest terms, they told him that they were now ready to retrieve their credit by some noble exploit, either against the Amalekites, or against some of the Canaanitish nations. Moses strove in vain to divert them from such a rash enterprize, by represent-

c ing to them, that it was contrary to God's express command, who would have them go back into the desert towards the red-sea, and by assuring them that they would certainly perish in the attempt, because they had now forfeited the divine assistance and protection, without which it was impossible for them to succeed ; his speech did but whet their mushroom-valour the more, ever indocile and deaf to good counsel, they resolve to try their fortune, and to gain the passes of the neighbouring hills. These they found so well kept to their cost, that the Amalekites and Canaanites fell suddenly upon them, made a great slaughter of them, and pursued the rest as far as Hormah, and there discomfited them *. All this while Moses, who foresaw what would be the consequence of this rash enterprize, did wisely keep himself, and d the ark of the covenant, in the camp. In memory of this sad disaster, and of the continual dwindling of the people, during the remainder of the forty years, he is supposed to have composed the 90th psalm, in which he gives us a most lively image of the shortness and frailty of life. After some longer stay in this camp, they continued moving from place to place, but still in the same wilderness of Seir, during which time Moses received many other laws, the time and occasion of which not being mentioned by him, we shall give an account of the most remarkable ones in its proper place. However it is to be observed, that their encampments from this time were much longer than they had formerly been, seeing that we read but of seventeen of them, during the remaining thirty seven years, whereas this removal from Cadesh-barneab was the fifteenth encampment from their coming out of Egypt. We shall e not trouble our readers with a further detail of them at present ; those, who are desirous to have a more particular account of them, may find it in the annals of the learned archbishop Usher<sup>h</sup>.

DURING this long interval, the divine providence displayed itself in the most conspicuous manner in the forming and polishing this new springing generation, for whom the conquest of Canaan was reserved. The miraculous pillar * Num. xiv. 36, 37. to the end.

<sup>t</sup> מנחת תענית. See liber de Jejun. part. ult. § 14.

<sup>h</sup> Numb. xiv. 40.

<sup>a</sup> Ann. USHER, p. 19, 20.

(K) Moses here makes use of a round number, alluding to the forty days of the spies searching the land, though it is plain, that their children did enter it, thirty nine years after this sentence was pronounced against their fathers (50). It is further to be observed, that though this exclusion excepts none but Joshua and Caleb, yet there were certainly some others that cannot properly be said to have been included in it; such were Moses and Aaron, who had no part in the mutiny, but were excluded afterwards upon another account ; together with Eltazar, who died in the land of promise †, and a few more, especially of the tribe of Levi.

(50) Compare Numb. xxxii. 13. with Deut. ii. 14. Vid. USHER's Ann. p. 19. † Vid. Josh. xxiv. ver. ult.

God's wonderful care of this new generation.

continued still to direct them, and the manna to nourish them. Moses continued a still his intercourses with God, and, as if this had been too little, to assure them of his paternal care, the people's raiments, particularly their shoes, whether of men, women, or children, continued sound and whole<sup>1</sup>; and their feet unhurt, notwithstanding their long and frequent marches (L). If at any time the people relapsed into their usual murmurs and rebellions, as they often did, their punishment followed so close, so severely, and so universally, that their disobedience could neither be countenanced by the number of delinquents, nor flatter itself with hopes of impunity. However, it is plain by the sequel, that their behaviour was far from being answerable to that excess of care and tenderness which God shewed to them; for which reason the divine historian has thought fit to leave us but an imperfect account of the transactions of these remaining years, if we except some few rebellions and chastisements, which he committed to writing without order of time and place. And, indeed, they are so little to the honour of his nation, that he seemeth to mention them with regret, and to have been much more willing to have suppressed them, had not the glory of their great deliverer, as well as the stubbornness of the people obliged him to record them.

The sabbath-breaker accused, and put to death.

THE next transaction, indeed, we read of, would make one hope that some extraordinary change had been wrought in them, and that they would begin to fear God in good earnest, by the zeal which they shewed against a poor delinquent, whom they caught gathering a few sticks on the sabbath. Their fear lest his breach of a precept so esteemed, so solemnly inculcated, should bring some new judgment upon them, if they let him go unpunished, made them bring him before Moses, who ordered him to be put into custody till he had enquired of God, what was to be the punishment against sabbath-breakers; and on the next day, when he acquainted them that such a transgression should be punished with death, they immediately led him out of the camp, and there stoned and buried him<sup>2</sup>.

THOUGH Moses's sweet and tender disposition might, perhaps, make him look upon this as a very severe punishment, especially on the first transgressor, yet could he not chuse but be pleased with this new instance of their religious zeal, and to esteem it as an earnest of their future obedience; but this short-liv'd joy was soon imbittered by one of the most audacious conspiracies that was ever hatched against him (M). It was not like the former, occasioned through want of flesh or water, or the folly of a giddy and ungovernable mob, that thought themselves bereaved of their leader, or at the point of falling into the hands of their enemies; but this was a treason hatched with the utmost deliberation and secrecy in the breast of one of the chiefs of the tribe of Levi, and countenanced by some

<sup>1</sup> Deuter. viii. 4. xxix. 5.

<sup>2</sup> Numb. xv. 32, & seq.

(L) A certain bold critic of a neighbouring church † has taken a great deal of pains to prove, that there was nothing miraculous in all these and many other things, which are looked upon as such by all that are not endowed with the same perspicacity with himself. According to him, the meaning of those places, where the divine historian tells the Israelites, that their cloaths and shoes did not wear out during those forty years, is only this, that they were not drove to the necessity of going naked or barefoot, because they had the wool of their cattle to supply them with cloaths, and the skins of those beasts that were either killed or died a natural death, to make shoes of; so that it was no wonder that their feet never swelled by so many marches, when they could be so well shod. He is not the only one, by many, that has thus burlesqued the sacred scriptures, under pretence of vindicating them. For were Moses's words capable of this sense, as they are not, it would be plain either that he trifled with his people and his readers, or that he purposely couched these transactions in such terms, to make them appear miraculous to all but such sagacious heads as our critic; in which case we shall be at a loss to whom to ascribe the largest share of modesty, to the historian or to his interpreter. But the latter has been sufficiently censured for his boldness, and more fully confuted than we think he deserved*.

(M) It is not easy to guess in what year and place this sedition happened (51.) Some think it was in the desert of Sinai, others at Cadesh-barneah, and others at Jothbath (52). This last seems the most probable, because, where that encampment is mentioned, Moses tells us, that the Lord separated the tribe of Levi to be priests to administer unto him, and to bless the people in his name (53); but wherever it happened, it is plain, that the conspirators were far from giving any credit to Moses, or to his miracles, else they could never have been so insatuated as to run into the very jaws of that destruction, which he had so publicly threatened them with, in case they persisted in their rebellion.

† PEIRER. Appen. ad Exercit. de præadamit. pass. * Vid. int. al. CALM. Com. in Genes. (51)
 URIBER'S Ann. p. 20. (52) Vid. CALM. Comment. in loc. (53) Deuter. x. 7. & seq.

a of the most considerable men in the whole camp, especially of the tribe of Reuben <sup>1</sup>.

KORAH, the great grandson of Levi by his father Jahar, as Aaron also was <sup>Korah's rebel-</sup> by his father Anram, and consequently one of the heads of that tribe, unable to <sup>lion and ac-</sup> behold Aaron and his family raised to the high priesthood, to which he thought he <sup>complices.</sup> had an equal title, ceased not to cabal against him, till he had drawn a considerable <sup>Year of the</sup> number of eminent persons into his interest. Among these were Dathan, Abi- <sup>lood 1528,</sup> ram, and Hon, who were heads of the house of Reuben (N). Whether he thought <sup>before Christ</sup> that he should never gain his point against his rival, whilst Moses enjoyed the <sup>471.</sup> supreme legislative power, and consequently that it was necessary to inspire them with <sup>~~~~~</sup> an ambitious desire of supplanting him in it, or whether he had observed already some such design in those three chiefs, he played his part so well, that he drew them and two hundred and fifty more into his party. As soon as he found things ripe for an open rupture, he ventured to appear at their head, resolved to bear the brunt of the first onset against Moses and Aaron. He began with upbraiding them with their unjust ambition in ingrossing all the power into their hands, to the exclusion of the rest of the congregation, whom he affirmed to be holy as they. Moses was so surprised at the boldness of this speech, that he fell prostrate with his face to the ground; and after a short prayer, as is supposed, he arose; and, having gravely rebuked them for their presumption, desired them to put off all further debate till c next morning, when they might all appear at the door of the tabernacle, with each his censor in his hand, and at which time he promised, that the Lord should declare himself openly in favour of those whom he designed for that high office. After this, addressing himself to Korah and his Levites, he upbraided them for their ingratitude and arrogance, in not being contented with the dignity and privileges which God had annexed to their tribe; but aspiring to the high priesthood, which God had reserved for Aaron and his posterity.

Soon after this, he sent privately for Dathan and Abiram, whom he supposed to have been drawn by Korah into this conspiracy; with a design to have argued the case more calmly with them; but they not only refused to come, but sent his

d messenger back with an insolent answer, in which they upbraided him with having decoyed the whole nation out of the rich and fertile land of Egypt, under pretence of bringing them into a better, instead of which he only detained them in that barren wilderness to make them greater slaves to him; adding that he had now nothing more to do, but to put their eyes out, since they saw further into his ambitious designs than he would have them, and dared grieve to behold the author of all their misfortunes become their greatest tyrant <sup>m</sup>.

As meek and gentle as Moses naturally was, his patience was not proof against such a reproachful message; he appealed to the divine presence against the injustice of it, since those wretches could not but know that he had been so far from using e his power to the invading of the least portion of any man's property, that he had reaped hitherto nothing by it but care and vexation; begging at the same time of

<sup>1</sup> Num. xvi. pass.

<sup>m</sup> Ibid. ver. xii. & seq.

(N) It is plain from Moses's words, if rightly translated, that Korah was the first sower, as well as ring-leader of this conspiracy. They ran thus in the original; and Korah took Dathan, and Abiram, and On, and they rose up with two hundred and fifty of the children of Israel, &c. (54). What has misled most translators is the conjunction vau, (and) before Dathan, from whence they have taken the verb vajikach, took, though in the singular, to relate to all the four, though forced to make up the sense by the supplement of some accusative; thus some read it; and Korah, Dathan, &c. took men, others, took censers, others, took 250 men: whereas the verb, being in the singular, can only relate to the first, namely, Korah; and he it was who took, or, as the word may bear it, led up both Dathan, and Abiram, and On, &c. As for the vau, (and) it is plain, that it is often joined to the first as well as the other words that follow in order, in the same manner as the Greeks do their κα, or the Latins their et and que, as in hominesque, deosque, & caelum, & maria, & tellus, and the like; of which we shall give an instance or two out of the Psalms, וְכַבֹּד וְהַדָּר תַּעֲמִדָהוּ, coronabis eum & honore, & gloria (55). וְעַיִי וְאֶבְיֹן מְגֹלֵר, inopemque miserumque, liberabis a diripiente eum (56). וְאִין וְעַמֶּל בְּקִרְבָּהּ, sunt & iniquitas & perversitas in medio ejus (57).

We had not dwelt so long upon this critical note, had not some authors supposed this rebellion to have been at first excited by the Reubenites, in order to preserve the priesthood in the old channel of the first-born, which they saw Moses was now going to transfer to the tribe of Levi; for besides that this supposition is quite contrary to the whole tenor of Moses's account, it is hardly credible that if the Levites had been drawn into it by Dathan and Abiram, and merely upon that account he would have made use of such terms, as threw the far greatest part of blame against the former, of whose tribe he himself was, or placed Korah as the very head of the faction.

(54) Num. xvi. 1, 2, & seq.

(55) Ps. viii. 6.

(56) Ps. xxxv. 10.

(57) Ps. lv. 11.

God equally to reject the complaints and prayers of such ungrateful rebels. Early the next morning Moses and Aaron marched towards the tabernacle, whither Korah failed not to repair soon after at the head of his two hundred and fifty men, each having a copper censer in his hand. These were followed by a vast multitude of the people, who were come either to be spectators of this famous contest, or perhaps to back the seditious in case of an opposition. The first thing, that drew their eyes, was the glory which appeared in the cloud over the tabernacle, from which God was heard to command Moses and Aaron to withdraw themselves from the rebellious crew, lest they should perish with them in the ruin which was going to fall upon them. Here Moses was forced again to turn intercessor, and to beg of God, that he would not punish the innocent with the guilty; and the croud had no sooner separated themselves from Korah and his company, and followed him to the quarters of the Reubenites, where Dathan and Abiram, with their families, stood at their tent doors as it were in defiance; but Moses spake to the assembly to this purpose, that if those rebels died a common death, they should from thence forward be at liberty to call his divine commission in question; but that if the earth did immediately open itself in a miraculous manner, and swallowed them up alive, he then hoped that they would look upon him only as an instrument in God's hand, and sufficiently authorized for all he did. The words were scarce out of his mouth, and the people retired at a sufficient distance from the tents of the conspirators, when the earth clove asunder under their feet, and buried them alive, with all their families and substance. At the same time Korah and his whole company, who stood with their censers before the court of the tabernacle, were all destroyed by a supernatural fire, though their children were spared, because, in all likelihood, they had no share in their father's guilt. In memory of this dreadful judgment, and to deter, for the future, any but the sons of Aaron from presuming to burn incense before the Lord, Eleazar was commanded to take the censers of Korah and his men, and to beat them into broad plates for a covering of the altar; which he accordingly did.

Their dreadful punishment.

Causes a new insurrection against Moses.

In the mean time the people, who ran away terrified at the sight of so dreadful a spectacle, were scarce recovered from their fright, before they began to murmur afresh, and to accuse Moses and Aaron of having murdered the people of the Lord, as they called that seditious crew. These two ran immediately into the tabernacle, from whence the glory, appearing again in the cloud, did suspend for some time the fury of the insurrection. Here Moses, who foresaw that some terrible judgment was just ready to fall on the rioters, did immediately command his brother to take his censer, and to go and make atonement for the people: but though Aaron made all possible haste to obey him, the plague was not only begun, but had by that time raged with such furious speed, that it had destroyed fourteen thousand and seven hundred men, besides those who perished in the rebellion with Korah; all he could do was to stop its further progress, by interposing the propitiatory perfume between the living and the dead.

Aaron's priesthood confirmed by the budding of his rod.

THERE was certainly something surprising and unaccountable in the stubborn behaviour of these men, whatever they thought of their law-giver; for whether they looked upon his works as miraculous, and those heavy punishments, which befel them, as the effect of his too severe prayers, as Josephus thinks †, or whether they attributed the whole to his extraordinary skill in Egyptian magic, which is most likely, one would think that so many severe examples of his superior power might have deterred them long before, from making such dangerous attempts against him. However, to prevent Aaron's authority being any more called in question, God was pleased to confirm it by one miracle more. Aaron on the one side, and the head of every tribe on the other, were ordered to bring each an almond rod, with their names written upon it, and these were to be deposited in the tabernacle till the next morning, by which time the Lord would decide in favour of that family, on whose rod some visible and miraculous change was found. Accordingly, when they came to examine them on the morrow, Aaron's rod alone was found to have budded, and brought forth leaves and ripe almonds; and Moses was ordered to lay it up in the ark, as a standing testimony in favour of the Aaronic race, and as a monument of the late rebellion. The people had nothing to object either against his proceeding, or against the miracle, but yet could they not forbear making some grievous complaints against the severity of God's punishments.

u Vid. Num. xxvi. 11. j Ibid. ver. 12, 13.

o Ibid. xvi. per tot.

† Ant. lib. iv. c. 4.

p Num. xvii. per tot.

However,

- a However, from that day there was an express prohibition made, against any but the sons of Aaron, to presume to come into the tabernacle under pain of death; and at the same time some further ordinances were renewed concerning the office of the Levites, who were only to minister to the priests; but were interdicted approaching either the altar or any of the consecrated utensils, under the same penalties. The portion and perquisites of both priests and Levites were likewise appointed, together with some other regulations relating to their ministry; in particular, that of making the waters of separation, and the use of them to purify all unclean persons from any contracted impurities.
- b By this time they had wandered near thirty years in the desert of Arabia Petrea, and had been thirty nine years out of Egypt (1), still moving from one place to another about the mountains of Idumea; during which time, they were guilty of many more murmurings and idolatries than Moses has thought fit to record, but which have been preserved by other inspired writers, who have severely upbraided them with setting up and carrying about the idols of Rempban, Malkom, and many others (O) of the like stamp. However, the time drawing near for their entering into the promised land, they went from Ezion Geber, towards Kadesh in the wilderness of Zin, designing probably to have entered Canaan by the narrow passes called the way of the spies; but they were discomfited in their first attempt by Arad, one of the kings of the Canaanites, who killed a great number of them, and took some considerable spoil from them. Upon this they vowed all the cities of Arad to destruction; soon after which they made a second push, wherein they had much better success, and having defeated the king, and destroyed some of his towns, they called the field of victory Hormah, or Chormah, that is, Anathema, or utter destruction; though the total one of that country did not happen till the time of Joshua (P).
- c

1 Num. xviii. & xix. pass. Vid. Usser. sub. an. Amos v. 26. Ezek. & Psal. pass. Acts vii. 43. & alib. † Vid. sup. p. 330. b. & sub not (W) & (X). Num. xxi. 1, 2. & seq. Josh. xii. 14.

(O) It would scarce be credible, that the Israelites could ever be guilty of so many horrid idolatries under Moses's note, and in sight of all God's wonderful works and severe punishments, were we not well assured of it from the mouth of so many inspired writers, who all agree in this, that they had contracted such an invincible propensity towards it in Egypt, that they not only persisted in the worship of the Egyptian deities, but adopted moreover every new one which came in their way, as they became acquainted with other nations (58). But as to the deities themselves, we have nothing certain but their names; all that has been writ concerning their extraction, their figure, and the way of worshipping them being nothing but mere conjecture, as has been observed more than once already †††. Their names, as we find them mentioned in some of the authors above quoted, are Moloch, Chim, and Rempban; to which they added a vast number of others in process of time. One thing however appears more than probable, with respect to one part of the worship of these idols, from the places above quoted, and some others (59); namely, that they used to carry them about in tabernacles, or under canopies in carts, or upon priests shoulders, not only as they removed from place to place, but likewise at certain times, and upon certain occasions, in a kind of procession (60). To this the psalmist seems to allude in the 16th psalm above quoted, where he expresses himself thus, יִרְבּוּ עַצְבוֹתָם אַחֲרַי מִהֵרָא, &c. which ours, after most other versions, renders, their sorrows shall be multiplied that run, or hasten after other gods; whereas, the word עַצְבֵּי betzeb signifying also idols, the verse may more properly be rendered thus: though their idols be multiplied; or, according to the Hebrew idiom, let them multiply their idols; let them run or hasten after them; or let others multiply their idols, &c. as for me, I will be so far from offering them any drink or blood-offerings, that I will not so much as mention their names with my lips. According to which version, the sense is perfect and clear without those suppletives, without which the other cannot be understood. Those, who are desirous to be more particularly informed about all these false deities, may, at their leisure, consult those who have treated of them in a more ample manner, especially those quoted in the margin (61).

(P) The Jews have a tradition, founded on an express text in Deuteronomy (62), and some parallel places in Joshua, that the Israelites were obliged to send a herald to offer peace in their name to every city and people, before they attempted to conquer it by the sword; and that in case they accepted it, they became only tributaries to them, but if they refused their offer, they were then to be vowed to destruction; and that this command of God extended even to the seven nations of the Canaanites, contrary to the current opinion, that these had been long before under an anathema for their wickedness. However, Maimonides has taken a great deal of pains to confute this common notion, and to prove that all those nations, that were cut off by the Israelites, owed their destruction to their chusing to try the fortune of war, rather than to accept of peace upon such terms. There is, indeed, one main objection against him, namely the stratagem which the Gibsonites made use

(58) Exod. xxxii. 4. Levit. xvii. 7. Num. xxv. 3. & seq. Deut. pass. Josh. xxiv. 14. Psalm lxxviii. cvi. & al. pass. Jer. vii. 30. & seq. Ezek. xiv. & xvi. pass. Amos v. 25, 26. Acts vii. 43. & alib. ††† Vid. sup. p. 132. & seq. 397. & seq. (59) Ps. xvi. 4. Isai. xli. 7. & Baruc. vi. 3. 25. (60) Vid. Hieronymot. l. iv. Clem. Alex. Strom. l. v. Macrob. Satur. l. i. Philo Bybl. ap. Euseb. prap. l. i. N. 10. & al. mult. (61) Vid. Grot. in loc. Voss. de Idololat. Selden de diis Syr. Le Clerc Com. in loc. SAURIN'S Discourse, and CALMET'S Dissertation on that subject. (62) Deut. xx. 10. & seq. Josh. xi. pass.

Gon er
 ly the failed havir peop back
 the hea left
 H not fel nit
 we die
 vi m le a l
 d
 l
 i

Their dreadful punishment.

Causes of insurrection against Mo

*An hour by
 of*

- a to cast a brazen serpent of the same figure with those that infested them, and to set it upon a pole upon some eminent ground, that as many as were bitten by the serpents might be healed by looking upon it<sup>1</sup>. As soon as they were delivered by this means from the plague, they marched towards Phunon<sup>2</sup>, since known by the name of Metalls Phunon, by reason of the copper mines with which it abounded<sup>3</sup>, and might, perhaps, have its first name from Phinon, one of the dukes or princes of Edom<sup>4</sup>; from thence they removed to Oboth, called by Pliny, Ebotha. This was their thirty-seventh encampment; their next was at Jie abarim (T), upon the borders of Moab, that is, in that part of the desert which lieth over against the land of Moab eastward<sup>5</sup>, and is therefore called the desert of Moab<sup>6</sup>. Soon after this, as they were removing to pass the brook or valley of Zared, God forbid them to commit any hostilities against the Moabites and Ammonites<sup>7</sup>, because he had given them the land they dwelt in, and obliged them to take a large turn round their country to come at that of Canaan. They arrived at length at Bamoth, or Bamoth-arnon, that is, the high places of Arnon, under which is a fine valley belonging to the Moabites, along which the brook or torrent of Arnon runs (V); and pitched at the foot of mount Pisgab. From thence they removed to Beer, so called from the well which the heads of Israel digged there by God's direction; and this gave birth to that song of Moses which was sung by the Israelites, the burthen of which begins with the words, Spring up, O well, sing ye unto it<sup>8</sup>.
- c AFTER several marches, in which they passed, as it were, between the countries of Moab and Ammon, without committing the least hostilities on either side, they came at length to the land of the Amorites. Here they sent again to beg a peaceable passage through the territories of Sibon, king of Heshbon. But that prince having refused to

<sup>1</sup> Numb. xxi. 4. & seq. <sup>2</sup> Ibid, xxxiii. 42. <sup>3</sup> Ibid. ver. 9, 18, 19. <sup>4</sup> Num. xxi. 17. & seq.

<sup>5</sup> Vid. EUSEB. loc. Hebr. sub Phenon. <sup>6</sup> Gen. xxxvi. 41. <sup>7</sup> Num. xxi. 11. <sup>8</sup> Deut. ii. 8.

by a kind of providence from multiplying as other serpents do; but the Arabians tell us, that after they have coupled together, the female never fails to kill the male, and that her young ones kill her as soon as they are hatched. The learned Bochart, from whom we have this account of them, tells us further (69), that they are short, and spotted with divers colours, and that their wings resemble those of a bat. He quotes a great number of antient and modern authors to prove, that they are the same with the Hydra of the Greeks and Latins. Herodotus, who went on purpose to the city of Buto to see them, says, that they are not unlike the Hydra; and that he had seen a vast quantity of their skeletons, whose flesh had been devoured by the Ibis (70), which bird is peculiar to Egypt, and a continual destroyer of those serpents, as we have shewed elsewhere<sup>1</sup>. There was no need therefore of any other miracle, the Israelites being then in Arabia Petrea, than a strong wind to blow them into their camp, it being then the hot season of the year, in which they are affirmed to commonly fly in great swarms from Lybia and Arabia towards Egypt, and other countries in that neighbourhood (71).

(T) It must be observed here, that when Moses tells us, that they encamped at Oboth, Jie-abarim, and other cities belonging to the Edomites and Moabites, he is not to be understood as if they came to or near those places, but only that they encamped at such convenient distance from them, that they might easily get a supply of provisions from them, without giving them any umbrage of their having any hostile design against them.

(V) The brook or torrent of Arnon runs along between the countries of the Ammonites and Moabites, and discharges itself into the black-sea (72). The book of the wars of the Lord, mentioned by Moses (73), seems to intimate some such miraculous transaction at this brook, as had been at the red-sea; and we find some passages in the psalms, and in the prophet Habakkuk (74), which the Chaldees paraphrast doth understand as if the brook Arnon had been dried up, or miraculously divided, to make a passage for God's people. However, it must be owned, that the words of Moses are somewhat obscure, and variously understood both by Jews and Christians; and that the words וְהָבָה סוּפָה, Vabeb Supbah, may be the proper names of places, as we find it in the margin of our bibles, and as Dav. Kimchi, and some Christians understand them (75); but we rather chuse the exposition of R. Salomon, who thinks the Vau in וְהָבָה to be put for the Jod, which often happens, and that it ought to be read יְהָבָה Jabeb, and then the sense will be, what the Lord brought upon Supbah, that is, on the red-sea, and on the brook Arnon.

As to the book of the wars of the Lord, the generality of Christians think, that it is one of those that were lost, either at the captivity or the burning of the temple (76), if not during Manasseh's wicked reign. The generality of the Jews, unwilling to admit that one jot, much less a whole book, of holy writ should be lost, have fancied that the book of Judges is prophetically meant by it, and understand the verb יִמָּנֵר, Yamner, in the future tense, it shall be said, or recorded in time, in the book of, &c. because in Judges there are several wars mentioned between the Jews and their neighbours, in which God did visibly appear in favour of the former. However, the most received opinion is, that this and some other books mentioned in the old testament were actually lost.

(69) De Animal. Sac. p. 2. l. iii. c. 13. (70) HEROD. l. ii. c. 75, 76. † Vid. sup. p. 182. b.
(71) Vid. BOCHART ubi sup. & autor. ab eo citat. (72) Vid. Num. xxi. 13. (73) Ibid. ver. 14.
(74) Vid. Ps. lxxiv. 15. Habakkuk iii. 13. & seq. (75) KIMCHI. in rad. vid. JUN. in loc.
(76) Vid. PACKHURST'S Mazarab, p. 185. MUNST. in loc.

ABOUT this time also it was that the king of Edom, having refused a free passage through his country to the Israelites, though asked on the most peaceable and friendly terms, they were, in all likelihood, going to take some severe revenge for the affront; but God, who would not suffer them to commit any hostilities against them, because they were their brethren, caused them to take a turn round their country, and to march peaceably away towards mount Hor †, where Miriam, Moses's sister, died soon after (Q), in the hundred and thirtieth year of her age, being about eight or ten years older than Aaron *, who died in the hundred and fortieth of his, in the very year following.

A new murmuring for want of water.

Moses smites the rock twice.

Year of the flood 1517, before Christ 1452.

Aaron's death.

WHILST they continued at Kadesh, a little before Aaron's death, a new murmuring arose for want of water, and Moses was again commanded by God to bring them a fresh supply out of the rock; but he did it in such a manner as was highly displeasing to him: for God had commanded him to call for the water by only speaking to the rock; but he, whether out of impatience at their loud murmurs, or out of diffidence of the promised supply, smote it twice with his rod, and used some undecent expression, either to the rock or to the people ***, for which he was excluded from setting his foot into the promised land, and condemned to die in the wilderness. Aaron was likewise included in the same sentence, as having, doubtless, shared in the fault. In memory of this new rebellion the place was called Meribah, strife, from which they went and encamped at the foot of mount Hor, on the frontier of the land of Edom. Here Moses was commanded to take Aaron, and Eleazar his son, to the top of the mountain in the sight of all the people, and to strip the father of his priestly robes, and to array the son with them; which was no sooner done than Aaron died, and was buried there: but whether by Moses or Eleazar, or by some other person, certain it is that the place was kept so private, that none of the sepulchre-mongers of those countries could ever find it out, or have since dared to substitute another in lieu of it. The children of Israel mourned thirty days for him, and Eleazar succeeded him in the high priesthood (R).

Soon after the days of mourning were over, they went and encamped at Zalmomonah; which place took that name from the image or figure of the brazen serpent which Moses caused to be set up there *. For the Israelites, being tired with the length of their journey, and labouring under a scarcity of provision, began to murmur afresh against Moses, in so grievous a manner, that God was provoked to send large flights of fiery serpents among them, which destroyed such multitudes of that rebellious people, that the rest came, and, in the humblest terms, acknowledged their fault to Moses, begging of him to deliver them from that destroying vermin (S). Moses, applying himself to God, was commanded use of to obtain peace from Israel, which would have been needless, had the latter been forced to offer it before all things; but to this our learned Jew above mentioned answers, that the reason of the Gibeonites policy was, that they had, in common with their neighbours, refused the first offers of peace, and were consequently doomed to the same fate with them; to prevent which, their ambassadors feigned themselves to come from a country vastly distant from any of those seven, and as such obtained the desired peace (63). However, it is plain from this tradition, and the rabbi above mentioned, that this peace was to be offered to those nations upon certain conditions, the two principal of which were, that they should own a subjection, and pay tribute to the Israelites; and that they should observe the seven precepts given to Noah, in case they refused to be circumcised.

† Num. xx. 14. Deut. ii. 8, 9. Vid. sup. p. 313. & seq. * Vid. sup. p. 477. note (K). *** Vid. Pf. cvi. 32, 33. † Num. xx. 23. & seq. * Ibid. xxi. 9.

(Q) Eusebius (64) tells us, that Miriam's sepulchre was still extant in his time at Kadesh, at a small distance from the city of Petra, the metropolis of Arabia Petra †. Some ancient fathers think that she died a virgin (65), and that she was the legistatrix or governess of the Israelitish women, as her brother Moses was of the men (66).

(R) Aaron's death happened upon Tuesday the first day of the fifth month (which is our August) in the fortieth year after the Exod, and in the hundred and twenty third year of his age (67).

(S) A certain author (68) has endeavoured to prove, that those insects were only little worms which bred in the skin, but of such a venomous nature that they immediately poisoned those that were infected with them; but it is plain, not only that the original words, נחשים השרפים Nechaschim basorepbim, signify a burning or winged serpent; but likewise, that those creatures are very common, both in Egypt and Arabia; inasmuch that those countries would become uninhabitable, if those serpents had not been debarr'd by

(63) MAIMON. op. Caneum. & BASHAG. Rep. Hebr. tom. i. lib. 2. cap. 20. (64) Loc. Habr. † Vid. sup. p. 481. note (Q). (65) GREC. NYSSER. & AMBROS. de Virginitat. & al. (66) THEOD. in Micah vi. 4. (67) Vid. Annal. USHER, p. 22. (68) FORTUN. LICET. lib. de spontan. vivunt. etc. vid. USHER ubi sup.

- a to cast a brazen serpent of the same figure with those that infested them, and to set it upon a pole upon some eminent ground, that as many as were bitten by the serpents might be healed by looking upon it<sup>1</sup>. As soon as they were delivered by this means from the plague, they marched towards Phunon<sup>2</sup>, since known by the name of Metallu Phunon, by reason of the copper mines with which it abounded<sup>3</sup>, and might, perhaps, have its first name from Phinon, one of the dukes or princes of Edom<sup>4</sup>; from thence they removed to Oboth, called by Pliny, Ebotha. This was their thirty-seventh encampment; their next was at Jie abarim (T), upon the borders of Moab, that is, in that part of the desert which lieth over against the land of Moab eastward<sup>5</sup>; and is therefore called the desert of Moab<sup>6</sup>. Soon after this, as they were
- b removing to pass the brook or valley of Zared, God forbid them to commit any hostilities against the Moabites and Ammonites<sup>7</sup>, because he had given them the land they dwelt in, and obliged them to take a large turn round their country to come at that of Canaan. They arrived at length at Bamoth, or Bamoth-arnon, that is, the high places of Arnon, under which is a fine valley belonging to the Moabites, along which the brook or torrent of Arnon runs (V); and pitched at the foot of mount Pisgab. From thence they removed to Beer, so called from the well which the heads of Israel digged there by God's direction; and this gave birth to that song of Moses which was sung by the Israelites, the burthen of which begins with the words, Spring up, O well, sing ye unto it<sup>8</sup>.
- c AFTER several marches, in which they passed, as it were, between the countries of Moab and Ammon, without committing the least hostilities on either side, they came at length to the land of the Amorites. Here they sent again to beg a peaceable passage through the territories of Sibon, king of Heshbon. But that prince having refused to

<sup>1</sup> Numb. xxi. 4. & seq. <sup>2</sup> Ibid. xxxiii. 43. <sup>3</sup> Ibid. xxxvi. 41. <sup>4</sup> Num. xxi. 11. <sup>5</sup> Deut. ii. 8.

<sup>6</sup> Vid. EUSEB. loc. Hebr. sub Phenon. <sup>7</sup> Gen. <sup>8</sup> Ibid. ver. 9, 18, 19. <sup>9</sup> Num. xxi. 17. & seq.

by a kind of providence from multiplying as other serpents do; but the Arabians tell us, that after they have coupled together, the female never fails to kill the male, and that her young ones kill her as soon as they are hatched. The learned Bochart, from whom we have this account of them, tells us further (69), that they are short, and spotted with divers colours, and that their wings resemble those of a bat. He quotes a great number of ancient and modern authors to prove, that they are the same with the Hydra of the Greeks and Latins. Herodotus, who went on purpose to the city of Buto to see them, says, that they are not unlike the Hydra; and that he had seen a vast quantity of their skeletons, whose flesh had been devoured by the Ibis (70), which bird is peculiar to Egypt, and a continual destroyer of those serpents, as we have shewed elsewhere†. There was no need therefore of any other miracle, the Israelites being then in Arabia Petraea, than a strong wind to blow them into their camp, it being then the hot season of the year, in which they are affirmed to commonly fly in great swarms from Lybia and Arabia towards Egypt, and other countries in that neighbourhood (71).

(T) It must be observed here, that when Moses tells us, that they incamped at Oboth, Jie-abarim, and other cities belonging to the Edomites and Moabites, he is not to be understood as if they came to or near those places, but only that they encamped at such convenient distance from them, that they might easily get a supply of provisions from them, without giving them any umbrage of their having any hostile design against them.

(V) The brook or torrent of Arnon runs along between the countries of the Ammonites and Moabites, and discharges itself into the black-sea (72). The book of the wars of the Lord, mentioned by Moses (73), seems to intimate some such miraculous transaction at this brook, as had been at the red-sea; and we find some passages in the psalms, and in the prophet Habakkuk (74), which the Chaldee paraphrast doth understand as if the brook Arnon had been dried up, or miraculously divided, to make a passage for God's people. However, it must be owned, that the words of Moses are somewhat obscure, and variously understood both by Jews and Christians; and that the words וְהָבָה סוּפָה, Vahab Suppah, may be the proper names of places, as we find it in the margin of our bibles, and as Dau. Kimchi, and some Christians understand them (75); but we rather chuse the exposition of R. Salomon, who thinks the וְהָבָה in וְהָבָה to be put for the Yod, which often happens, and that it ought to be read יְהָבָה Jahab, and then the sense will be, what the Lord brought upon Suppah, that is, on the red-sea, and on the brook Arnon.

As to the book of the wars of the Lord, the generality of Christians think, that it is one of those that were lost, either at the captivity or the burning of the temple (76), if not during Manasseh's wicked reign. The generality of the Jews, unwilling to admit that one jot, much less a whole book, of holy writ should be lost, have fancied that the book of Judges is prophetically meant by it, and understand the verb יִמְצָא, Yeama, in the future tense, it shall be said, or recorded in time, in the book of, &c. because in Judges there are several wars mentioned between the Jews and their neighbours, in which God did visibly appear in favour of the former. However, the most received opinion is, that this and some other books mentioned in the old testament were actually lost.

(69) De Animal. Sac. p. 2. l. iii. c. 13. (70) HEROD. l. ii. c. 75, 76. † Vid. sup. p. 182. b.
(71) Vid. BOCHART ubi sup. & autor. ab eo citat. (72) Vid. Num. xxi. 13. (73) Ibid. ver. 14.
(74) Vid. Ps. lxxiv. 15. Habakkuk iii. 13. & seq. (75) KIMCHI. in rad. vid. JUN. in loc.
(76) Vid. PACKHURST's Mazorab, p. 185. MUNST. in loc.

ABOUT this time also it was that the king of Edom, having refused a free passage through his country to the Israelites, though asked on the most peaceable and friendly terms, they were, in all likelihood, going to take some severe revenge for the affront; but God, who would not suffer them to commit any hostilities against them, because they were their brethren, caused them to take a turn round their country, and to march peaceably away towards mount Hor †, where Miriam, Moses's sister, died soon after (Q), in the hundred and thirtieth year of her age, being about eight or ten years older than Aaron *, who died in the hundred and fortieth of his, in the very year following.

A new murmuring for want of water.

Moses smites the rock twice.

Year of the flood 1517, before Christ 1452.

Aaron's death.

WHILST they continued at Kadesh, a little before Aaron's death, a new murmuring arose for want of water, and Moses was again commanded by God to bring them a fresh supply out of the rock; but he did it in such a manner as was highly displeasing to him: for God had commanded him to call for the water by only speaking to the rock; but he, whether out of impatience at their loud murmurs, or out of diffidence of the promised supply, smote it twice with his rod, and used some undecent expression, either to the rock or to the people *** for which he was excluded from setting his foot into the promised land, and condemned to die in the wilderness. Aaron was likewise included in the same sentence, as having, doubtless, shared in the fault. In memory of this new rebellion the place was called Meribah, strife, from which they went and encamped at the foot of mount Hor, on the frontier of the land of Edom. Here Moses was commanded to take Aaron, and Eleazar his son, to the top of the mountain in the sight of all the people, and to strip the father of his priestly robes, and to array the son with them; which was no sooner done than Aaron died, and was buried there: but whether by Moses or Eleazar, or by some other person, certain it is that the place was kept so private, that none of the sepulchre-mongers of those countries could ever find it out, or have since dared to substitute another in lieu of it. The children of Israel mourned thirty days for him, and Eleazar succeeded him in the high priesthood (R).

Soon after the days of mourning were over, they went and encamped at Zalmunah; which place took that name from the image or figure of the brazen serpent which Moses caused to be set up there †. For the Israelites, being tired with the length of their journey, and labouring under a scarcity of provision, began to murmur afresh against Moses, in so grievous a manner, that God was provoked to send large flights of fiery serpents among them, which destroyed such multitudes of that rebellious people, that the rest came, and, in the humblest terms, acknowledged their fault to Moses, begging of him to deliver them from that destroying vermin (S). Moses, applying himself to God, was commanded use of to obtain peace from Israel, which would have been needless, had the latter been forced to offer it before all things; but to this our learned Jew above mentioned answers, that the reason of the Gibeonites policy was, that they had, in common with their neighbours, refused the first offers of peace, and were consequently doomed to the same fate with them; to prevent which, their ambassadors feigned themselves to come from a country vastly distant from any of those seven, and as such obtained the desired peace (63). However, it is plain from this tradition, and the rabbi above mentioned, that this peace was to be offered to those nations upon certain conditions, the two principal of which were, that they should own a subjection, and pay tribute to the Israelites; and that they should observe the seven precepts given to Noah, in case they refused to be circumcised.

† Num. xx. 14. Deut. ii. 8, 9. Vid. sup. p. 313. & seq. * Vid. sup. p. 477. note (K). *** Vid. Pf. cvi. 32, 33. † Num. xx. 23. & seq. † Ibid. xxi. 9.

(Q) Eusebius (64) tells us, that Miriam's sepulchre was still extant in his time at Kadesh, at a small distance from the city of Petra, the metropolis of Arabia Petra †. Some ancient fathers think that she died a virgin (65), and that she was the legislatrix or governess of the Israelitish women, as her brother Moses was of the men (66).

(R) Aaron's death happened upon Tuesday the first day of the fifth month (which is our August) in the fortieth year after the Exod, and in the hundred and twenty third year of his age (67).

(S) A certain author (68) has endeavoured to prove, that those insects were only little worms which bred in the skin, but of such a venomous nature that they immediately poisoned those that were infected with them; but it is plain, not only that the original words, נחשית השרפיים Nechashim basorephim, signify a burning or winged serpent; but likewise, that those creatures are very common, both in Egypt and Arabia; inasmuch that those countries would become uninhabitable, if those serpents had not been debarred by

(63) MAIMON. ap. CUNÆUS. & BASNAG. Rep. Hebr. tom. i. lib. 2. cap. 20. (64) Loc. Hebr. † Vid. sup. p. 481. note (Q). (65) GREC. NYSSEN. & AMBROS. de Virginitat. & al. (66) THEOD. in Micah vi. 4. (67) Vid. Annal. USHER, p. 22. (68) FORTUN. LICET. lib. de spontan. viventi. ort. vid. USHER ubi sup.

- a to cast a brazen serpent of the same figure with those that infested them, and to set it upon a pole upon some eminent ground, that as many as were bitten by the serpents might be healed by looking upon it<sup>1</sup>. As soon as they were delivered by this means from the plague, they marched towards Phunon<sup>2</sup>, since known by the name of Metallus Phunon, by reason of the copper mines with which it abounded<sup>3</sup>, and might, perhaps, have its first name from Phinon, one of the dukes or princes of Edom<sup>4</sup>; from thence they removed to Oboth, called by Pliny, Eboda. This was their thirty-seventh encampment; their next was at Jie abarim (T), upon the borders of Moab, that is, in that part of the desert which lieth over against the land of Moab eastward<sup>5</sup>, and is therefore called the desert of Moab<sup>6</sup>. Soon after this, as they were
- b removing to pass the brook or valley of Zared, God forbade them to commit any hostilities against the Moabites and Ammonites<sup>7</sup>, because he had given them the land they dwelt in, and obliged them to take a large turn round their country to come at that of Canaan. They arrived at length at Bamoth, or Bamoth-armon, that is, the high places of Arnon, under which is a fine valley belonging to the Moabites, along which the brook or torrent of Arnon runs (V); and pitched at the foot of mount Pisgab. From thence they removed to Beer, so called from the well which the heads of Israel digged there by God's direction; and this gave birth to that song of Moses which was sung by the Israelites, the burthen of which begins with the words, Spring up, O well, sing ye unto it<sup>8</sup>.
- c AFTER several marches, in which they passed, as it were, between the countries of Moab and Ammon, without committing the least hostilities on either side, they came at length to the land of the Amorites. Here they sent again to beg a peaceable passage through the territories of Sibon, king of Heshbon. But that prince having refused to

<sup>1</sup> Numb. xxi. 4. & seq.<sup>2</sup> Ibid. xxxiii. 42.<sup>3</sup> Vid. EUSEB. loc. Hebr. sub Phenon.<sup>4</sup> Gen.

xxxvi. 41.

<sup>5</sup> Num. xxi. 11.<sup>6</sup> Deut. ii. 8.<sup>7</sup> Ibid. ver. 9, 18, 19.<sup>8</sup> Num. xxi. 17. & seq.

by a kind of providence from multiplying as other serpents do; but the Arabians tell us, that after they have coupled together, the female never fails to kill the male, and that her young ones kill her as soon as they are hatched. The learned Bochart, from whom we have this account of them, tells us further (69), that they are short, and spotted with divers colours, and that their wings resemble those of a bat. He quotes a great number of antient and modern authors to prove, that they are the same with the Hydra of the Greeks and Latins. Herodotus, who went on purpose to the city of Butes to see them, says, that they are not unlike the Hydra; and that he had seen a vast quantity of their skeletons, whose flesh had been devoured by the Ibis (70), which bird is peculiar to Egypt, and a continual destroyer of those serpents, as we have shewed elsewhere†. There was no need therefore of any other miracle, the Israelites being then in Arabia Petraea, than a strong wind to blow them into their camp, it being then the hot season of the year, in which they are affirmed to commonly fly in great swarms from Lybia and Arabia towards Egypt, and other countries in that neighbourhood (71).

(T) It must be observed here, that when Moses tells us, that they incamped at Oboth, Jie-abarim, and other cities belonging to the Edomites and Moabites, he is not to be understood as if they came to or near those places, but only that they encamped at such convenient distance from them, that they might easily get a supply of provisions from them, without giving them any umbrage of their having any hostile design against them.

(V) The brook or torrent of Arnon runs along between the countries of the Ammonites and Moabites, and discharges itself into the black-sea (72). The book of the wars of the Lord, mentioned by Moses (73), seems to intimate some such miraculous transaction at this brook, as had been at the red-sea; and we find some passages in the psalms, and in the prophet Habakkuk (74), which the Chaldee paraphrast doth understand as if the brook Arnon had been dried up, or miraculously divided, to make a passage for God's people. However, it must be owned, that the words of Moses are somewhat obscure, and variously understood both by Jews and Christians; and that the words וְהָבָה סוּפָה, Vahab Suppah, may be the proper names of places, as we find it in the margin of our bibles, and as Dau. Kimchi, and some Christians understand them (75); but we rather chuse the exposition of R. Salomon, who thinks the וָפָא in וְהָבָה to be put for the Jod, which often happens, and that it ought to be read יְהָבָה Jahab, and then the sense will be, what the Lord brought upon Suppah, that is, on the red-sea, and on the brook Arnon.

As to the book of the wars of the Lord, the generality of Christians think, that it is one of those that were lost, either at the captivity or the burning of the temple (76), if not during Manasseh's wicked reign. The generality of the Jews, unwilling to admit that one jot, much less a whole book, of holy writ should be lost, have fancied that the book of Judges is prophetically meant by it, and understand the verb יִמָּרֵר, Jeamer, in the future tense, it shall be said, or recorded in time, in the book of, &c. because in Judges there are several wars mentioned between the Jews and their neighbours, in which God did visibly appear in favour of the former. However, the most received opinion is, that this and some other books mentioned in the old testament were actually lost.

(69) De Animal. Sac. p. 2. l. iii. c. 13.(70) HEROD. l. ii. c. 75, 76.† Vid. sup. p. 182. b.(71) Vid. BOCHART ubi sup. & autor. ab eo citat.(72) Vid. Num. xxi. 13.(73) Ibid. ver. 14.(74) Vid. Ps. lxxiv. 15. Habakkuk iii. 13. & seq.(75) KIMCHI. in rad. vid. JUN. in loc.(76) Vid. PACKHURST's Maxorab, p. 185. MUNST. in loc.

Sihon and Og discomfit d.

let them pass upon any terms, and made himself ready to attack them, was over- a thrown by them in a set battle †, and the Israelites having seized upon his kingdom, from the torrent of Arnon to that of Jabbok ‡, put men, women, and children to the sword, and saved nothing but the cattle (W). Soon after this, Og, king of Besun, attempting in like manner to obstruct their passage, underwent the same fate, as we have already shewn in the history of the Canaanites (X) †.

THIS land of Besun, one of the most fertile cantons of Canaan, which reached on the east to the river Jordan, to the mountains of Gilead on the west, to the brook Jabbok on the south, and to the land of Geshur on the north, was divided, though not equally, between the tribes of Manasseh and Gad: and the land of Sihon was assigned partly to Gad and partly to Reuben §, as we shall shew more fully in the sequel b of this history; but upon this condition, however, that they should assist the rest of the tribes in the conquest of the land of Canaan till that was perfected.

Balak sends for Balaam.

By this time Balak, king of Moab, near whose territories the Israelites were encamped, with a design to cross the river Jordan, in order to enter into the land of Canaan, began now to look upon them with a jealous eye. However, their late conquest having given him but too sure a proof of their strength, he did not think it sufficient to make a strong alliance with the Midianites and Ammonites, his neighbours, in order to stop their progress; but resolved, before he began any hostilities against them, to try how far Balaam's enchantments might go towards turning the fortune of the war to his side. We need not repeat c what has been said in the history of Moab *, concerning the ill success of Ba-lak's project (Y), and the too fatal one of Balaam's advice of debauching the † Vid. sup. p. 303 a. & 330 c. d.

‡ Vid. Judg. xi. 13. & seq.

§ Vid. sup. loc. citat.

§ Num. xxxii. 33. & seq. & Deut. iii. 1. & seq.

* Vid. sup. p. 287. & seq.

(W) This land formerly belonged to the Moabites and Ammonites (77), out of which either Sihon or some of his predecessors had drove them.
When therefore the Israelites conquered it from him, they made no difficulty of keeping possession of it; and when it was afterwards claimed again by the Ammonites, Jephthah roundly told them, that they had lost all their right to that tract, since it had been taken from them by the Ammonites, and from them given by God himself to the children of Israel (78) †.

(X) We have already taken notice of the gigantic stature of this Canaanitish prince ‡, and of his large iron bedstead preserved at Rabbah †††, the capital city of the Ammonites; but the Jewish rabbies, not contented with such pigmy wonders, have improved it to their liking. They tell us, that this nine cubit bed could be only his cradle, seeing himself was six score cubits high, when full grown. They add, that he had lived before the flood; and that the waters of it, when at the highest, reached only up to his knees. Several other wonderful things they write of him, which cannot be read without laughter. We shall only mention one among the rest, which is, that he took up such a monstrous rock with a design to throw it into the Israelitish camp, as would have crushed them all under it, but that a lapwing, or, as others have it *†*, a swarm of ants pecked a miraculous hole in it, big enough for his head to go through, which, nevertheless, he would easily have disengaged, had not his teeth immediately grown to an excessive length, and given Moses an opportunity of killing him, whilst he was struggling to get the stone off his neck (79).

(Y) We have already said something concerning Balaam's prophecies ***, and endeavoured to clear some obscure passages of it; we now beg leave to add an explication of two or more other places equally dark and puzzling. The first is where Balaam prefaces his prophecy with these words, the man whose eyes are open has said, or, as our margin has it, who had his eyes shut, but now open (80): and in the next verse, who heard the words of God, and saw the Almighty, falling (into a trance, but) having his eyes opened. Here it is plain ours, as well as other versions, have been forced to add several words to supply the sense, for want of considering what Balaam alludes to by these expressions, and for want of attending to the two words, שָׁחַח וְחָלַל, Satum, and חָלַל

Halui, when joined to the word עֵינָיו, Henaim, eyes, as here, or to any other member; for though the words do sometimes signify open and shut, hidden and revealed, yet, when thus tacked to any thing else, do more properly signify withholden, and then loosened again. We need then but suppose that he alludes to the angel meeting him thrice in the way, and his eyes being holden from seeing him at the first and second meeting, and opened at the third, when the ass fell down under him, and he, not in a trance, but upon his face to the ground, either through fear, or out of reverence.

The next is where he says, that his (Israel's) kingdom shall be higher than Hagar (81); for though that were as certain which a learned rabbi observes, † that Agag was the common name of the kings of Amalek, as what he subjoins immediately after, that the first king of Israel gave the most signal defeat to that of the Amalekites; yet as the Samaritan, Septuagint, Syrine, and Arabic read Gog, instead of Agag, and Gog doth generally signify the Scythians and northern nations (82), several interpreters have preferred this latter

(77) Vid. Judg. xi. 13. & seq.

(78) Ibid. pass.

† Vid. sup. p. 295. b.

‡ Vid. sup.

p. 330. d. ††† Ibid. p. 293. b.

*†* Targ. BEN UZIEL & al.

(79) Vid. CALM. Hist.

V. T. in loc. & MUNST. in Deut. iii. sub not. d. & al.

*** Vid. sup. p. 289. not. (N) & seq.

(80) Num. xxiv. 3, 4.

(81) Ibid. ver. 7.

† R. MOS. GERUND. ap. MUNST. in loc. vid.

sup. 319. c.

(82) See JOS. MEDA's Discourse on Gog and Magog.

- a Israelites, by the help of some of their most beautiful women. All that needs be added is, that it fully answered their hopes, and that the Israelites failed not to give into the snare, and to make work for repentance. For Balak having ordered his subjects to celebrate a grand feast to Baal-peor, which is generally thought to be the same with Priapus or Adonis<sup>1</sup>, in which, as we observed before ***<sup>2</sup>, the most shameful kinds of lewdness used to be perpetrated, and invited the Israelites to it, these greedily accepted the offer, and were soon enticed from one crime to another, by the fair women that were sent among them for that purpose; that is, they fell from drunkenness to lewdness, and from lewdness to idolatry, and became so enamoured with those fair deluders, that, observing in them a more than ordinary forwardness to follow them, they made no scruple to bring a great number of them into their camp; so that it was not long before the infection was become universal, and punished by a plague, which carried off about twenty four thousand of the offenders.

The Israelites debauched by the women to idolatry;

Their severe punishment.

- IN the mean time God still highly provoked at their disobedience, which this severe punishment had not yet put an effectual stop to, commanded Moses to erect a court of judicature, consisting of the heads of all the families, and to try and hang all that had been guilty of this rebellion and idolatry, without respect to friendship or kindred (Z); which was accordingly done, and about one thousand more were put to death. By this time the greatest part of the people, being come to themselves, were deeply bewailing their folly at the door of the tabernacle, when they were surprized with an instance of the most unparallel'd boldness in one of the chiefs of the tribe of Simeon, named Zimri, who had brought a young Midianitish princess into the camp, and, in sight of Moses and of the whole congregation, was leading her into his tent. This unparallel'd impudence did not latter reading to the first, and not without good grounds (83).

<sup>1</sup> *Isid. orig. lib. viii. Hieron. in Hof. ix. vid. Goodwin's Moses and Aaron, lib. iv. c. 3. CALM. Dissert. LE CLERK's Com. in loc. *** Vid. sup. p. 285. c.*

The last expression, we shall take notice of, is where Balaam says, that God had not beheld iniquity in Jacob, nor seen perverseness in Israel (84); which cannot be true in a literal sense, since he could scarce behold any thing else. Nor can we think, with some predestinarians, that, as his elect, they were such favourites of the Almighty, that he could see no fault in them. Neither have those, who by perverseness and iniquity understand idolatry, succeeded better, since it is plain, they had so often made themselves abominable by, and been severely punished for it; and consequently neither can it be true in the sense that others have taken it, namely, that he did not behold any iniquity in them, because he had already forgiven it; seeing the contrary is plain from those heavy punishments which he inflicted upon them. The best sense therefore seems to be that of the learned Gataker, namely, that God did not behold iniquity, &c. in them with approbation, as he is said to behold, that is, to approve the contrite, humble, &c. and that he is of purer eyes than to behold, that is, to approve evil. To this we may add further, that the particle ו, Beth, doth often signify against, and is accordingly rendered, not only by ours, but by most translations in the places quoted in the margin (85), and many more of the like import; according to which, the words will run more naturally thus, he doth not approve of any wicked practices against Jacob, &c. This sense is still further confirmed by the words וַיִּנְחַם, Aven, and חַמָּל, Hamal, which though we render iniquity and perverseness, do oftener signify outrage, oppression, deceit, machination, affliction, and the like; which therefore, God seems here to declare, he would not suffer to be attempted or practised against his people (86).

(Z) Though we have given this place a different sense from our own, and most versions, which make God to command Moses to take all the heads of the people, and to hang them up in the face of the sun (87), whether guilty or not, we hope those, who understand the Hebrew, will readily own, not only that the words are capable of our interpretation; but likewise that the context, as well as the reason of the thing, doth naturally lead one to it. For, whatever shifts commentators have made use of to justify the other version, (such as that those heads were either all as deep in the guilt, as those that were under them, which is not probable; or that they were guilty of a shameful neglect, in not opposing the growing mischief, and punishing the offenders (88), both which might, probably enough, be out of their power, since even Moses himself found them so often too headstrong for him) yet it is plain from the directions which he gives those judges in the very next verse, viz. to punish all that they found guilty indifferently, that this command had nothing so unjust in it, as those versions intimate. Josephus, who followed the Greek version, was so well convinced, that it could not be palliated by any futile arguments, that he has chosen to suppress it wholly; and this is one main argument to us, that he understood neither the Hebrew nor the Chaldee, else he might as easily have pitched upon that more reasonable sense, we have given above, as the Targum of Onkelos, rabbi Salomon, and other Tows have done, as well as the learned Fagius, in his comment on the place, and others among the Christians. How Josephus has mutilated this place, and what account he has given of this defection, and the consequences of it, the reader may, if he pleases, see in his antiquities; (89).

(83) Id. ibid. Vid. CALM. Hist. Vet. Test. & LE CLERK's Com. in loc. & al. (84) Num. xxiii. 21. (85) Exod. xiv. 25. xx. 16. Num. xii. 1. & xxiii. 23. & alib. (86) Vid. LE SCEN. & Essay on a new Vers. p. 118. (87) Num. xxv. 4. (88) Ita ADAMIANUS in Phirush bathrah. & al. Rabb. (89) Lib. iv. c. 6.

Are severely punished.

go long unpunished, for Phineas, the son of Eleazar the high-priest, being moved <sup>a</sup> with a just indignation, and fired with a godly zeal, came so suddenly upon them with his spear in his hand, that at one stroke he joined their bodies in death; where they were joined in their sin*. This action was highly pleasing to God, as well as to Moses, and the high-priesthood was confirmed to him and his seed as a reward for his zeal. However it is plain from the words of the Psalmist†, that he averted the divine vengeance more by his prayers to God, than by the punishment of these two offenders‡. As for the authors and accomplices of this rebellion, they did not go unrewarded; Balaam was soon after killed in a set battle which Israel fought against five kings of Midian, who likewise fell on that day, whilst the conquerors made a terrible slaughter of their subjects, putting <sup>b</sup> them all to the sword, women and children excepted; plundered and burned their cities, and carried off a considerable booty † with them, which they brought to Moses and Eleazar; and these ordered one fiftieth part of it to be distributed among the priests, and another fiftieth to the Levites. But though Moses could not but be pleased with their victory and valour, yet the sight of such a number of Midianitish women whom they had brought captive with them, and the remembrance of what the people had suffered upon that account, made him think it unsafe to spare their lives; he therefore ordered all those that had ever known man, as well as the male-children, to be immediately dispatched, and that none but virgins should be preserved alive¶ (A). <sup>c</sup>

Balaam, with five kings of Midian, slain.

The Israelites
numbered.

Soon after this defection to Baal-peor, Moses was ordered to take an account of all the children of Israel that were able to bear arms, that is, from twenty years old and upwards. Josephus says from twenty to fifty †, but it is more likely to have been to sixty, and these were found to amount to six hundred and one thousand seven hundred and thirty, besides the Levites who were numbered from one month and upwards, and amounted to twenty three thousand: this account was taken in the plain of Moab, near the river Jordan, over-against Jerico; and it is supposed, that the last punishment, that befel the 2400 adherers to the Midianitish deity, made a final end of the old murmuring generation, which had been excluded from entering into the land of Canaan, be- <sup>d</sup> cause, upon examination, there was not one of them found in this new list which Moses took of the people, except Joshua and Caleb, according to the sentence pronounced against them¶ by God himself. The numbering of the people was no sooner over, than Moses received orders to direct the distribution of the promised land between the tribes to be made by lot, not into equal parts, but in pro-

* Numb. xxv. 8.    † Psal. cvi. 30.    ‡ Numb. Ibid. per tot.    † Vid. sup. 289. c.    ¶ Numb. xxxi. per tot.    † Ant. lib. iii. cap. 12    ¶ Numb. xxvi. 64, 65.

(A) We shall not need wonder at Moses's severity against these women, when we consider how zealous they had been to prostitute themselves, to debauch the Israelites into the most obscene and beastly ceremonies. The ancient Jews give us a very strange account of the worship of this filthy idol, and affirm in particular, that it consisted in making a common jakes of his temple, from which, according to them, he was called Baal-peor; of which the reader may see more in Munster's bible (90.) They add, that Balaam's counsel was to proclaim a kind of large fair, in which should be exposed great quantities of fine linnen, which, he told Balak, the Israelites delighted much to wear, and that every booth, where they were exposed to sale, should have an old woman in the outward, and a young one in the inward apartment, besides a considerable number of other places for eating and drinking: that the youths of Israel were easily drawn to the fair, where having refreshed themselves at the common booths, their curiosity did naturally lead to visit the other shops also. Here the business of the old women without was to ask a moderate price for their linnen, and of the young ones within to make a considerable abatement, or even to offer it at their own price; after which, that they might not make a dry bargain, she offered the youth a bumper of Ammonitish wine, which at once set him on fire, and, upon his asking her the favour, she answered, with all my heart, provided you'll pay your respect to this idol: and if he made any difficulty upon the account of his being an Israelite, she answered, that he had nothing to do, but to break wind backwards, or ease himself before it, which he readily complied with, not dreaming that this could be the peculiar worship of that deity (91). Something like such a filthy ceremony seems hinted by the prophet (92), if rightly understood, where he says, that the Israelites did withdraw themselves, or go aside, to blush, or, as the word may be rendered, to sink, when they came to Baal-peor. However, it is plain, from the account of Moses, and some of the prophets, that there was something else more abominable in the worship of that idol; for the Psalmist says, that when they joined themselves to Baal-peor, they eat the sacrifices of the dead (93): but whether that false deity was surnamed Peor from the mount of that name where he was worshiped, as Isidorus and St. Jerom think (94), or whether the mountain had its name from the idol, and this last from the filthy ceremonies used in its worship, is neither plain nor very material.

(90) Vid. MUNSTER in Numb. xxv. sub note 2.    (91) GOODWIN'S Moses & Aaron, lib. iv. c. 3.
(92) Hos. ix. 10.    (93) Psal. cvi.    (94) ISID. Orig. lib. viii. HIERON. in ix Hos.

portion.

a portion to the number of men in each tribe. As for that of Levi, it was not to have any inheritance with the rest, but was otherwise provided for *.

WHEN this order was published, there came five of the daughters of Zelophehad, of the tribe of Manasseh, the son of Joseph, to petition Moses and Eleazar for an inheritance with their father's brethren, that his name might not be lost in Israel, seeing he had left no sons, but was dead in the wilderness, not for any sedition, but had shared in the common fate with the rest. Their request was approved by God, and Zelophehad's readily granted by Moses, who allotted them a portion in their kindred's inheritance daughters por- tioned. accordingly. Upon this occasion God was pleased to make a law, that for the fu-

b ture the estates of those, who died without issue-male, should be inherited by their daughters, and if they had no daughters, that then it should go to the next of the male, and, in defect of that, of the female-line †. But there being still some doubt remaining, namely, in case the latter should marry out of their tribe; that of Manasseh came soon after to Moses, and represented to him the inconveniency of such marriages, seeing those heiresses would carry their inheritance into other tribes, which might, in process of time, cause a great deal of confusion, and probably lessen one tribe and enrich another. This remonstrance was likewise approved by God, Some regula- tions about the marriage of heiresses. who immediately declared, that neither these daughters of Zelophehad, nor any heiresses for the future, should marry out of their tribes, nor even out of their own family. As for the other females who had no inheritance, they were permitted to c marry into what tribe they pleased ‡.

IMMEDIATELY after this, God commanded Moses to get up upon mount Nebo, which is one of the mountains which make that long ridge which is called A- Moses com- manded to take a view of Canaan from Nebo. barim (B), and to take a view of the promised land, since his misbehaviour at the waters of Meribah had debarred him from entering into it, and he was shortly to die in that very mountain, from whence he beheld it. Moses was nothing surpris'd at the news of his approaching death, which he only looked upon as a haven of repose, after a life of the greatest trouble and fatigue. Neither was he solicitous to have his commission transmitted to his children, or in the least displeased to see his own servant

d appointed his successor before them; but finding his end so near, he made it his chief business, during those few remaining days, to settle things in the best order he could. The first care he took was to have Joshua confirmed his successor in the most public Causes Joshua to be proclaim- ed his suc- cessor. and authentic manner, to prevent any opposition from his own family after he was dead. To this end he brought him forth in sight of all Israel, lay'd his hands upon him, and having presented him to Eleazar the high-priest, and given him all necessary directions, and in particular, that of consulting God upon all emergencies by the Urim and Thummim (C), he caus'd him to be proclaimed head and general of all Israel §.

* Numb. xxxvi. 62. xxvii. 16. ad fin.

† Ibid. xxvii. 1, 2, & seq.

‡ Ibid. xxxvi. 1. ad fin.

§ Ibid.

(B) Abarim was a long ridge of mountains that reached from the tribe of Reuben into the land of Moab, on each side the river Arnon; but the extent of which is not easy to fix. Eusebius and St. Jerom do mention it more than once: the former places it about six miles westward of Heshbon, and seven eastward of Livade (95). The mountains Pisgab, Peor, and Nebo, where Moses died, were part of the ridge Abarim, or as the original has it, עבריים, Elabarim, which signifies either paths or passengers.

(C) What the fashion of the Urim and Thummim was, as far as can be known, shall be taken notice of when we come to speak of the high-priest's garments, of which they were an appendage. In the mean time we beg leave to observe, that Joshua could not be that prophet like Moses whom God promised to raise, and commanded under severe penalties to be obeyed (96), as our modern Jews affirm, and some Christians, whom we forbear to name, have too easily granted.

Joshua was in many particulars inferior not only to Moses, but likewise to the generality of the prophets, since he was to have recourse to the Urim and Thummim upon all emergencies, whereas the former spoke to God face to face, and the latter were always ready to declare the mind of God to those that came to consult them. How could he therefore be the head prophet, and director of such a numerous nation, who wanted a director himself? Or how could the people be charged to hear and obey him, who was himself to receive his orders from the high-priest? As for this divine oracle of Urim and Thummim, which in the original signifies light and perfection; and the Septuagint and Philo (97) render by the words Διάνοια and ἀληθείαν, manifestation and truth, as having those two distinct virtues; it was not to be consulted by private persons, but only by the judges, whilst Israel was governed by them, and afterwards by the kings, or such as were sent by them; or, according to the Talmudists, by the

אב

(95) Sub voc. Nebo & Bel-phegor.

(96) Deut. xviii. 15. vid. John i. 45. Act. iii. 22. vii. 37.

(97) In vit. Mos. & lib. de Monarchia, c. 2.

As there elapsed somewhat above a month between Moses's receiving the news of his death, and the day in which he expired, he spent the best part of that time in making some further regulations. Amongst other things he had the pleasure to see the twelve thousand men whom he had chosen, that is, a thousand out of every tribe, return from the total overthrow of the Midianites, we mentioned a little before, loaden with the richest spoil, and to order the distribution of it: one half of which he allotted to the conquerors, and the other מן בית דין, Ab beth-din, or the head of the Sanhedrin (98), and even by the general in time of war, as in the case of Joshua (99). Spencer indeed thinks that the head of the nation alone, and he in his own person, was allowed to consult the Urim (100); but the contrary seems more probable from David's consulting the Lord by Abiathar, before he was settled upon the throne (1). However that be, this ceremony of consulting by Urim, &c. was not performed, without great ceremony. The high-priest alone was the person to apply to, he was to be dressed in his pontifical robes, particularly his breast-plate, and to go into the holy place, though not into the holy of holies, towards which he was only to turn his face, when he enquired of the Lord. Again, he was not to be consulted upon trivial matters, but upon those of the greatest moment, such as concerned the public good, and upon any sudden and unexpected emergency, as the Jews do prove from those places of scripture where such counsel was asked (2). Lastly, things relating to faith or practice were not to be enquired by the Urim, because they had the old precept quoted by Isaiah (3), to the law and to the prophets.

But how this divine oracle gave its answer, whether by the unusual lustre of the stones in the breast-plate, when the answer was favourable; and by their dimness in the contrary case, as Josephus (4), and others after him, have imagined; or, as others think, by virtue of the name, יהוה, written, or engraven, in, or between, the double breast-plate (5); or, 3dly, by the prominence of the letters engraven upon the 12 stones of it, which the high-priest, being then inspired, knew how to range so as to give a true answer; we will not take upon us to determine. But this last opinion is almost universally received by the Jewish Rabbies (6). For instance, they say that when David enquired whether he should go up into any of the cities of Judab, and the Lord answered עלה, go up (7), those three letters became prominent above the rest. But the majority of Christians think that God answered the high-priest visu voce, by an articulate voice, from the mercy-seat, where the cherubims covered the ark of the testimony, called therefore the oracle (8); from whence God promised that he would meet and commune with Moses, or as the original has it, instruct and talk with him; which notion is indeed the most probable and consonant to some instances in the text relating to this matter, and especially to that where the children of Israel are blamed for making peace with the Gibeonites, without consulting יהוה, the mouth of the Lord (9). All these opinions are liable to many objections, which we shall not trouble our readers with, but conclude with the saying of a wise Jewish Rabbi (10), that he is on the safest side, who roundly owns his ignorance in this point.

How long the Urim and Thummim continued is not so difficult to decide: the Jews in general agree, that it lasted no longer than the tabernacle. It is a maxim with them, that God delivered his oracles, during the standing of it, by Urim and Thummim; by the mouth of his prophets, during the first temple; and by the Eath-col, from the Babylonish captivity to the destruction of the second. Spencer, who has espoused their opinion, has backed it with several arguments de congruo †; but what confirms it more than all his reasoning is, that we do not meet with one single instance of the Urim being consulted from the building of Salomon's temple; on the contrary, we read, that when Hilkiah the high-priest found the book of the law in Josiah's reign, and that good king was not a little perplexed at the terrible threatenings pronounced against the transgressors of it, he sent to consult the prophetess Huldah about it (11), which he needed not to have done, had the Urim still subsisted. All that can be objected against it is, that Moses, in blessing the tribe of Levi, prays that the Urim and Thummim may continue with God's holy one (12): but this doth not imply, that it should do so whilst Levi continued a tribe. Some have urged that passage where the prophet threatens the Israelites, that they should abide without king, prince, image, ephod, or teraphim (13): but it doth not appear to us, that any of the three last have any relation to the Urim and Thummim. As for what Josephus says, that the stones of the Urim had lost their lustre but about two hundred years before he wrote (14); that is, about 112 years before Christ; we think it not worth consulting, since it is allowed on all hands, that it ceased at the Babylonish captivity, if not before, and that it was one of those things in which the second temple came short of the first (15), as Ezra and Nehemiah intimate plainly enough (16).

We shall dismiss this note with reminding our readers, that the Egyptians had an oracle or teraphim, which they called truth. This is plain from the testimony of several antient writers (17); but as to the question, whether they had it from the Hebrews, or these from them, we shall refer them to what has been said before in cases of the like nature †. Those, who are desirous to know more of the subject, may consult at their leisure the authors quoted in the margin (18).

(98) Talm. Tract. in MDI Yoma, cap. 7. § 5. vid. FAG. in Exod. xxviii. GOODW. Moses & Aaron, lib. iv. cap. 7. § 8. vid. De Judg. i. 1. (99) De Legib. ritual. Habr. lib. iii. Dissert. 7. c. 1. 8. & alib. (100) Vid. MEYER de fest. dieb. Habr. cap. 4. § 49. & 51. (1) 1 Sam. xxiii. 4. xxx. 7, 8. (2) ABARBAN. R. LEVI. BEN. GERS. ap. BUXT. Hist. Urim & Thum. (3) Ch. viii. 20. Vid. MAIMONID. Kele Mammikdash. cap. 10. (4) Ant. lib. iii. c. 9. (5) Rab. SALOM. ap. D. KIMCH. in Rad. vid. Exod. xxviii. 15. (6) Vid. ZOHAR. in Exod. ex lib. Jalkuth. R. BECHAI in Dent. xxxiii. MAIMON. ubi sup. & al. mult. (7) 2 Sam. ii. 1. (8) Exod. xxv. 22. & alib. (9) Josh. ix. 14. Hos. iii. 4. (10) KIMCH. in Rad. † De Urim & Thum. c. 2. § 2. (11) 2 Kings xxiii. pass. (12) Deuter. xxxiii. 8. (13) Hof. iii. 4. (14) Jos. ubi sup. (15) Vid. PRIDEAUX's Connect. part. i. lib. 3. (16) Ezra ii. 63. Nehem. vii. 65. (17) Vid. AELIAN, var. Hist. lib. xiv. cap. 34. DIOD. SICUL. lib. 2. & al. † Sup. p. 427. note (R), & p. 516. notes (Y), (Z). (18) PRIDEAUX ubi sup. CUNÆUS, BASHAG. Rep. Jud. tom. I. lib. ii. c. 2. LE CLERC's Comm. in Exod. SAURIN's Discourses on the Pentat. CALMET's Dict. sub voc. Urim. Id. Comm. in Exod. & al.

- a to those who had not gone to the war, reserving, as we said before, one fiftieth part of each for the priests and Levites; which distribution seems to have past afterwards into a law<sup>a</sup>. What added still more to his joy was, that the chief captains, upon a strict enquiry, had not found one man missing of all that went upon this expedition, and expressed such thankfulness for it, that they presented to the Lord an offering of the gold-rings, bracelets, and ornaments which they had taken, amounting to the weight of sixteen thousand seven hundred and fifty shekels, <sup>Part of the Midianitish spoils offered to God.</sup> all which was deposited by Eleazar in the tabernacle as a monument of their gratitude<sup>b</sup>. It is likewise supposed, that it was during this interval, that he distributed the land of Sibon and Og, to the two tribes and half<sup>c</sup>.
- b AND now as the Israelites were on the eve of entering into the promised land, no time could be more proper to remind them of his former commands, of driving out the Canaanites, and destroying their idols, temples, groves, and all the monuments of their idolatry; and to forewarn them, at the same time, that in case <sup>Idols of Canaan to be destroyed.</sup> they neglected to drive the inhabitants out of the land, they would prove as thorns in their sides, and an inexhaustible source of vexation and trouble, and of the severest punishments from God<sup>d</sup>. At the same time he appointed the limits of the land which they were to conquer, and the distribution of it by lot (D) according to God's command, and committed the whole care of it to Joshua and Eleazar the high-priest, at the head of the chiefs of every tribe<sup>e</sup>, who saw it punctually executed, as shall be shewn in its proper place. But though these limits did not reach beyond the land of Canaan, strictly so called<sup>f</sup>, yet he had added thereto all the land of the Amorites, on the other side Jordan, with all the tract of ground which reached from the wilderness, the mountains of Lebanon, and the river Euphrates, unto the Mediterranean sea as far as the Nile. Some further directions were also given concerning the forty eight cities and their suburbs, or rather districts, which were to be allotted to the tribe of Levi<sup>g</sup>: six of these were to be cities of refuge for the manslayer to flee to, three of which were to be on the one side, and three on the other of Jordan; to which he added a permission to appoint three more, whenever the enlargement of their borders should make it necessary<sup>h</sup>.

THE nearer Moses drew to his end, the more solicitous he was to compleat his arduous task. Accordingly, on the fifth day of the eleventh month, answering to our Saturday, February 20, of the fortieth year of the Exod<sup>i</sup>, the Israelites being still encamped in the plain of Moab, he assembled the people about him, and in a long and pathetic speech recapitulated to them all that <sup>Moses' speech to the Israelites.</sup> had happened since their departure out of Egypt till that time<sup>j</sup>. He added indeed one circumstance not taken notice of before, namely, his earnest request to God, that he might be admitted to go into the promised land, and his prayer being absolutely denied<sup>k</sup>. All the rest is what has been already said in this section, except what relates to the laws he made, which we reserve for another place. He concludes with exhorting them to continue faithful to God, and with the severest threatenings, in case of disobedience.

THIS speech was soon followed by another of a much greater length<sup>l</sup>, in which more particular mention is made of all God's mercies and judgments, <sup>A second speech of Moses.</sup> promises and threatenings; and wherein the blessings and curses, which were to be the fruit of their obedience or disobedience, are expressed in the strongest and most lively terms; after which, he reminded them of the continual murmurings and rebellions of their fathers, and the severe judgments that followed them.

<sup>a</sup> Vid. 1 Sam. xxx. 21. & seq. 2 Maccab. viii. 28. Ann. p. 24.
<sup>b</sup> Numb. xxxiii. 51. & seq.
<sup>c</sup> Numb. xxxv. pass. Deut. xix. 8.
<sup>d</sup> Ibid. ch. iii. 26. & seq.

<sup>e</sup> Numb xxxi. 49. & seq. <sup>f</sup> UssER. Deut. xi. 24. <sup>g</sup> Josh. i. 4. & seq.
<sup>h</sup> Vid. UssER. Ann. p. 24. <sup>i</sup> Deut. i, ii, iii, & iv. ap. ver. 4. <sup>j</sup> Ibid. from ch. iv, to xxvii.

(D) Nothing could be more prudently forecalt than this partition of the land by lot, and making Joshua and the high-priest the superintendents of it, since it was the only way that could, and did, effectually prevent all murmurings and quarrels among that stubborn people. However, as the lots were to bear a proportion to the bigness of each tribe and family, it is supposed from what followed, that every tribe drew its lot for its own canton, after which there were proper persons to measure out a quantity of land to each family, according to their bigness. But whether this last was done by this, or by any other method, whether the subdivisions between the families were likewise carried on by lot or otherwise, sure it is, that we do not read, that it occasioned any broils or jealousies among them (19).

He interspersed the whole with a summary of all the laws which the divine providence had calculated for their welfare, among which he repeats those of the decalogue almost word for word (E); and concludes with a most elegant description of the solemn and dreadful manner in which they were delivered from mount Sinai. He closed his speech with a most pathetic exhortation to obedience, and a submissive reliance on that amazing goodness that had so graciously chosen them before any other nation of the world, not for any merit of theirs, but that he might display his almighty power in favour of them, in order to be glorified by them and future ages, as well for the great mercies he had shewed to them, as for the heavy punishments he had inflicted upon the neighbouring nations for their wickedness and idolatry<sup>1</sup>. And lest their prosperity should in time make them forget their divine benefactor, he prescribed unto them a form of confession, which they should be bound to make every year, when they came to offer the first fruits of their land; in which they were to acknowledge their having received it from God. It was prefaced with these remarkable words, a Syrian ready to perish was my father, and went down into Egypt; then follows a short account of the Egyptian bondage, their deliverance from it, and induction into a land flowing with milk and honey; and concludes with begging, that God would accept of his offering as a thankful acknowledgment for it<sup>2</sup>. After this, he directed Joshua and the elders how to erect a capacious altar upon mount Ebal, of unhewn stones covered over with plaister, upon which they should write a fair transcript of all these laws, copies of which he delivered to the Levites to keep (F)<sup>3</sup>; and how to set up the blessings and curses upon mount Ebal and Gerizim, in full sight of all Israel, six tribes of which, namely Reuben, Gad, Asser, Zebulun, Dan and Nephthali, should stand upon the former, and those of Simeon, Levi, Judah, Issachar, Joseph and Benjamin, on the latter, and should alternately answer amen to all those blessings and curses, when they came to be proclaimed and set up there, which was accordingly done in Joshua's time<sup>4</sup>, as we shall see in the sequel. And that there might be nothing wanting in these his last instructions,

A form of acknowledgment prescribed.

Blessings and curses to be set up on mount Ebal and Gerizim.

<sup>1</sup> Deut. ix. pass. xxxii. pass. & al.

<sup>2</sup> Ibid. xxvi. pass.

<sup>3</sup> Ibid. xxvii. 5. & seq. xxxi. 9.

<sup>4</sup> Josh. viii. 33. & seq.

(E) All the difference betwixt those two places is in the fourth commandment: in this, Moses expresses this injunction thus; keep the sabbath-day in order to sanctify it, as, or, in the manner, in which the Lord has commanded; unto which he subjoins these two reasons, namely, first, that the servants might enjoy the benefit of rest as well as their masters; and secondly, that God had appointed that day of rest, to put them in mind that they had been servants in Egypt, out of which the Lord had brought them, with a mighty hand and stretched out arm, for that is the plain meaning of the text here; whereas in Exodus, these two reasons are omitted, and another given which is not mentioned here, namely, that God sanctified the seventh day, because in it he had rested or ceased from his work of creation. From this seeming difference, and some other arguments, foreign to our present purpose, some divines have inferred, with some probability at least, that not the seventh, but a seventh day, or one in seven, had been instituted at, and observed from the creation till the Exod. and if so, most likely the first day of the seven; but that in memory of this great deliverance, it was superseded and changed into the seventh day, on which it was to continue till a much nobler redemption, namely, that which Christ wrought for us, made the lesser give place to it; at which time it was to return to its first institution (20). We shall not take upon us to affirm any thing in so delicate a point: only this, we beg leave to observe, that nothing can so well account for appointing the observance of the Mosaic sabbath in so indolent and inactive a manner, as the reason here given, that when they found the sweetness of rest, and enjoyed it even beyond what nature required, they might be the more sensible of the goodness of God, in delivering them from that thralldom in which their labours, though exceeding all measure, had been without the least intermission†.

(F) The words which our version renders to write very plain, and we by a fair transcript, are in the original באר היטב, Baer-hetebb, in the infinitive mood, that is, in order to be distinctly and easily read. What the contents of this law were, which was to be thus written or ingraven upon the altar, or more probably along the sides of it, is not agreed. For whilst some will have it to be the whole Pentateuch, which the Jerus call by way of excellency התורה, Hathorab, the law (21), Josephus mentions only the blessings and curses (22), and others more absurdly confine it to the bare decalogue; but the most probable opinion is, that it was that summary of all the laws which is contained in the book of Deuteronomy. Accordingly, when it is said there (23), that the kings of Israel shall be obliged to write a copy of this law with their own hand, it is more likely to have meant those that are contained in Deuteronomy, than either the whole Pentateuch or the bare decalogue, not only because the former contains the sum and substance of all the laws in the other four books of Moses, but likewise because they are here enforced by the most powerful motives (24).

(20) Vid. BEDFORD'S Chronol. p. 298. § 13. 378. & seq. † Vid. supr. p. 474. note (C).
(21) MAIMON. Halak Melak. JOS. KARO, Keseph Mishn. Vid. R. SIMEON in Talkuth & al. mult. S. AUGUST. in Deut. xvii. 18. GROT. ibid. DAAHAWER. SCHIKARD. & al. in loc. (22) Ant. lib. iv. c. 8. (23) Deut. xvii. 18. (24) Vid. LE SCEN. Essay on a N. Verf. p. 92. ABAAB. LUTHER. & al.

a he prescribed a kind of exhortation, which was to be spoken aloud at the head of the army, by a priest appointed for that purpose (G,) whenever they were going to engage their enemies, in order to inspire the people with an unshaken trust in God, and assurance of victory. He ordered likewise that a proclamation should be made at the same time by proper officers, to permit not only all that had left a new wife, house, or vineyard unenjoyed, but even all those, whose fear or pusillanimity might discourage the rest, to return home. And lastly, how they should behave themselves towards those cities that accepted of their proffered peace, and to those which rejected it <sup>a</sup>.

b Hz soon after assembled the whole nation, men, women, and children, in or-<sup>The old cove-</sup> der to make them renew the covenant which their fathers had made with God <sup>nant ratified</sup> in Horeb; and as he enforced the observance of it by the most engaging mo-<sup>by the whole</sup> tives, so did he at the same time endeavour to deter them from the breach of it <sup>nation.</sup> by such threatenings, as proved no less than prophetic of those miserable slaveries which they underwent afterwards for their disobedience <sup>1</sup>, not only during the time of the judges, and the Babylonish captivity, but much more since their rejection of the Messiah. There was one remarkable thing in this prophetic warning, which ought not to be passed by, which was, that under whatever captivity and dispersion they happened to groan, if they applied themselves to God by prayer, and an humble acknowledgment of their sins, they c should still be delivered from it. This was exactly verified by the event, for they no sooner turned to God, but he either sent them a deliverer soon after, as in the time of the judges, or some prophets to comfort them during their captivity, and to fix the time of its duration; as in that of Babylon. This needs not to be wondered at, the crimes for which they suffered in these, idolatry, murders, rapine, extortion, and the like, were of too glaring a nature, not to force the deepest remorse and acknowledgment, whenever they smarted for them. It was far otherwise in their last sin, the rejection of the Messiah; his mean birth and appearance, his sufferings and death, and many other disadvantageous circumstances, were so opposite to those glorious notions they had d imbibed of him, and his religion so pure and spiritual, that their prejudices made them easily overlook all the visible proofs he gave of his divine mission.
And after they had once condemned him, they had too great a notion of their own sagacity and uprightness, ever to feel, or at least own the injustice of the deed.
We may add that their posterity has followed their steps, and has been so far from supposing that the Sanhedrin could have been guilty of so fatal a mistake, and so horrid a crime as the rejecting and murdering the Messiah, that they are still fully persuaded, that court would have been the very first that would have acknowledged him. This is the source of their unbelief, and since they have ever since rather glorified in that deed, than acknowledged and repented e of it, we need seek no farther for the cause why their captivity and dispersion has proved so severe, of so long a duration, and without the least comfortable prophecy, or even prospect of God's putting an end to it. But to return, Mo- ses having caused this covenant to be ratified by the whole assembly, no doubt with a suitable solemnity, he commanded the Levites to deposit a copy of it, which he delivered to them, in the ark, and concluded with calling heaven and earth to witness for the truth of what they had heard from him, for the reasonableness of those laws which God had given them, and for the certainty of those blessings or curses which would infallibly follow the keeping or the breach

<sup>a</sup> Deut. xx. per. tot.

<sup>1</sup> Ibid. xxix. pass.

(G) This priest was either then, or in process of time, called אמרכל, Amercol, from Amar, to speak, and Col, all, because he was to direct his speech to the whole army. And though the Jewish nation hath had no need of such an orator of a very long season, yet they still retain the name and notion of it in their game of chess, which, with regard to the analogy it bears to a fighting army, differs only from ours in their division of each opponent's side into church and state, and calling the former by ecclesiastic names, as follows: the queen is with them the מלכה, Melechah,

Cohen-gadol, or high-priest. Her bishop is the כהן, Sagan, or the next in dignity to the high-priest. The knight they style כוהן משרת, Cohen Mafnuach, by which is meant that priest that was anointed by the high one for the war, in order to supply his place, whenever God was to be consulted by Urim; and the last, or the rook, is the Amercol abovementioned. As for those on the king's side, they name the first his vicegerent, or the second perion to him, the second his יועץ, Yohatz, his counsellor, and the last is his generalissimo (25).

(25) Vid. Dr. HIDE's Shabulad.

breach of them<sup>a</sup>. However, in order to fix these important truths more strongly <sup>a</sup> in their minds, he composed a psalm or canticle, in which they are expressed in the most elegant and lively language, and having caused it to be read before all the people, he delivered it to Joshua, to be hereafter learned by heart by them and their posterity. This inimitable piece of ancient poetry, as far as our language can come up to the beauty of the original, is thus prefaced<sup>b</sup>:

The preface of Attend ye heavens, whilst I speak, give ear, O earth, to the words of my
it Englished. mouth.

Let my doctrine descend like drops of rain, and my speech distil as the dew.

Let them fall as a gentle shower upon the tender herb, and as the rain that falls upon the grass. <sup>b</sup>

And whilst I invoke the name JEHOVAH, resound the greatness of our God.

His works, even the works of this our strong rock, are perfect, and all his ways are are equity.

He is a faithful God, without deceit, for he is just and righteous. And so on (H).

THE lecture of this divine song being ended, Moses went on with acquainting the people that, since it was not the will of God that he should go with them into the promised land, they must now look upon Joshua as their leader, assuring them that they could not fail of success in the conquest of it, provided they faithfully observed the covenant which they had so lately renewed with God. <sup>c</sup>
 He then delivered a written instrument of it, and a duplicate of the laws to be preserved in the ark, with an order, that this latter should be publicly read before the whole assembly at the feast of the tabernacles every sabbatic or seventh year<sup>d</sup>. He added some few laws, one against false prophets, another against magic, and a third for the expiation of murder when the author of it could not be discovered.

AND now his talk being at an end, and God having commanded him to go up to mount Nebo, and to resign commission with his soul there, as soon as he had taken a view of the promised land; he had nothing left to do but to gather the tribes about him, and to pronounce his prophetic blessing upon <sup>d</sup> them. The text tells us that he was a hundred and twenty years old, and that neither his sight nor his natural strength were in the least impaired, and we may add, that, if one may judge of that of his mind by the style of this his last speech, and by the beauty and energy of the expressions, it seems to have received an addition at the sight of his departure, and of his people's approaching happiness. The preface and conclusion of it are couched in as strong and elegant terms, as the most divine enthusiasm could inspire a prophet with. However as we have already spoken of it in another place, and shewed how it agreed with that of Jacob†, which we there endeavoured to explain throughout, we shall not dwell any longer upon it at present. Only here it will not be amiss <sup>e</sup> to observe that our English version was certainly right to insert the word not in the latter part of the 6th verse of this chapter*, let Reuben live and not die, and let not his men be few; which is certainly the true sense according to the

His last blessing to the twelve tribes.

<sup>a</sup> Deut. xxx. and xxxi.
 supr. p. 461. & seq.

<sup>b</sup> Ibid xxxii. ad ver. 45.

<sup>c</sup> Ibid. xxxi. 10. & seq. † Vid.

* xxxiii.

(H) We beg leave to assure our readers, who do not understand the Hebrew tongue, that we have not departed from our English version in the sketch we have given of this incomparable song, with any other view but to come somewhat nearer to the genius and beauties of the original, than that doth, though we own it impossible to come up wholly to it; for which reason we willingly excuse ourselves from going further in the version.
 The Jews do justly esteem it a most elegant epi-tome of the whole Pentateuch, because it makes mention of the greatness and magnificence of God, of the creation of the world, of the deluge, of the confusion of tongues and dispersion of the nations, of the call of Abraham, and of his posterity, and of all that the divine goodness had done for them; of their murmurings, rebellions, idolatries, and of their inheriting the promised land: of the worship of the one only true God, of the resurrection of the dead, and of the future life. But we much question whether these two last will be so universally granted unto them, as all the rest may and actually is, because the words from which they prove them, the Lord killeth and maketh alive (26), may easily admit of another sense, it being commonly used for preserving alive, and even for forbearing to kill.

- a genius of the original, which often omits that negative in the second hemistich, though any modern version, that did not supply it, would make it speak contrary to its plain meaning<sup>1</sup>. This is the very error into which the septuagint and vulgate have fallen, in order to render this latter part of the verse applicable to the tribe of Simeon, of which Moses had made no mention throughout this prophecy; but herein 'tis plain they mistook the sense of the text, not only from what we have just now hinted, but also because being few in number would have been a curse rather than a blessing, and was more particularly esteemed such by the Israelites; in which case that tribe alone would have been cursed, whilst all the rest were highly blessed, whereas they are said to be all blessed in the very first verse; besides it is
- b certain that Simeon had his blessing, since he had an inheritance allotted to him as well as the rest<sup>2</sup>. We need not therefore look for any other mystery or reason for this omission of Moses, than that this tribe was wholly intermixed with that of Judab, according to their father's prophecy<sup>3</sup>, and consequently shared in all its blessings, those only excepted which Jacob had confined to the latter; and hence it came to pass that these two tribes did generally go hand in hand in all their expeditions<sup>4</sup>.

Why Simeon is omitted in this blessing.

- THE Jewish lawgiver had no sooner ended this prophetic speech, than he obeyed the divine call, and in the sight of all Israel went up to mount Nebo, from the summit of which he beheld all the land which God had promised to Abraham's posterity. Josephus adds<sup>5</sup>, that he was accompanied by Joshua, Eleazar, and the seventy, to the mount, and that, whilst the two last were taking their sorrowful farewell of him, a cloud conveyed him away into a certain valley; but the text seems rather to intimate that he went up alone. Be that how it will, the author of this last chapter, whoever he was, assures us that he died immediately after, and that the Lord conveyed him into a valley in the land of Moab, over against Beth-peor (I), and there buried him in so private a place, that his sepulchre was not known at the time of his writing<sup>6</sup>; to which we may add that it never was discovered since<sup>7</sup>. Several inspired penmen, and apocryphal writers, have since given us the character of this truly great lawgiver,
- c besides the abovementioned Josephus; but none has expressed it in fewer and stronger terms than the author of these additions in the three last verses of this chapter (K). His death happened on the first day (according to Josephus and Moses goes up to mount Nebo.

His death, burial, and character.

<sup>1</sup> Compare Ps. vi. 1. and xxxviii. 1. See also Ps. ix. 18. as they are in our bibles. <sup>2</sup> Josh. xix. 1. <sup>3</sup> Chron. iv. 24. & seq. <sup>4</sup> Gen. xlix. 7. Vid. sup. p. 462. note (F). <sup>5</sup> Judg. i. 3. & seq. Vid. JUN. in Deut. xxxiii. 6. <sup>6</sup> Ant. lib. iv. c. 8. <sup>7</sup> Deut. xxxiii. 6. <sup>8</sup> Vid. HORN Hist. Ecclesiast. BARNAC. Continuat. JOSEPH. tom. IV. lib. vi. c. 17. art. 13. BARTOLOC. Bibliot. Rabbini. tom. III. p. 928. & seq. CALM. Dissert. on the death and burial of Moses, at the head of his Epit. Canoniq. & al.

(I) Though the text says, in the land of Moab (27), yet, it is plain, as the learned primate of Ireland observes, by comparing these with other places of scripture, that this valley was in the land of Sibon, king of the Amorites, which the Israelites took from him, and assigned to the tribe of Reuben; and therefore, when it is here, and elsewhere, called the land of Moab, it can mean no more than the land which Sibon had conquered from them, and the Israelites from him (28).

(K) Nothing is plainer from the text, than that Moses did really die, and was buried; and Josephus tells us (29) according to our copies of him, that the scripture affirms him to be dead, lest people should think, because of the excellency of his person, that he was still alive, and with God; notwithstanding which, the superstitious Jews have fallen into various notions about it; some absolutely denying his death, and others, without taking notice of that circumstance, affirming him to have been translated into heaven (30). Those of the Christians, who have embraced this wild notion, do ground it upon his appearing with Elias at the transfiguration upon mount Taber (31), and upon that context which Michael and the devil had about his body, which we find mentioned by St. Jude (32); though the most probable inference that can be made from such a dispute, if any such there was, is, that the devil wanted to bring Moses's body to light, that he might thereby ensnare the people to idolatry, or rather to ἀντανακρίσει, the worship of relics, which therefore Michael opposed with a zeal worthy of an archangel (33). However, this circumstance seems, in all probability, to be quoted by the apostle from an apocryphal book, intitled Ἀποκάλυψις Μωϋσέως, or the assumption of Moses; something like which we find in some Jewish writings (34). Other rabbies, though they believe that he was so far dead, as that there was a separation of soul and body, yet deny his dying a common death, because he is said to have died על פי יהוה, that is, as we rightly translate it, according to the word of the Lord; but according to their literal sense of it, upon the mouth of the Lord; from (27) Deut. xxxiv. 5, 6. & alib. compared with Numb. xxi. 26. Deut. iv. 46. Josh. xiii. 20. (28) Vid. USHER's Ann. p. 25. (29) Ant. loc. citat. (30) Vid. MAIMON. proem. ad Talmud. (31) Mat. xvii. 1. & seq. (32) Jud. ver. 9. Vid. FABRIC. Apoc. Vet. Test. (33) USH. Ann. ubi sup. & aut. ab eo citat. (34) Vid. R. NATHAN. פירק' אבות.

archbishop Ujver †, or on the seventh according to the generality of the latter a

† Ant. & Ann. ubi supr.

from which they affirm, that Moses, having begged of God not to deliver up his soul to the angel of death, breathed it out in a kiss, which the Lord was pleased to give him (35).

As to his writings, besides the Pentateuch, which is universally received by Jews and Christians, as penned by him, if we except Abenezra and Spinosa, among the former, and some moderns among the latter, (if their avowed principles can permit us to call them Christians, who denied him to be the author of it, and have been learnedly confuted by a late author (36),) besides the books, I say, commonly called the five books of Moses, there have been some other works attributed to him, though without any certainty, such as the book of Job, of which we have already spoken in another place †, eleven psalms, viz. 90, 91, 92, and so on to the 100th. Origen believes him to have translated the book of Job from the Syriac into Hebrew (37). Though he is scarce followed by either Jew or Christian. A few fragments of other books are likewise quoted by some of the ancients, as wrote by him; such as, 1. His Apocalypse, out of which St. Paul is by them supposed to have taken those words (38), for in Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth any thing, &c. 2. His lesser Genesis. 3. His ascension. 4. Assumption, mentioned a little above. 5. His Testament, and some other mysterious books (39).

Some Rabbies attribute to him likewise a treatise entitled באר חכמה, Beer Mosheh, or באר חכמה, Beer Chokmah, the fountain of wisdom (40). As for the lesser Genesis, St. Jerom, who quotes a passage or two out of it, tells us, that they had it in Hebrew in his time (41). The Setbites, an ancient sect of heretics, quoted likewise two of the aforementioned books, namely his testament, and his mysterious books or discourses; but all these were so far from bearing any authority in the church, that they fell into contempt and oblivion, as fast as christianity prevailed.

The wonders of his life have been no less multiplied by the Rabbies than his writings; we shall just hint some of them. They tell us that he was born circumcised; that Pharaoh's daughter, whom they call Bathia, being all over leprous, was cured by the touching of the little ark, in which he was exposed: That, at three years of age, she brought him to her father, from whose head he took the crown to put it upon his own, for which Balaam, who was then at that court, advised Pharaoh to put him to death, but the other magicians chose rather to try first whether this action was designedly done by him, or through childishness; upon which they set before him some diamonds and burning coals, and the angel Gabriel forced his hands towards the coals, one of which he put to his mouth, and burnt himself, which was the occasion of his stammering, and that he saved his life by it. That he was afterwards condemned to lose his head for the murder of the Egyptian, but that his neck became so hard, that the sword, instead of hurting him, recoiled with such force, that it killed the executioner; and that the king becoming dumb on a sudden, and the rest of the spectators being struck blind or deaf, gave Moses an opportunity of running away without opposition.

Being retired to the king of Ethiopia, who was then in Armenia, and Balaam having caused an insurrection in Ethiopia, Moses put himself at the head of the king's army, and besieged Balaam in the metropolis, who endeavoured by his magic to obstruct his approach, by an innumerable multitude of serpents, which he caused to surround the city; but Moses, having charmed them, took the town, married the queen whose consort had been killed at the war, and reigned in Ethiopia forty years, till his queen, complaining of his coldness towards her, caused a rebellion, which obliged him to retire to Yebra, where he got the miraculous rod of which we gave an account in a former note †, and married his daughter Ziphorab: That her father having stipulated that her first-born son should not be circumcised, an angel was sent in the shape of a serpent, who swallowed him up to the place of circumcision, which made Ziphorab retrieve the fault, and save her husband by the circumcision of her son.

As for the manner in which they say that Moses received the divine law, it is so absurd, that we should not trouble our readers with it, were it not to point out to them the spring from which Mohammed did pump out all the rhapsodies of his Koran. These grave gentlemen thought it not enough for their law-giver to have gone up and received it upon mount Sinai, but they make him take a journey to heaven in a cloud; and add, that he met in his way Kemuel the chief of a legion of angels, who endeavoured to come up to him, but that he was repulsed some thousands of miles back, by his pronouncing the name of God consisting of twelve letters. Soon after this, he was terribly frightened by the angel Adarniel's voice, which was so dreadful that it was echoed from no less than two hundred thousand spheres, all surrounded with a white fire. Moses was just ready to run away, when God heartened him up again, and bid him put the spirit to flight by pronouncing the name of God written with seventy two letters, which made him cry out as he fled; how happy art thou, Moses, to know those things which the very angels are ignorant of. They add that the two tables which Moses brought down from heaven being made of the finest saphir stone, he enriched himself exceedingly by the chips that fell off in the carving and polishing of them; which is no great wonder, if they were ten or twelve cubits high, as some of them pretend (42).

The Mohammedans have not only embraced all these rabbinical dreams, but have very much improved them. The reader may remember what they say concerning this last circumstance of the two tables being brought from heaven and carried thither again †. We shall not trouble the reader with any more of their reveries, those who are fond of such things may find them at large in Monsieur D'Herbelot's Bibliotheca Orientalis, under the article Moyse (43). In the mean time as the character

(35) Vid. GAULMIN'S פסירת-מושה. (36) ABBADIE Verit. de la Relig. Chrestien, pt. 3. † Vid. sup. p. 481. (37) ORIGEN in Job. (38) Galat. v. 6. vi. 15. (39) SYNCHELL. ex parv. Gen. CLEM. ALEXAND. ex Eusebium. Stromat. lib. i. ISIDOR. HISPAL. lib. i. ORIGEN. c. iii. CEDREN. GLYCAS. BARTOLOC & VOLP. Bibl. Rabbini. & Auct. ibi citat. vid. etiam FABRIC. de Apoc. V. 9. (40) R. SHABTAI STRIM. vid. & WOLF. Bib. Rabbini. Num. 1582. (41) Epist. 127. ad Fabiol. Manp. 18. & 24. Vid. CALM. Hist. V. Test. t. i. p. perult. † Vid. sup. p. 489, note (2). (42) Vid. Elle-shemeth rabb. in EXOD. xxxiv. Rab. SAL. in loc. Pirke Aboth. P'etirath Moyse. vid. & SIX. SIXEN. & al. op. CALM. dict. sub. voc. MOISE. Vid. sup. p. 511. at the end of note (A). (43) P. 647. & seq.

- a Jews) * of the twelfth month, which is called Adar, and in the hundred and twentieth of his age; the last forty of which, the last month excepted, he had spent in the government of the Israelites. The people mourned for him one whole month according to the custom of the nation, for the death of any eminent person, after which Joshua entered into his office, and soon after that, into the land of Canaan, as shall be shewn in the next section.

In the mean time it will be proper to observe here, that the ceremony of circumcision was discontinued during the whole time of their abode in the wilderness; for which no proper reason can be well assigned, unless it be either because their frequent moving from place to place would have made it dangerous for those children who were circumcised before a march, or that, the design of circumcision being to preserve the people from intermingling with other nations, it became less necessary in the wilderness, where they were in no danger of such a mixture *. But neither of these reasons is satisfactory; for as to the first, besides that their marches happened but seldom during the last thirty eight years, as we observed before †, it would have been more safe to have dispensed with the time, and, instead of the eighth day, to have performed it on the next encampment, than to have wholly omitted it, seeing there were some particular blessings belonging to it, which they were deprived of, that died without it. For this very reason therefore it did not become less obligatory, though the preventing a mixture were allowed to have been the main design of its institution. For that could not authorize them to dispense with a positive precept, even though none of those neighbouring nations had been circumcised, which was not the case, seeing the Edomites, and perhaps also the Midianites were. But whatever be the reason of its omission, one may conclude from it, that this ceremony was not so necessary to salvation as some, both Christians and Jews, have imagined, among the latter of which, some have run to such an extreme of superstition, as to cause those children of theirs that happened to die before they were circumcised, to receive it before they were buried.

BEFORE we dismiss this section, it will be expected, no doubt, that we should give some account of the order and manner of encamping and marching used by the Israelites in the wilderness, because it is not only curious, but useful, in order to understand several places of holy writ that allude to it, both in the old and new testament *, especially in the prophetic books. It is plain, from the short account which Moses has left us of it †, that it was prescribed to him by GOD himself. And indeed, if we consider their vast multitude, their untoward genius, the great mixture of other nations that joined themselves to them, the quantity of lumber which they were forced to carry with them, we can hardly suppose that any man, how wise and experienced soever, could be equal to such a task without a supernatural assistance. 'Tis true indeed that the word wilderness, by which the scene of their forty years wandering is called, ought not to be taken too literally, seeing they did generally encamp near inhabited towns and villages, whose territories could furnish them with provisions for themselves, and pasture for their cattle, and, when that failed, they were often miraculously supplied; but nevertheless, to provide for all other exigencies, which must needs be supposed to happen in such a numberless host, to settle such * Vid. Sedar holam Rab. cap. 10. MAIMON. Præf. ad Misnaioth, &c. † Josh. v. 2. & seq.

* BASNAG. Rep. Hebr. Tom. I. lib. iii. c. 5. LE CLERC, GROT. & SAURIN, &c. † Vid. sup. p. 527. c. - See Sir ISAAC NEWT. Observ. upon the prophecies, p. 259. & alib. MED. Clav. prophet. pass. & al. † Numb. i. 51. & seq.

character of this lawgiver has been universally known by the ancients, so has it been as much lessened and blackened by some, as it has been exaggerated by others beyond all modesty and truth, according to their different prejudices and interests. Josephus, in his book against Apion (44) has not only recorded, but fully answered all that Manetho had said, to lessen the glory of it; and what that learned Jew has said there, will equally confute what Justin out of Trogus has said of him (45). On the other hand some late authors, by comparing what we read of Moses with what the fables tell us of Bacchus, Mercury, &c. have found so near a resemblance in the characters, that they have not scrupled to affirm, that the heathen had applied what they had read of the former to the latter; concerning which the reader may, if he pleases, consult the learned Huetius's Demonstratio Evangelica, a work which could hardly have met with such a strenuous and bitter opposition from the Cartesian philosophers, had it bore any other title than that of demonstration.

excellent order and discipline in it, as to prevent confusion, disorders, and defection, to breed up such a number of excellent soldiers, and to teach them to incamp and decamp, to march and to fight in so regular a manner as they did, whatever Moses might have learned from the Egyptians, who understood doubtless as much of the art of war as any other nation then did, seems still to have been above the power of a meer man. And this consideration should, one would think, stop the mouths of those who pretend they can find nothing of military art worth admiring, except in the ancient Greeks and Romans.

HOWEVER as the subject has been copiously handled by other pens<sup>c</sup>, who have been forced to supply the succinct account of Moses out of the writings of the Talmudists, and other ancient Jews, not to say sometimes out of their own heads; we b hope our readers will easily excuse us from launching farther into these particularities, than we have good grounds for from holy writ. Though where we find any thing in the Talmud, Josephus, or any other Rabbi, that carries a face of probability, or gives any light to the account we have in the text, we shall venture to give it in a note.

THE text tells us, that they were to pitch their tents every man by his own camp, tribe, and standard, throughout the whole host: that the tribe of Levi was to incamp round the tabernacle, and have the charge and custody of it; and that the rest of the tribes should pitch their standards with the ensigns of their father's house round about it, at an equal and convenient distance from it<sup>d</sup>. This distance, let it c have been what it would (L), composed not a perfect square, because the tabernacle and its court were oblong, much less a circle, as some have fancied it, from the word round about taken too literally; but an oblong square, in the center of which was the tabernacle with its court in length one hundred, and in breadth fifty cubits<sup>e</sup>. Parallel to each of the four sides of it, and at a proper distance between it and the other tribes, was that of Levi; along the east end was Eleazar the high-priest, with the rest of the family of Aaron at the head of the four classes of Levites. As for Moses's pavilion, all that he has told us of it is only, that it stood on the same side with those of Aaron's children<sup>f</sup>; though we may reasonably suppose that it was in the most honourable place of the d whole camp, as he was their chief and lawgiver; and nearest the tabernacle, to which he was obliged to repair upon all emergencies; but whether we may conclude from his situation that the tabernacle stood east and west, that is, with the holy of holies towards the east, and the entrance into it facing the west, as Cuneus and others do<sup>g</sup>, is not very material. On the west side were the Gershonites under Eliazaph, the son of Levi, in number seven thousand five hundred: 3. The Kobabites under Elizaphan, the son of Uziel, in number eight thousand six hundred: and lastly, the Merarites under Zurich, the son of Abibail, in number six thousand two hundred; and these two last incamped along the south and north sides. All these together made an army of twenty two thousand e three hundred + (M.) Each of these had their particular functions and charges

<sup>c</sup> BASNAG. ex CUNÆO. Rep. Hebr. Tom. II. c. 18. FOLARD, Tactic. Hebr. Lamy & al.
<sup>d</sup> Num. i. 52. & seq. ii. 1, 2. & seq. <sup>e</sup> Vid. Exod. xxvii. 18. <sup>f</sup> Num. iii. 38. <sup>g</sup> BASNAG.
ex CUN. ubi sup. CALM. & al. <sup>h</sup> Vid. sup. p. 534 c.

(L) The Rabbies affirm the distance of the camp of each tribe, except that of Levi, to have been two thousand cubits, which they therefore call a sab-bath day's journey, because they were not allowed to go further on that day. This was the distance between Jerusalem and the mount of Olivet (46). This space of two thousand cubits seems well grounded, it being the distance which God commanded the people to keep from the ark, when they were on their march. They affirm moreover that there was likewise a distance of three miles between every tribe, which if true must form a square of near thirty six miles about. Josephus indeed doth not tell us what this distance was, but calls it a great one, and adds, that there were as spacious streets, lanes, markets, shops, &c. in the camp, and in as regular an order, as could be seen in the most polite cities (47). However the most rational Jews extend not this distance between tribe and tribe beyond two thousand paces, nor that which each tribe took up beyond four thousand (48). To which they add, that in the center of the camp there was a space of eight thousand paces square, of which the inmost four thousand was for the tabernacle and the tribe of Levi, and the residue, which was between these and the other tribes, was for pasture ground for their cattle.

(M) This tribe was not numbered at the first recension of the people, but some time after. However, if the reader compares the amount of it mentioned in this place (49), with that of the three classes of which it consisted, he will find that it comes short of the odd three hundred, which

(46) Vid. A2s i. 12. (47) Ant. I. iii. c. 12.
im. ii. c. 18. (49) Num. iii. 39.

(48) Vid. BASNAG. ex CUN. Rep. Heb.

allotted

- a allotted to them, both as to the worship of God, and the custody of the tabernacle, with all its apparatus, as may be seen by the text<sup>a</sup>. This is all that can be affirmed with any certainty concerning the Levitical camp, which the Rabbies affect to call the little host, or camp of the Lord; probably because we find that name given to them where mention is made of Hezekiah's restoring them,--- to sing the praises of God within the gates of the Lord's camp<sup>1</sup>, whereas the other tribes are commonly called the grand army, or the great host.

- As the tribe of Levi made four small bodies on each side the tabernacle, so did the other twelve make four large camps parallel to them, each body consisting of three tribes. That of Judah, whether because it was the most considerable, it b mustering seventy four thousand six hundred fighting men, or in consideration of the scepter, or the Messiah, being promised to it, had the post of honour, and incamped on the east side behind the priests at the head of two other tribes, namely, that of Issachar, consisting of fifty four thousand four hundred, and that of Zebulun of fifty seven thousand men; so that this body amounted to one hundred eighty six thousand four hundred fighting men; but whether he incamped on the right hand of the other two tribes, as the Jews think, or which is more probable, seeing he was as it were their head and general, in the center betwixt them, is neither certain nor material; the same may be said also of the heads of the other three bodies.

- c REUBEN was at the head of the next body, and his camp on the south side; his tribe consisted of forty six thousand five hundred men, and Simeon with fifty nine thousand three hundred, and Gad, with forty five thousand six hundred fifty, marched under his banner; this body consisted of one hundred fifty one thousand four hundred and fifty.

THE next was Ephraim at the head of forty thousand five hundred of his own tribe, under whom Manasseh led thirty two thousand two hundred, and Benjamin thirty five thousand four hundred, in all one hundred eight thousand one hundred; these encamped on the west side.

- d THE last was the tribe of Dan with sixty two thousand seven hundred, with that of Asher, consisting of forty one thousand five hundred, and Naphtali fifty three thousand four hundred, in all one hundred fifty seven thousand five hundred and fifty, and these were on the north side of the tabernacle. Thus the Israelitish host amounted to six hundred and three thousand five hundred fifty fighting men, exclusive of the Levites. To which if we add the old men above sixty, and the young men under twenty, their wives, daughters, servants, slaves, and strangers which, as we shewed before, amounted in the whole to little less than three millions, their vast number of cattle, waggon, and other lumber, the least space that can be allowed for such a prodigious camp must be above twenty miles, though we supposed the spaces between each tribe, to have been much less than the Jewish doctors affirm (N).

THESE four large bodies had each their general standard (O), to which their

<sup>b</sup> Numb. iv. per tot.

<sup>1</sup> 2 Chron. xxxi. 2.

are therefore supposed to have been the first-born of that tribe, and are therefore left out of the list. And as the Levites were chosen out instead of the first-born of all the tribes, when the number of the former came to be taken, and was found to fall short of the first-born of the latter by two hundred eighty three, this overplus was redeemed at the rate of five shekels of the sanctuary, and the money given to the sons of Aaron (50).

(N) This prodigious camp is by the ancient Jews called threefold, whereof the tabernacle with its precinct is called the camp of the Divine Majesty, the next the camp of Levi, and the largest the camp of Israel, and may well enough be compared to a cathedral in the heart of a city, round which are the bishop, dean, canons and inferior clergy, and round them the laity. The Gemmarab affirms (51), that it took up twelve miles in length and breadth, which they infer from that place in Numbers (52), where it is said, that they pitched by Jordan from Beer-jeshimoth, even unto Abel-shittim in the plain of Moab, which they say is the distance between those two places; but here we think there is no need of making the Jewish miles shorter than ours, as a certain author has done (53), without any foundation, only to justify the Gemmarists, considering what a vast quantity of empty ground they allow between every tribe for pasture ground, and the like.

(O) The Chaldee and Septuagint have indeed rendered the original word גִּדּוֹל, Gedel, ensign or standard, the former by תִּקְדָּם, borrowed perhaps from the Greek τὰς ἐκ τῆς, and the latter by πύγμα ἄνθρωπος ἐκόμενος κατὰ τάγμα αὐτοῦ, every man to his own order, station, or rank,

(50) Numb. iii. 41. & seq. vid. MUNT. in loc. & dar. cap. 8. § 4. l. vi.

(52) Ch. xxxiii. 49.

(51) Tract. סוּטָה, cap. i. ap. GOODWIN, M. f.

(53) GOODWIN, ibid. note 1.

own and the other tribes were to repair; under these were twelve more, one to every tribe, and under these again were those of all the heads of families, amounting to fifty seven, according to Moses's own account<sup>a</sup>; and indeed less than that number cannot be supposed. What the colours, emblems, and devices of those ensigns were, neither Moses nor any inspired writer has told us. The Rabbies have supplied all those defects very plentifully; but though they are not always to be depended upon, yet some particulars they have given us relating to those of the four main bodies, and those of the twelve tribes, which seem not to be ill grounded. Of the first they tell us, that Judah had the emblem of a lion, with this device, let God arise, and let his enemies be scattered<sup>1</sup>; but the latter seems more proper for the ensign of Levi, if any belonged to that tribe, which is not improbable, because those were the words which were used by the Levites, when the ark was removing. As for the lion, it is the emblem by which Jacob represented the tribe of Judah in his last will<sup>m</sup>; but they add, that it was painted of three colours on the standard<sup>n</sup>. Reuben's ensign had the figure of a man, to which some add that of a mandrake, alluding to those he found in the fields when a boy<sup>o</sup>. That of Ephraim was an ox or calf, and seems to be taken from the words of Moses's blessing to that tribe; his glory is like the firstling of his bullock<sup>p</sup>. To the tribe of Dan they give an eagle, which agrees neither with Moses's blessing, which compares him to a lion's whelp, nor to that of Jacob, which compares him to a serpent in the way. However, in order to make it agree with the latter, they pretend that the eagle was painted holding a serpent in his claws<sup>q</sup>; but we have still a better authority for these four emblems, namely, 1. The vision of Ezekiel<sup>r</sup>, which is universally allowed to allude to it. 2. The psalmist representing the congregation of Israel under these emblems<sup>s</sup>; and lastly, St. John in his apocalypse representing the faithful by the four beasts about the throne of God, crying night and day, holy, holy<sup>t</sup>, and so on; from which it is most likely that the four evangelists came afterwards to have the same emblems more particularly appropriated to them (P).

THAT every tribe had, besides, their particular standard of a different colour, and with a different emblem, and motto, if they used any so early, can hardly be questioned, and that these two last might be taken from those allusions which Jacob made use of in his last blessing, is far from improbable; and thus for instance Naphtali might have a large tree or a hind in his ensign†, Issachar an ass couching under his burthen, Benjamin a wolf<sup>u</sup>, and so on, beyond which we dare not venture to affirm any thing (Q), much less concerning the ensigns of rank, which phrase the apostle doth seem to apply in a sense somewhat different from this (54.) However it is plain that those versions must have supposed some such thing as standards set up in full sight; without which it would have been impossible for them to repair every one to their own tribe and family.

<sup>a</sup> Numb. ii. & xxvi. pass. <sup>1</sup> Ps. lxxviii. 1. <sup>m</sup> Gen. xlix. 9. <sup>n</sup> Ita RR. JONATH. ABR. BEN LEVI. Cabal. Histor. ap. CUNÆUM ub. sup. <sup>o</sup> Gen. xxx. 14. <sup>p</sup> Deut. xxxiii. 17. <sup>q</sup> Vid. ABEN EZRA & FAG. in Num. ii. <sup>r</sup> Ch. i. 10. <sup>s</sup> Ps. lxxviii. 10. <sup>t</sup> Revel. iv. 6, & 7. † Vid. sup. p. 464. [Q] <sup>u</sup> Gen. xlix. 14, 21, 27, &c. See also an ancient apocryphal book called the Testament of the twelve patriarchs.

(P) The psalmist here describes the Israelitish commonwealth, particularly whilst in the wilderness, their marches, encampments, order, and many other circumstances, in a most elegant and poetic manner, and, amongst other allusions used there, he represents it under that of Hajab (55), which our version rightly enough renders congregation, but in the original doth properly signify life, beast, or living creature; and being compared to that which is mentioned in Ezekiel, which had all these four figures, of a man, lion, ox, and eagle, is justly concluded to allude to these four general standards, representing the Israelitish congregation, as it doth that of the faithful under

Christ in the revelations (56).

(Q) The Rabbies add, from what authority is more than we can guess, many other particulars relating to those twelve standards, as first, that their colour answered to that of the twelve stones in the breast-plate of the high-priest (57), on which the name of each tribe was engraven; but the misfortune is, that they are far from agreeing in assigning the names and colour of those stones; besides, another difficulty arises which they do not answer, which is, that Levi had its own name and stone, which they affirm to have been, some a beril, others a sapphire, &c. on the breast-plate, though it be not here numbered with the other tribes, but instead of it, that of Joseph is divided into Ephraim and Manasseh. Concerning the four grand standards they add, that each of them had three letters taken from the names of their three first patriarchs Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. Judah had י, א, ל. Reuben ב, ש, ע. Ephraim מ, ק, ח. Dan נ, ח, מ. But

(54) 1 Cor. xv. 23. Vid. GOODWIN ubi sup. ISAAC NEWT. in Apocal. TREMEL. LABRADIE paraph. in Num. ii. 5.

(55) Ps. lxxviii. 10.

(56) Vid. MEDE. Sir

(57) Vid. R. JONATH.

<sup>a</sup> the principal families which other authors have thought fit to give us. * One thing more however is worth observing, that they had likewise a separate camp for lepers, for those who had running sores, or any infirmities of that nature, or had defiled themselves by touching a dead body, and the like; all which were excluded from this grand one *. These, with some other orders Moses gave them to preserve cleanliness and decency, sufficiently explode the ridiculous charge of their being driven out of Egypt, on account of some such nauseous disease.

THE order of their decamping and marching, of their engaging in battle and such like, are likewise particularly prescribed by Moses; we shall content ourselves with mentioning the principal heads relating to each of them, and <sup>b</sup> removing some few difficulties that occur, and refer our readers for the more circumstantial parts to the text itself, and to those who have treated on them more at large †.

IN their decamping, whilst in the wilderness, the first thing they were to observe was the signal from the miraculous pillar, of which we have already spoken †. Moses immediately took care to have it communicated throughout the camp by two silver trumpets made by GOD's command ‡; and because these were used for other signals, such as the calling the elders to the tabernacle, proclaiming of anniversary festivals and the like; they were differently blown according to the signal they were to give, that is, for instance, singly, when <sup>c</sup> to call the elders; jointly, when to call the whole congregation; with a constant and even sound when they proclaimed a march; and with a tremulous interrupted one, when they sounded to battle. To these the apostle seems to allude, when he says, if the trumpet gives an uncertain sound, who will prepare to battle †? As soon therefore as the first signal was given for marching, every tribe set about making ready for it; and this took up some considerable time, especially to the priests and Levites †, who had the tabernacle with all its utensils to take down, cover, and pack up (R), part to be set upon waggons for that purpose, and part to be carried upon men's shoulders (S). By that time the Levites had got every thing ready for the march, the second signal was given; for it is not

* BASNAG. ubi supr. CALM. & al. † Numb. v. 1. & seq. ‡ Vid. BASNAG. ubi supr. c. xix.
 † Vid. supr. p. 504. 2. † Numb. x. 1. & seq. † 1 Cor. xiv. 8. † Vid. Numb. iv. 5. & alib.

But these, with the learned interpretations of them, as well as some other wonderful things which they do tell us of this camp, such as that, wherever they pitched it, there sprang up a fountain before the tabernacle, which divided itself into streams, which ran through and supplied every tribe with water, which we have elsewhere confuted †: that the miraculous pillar, which went before them, did lower the mountains, raise the vallies, &c. to make the way easier for them, with many more of the like nature, we willingly leave to those who have either a Jewish faith to believe, or a Jewish conscience to retail them.

(R) There arises a difficulty between the command here given about the taking down the tabernacle, with the veil and covering, &c. and the prohibition for any but the high-priest to go into the sanctuary, since even he was not allowed to enter it above once a year (58). This seeming contradiction is generally solved by the common answer, that GOD can dispense with his own laws. Others confine the entrance permitted here to the sons of Aaron, only to the holy place, whilst the high-priest alone went into the most holy one, to take down the veil, cover the ark, &c. and this seems probable enough by comparing what is commanded in the 4th and 10th chapters of Numbers, if we can suppose one single person, and he not over young, to have been sufficient for all this. But a learned critic has given us another solution, which we think is more satisfactory still (59), which is, that this entrance was only forbidden whilst the tabernacle was set up, and the cloud, which was the known symbol of the divine presence, continued to cover the holy place; but when that was removed, and the ark or mercy-seat had been covered, or perhaps shut up in some proper repository †, then it might be lawful for the inferior priests to come in, and assist the high-priest and his sons in the removal of the rest.

(S) Another seeming contradiction is, where it is said that as soon as the ark was covered, which was to be with a treble covering, they should put in the staves of it (60). Whereas it is said elsewhere (61), that the staves should never be taken out; besides, how was it possible to put them in, after the ark had been packed up in so many coverings. Some therefore instead of, they shall put in, read, they shall lay or put on, the staves, namely upon men's shoulders; but since the original may as properly be rendered, and they shall let the staves abide in, that is, they shall cover it over without taking them out, probably lest the ark might be seen through the holes of the covering through which the staves must afterwards have been put in; there is no occasion to seek for a better solution than this, as the author above quoted justly observes (62). All the other utensils of the tabernacle had likewise their particular coverings, under which they were carried, as the most proper way to strike an awe upon the people. And therefore the opinion of those who think that the ark was uncovered, when carried in procession round the walls of Jericho, and into the camp of Israel by the two sons of Eli, seems somewhat absurd, especially considering what terrible punishments were denounced and actually inflicted on those who ventured to look upon it. It is therefore more probable that it had in such a case at least a sky blue covering thrown over it. But this by the by.

† Vid. sup. p. 511. (T). (58) Exod. xxx. 10. Levit. xvi. 2. & seq. Heb. ix. 7. (59) BASNAG. ubi supr. † See the next note. (60) Numb. iv. 6. (61) Exod. xxv. 15. (62) BASNAG. ibid.
 VOL. I. NUMB. VIII. 6 Z to

to be doubted but the other tribes could be sooner in a readiness than they; <sup>a</sup> and then all that bore arms repaired to their standards, whilst the invalids, women, children, and carriages marched towards the rear. Upon the next signal the tribe of Judab, at the head of the other two that belonged to his camp, began to march; and these were followed, according to the most general opinion, by the Gershonites and Merarites, who guarded the waggons loaded with the boards, skins, and pillars belonging to the tabernacle. Upon the next signal, Reuben and his two tribes began to move; after whom came the Kobathites, bearing the ark, altar, table, and other utensils upon their shoulders, so that, by that time they were got to their journey's end, the Gershonites and Merarites had set up the tabernacle, and got all things ready for their reception (T). <sup>b</sup> The ark and its bearers were guarded by the tribes of Ephraim, Benjamin, and Manasseh, as soon as the third signal was given. To this alludes that of the psalmist <sup>c</sup>, thou that fittest between the cherubims shine forth before Ephraim, Benjamin and Manasseh. Last of all came the tribes of Dan, Asher, and Naphtali escorting the invalids that none might be left behind; for which reason this body is called the rear-ward, or, as our margins more properly word it, the gathering host <sup>d</sup>. However, it is plain that this order was not always observed, for first, with respect to the ark, there are some places where it is said to have moved before them <sup>e</sup> upon some emergencies; and with respect to the whole body, though they kept this excellent order of marching in columns, as often as the lands <sup>c</sup> through which they passed would permit it; yet whenever they came to cross whole ridges of mountains, they were then forced to make the best of their way, some over heights, others through the vallies, preserving still the best order they could for their own safety (V). All that needs be added upon this subject is, that, when the ark was taking up for the march, Moses or the priests used to say, Arise, O Lord, and let thy enemies be scattered, and let them that hate thee flee before thee; and when the priests set it down, Return, O Lord, unto the many thousands of Israel <sup>f</sup>. These words are still to this day used by the Jews, when they fetch the roll of the law out of its repository, and when they carry it thither again.

CONCERNING their method of engaging an enemy, their order of battle, and the like, we have nothing certain but what has already been occasionally mentioned before. Such as the having one priest anointed to be consulted by Urim, instead of the high-priest, who never went to the wars, the Amercol, or exhorting priest, who is thought to be the same with the former by some authors <sup>g</sup>, and whose speech, at least the substance of it, has been preserved to us by the antient Jews (W): all that we can say farther on this head with any certain-

<sup>c</sup> Psal. lxxx. 1, 2.

<sup>d</sup> Josh. vi. 9. Vid. MÜNST. in loc. GOODWIN's Mos. & Aaron. lib. vi. c. 4. art. 3. see also Numb. x. 21. & seq.

<sup>e</sup> See Numb. x. 33. Josh. iii. 6.

<sup>f</sup> Numb. x. 35, 36.

<sup>g</sup> CALMET & BASNAG. ubi supr.

(T) It is not easy to guess how far such a camp may be supposed to go in a day, by marching in that regular manner: an author often quoted upon this subject (63) has pretended to prove, that they did not exceed two miles a day, from what is said of one of their marches (64), that they took up three days in going from Sinai to Kibroth-battarah, which he says is not reckoned above six miles, according to the calculation of several authors. But who knows how far this small progress might be owing to the ruggedness of the ways, to some mountains interposing, or to some other reason not taken notice of by the historian? This therefore can by no means be an argument, that they never marched further in one day, seeing in an open country such an army might easily march above six times that ground, if not more.

(V) If it be objected here, that it was unsafe and impolitic to leave the women, children, invalids, and all their baggage in the rear, where they had been once attacked by the Amalekites as we have seen before †, all that can be answered to this is, that, when they had once crossed the red-sea and seen an end of their enemies, they thought themselves safe on that side, and consequently appointed that order of marching, which was certainly the most convenient where it could be followed with safety. But we need not doubt, but, whenever they had any reason to apprehend being attacked in the rear, they placed them nearer to the vanguard. Neither do we meet with any other instance of such an attack, for those other nations with whom they had any encounters always came in front, and endeavoured to obstruct their passage. However, though we have spoken in this the sentiments of those who have wrote upon the subject, yet we are far from thinking it improbable that the wives, children, and most valuable baggage might march either with each body to which it belonged, or in the spaces that were between them whenever the ground permitted it.

(W) Among other remarkable things in this speech, were those that follow; Hear, O Israel, — you are now going to engage, not against your brethren, not one tribe against another, by whom, if you

(63) BASNAG. ubi supr.

(64) Numb. x. 33.

† Vid. supr. p. 320. b. 511. d.

The Camp of the Israelites according to Reyherus.
THE CAMP OF THE ISRALITES.

WE S T.
 108100.

THE CAMP OF EPHRAIM.

NORTH. 157600. THE CAMP OF DAN.	Tribe of DAN 62700.	Tribe of BENJAMIN 35400.	Tribe of MANASSEH 32200.	Tribe of EPHRAIM 40500.	SOUTH. 151450. THE CAMP OF REUBEN.
	Tribe of ASHER 41500.	GERSHONITES. The Camp 7500. of God. All the Levites 22000.
	Tribe of NAPHTALI 53400.	MERARITES. CATHITES. The Tabernacle. Aaron. Moses.
	Tribe of JUDAH 74600.	Tribe of ISSACHAR 54400.	Tribe of ZABULON 57400.	Tribe of SIME'ON 49300.
THE CAMP OF JUDAH. EAST. 186400.
Tribe of REUBEN 46500.

The Standards of the Twelve Tribes.

The Standards of the Twelve Tribes.

- a ry is, that as soon as the trumpets had given the signal for the engagement, the combatants gave a great shout, and fell immediately upon their enemies<sup>a</sup>; an Their manner instance of which we find some time after, when they went to engage the Phi- of engagin- listines<sup>1</sup>. This was no less practised by the Greeks, Romans, and other warlike nations, who often increased the horrid noise with knocking their weapons against their shields<sup>2</sup>. With relation to their besieging of towns we are still more in the dark; all therefore, that can be added here, is what the Jews tell us from a passage in Joshua<sup>3</sup>, that, when he sent to offer peace to the cities of Canaan before he enter'd it, he dispatched three expresses to them: the first was, to permit those, who had a mind to leave the country, to depart; the second was to offer peace to those that would make peace with him, and the last, to declare war against those that refused the two former offers<sup>4</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> Vid. CUN. & GOODWIN ubi sup.
<sup>2</sup> POLYB. apud. CUN. ubi supr.

<sup>1</sup> Vid. 1 Sam. iv. 5. & JOSEPH. de Bell. Jud. lib. 3.
<sup>3</sup> Josh. xi. 19. 20. <sup>4</sup> GOODWIN ubi supr.

SECT. III.

The History of the Jews under Joshua.

The description, conquest, and partition of the land of Canaan.

- THE Israelitish camp continued at Shittim, near the river Jordan, and in Year of the sight of the land of Canaan during the days of mourning for Moses; and Flood, 1548. the people, whom a forty years wandering in the wilderness, under a discipline Before Christ, intermixed with the greatest tenderness and severity, had rendered more tracta- 1451- ble, and more sensible of God's paternal care, were only waiting for the signal for passing over the river Jordan; when their new general received fresh and repeated promises of the divine assistance in the conquest of the promised land<sup>a</sup>. Nothing less than such an assurance could indeed have supported Joshua's cou- The state of rage in so arduous a task. He was now ninety three years of age, and had the host of Israel. been trained up under Moses at least one third part of that time, so that he wanted neither experience nor sagacity to foresee all the difficulties he was to encounter with. He saw himself indeed at the head of six hundred thousand fighting men, but on the other hand his army was clogged with an innumerable multitude of old men, women, and children, besides servants, cattle, and other incumbrances. The very first step he was to take, was the crossing of a large river, in doing which he knew himself equally exposed to the arms of those he went to attack, and those whom he left behind. The nations he was to sub- due were naturally warlike, of a gigantic stature and strength, their towns well d fortified by nature and art, their forces and interest united by the strongest ties and alliances; they had all long ago taken the alarm, and had made the greatest preparations against him, resolved either to obstruct his conquest, or lose their lives in the defence of their country<sup>b</sup>.

THIS was the situation of the Canaanites, and of Joshua's affairs, when he received the divine signal to prepare for the glorious conquest. His first care therefore was to make choice of two proper persons to go privily to the land of Jericho, and examine what condition their cities and people were in. These Two spies sent to Jericho.

<sup>a</sup> Josh. i. per tot.

<sup>b</sup> Ibid. ix. 1, 2. & seq. x. & seq. pass.

you chanced to be taken, you might expect to be used with mercy: — but against your enemies, into whose hands if it be your misfortune to fall, you must expect no quarter: — let not your courage fail you; let not the neighing of their horses, the brightness of their spears, the clattering of their shields, or the sound of their trumpets dishearten you — God is in the midst of you: — your foes come against you with an arm of flesh, but you trust in the strength of the Almighty; and so on (65). Part of this speech we find to have been certainly dictated by Moses (66), but whether the rest was fo or not, we dare not affirm. However one thing is worth observing, with respect to these words, thou art not going to engage against thy brethren, from whom thou mightest expect mercy; that the tribe of Judah having been captivated by those of Israel, so long after as in Abaz's reign, and these ready to use their captives with the same severity as they did strangers, a prophet of the Lord did strenuously oppose it, and made the conquerors cloath, feed, and anoint them, and send them back to their brethren (67).

(65) Transl. מוֹשֶׁה cap. viii. vid. GOODWIN. Mss. & Aar. lib. iw. c. 8. § 14.
 2 & seq. (67) Vid. 2 Chron. xxviii. 8. & seq.

(66) Deut. xx

soon

Concealed by Rahab.

They swear to save her and hers.

soon set out for this perilous expedition, and, having happily crossed the Jordan,<sup>a</sup> went and lodged at an inn-keeper's-house (X) named Rahab, where they had not been long, before a strict search was made after them by order of the alarmed king of Jericho. Their fear however was soon dispelled by their hospitable hostess, who sent away the searchers by telling them out of her window, that two strangers had indeed refreshed themselves at her house, but that they were gone since towards sunset, and might be easily taken if closely pursued. Their backs were no sooner turned, than she went to the two spies, to whom she freely owned the panick dread that had seized not only that city, but all the land of Canaan, at the news of what the God of Israel had done in favour of their nation both at the red-sea, and against those kingdoms which they had so lately conquer'd.<sup>b</sup> To this she added, that being now fully persuaded that he was the only true God, against whose decrees, all opposition would be not only vain, but dangerous, she was now ready to save them from their imminent danger, upon condition they swore to save her and her family, when they became masters of the city. An offer so generous and so unexpected, joined to so candid a confession, could not deserve a less reward; and the two spies, who, in the condition they were in, would have purchased their safety upon much harder terms, were not long before they gave her all the desired assurance, that not only she and her family, but all, that were found in her house at the taking of the city, should be exempted from the common ruin. She kept them hid the remaining part of the time under some hempen stocks, and about midnight let them down by a rope out of one of her back windows, which was contiguous to the city-wall, after she had charged them to keep themselves concealed in some cliff of the neighbouring mountains for two or three days, till their pursuers were returned home. Before they took their leave, they agreed that she should hang a scarlet line out of her window, which should be a signal to them, and a safeguard to her house. The risk they had run put a stop to their further progress, and what they had learned at Jericho made it as needless as dangerous; so that, having happily escaped all further discovery, they returned to their

(X) We have ventured to give Rahab a more favourable appellation than most versions have done, who make no scruple to call her a harlot, though it is plain, that the word זונה, Zonah, doth as properly signify an inn-keeper, or one who selleth victuals and drink, as a harlot; for it is derived from the root זן, Zon, which signifies to give food, and is the feminine participle active of that verb. And in this we have followed the Chaldee paraphrast, which renders it by the word פונדקיתא, from פונדק, an inn (68); in which he is also followed by some of the most learned Hebrew who paraphrast the word hereby מוכרת מאון, Mokereth-maon, a seller of victuals (69); and Kimchi allows, that it may be rendered either way (70); to which we may add, that the Septuagint, and after them St. James, have made use of the Greek word πώτρια, which is capable of both significations, namely, of a victualler or a harlot, as Junius has fully proved it (71). And indeed, as the word in its primitive sense doth properly signify the former, it is not unlikely that the freedoms, which those kind of women were wont to allow to their customers, might give birth to the latter signification, and, from an hostess or a victualler, come in time to signify a harlot. But as it doth not appear by the text that she did drive both these trades, but rather the contrary, the faith which she expressed in God, and her behaviour to his two servants, might well deserve to have the most favourable construction put upon her profession. To which we may add, that it is not likely that Salmon would, or indeed could, afterwards have lawfully married her, if she had been such a publick woman; he who was a prince of the house of Judah, and one of the Mefiashab's ancestors.

But here, we do not pretend to enter into a scrutiny how far her hospitality to her two guests was blameable or praise-worthy, or how far she was guilty of betraying her country; much less shall we take upon us to justify the lye she told the king's officers, as some have done with more zeal than discretion (72); but thus much may be said on her behalf, setting even aside her faith, for which she is commended in the gospel, that if she had heard of the overthrow of Pharaoh, Sihon, and Og; the king of Jericho could not be ignorant of it. It was therefore as natural for her to be terrified at it, and to provide for her safety, as it was for him to make a brave resistance or perish in the attempt. To this we may add, that if what the scripture seems to intimate plainly enough be true, that Joshua was obliged to offer peace, before he made use of the sword, against any of the Canaanish nations †, it was lawful for her or any other subject to accept it, as it was glorious for a monarch to refuse it. At least, we think that the refusal of such advantageous terms from an irresistible conqueror, at the risk of being all infallibly massacred by him, for the sake of a king, who, for aught that appears to the contrary, might be but a petty tyrant, and of a people whom fear had rendered incapable of making a defence, when perhaps the difference between being under the natural monarch, if he was really such, or under the conqueror, was either inconsiderable, or, it may be, on the side of the latter; such a refusal, we say, would have been an instance of patriotism that could hardly be expected from a Canaanite, much less from such a young inn-keeper as Rahab must have been, to have been the mother of Boaz above thirty years after, as Junius has fully shewn in the place above quoted.

(68) Vid. עריר sen Lexic. R. Nathan.

(69) R. R. SALOM. JONA. LEVI Ben GERSH. vid. &

MUNST. in loc.

(70) In Rad.

(71) Vid. Jun. in Epist. Jacob. ii. 25.

(72) Vid. inter al.

TRIMEL. in loc. † Vid. supr. p. 531. (P).

a camp on the third day, and related to Joshua all that had happen'd to them, who could not but applaud himself that he had made so much better choice than Moses had done before upon the like occasion.

THE consternation, which they told him had overspread itself throughout that whole land, was universally looked upon as a sure omen of their future success, and Joshua failed not to improve it, by assuring them that it was God himself who had injected such a terror among their enemies, and that they had now nothing to do but to fight valiantly under his banner and protection. He then re-

Return to the camp and make their report.

mindes the two tribes and half of their former promise of assisting their brethren in the conquest of the land, and they on their part as readily promised to obey his orders at the peril of their lives. However as these tribes composed an army of upwards of an hundred thousand fighting men, Joshua contented himself with less than one half, and left the rest to defend their new possessions and families. After this he caused it to be proclaim'd through the camp, that they should pass over Jordan within three days, during which interval they should make provision for victuals, seeing the manna was to cease, as it actually did **, as soon as they had set foot on the other shore, and had tasted the bread of that country, and then gave the signal for marching from Sbittim to the neighbouring shore of that river. As soon as they were encamped there, Joshua sent and communicated to every tribe the order that was to be observ'd in this

They prepare to march towards Jordan.

c solemn march. The priests bearing the ark were to begin the procession, and as soon as their feet, touching the water, had opened a miraculous way to them, each tribe was to follow in the same order as they had observed in all their marches, keeping however the awful distance prescrib'd of two thousand cubits; from that sacred symbol of the divine presence *, whilst those that bore it were to continue in the middle of the river, till the whole host of Israel had got safe to the other shore.

The order of crossing that river.

To inspire the people still with a greater regard for this wonderful passage, they were commanded to sanctify themselves as had been formerly done upon such solemn occasions †, by washing their cloaths, avoiding all impurities and abstaining from matrimonial intercourse, on the eve of their march. He charged likewise every tribe to send a man to him, to be ready to execute such orders as he should give them on the morrow; which was no sooner come, than the priests began their march towards the river, and the people made themselves ready to follow them in two columns, one above and the other below the ark. This march happened on a Friday, on the tenth day of the first month Nisan, which answers to our thirtieth of April, and was the day on which the lamb was to be chosen and set by for the passover †, about which time the waters of Jordan being usually swelled by the melting of the snows of the Lebanon, and other neighbouring mountains, seldom or never failed to overflow its banks †.

e As soon therefore as the priests that bare the ark had touched the extremity of it with their feet, God, who had promised to signalize their new general here, in as miraculous a manner, as he had done their old one at the red sea, caused the waters of the river from above to go back, and to rise up in heaps far beyond the city of Adam, which is beside that of Zaretan (Y), whilst those below continuing their course towards the sea of the plain, otherwise called the

Which divides itself to open a dry passage.

* Josh. ii. per tot.

† Ibid. i. 12. & seq.

** Ibid. v. 12.

† Ibid. iii. 13.

• Ibid. ver. 4.

† Vid. supr. p. 448. b. 513. c.

† Usher's Ann. p. 25.

† Compare

Josh. iii. 15. & 1 Chron. xii. 15. Eccl. xxiv. 26. JOSEPH. Antiq. l. v. c. 1.

(Y) This city was afterwards called Zeredathah. It belonged to the tribe of Ephraim, and became famous for the fine copper-works which Hiram did cast there for the temple of Salomon (73). As for the city of Adam, though some geographers place it upon the Dead-sea, that is, below the place where the waters divided themselves (74), it is plain from the text, that it was above it towards Scythopolis; so that if the place where they crossed was about Bethabara, where John did baptize, as some think (75), the waters must have risen near sixty miles upwards.

What adds still to the miracle is, 1st, that that none of those cities that were situate along the shore, where the waters rose up to such a height, were drown'd, or even hurt as we find: and 2dly, that the inhabitants of Jericho, right over against whom they crossed the river, did not make some bold attempt to have disputed a pass of such consequence, and obstructed their crossing; all which can only be attributed to the same miraculous power which kept the waters suspended.

(73) 2 Chron. iv. 17.

(74) CELLAR. Geogr. Antiq. lib. iii. c. 13.

(75) Vid. LE CLERC &

CALM. Comm. in Josh. & Hist. V. T.

Salt or Dead-sea, opened a passage of about sixteen or eighteen miles in breadth to the Israelites, till they were all got safe to the other side.

DURING all the time of their crossing, the priests continued with the ark in the midst of the Jordan, and waited only for Joshua's orders when to come out and join the rest of the camp. But Joshua, who designed to perpetuate the memory of this wonderful transaction, commanded them to stand still, till he had made those twelve men, whom he had directed to wait about him, to take twelve large stones, one for each tribe, and lay them on one heap in the place where the ark stood, so that they might be seen afterwards from each shore, when the waters of the river were abated; and at the same time he made them take up twelve other stones from the bottom of the river, and to erect a monument with them on the shore; which was no sooner done than the priests had orders to march with the ark, and leave the waters to retake their usual course. Joshua, who by this time was in as high esteem with the people as Moses had been before, failed not to charge them to transmit to their posterity the occasion and meaning of these two monuments; both which, if we may believe Eusebius and others, were still to be seen many centuries after. From this place Joshua commanded the vanguard, which consisted of the forty thousand men of the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and half Manasseh, to march towards the plains of Jericho, and these were soon followed by the rest of the army, and encamped at Gilgal, about seven or eight miles from Jordan, and about three or four from Jericho.

Two monuments of it reared up.

Circumcision renewed.

IN the mean time the feast of the passover drew nigh, unto which no uncircumcised person was to be admitted under the severest penalties; and yet at least two thirds of the men were so. That ceremony had been intermitted during their forty years wandering, so that all, that had been circumcised besides Joshua and Caleb, were only those who were under twenty years of age at the rebellion of Cadesb Barnea, all the rest were dead in the wilderness; it was therefore necessary before all things that it should be renewed out of hand: wherefore Joshua was commanded to have it immediately perform'd. The circumstance of time was altogether favourable for such an operation; and their miraculous passage over the Jordan had spread such an universal dread among their enemies, that they now had no cause to apprehend being surprized by them, as the Shechemites had been by Simeon and Levi. Besides it was God that commanded, to whom they had all the reason in the world to commit their safety, so that his orders were chearfully and punctually obeyed. The sharp stones which they made use of being more proper for the ceremony than knives or razors made of metal, as being less apt to cause inflammations, was a means of their being sooner healed, and consequently in a condition to celebrate the passover, at the appointed time, as it was accordingly done; and God, highly pleased with their obedience, told them that he had now removed or rolled away from them the reproach of Egypt, that is, that he did no longer look upon them as uncircumcised Egyptians, but as his own people, in memory of which, the place was called Gilgal, or rolling (Z).

† Josh. iii. & iv. per tot. ‡ EUSEB. loc. Hebr. sub Bounos & Gilgal, ANSELM. ALBERT. JOB. MOSCH. Vit. Patr. & al. ap. Calm. Hist. V. T. lib. iii. cap. 1. ¶ Josh. iv. 12, 13. †† Vid. supr. p. 536. d.

(Z) The expression of repeating the circumcision here used (76) has puzzled several commentators, and even St. Jerom, as great a Hebraist as he was, to find out what this circumcision was, that was performed a second time. The generality of the Jews affirm, that they had been circumcised in the wilderness, but that one of the three parts of the ceremony, namely, the pushing quite back the remainder of the skin of the penis after the fore part was cut off, had been omitted during those forty years, because it put the infant to too much pain and anguish, and that it was this operation which Joshua caused to be performed, and which, being as troublesome as the other two, is therefore here called a second circumcision (77). Another learned Jew (78) has taken upon him to prove from the words of Jeremiah, I will punish the circumcised that has a foreskin (79), for so he reads it, that it was possible to bring the foreskin again by art, from which some have thought that the Israelites had done so during their abode in the wilderness, and were therefore ordered to be circumcised afresh. Those Christians, who have embraced this notion, pretend to back it by the words of St. Paul (80), if any man is called, being circumcised, let him not get afresh foreskin, or, as we render it, let him not become uncircumcised (81). To confute these

(76) Josh. v. 2. (77) Vid. MUR. in loc. (78) Rab. Nash. in Lexic. שלחן ערוך sub ער. ערלה. (79) Jerem. ix. 25. (80) 1 Cor. vii. 18. (81) Vid. DRUS. ap. CUNN.

- <sup>a</sup> THIS was the third time of their celebrating that festival; the first was at their departure out of Egypt, and the second on the next year, at the setting up of the tabernacle at the foot of mount Sinai, since when, whether for want of corn to make unleavened bread, or any other reason, it had been wholly intermitted till now; when, the text tells, the Israelites having provided themselves with corn, both old and new, they baked themselves unleavened cakes with the former, and parched the latter in the sheaves, and eat it instead of bread, this last being equally suitable to the feast, as being eaten without leaven. In this place it was also that God, or, as some will have it *, his angel, appeared unto Joshua in the plain, in the shape of a warrior, standing at some distance from him with a drawn sword. Joshua knew him not, and was probably gone thus far alone to reconnoitre the city, and contrive the properest means of besieging it. Being therefore surprized to see a man stand so near him in that hostile posture, he asked him whether he was for or against Israel? and upon his answering that he was the captain of the Lord's host, Joshua fell down at his feet and worshipped him, whilst the vision commanded him to shew the same respect to the place, as Moses had formerly done at the sight of the miraculous bush *. He had no sooner obeyed, and in the humblest terms express'd his readiness to receive his command', than the Lord was pleased to direct the wonderful manner in which he would have Jericho besieged, that the rest of the Canaanites might be made sensible that it was not an arm of flesh that fought against them (A).
- <sup>b</sup> The passover celebrated.
- <sup>c</sup> God appears to Joshua.

WE have already given some account of the siege, and taking of this place in the history of Canaan†*. All that needs be added to it here is, that the city, into which great numbers out of the neighbouring villages had retired, some to help to defend it, and others to save themselves, had been closely shut up by order of the king, who commanded in it in person, no man being suffered to go in or out of it, and that on the seventh day, which was the sabbath, the circumvection of the ark was repeated seven times, with the usual solemnity; the priests sounding with the rams-horns (B), and the same guard of armed men

* GROT. LE GLERC, & al. vid. supr. p. 484. (S) & alib. of note (V).

† Josh. v. per tot.

† Sup. p. 330. e.

* Vid. supr. p. 488. at the end

these St. Jerom has taken a great deal of pains to prove, though perhaps without any reason, that this prepuce can never be recovered, when once cut off; and consequently that the circumcision, mentioned in Joshua, must be understood of the circumcision of the heart, and to have been performed with a spiritual knife. The truth is, that good father, though the most learned of all that bear that name, was so fond of the virginal, and so prepossessed against a matrimonial state, that he has wrested the words of Joshua, those of the apostle, and a vast number more out of the old and new testament in favour of his favourite opinion, and, right or wrong, wrote with such an air of triumph, and with so much heat against his opposers (82) that when he became sensible of his error he made no difficulty to censure himself for it in a pathetic apology, which is perhaps the finest piece of oratory that ever he penn'd, and may well atone for his indiscreet zeal in favour of celibacy. However, all the difficulty in the words before us arises from misunderstanding the idiom of the original, and would have been easily removed, if they had been translated or paraphrased thus:—Let, the ceremony of, circumcision, which has been so long discontinued, be renewed, or, set on foot, once more.

(A) Nothing could be more wisely ordered than this miraculous manner of taking the city; not only to signalize the first conquest of the Is- raelites in the land of Canaan, but likewise to inject such a terror into its inhabitants as might either make them more ready to accept their terms of peace, or, at the worst, to induce them to save their own lives, by timely abandoning the country to the conquerors. To say, that the former was impracticable, is begging the question; nay, the contrary seems plain from the Gibeonites finding means to send two different embassies to Joshua †; though they could not do it without passing through some of the territories of the allied kings, as will appear by and by, from the geography of that country.

(B) The original is שְׂפוֹת הַיּוֹבֵלִים, Sophoth-hajoblim, which all the Jews in general (83), and after them very many Christians, understand as we do, of trumpets made of rams-horns *. And from the word יוֹבֵל, jobel, the singular of it, they also think the jubilee to have taken its name, because it was to be proclaimed by the sound of that instrument (84). We shall have occasion to offer a more proper etymon of the word, when we come to speak of the jubilee itself; in the mean time there have not been wanting those who have opposed the notion of trumpets being made of rams-horns as ridiculous, because they think it impossible to perforate them so as to give any such shrill sound (85), and therefore have supposed 'em to have been made of metal, and in that shape. But this notion, as well as the impossibility of boring

(82) HIERON, cont. Jovinian. in Josh. in loc. & alib. † Vid. supr. p. 331. & seq. (83) Ita Rabbin. ser. omn. vid. MUNST. in loc. * SPENC. & MEYER. de tem. sacr. c. xiv. § 11. GOODW. Mos. & Aar. lib. iii. c. 10. § 2. & al. mult.

(84) Id. ibid. vid. & R. SELOMO BEN. Melech in Levit. xxv. 10. (85) MASIVUS in Josh. vi. 4. BOCHART Hieron. l. ii. c. 43. CALM. & al.

The manner of taking Jericho.

Rahab and her family saved.

She is married to Salmon.

of marching before and after it, as has been done during the first six days. The whole a procession, we may reasonably suppose, kept at such a distance from the walls as to be out of reach of their shot, whilst the besieged, too well skilled in warlike affairs, to think that a city was to be taken by such whimsical marches, did probably conclude that they were only making an awkward show of their strength.
However, as soon as the seventh round was ended, the sound of the trumpets was accompanied with an universal shout of all the besiegers, and this was followed by the fall of the city wall which opened a way into it, at which every man mounted the breach that was next before him. Their first care was to convey Rahab and all her family out of the city, and these were no sooner got safely out, but the b Israelites killed all the men, women, children, and cattle that were found in it; after which, having seized upon all the gold, silver, brass, and other baser metals to be repositied in the treasury, they set the place on fire, and levelled it to the ground. Joshua added a prophetic curse on the man that should afterwards attempt to rebuild it, importing that he should lay the foundation of it in his first-born, and set up its gates against his youngest son <sup>c</sup>, by which the Jews do understand, that all his children from the biggest to the least should die an untimely death before he had finished it <sup>d</sup>. However we find it literally fulfilled above five hundred and fifty years after, by Hiel the Bethelite, who is said to have laid the foundations of it in his eldest son Abiram, and set up its gates in his youngest son Segub accordingly <sup>e</sup>. Such was the fatal end of Jericho, which Moses chose g to call by the name of the city of palm trees <sup>f</sup>, by reason of the great number of them that grew in the plain, round about it. To which Josephus adds, that the tree from which flowed the famed balm of Gilead, and several other odoriferous trees, did likewise grow in its neighbourhood <sup>g</sup>, from whose fragrancy it is supposed to have been named Jericho, which in the original signifies any fragrant smell (C).
As for Rahab and her family, they had a place assigned them out of the Israelitish camp, and she was soon after incorporated into their commonwealth, by her embracing the Jewish religion, and her marriage to Salmon <sup>h</sup>, head of the tribe of Judah, as was hinted before: whether the rest of her kindred follow'd her example or no, is neither certain, nor of great consequence (D).

<sup>a</sup> Josh. vi. per tot.
<sup>d</sup> Jew. Wars, l. v. c. 4.

<sup>b</sup> Vid. MURST. in loc.
<sup>e</sup> Matth. i. 5. Vid. USHER's Ann. p. 26.

<sup>c</sup> 1 Kings xvi. ver. ult.

<sup>f</sup> Deuter. xxxiv. 3;

boring a ram's-horn, has been sufficiently con-futed by our learned Spencer. Sure it is, that it has a softer part in the inside, which is easily drawn out whole by art, after which they are hollow all the way up, except about four or five inches towards the tip, part of which is sawed off to make it broad enough for the mouth, after which the rest is easily bored. And we can assure our readers, that we have seen some of them made in that manner, and used by shepherds and swineherds in the south parts of Germany, and on the Alps.

Josephus, who is very particular in describing those liver ones which Moses made (86), says little or nothing of these here, but calls them plainly horns (87); only when he comes afterwards to speak of those which Gideon and his men made use of (88), he calls them rams-horns (89). However, let them have been made how, and of what they would, 'tis plain from this instance of Gideon and some others both before and after him, that, besides those trumpets which were appropriated to the priests, to sound before the ark, to proclaim feasts, jubilees, and the like, whose number was increased to seven in Joshua's (90), and to six score in Solomon's time (91):
[Josephus says (92) two hundred thousand, and adds, that it was according to Moses's command, though upon what authority is hard to guess:] besides these, I say, 'tis plain there were others for the war, which each general caused to sound upon upon all exigencies. Thus Ehud, after he had privately killed Eglon, King of Moab, sounded the trumpet, and gathered Israel on mount Ephraim (93). And the same was afterwards done by Joab,

Abjalon, and many more (94).

(C) This however must not be literally understood, as if there had been no city of that name from Joshua to Hiel; since we read of the city of Palm-trees in Eglon's time (95), and of Jericho, in David's days, for there it was that he bid his ambassadors stay, till their beards, which had been cut off by Hanun King of Ammon, were grown up again (96). And Josephus tells us this new one was rebuilt not upon the spot of the old, the ruins of which, he says, were still to be seen in his time, but at a small distance from it (97), as shall be further seen in the map of Canaan. However, after Hiel had ventured to rebuild the old town, no scruple was made of inhabiting it; so that it became afterwards famous upon many accounts. Here the prophet sweetened the waters of the spring that supplied it and the neighbouring countries. Here
Herod built a sumptuous palace: it was the dwelling-place of Zacharias, and was honoured with Christ's presence, who likewise vouchsafed to work some miracles there.

(D) The Jews tell us, that Joshua was very doubt-

(86) Ant. lib. iii. c. 12.

(87) Ibid. l. v. c. 1.

(88) Judg. vii. 8. & seq.

(89) Ant.

l. v. c. 8.

(90) Josh. vi. 4.

(91) 2 Chron. v. 12.

(92) Ant. l. viii. c. 2.

(93) Judg.

iii. 27. (94) Vid. 2 Sam. ii. 28. xv. 10. & alib.

(95) Judg. iii. 13.

(96) 2 Sam. x. 45.

(97) JOSEPH. Ant. lib. v. c. 1. & al.

- <sup>a</sup> In the mean time, though the wonderful success of the Israelites against this city opened a way to new conquests, yet their general wisely considering the time which the making and dividing of them would take, during which his numerous army must be supplied with provisions, chose to make that fruitful plain the center of his camp, from whence he might constantly draw out a sufficient number of men to invade other territories till they had so far enlarged their own as to admit of a distribution between the tribes, which was not done till six years after †. As soon therefore as Joshua had settled the best order he could in his camp, he detached a body of three thousand men against the king of Ai, whose capital was about ten or twelve miles distant from Jericho, where they received <sup>The Israelites repulsed at Ai.</sup>
- <sup>b</sup> an unexpected repulse, with the loss of about thirty six men. This defeat, how small soever, did so damp the people's courage, that Joshua was forced to have recourse to God, who immediately answered by Urim, as is supposed, that his commands had been sacrilegiously infringed, and ordered him to discover the guilty person by lot, and (E) to punish him with immediate death. Joshua lost no time, and, having cast lots from the tribes to the families, Achan, the son of Carmi of the tribe of Judab, was found to be the sacrilege, who, at the general's request, confessed that he had concealed some of the accursed plunder of Jericho. His crime was no sooner verified by the search that was made in his tent, than he, his children, cattle, and all he had, were conveyed to the adjacent
- <sup>c</sup> valley, which was from that time called the valley of Achor, or trouble, from <sup>Achan's crime punished.</sup> the trouble which this crime had brought upon the people, and there the former were stoned to death, and the rest burnt (F); after which they reared up an heap of stones, for a monument of his crime, and a deterrent to the rest †.

† Vid. supr. p. 333. b.

† Josh. vii. per tot.

doubtful whether the promise which the two spies had made to Rahab was lawful or not, and that he could not ratify it till he had first consulted Eleazar the high-priest, and the seventy elders, who not only gave sentence in her favour, but pronounced her worthy of a greater reward than she had stipulated; upon which, as soon as she had accomplished the days of her purification without the camp, on account of her being a Gentile, she was admitted a proselyte, and soon after married to Salmon the son of Naathon, and great grand-father of David. A Romish chronologist (98) says, upon the authority of the Jewish rabbies, that Joshua married her, from which another writer of the same church has inferred, that it was a grand-daughter of hers of the same name, that was afterwards married to Salmon (99); but, as we can see no foundation for either of these notions, we have chosen to follow the far greater majority of chronologers, and particularly the learned Usher, who affirms, that it was this Rahab whom Salmon took to wife †. However, as it is forbidden by the cxiith negative precept of Moses, to make any affinity with any of the seven nations there mentioned (100), the Jews affirm her to have been of some other nation, and only an inhabitant of Jericho (1), which is not at all improbable, seeing they were so strangely intermixed, as we have seen elsewhere ‡.

(E) How these lots were cast is neither plain from scripture, nor agreed about by commentators, though we have a great many instances of their being made use of, both to discover guilty persons, not only by the Jews, as in this, and the case of Saul (2), but by other nations, as we find by the history of Jonah; and for several other purposes bad as well as good. As to the manner in which the ceremony itself was performed, except the calling of the tribes one after another, till it came to the right, and so down to the inferior branches of each family, till they came at last to single persons, as in the two cases above mentioned, except this we have nothing certain about it. Josephus (3) only says, that it was done before the high-priest and seventy elders. To this other Jews add, that they were made to pass before the ark, and that the high-priest was directed by the Urim to pitch upon the right tribe, family, &c. (4). However that be, the lawfulness of this way of casting lots cannot be denied, seeing it was not only countenanced if not prescribed, by God, but afterwards practised even by the apostles (5), though the heathenish superstition which did since mix itself with it, and the vile purposes to which it has been put, hath made it exceeding dangerous, if not altogether criminal.

(F) The law against sacrilege condemning the transgressor to the flames, and God commanding the person here guilty to be burnt accordingly (6), the Jews affirm that Achan was actually burnt (7); and whereas it is said in the text, that he was stoned (8), they think it to have been done accidentally by the people, who were so highly provoked, that they could not forbear casting stones at him, as he was led to execution (9). However their large comment on this place observes, judiciously enough, that he was also guilty of the breach of the sabbath, because it was on that day that Jericho was taken, and therefore, that as he had been guilty of a double crime, sacrilege and sabbath-breaking, so he received a double punishment prescribed, stoning and burning (10). The Jews add, that the place, where the 3000 men were routed by the men of Ai, was called שְׁבָרִים, Shebarim, breaches or defeats, from the defeat which they received there, as עֶכּוֹר, Achor, was from the grief which Achan caused them.

(98) GENEVA. Chronol. p. 13.

Annal. p. 26. (100) Dent. vii. 1. & seq.

supr. p. 322. & seq. (2) 2 Sam. xiv. 38. & seq.

in Josh. vii. (5) Abt. i. ver. ult. (6) Josh. vii. 15.

ver. 25. (9) MUNST. ibid. (10) Bammidbar. Rab. in loc.

(99) BEAUV. Hist. du Peup. de Dieu. Age iii. l. 2.

(1) Vid. מִצּוֹת לֹא תַעֲשֶׂה : sub מִצּוֹת : cxi. † Ush.

(3) Ant. l. vi. c. 1. (4) Vid. MUNST.

(7) Vid. MUNST. in loc. (8) Ibid.

(10) Bammidbar. Rab. in loc.

Canaan conquered in six years.

THE army being thus purged, as Josephus words it, they had much better <sup>a</sup> success, not only in their next expedition against Asi, but also against the whole land, the conquest of which was, though not perfectly, finished in six years. But as we have already given some account of it in the history of Canaan . . . we shall, to avoid prolixity and repetition, refer the other material circumstances that have been either but lightly touched upon there, or postponed as foreign, such as the setting up the tabernacle of Shiloh, engraving the law on stone, setting up the blessings and curses, and the like, to the next article of the geography and partition of the land, where the whole will be more distinctly seen at one view.

The sun stands still at Joshua's
prayer.

In the mean time our readers will not, perhaps, think it amiss, if we ven- <sup>b</sup> ture to subjoin here some few, we hope, not improper, remarks upon those two miraculous transactions which happened at this time; namely, the stopping the course of the sun by Joshua, and the remarkable rain of hail-stones, which did such a terrible execution upon the confederate army of the Canaanites, both which happened on the same day; but having been but barely mentioned be- fore <sup>c</sup> ||, and having no connection with what is to follow, can no where be more properly offered than in this place. We need not tell them how many, other- wise learned men, among the Christians have scrupled to fall in with the Coperni- can system, in this and many other countries free from the inquisition, upon a mistaken notion that it is point blank contrary to several express testimonies of holy writ, among which this of the sun and moon standing still is stren- uously urged by them; whilst others, from a contrary principle, have been in- duced to question its divine authority, because it favoured so absurd a one as that of Ptolemy is now generally allowed and proved to be. It was, doubtless, this last error which gave occasion to those two witty, though profane, sayings reported of that great philosopher, Alphonso, king of Naples, that, if the system of the earth's standing still were true, the whole universe was but a bungling piece of mechanism; and that, if he had been admitted into God's council at the creation, he could have saved him a world of trouble †.

Now it is plain that these two extremes might have been easily avoided by <sup>d</sup> two very obvious observations, namely, 1st, that the expressions here made use of, Sun, stand still upon Gibeon, and so on, are figurative and incapable of a literal sense (G); and 2d, that the system which places the earth immoveable in the center, and supposes the sun, moon, and stars to turn round it, was the most uni- versally received, the most adapted to vulgar capacities, and the freest from seeming difficulties, because most agreeable to common appearances and obser- vations; and that the grois Israelites were so used to it, that, had Moses, Joshua,

••• Supr. p. 332. c.    * Josh. x. 12. & seq.    || Ubi sup.    † Vid. Bacon's Apophthegms.

(G) The words literally run thus: Sun, be thou silent in, or upon, Gibeon, and thou moon, in the valley of Ajalon; and in the next verse it is said, that they stood still accordingly; now it is plain, that those two luminaries were neither in, upon, or even over these places in any other than a relative sense, and that they had a different situation with respect to those that were one mile east or west of the place where Joshua stood. We may venture to add, that it was impertinent to make the moon stand still with the sun, upon any other supposition than that Joshua had the solar system in his thoughts when he used those expressions, because the presence of the moon was useless to him as long as he had that of the sun; but if he only prayed, that their light might continue in status quo, till he had accomplished his conquest, which is certainly all he meant, he could not but know, that, upon the earth's standing still, both the sun and moon and all the rest must seem to do so. It is plain our great philosopher Sir Isaac Newton, who was sufficiently master of the Hebrew, was not frightened by these or any such popular phrases from his favourite system, though no man paid a greater deference to the authority of the scriptures than he did; and that he thought it sufficient that the effect was the same, whether the sun or the earth were supposed to be stopped in their career.

If it be asked, how it was possible for the earth to resist, for so many hours, the impulse of the circumambient fluid of the Cartesians, or of the attraction and gravitation of the Newtonian system, or of whatever other mover that hurries it along, without causing an universal stop in the whole system? Besides, that the objection will be equally strong, if not stronger, in the other hypothesis of the sun standing still, it may be answered, that, the fact being altogether preternatural, we need but suppose a sufficient power to have diverted that impulse from the earth, and directed it to glide on each side it, and then all the rest might easily keep on their motion, though this stood still all the while. However we do not pretend to answer all the objections that have been raised against the possibility of this miracle from principles, which, for aught we know, have no foundation but in the heads of those who first invented them; we think it enough to say that the supreme author of nature, who first gave motion to matter, and whose will alone appointed the laws of it, can either suspend, or dispense with them, whenever his own glory, or any wise ends of his providence, make it necessary or expedient; to doubt of this is to deny the truth of all miracles, and unworthy of any answer.

a or any other inspired writer, known any thing of the solar one, yet it would have been improper, if not dangerous to have so much as hinted at it. However these considerations, though obvious and reasonable, have been so far from being universally admitted, that a great number of authors, both Jews and Christians, have ransacked their brains to find out more satisfactory solutions, though with so little circumspection and success, that they have rather multiplied than removed the difficulties which they endeavoured to avoid.

The systems of some authors concerning it examined.

AMONG the first, some have affirmed, that the motion of the luminaries was only abated in its velocity, as that of a coach is from a full gallop, to an even pace<sup>b</sup>, from an expression used there, that the sun did not hasten to go down about a whole day. But whether or no they thought it easier to retard, than wholly to suspend their motion, sure it is that neither of them could be done but by a supernatural power; the same may be said of what some rabbies affirm, that God substituted some meteor, or body of light<sup>c</sup>, or that he retained the moon above the horizon to supply the absence of the sun<sup>d</sup>; but all these are modest men in comparison to the learned Maimonides, who makes all the miracle of this transaction to have consisted in a bare wish or prayer of Joshua, that the sun might not go down till he gained a compleat conquest, and in God's granting his request, not by stopping the sun's career during so many hours, as we understand it, but by enabling that general and his army, to do as much execution in one, as would reasonably have taken up two days<sup>e</sup>. After this we need not wonder if Spinoza, the last among the Jews we shall mention, has still improved upon him, and quite removed the difficulty, by denying the miracle, and attributing the extraordinary length of that day to the bare refraction of the sun's rays by the sky, which was then more than ordinarily charged with hail, but which the people mistook for the sun's standing still. According to him Isaiab was no better a philosopher than Joshua, when he attributed the change that happened upon Abaz's dial to the retrogression of the sun, rather than to a refraction of it from some cloud<sup>f</sup>.

Maimonides and Spinoza consulted.

WE do very much question whether any of these, especially the two last, would ever have been thought worth answering, or even mentioning, had they not been too closely followed by some very learned Christians, protestants as well as papists. We shall only take notice of three of the most eminent of them, namely, Grotius, Peirerius and Le Clerc, whose sentiments, as well as what has been said to confute them, we shall now give in as few words as the subject will admit of.

As for Grotius, though he doth not think it impossible that God should suspend the course of the sun, or make it appear upon our horizon after it is set, yet he is so far from granting that it was really done, that he thinks its not being mentioned, among other things of less moment, in the epistle to the Hebrews<sup>g</sup>, to be a strong argument against it (H). And therefore what is said

Grotius consulted.

<sup>a</sup> Chald. Paraph. R. LEVI BEN GERSH. & al. Vid. MUNST. in loc. & CALM. Dissert. <sup>1</sup> R. ELIAKIM. B. NAFTAL. שם שם. <sup>2</sup> JOS. & DAV. KIMCHI. vid. פסלול. & Epist. sup. Mor. Nevoch. MAIMONID. <sup>3</sup> More Nevoch. part ii. c. 39. <sup>4</sup> Tract. Theologico-Politic. c. ii. <sup>5</sup> Hebr. xi. ad fin.

(H) The misfortune is, that the argument will hold equally against several other miraculous transactions, which are likewise omitted by the apostle, though expressly mentioned in holy writ; such as the plagues of Egypt, all the wonders wrought by Moses in the wilderness, the miraculous passage over Jordan, and many more of the like nature. He doth not so much as speak a word of the conquest of Canaan, or mention Joshua among his worthies, though his character be so vastly superior to that of Gideon, Jephtha, and others that are mentioned in that place. Besides it is plain, the design of this chapter was only to give some few notable instances of the wonderful power of faith; to have enumerated all, that is recorded upon the subject, would have swelled it beyond the bulk of the whole epistle; and to have been too curious in the choice of them, especially to those of his nation, who knew all these things as well as himself, would have been too affected, and have savoured too much of art and human wisdom, which was always carefully and professedly avoided by the inspired writers<sup>h</sup>.

Under this head we may rank another objection, namely, the silence of all the antient historians, which, it is urged, could never have been so universal, had such a memorable transaction ever happened. But it ought to be remembered that this fact is vastly previous to any profane writer, either extant or quoted, so that it was easy for the remembrance or monuments of it, if there were any, to be lost among a vast multitude of others, during the long and dark interval between it and the most antient authors. However, if light may be allowed to be fetched out in Joshua, that God hearkened to the voice of a man, he thinks with Maimonides <sup>a</sup> to mean no more, than that God, at his request, granted him as much time and dispatch as was necessary to gain a compleat victory*.

<sup>h</sup> Vid. Luke xxi. 15. 1 Cor. i. 17, 21, 27. 2 Cor. i. 12. & alib.

Peirerius con-
futed.

Peirerius, mentioned before † for his extraordinary skill in accounting for all scripture miracles in a natural way, supposes†, contrary to all reason, as well as the plain meaning of the text, that Joshua only wished for a longer day, about the time of the sun's setting, upon which the land of Palestine, or perhaps the territories only about Gibeon, were enlightened by a kind of twilight, or something like our Aurora Borealis, which, continuing long enough to answer Joshua's purpose, was mistook by him for the sun, though it was actually set as usual; and made him and his army fancy that day to have been longer than <sup>b</sup> any other by all that interval. But here the question is not, how far these Parrelia, or mock suns, can supply the absence of the real one, but whether the historian's account can be capable of such a forced interpretation. The text says expressly, that the sun stood still in the mid heaven (1) at Joshua's prayer, and that his more than usual continuance above the horizon, or rather in the same situation, made that a longer day than ever was known before or since. Supposing then for once the whole army to have been so little acquainted with these kinds of lights, as to have fancied the sun still above the horizon, could they be so stupid as not to know his usual place at noon from that of his setting? But should we suppose even this, could they chuse being undeceived, ei- <sup>c</sup> ther by seeing it rise on the next morning at his usual time, or by the concurring testimony of other people who had seen him rise and set as at other times? And if they were undeceived, is it likely that they would have transmitted an account of it in such terms, as must of necessity betray either their want of common sense, or common honesty? Lastly, can our author, or any of his admirers, if they really believe this book to be divinely inspired, suppose that out of darkness, whence could the notion come into the poets heads, of their demigods and heroes having the power of lengthening days and nights, asbeit served their warlike or amorous designs, but most likely from this wonderful event? How came Jupiter, for instance, to be supposed to have spun the night which he spent with Alcmene, to twice its natural length? or Minerva to have done the same in favour of Ulysses, whilst he was butchering his competitors, and making himself known to his wife (11)? and many others of the like nature (12); but though we could bring nothing out of profane history to confirm this fact, yet would this be no fair argument against the truth of it, or the veracity of the writer, abstracting even from his divine authority, if we judge of him with the same candor, as we do of any other historian.

* Comm. in Josh. x. 14.

† Vid. supr. 528. note (L).

‡ Præadamit. lib. iv. c. 6.

(1) The words are בַּחֲצִי הַשָּׁמַיִם, in the midst of heaven, or, in the mid heaven, which is always understood both by astronomers, and by the vulgar, to signify the place where the sun is at noon; and that he halted not לָבוֹא to go down, or literally to decline towards its setting, during one whole day (13). What follows in the next verse, that no day was ever like it, either before or since, doth plainly confirm it. However, as these authors seem to rely little on the authority of the text, whatever they pretend to the contrary, it will not be amiss to try to confute them in their own way, by shewing that their supposition of the sun's being then near setting, when Joshua stopped it, makes against their favourite hypothesis, and leaves him not time enough for all the work which he is recorded to have done on that day.

It is expressly said, that the army marched all that night from Gilgal, and came early in the morning to Gibeon, where Joshua engaged and beat the enemy, put them to flight, and pursued them from the ascent of Bethoron to Azekab and Makkedab; and that, as they were going down the descent of Bethoron, the storm of hail fell upon them, after which he commanded the sun to stand still in Gibeon, and the moon in Ajalon. All this might be done easily enough before the sun was past the meridian, and the situation of those two last places shews, that it must have been about that time of the day. From the Bethoron here mentioned, or lower Bethoron, he pursued them to Azekab and Makkedab, which could not be less than twelve or fourteen miles, according to St. Jerom, who places the former at nine and the latter at eight miles northward of Eleutheropolis†. There he is told that the five kings had hid themselves in a cave, and ordered the mouth of it to be stopped with a heap of stones, and then continues his pursuit till part of the enemy is killed, and the rest fled into fenced cities, and then returns to Makkedab. Here again he causes the mouth of the cave to be opened, and the five kings to be hanged till sun-set, and then to be taken down and buried again in the same cave. Can an army which had marched all the night, and fought all the day, be supposed to have pursued their enemies so many miles, kill them all the way they went, then come back to Azekab, and execute and bury the five kings with such solemnity, after sun-set and by the help of a refracted light? And if so, what sun was that which they saw setting when they took the kings down? how much less probable is it still, that they should have done all this before the real sun-setting? The reader may further convince himself how much the situation of Gibeon and Ajalon is incompatible with the supposition we have been opposing, by consulting ancient geographers and the map at the head of the next section.

(11) Vid. Hom. Odyss. xxiii. ver. 242, 243. CALM. Dissert. & al.

(13) Josh. x. 13.

(12) Vid. BACON. Syrus. HUNT. Demonstr. EVAN. † Vid. Epitaph. Paula, & loc. Hebr.

the

- a the holy Ghost would have suffered the Hebrew general, not only to have continued under such a delusion, but even to have transmitted it to posterity with the divine stamp upon it?

THE last person, we proposed to mention under this head, is the famous Le Clerc <sup>con<sup>a</sup></sup> M. Le Clerc, who has not only embraced the sentiments of the two former, but <sup>futed.</sup> has endeavoured to back them with new reasons. The two first are taken from

- Joshua's* expression, Sun, stand still upon Gibeon, which can admit of none but a figurative sense; and from the literal one being contrary to the received solar system. We have already shewn above, that they prove nothing on either side of the question, and refer the reader to it. But he goes farther and says,
- b 3. That providence is too sparing of miracles, to bestow so signal a one as the overturning the whole order of nature, upon a thing of so small a moment as the defeat of the Canaanitish army in one day, rather than in two. To this it is added, that Joshua's prayer was too unreasonable for God to grant in the strict sense it is commonly understood in, since the next day might have done as well without lengthening this at the expence of so great a miracle (K): but is not this very presumptuous, and may not such a bold way of reasoning, against the plainest facts mentioned in scripture, prove the source of endless errors and infidelity? Will it not equally hold against all the other miracles wrought from Moses to Christ himself? Why were so many done in Egypt, when Pharaoh might
- c have been softened into compliance at a much easier rate? Why must the red-sea or the Jordan be miraculously divided, when the former might have been coasted, and the latter forded at more places than one? In a word, why did Christ and his disciples work such a great number of miracles, when one or two great ones, well known and attested, were sufficient to prove their divine mission? Well might Job say, Vain man would be wise <sup>1</sup>. 4. The same author supposes the account of this transaction to have been taken from the book of Jasher, or the upright, which, like other poetical works, especially those that are written in the eastern tongues, are too swollen and hyperbolic to admit of a literal sense, and cannot be rightly understood, unless they be reduced vastly below it. We shall not trouble ourselves with examining how unreasonable the supposition of such disparate and unnatural hyperboles is, and especially of their being afterwards closely followed by an inspired historian, whose style is every where else rather in the other extrem: it will be sufficient to say, that all this is affirmed gratis, and without any foundation. For who told Grotius, or our author, that the book of Jasher was a poetical piece, abounding with such hyperbolic flights? Sure it is, that no mention is made of it any where but in this place, and in the second book of Samuel *; and these would rather incline one to believe it to have been a history of Hebrew worthies, written and continued by several hands, and at different periods. But even this is upon the
- d supposition, that they are the same book, which yet doth not appear. The Jews indeed think so, but then they understand by Jasher, or righteous, Moses himself, and this book to be the Pentateuch, in which are contained several promises of the wonders that God was to work in favour of his people <sup>*,*</sup>. But as this is owing to a superstitious unwillingness in them, to own that any inspired book could be lost; they are not followed by any Christian. However that be, M. Le Clerc has taken the pains to verify the two places in question, by the transposition of some words, in order to make it appear at least probable, that the author of the book of Joshua, in quoting them out of that of Jasher, had only reduced them to historical prose by the contrary transposition. But here we

<sup>1</sup> Ch. xi. 12.

* Ch. i. 18.

*,* Vid. MUNST. in loc.

(K) The Jews, indeed, tell us, that the reason of the lengthening of this day was, because the next was the sabbath, which would have given the Canaanites an opportunity either of rallying or escaping, whilst Joshua and his army were at rest (14); but, besides that we have nothing but their bare word for it, it is plain from their own confession, that it was not always unlawful for them to do execution on the sabbath, since Jericho was so lately taken on that day, as we hinted before. Some Christians however say, it was on a Sunday that the sun stood still (15). The learned Usher says nothing of the day, or even the month, in which it happened, but only supposes it to have been towards the latter end of the year (16). As for the number of hours which that day lasted more than usual, the text is neither plain, nor authors agreed, and therefore we shall affirm nothing about it.

(14) Rabbin in Sedar Olam. vid. MUNST. in loc.
(16) Ann. p. 26.

(15) SERRAR. BONFRER. DE LYR. in loc.

beg leave to observe, that it is at least a very bold assumption to say, that a writer, who barely appeals to another for the truth of a single instance, has taken the whole from him. The most that can be fairly concluded from such an appeal is, that the fact is equally affirmed by both, either in the same or equivalent terms; but such as an honest historian would never have used, who had had the least suspicion of their being so monstrously exaggerated by poetic rhapsody; and that all that was meant by those expressions of the sun and moon standing still in the mid-heaven, and of that day being thereby so miraculously lengthened, was no more than that there remained so much light after their setting, occasioned by some unusual refraction, as made the whole army think those luminaries to be still above the horizon.

As to what our author adds, that it is more probable that Joshua should pray for a longer day, when he perceived the sun just going to leave him, than when it was at his height; though it carries a great appearance of reason, yet can it by no means conclude against a positive text, backed with other circumstances equally strong on the other side. Joshua might have his reasons for what he did, though they are not recorded, nor we able to guess at them. He was an old experienced general, eager for a complete victory, which alone could save his new allies from the impending ruin, and able no doubt to compute what time it would take to achieve it; so that his fear of losing any part of it might make him pray, that the day might be thus prolonged, till he had gained the whole. But after all, where is the unreasonableness of supposing, that God, who designed to signalize this day's action, by one of the greatest miracles that ever was done, did himself inspire the Hebrew general with that wish or prayer, which otherwise, perhaps, would never have come into his head?

BUT here it is further objected, that the occasion was too inconsiderable to deserve such a signal miracle, since it was only the giving one inconsiderable nation an advantage over another, for which the next day might have done as well: but, besides, that this seems to set limits to the divine wisdom and power, our author seems not to have examined the case thoroughly; we beg leave to do it for him, and to set it in a fairer light, by reminding the reader that this battle was not fought offensively but defensively on Israel's side, and in order to save a people, whom they had solemnly taken under their protection, from being utterly destroyed upon that very account. The Gibeonites, as a free people, had a right to take all proper measures for their safety, so that Joshua could not but look upon the confederacy formed against them as cruel and unjust, and consequently that it would have been base and dishonourable in him to have refused them the desired succour upon any pretence whatsoever. To this we may add, that the honour of God himself was concerned in the preservation of his new-made proselytes, whose alliance with the Israelites had been ratified in his name, by the mouth of his high-priest. Upon these considerations Joshua loses no time, but marches all that night to their assistance, and on the next day God is pleased to reward his faithfulness and zeal by a miraculous victory, which not only saves the oppressed by the total defeat of the oppressors, but makes at once the whole land of Canaan sensible, that a mightier God was on Israel's side, than any that was worshipped there, by stopping the course of the sun and moon, the two grand deities of those idolatrous nations. Had Israel's sword alone gained the conquest, it would have been imputed to their superior valour and strength; had there nothing more remarkable happened in it, than the rain of stones or large hail, it might have been thought owing to chance, or, at best, been only known in that neighbourhood; whereas the stopping of the two great luminaries in the height of their career, thus universally felt, could not but convince those unhappy people, that the gods which they trusted to were subject to that of Israel, as well as prove a most powerful deterrent to the latter from falling into the idolatries of the former.

WHAT shows this last to be more than a bare conjecture is, that noble zeal which the nine tribes and half did express some years after against their brethren on the other side Jordan, whom they suspected to have set up an altar there with an idolatrous intent. This signal instance, being the more remarkable, as it is perhaps the only one of that kind; is recorded by the divine historian †††, §

- a with all its circumstances very much to their praise, and may be as properly inserted here, as in any other place in this history, and is as follows.

THE tribes of Reuben, Gad, and half Manasseh, having assisted the rest in the conquest of Canaan, as far as was thought necessary, were honourably dismissed by their brethren; but, before they landed on the other side Jordan, they took care to erect an altar of a prodigious size upon the border of that river, in order to perpetuate the memory, both of the relation they bore to the other tribes, and of the wonders which GOD had wrought in their favour. However their intention was so far misconstrued by their brethren, that they assembled themselves at Shiloh, and there resolved to enter into a bloody war against them, in case they could not dis-

b culpatate themselves from the crime of rebellion and apostasy, which this new altar had given them cause to suspect them guilty of. They therefore deputed ten of their chiefs, with Phineas, the high-priest's son at their head, to go and enquire into the reasons of this proceeding; and these were no sooner come, than they began to charge them home, with a manifest violation of GOD's law, and with a design of setting up some idolatrous worship there, since it was expressly forbidden by Moses to offer up any sacrifices any where, but in the place which GOD was in due time to appoint. They reminded them of the heavy judgments which their former idolatries had brought upon them, and concluded their pathetic speech with assuring them, that they were resolved one and all to oppose, even at the peril of c their lives, the introduction of any new worship, which might involve them in a greater guilt.

THOUGH their alarm and reproaches were ill grounded, yet, being imputed to their heat of zeal, were not in any ways resented by the rest, who, being heard in their turn, took GOD to witness, that they had not built that sumptuous altar with a design to offer up any sacrifices there, much less to withdraw themselves from his worship at the place that was to be appointed; but, on the contrary, to prevent their posterity from being debarred that privilege in process of time, either by their being disowned by the other tribes, or by a pretence that GOD had separated them from the commonwealth of Israel, by setting the river Jor-

d dan as a barrier between them. This answer, which was couched in the humblest terms, and backed with the strongest tokens of sincerity, not only gave the deputies and the rest of the nation a full satisfaction, but fully shows how great a change all those wonders had wrought on both sides, and turned their strongest propensity to idolatry into a dread, and utter detestation of it. Upon the whole then, since this miraculous transaction of stopping the course of the two luminaries is recorded in words so express, so free from ambiguity, and so incapable of any other interpretation, without doing the greatest violence both to the text and to the character of the historian, we cannot see how it is possible to depart from the obvious meaning of the former without denying the authority of the e latter.

Some other objections urged against our side of the question, such as the intolerable heat to which Joshua's army must have been exposed, had the sun continued so long over their heads; the necessity there was of their stopping to refresh themselves with some sustenance; and lastly, that, had Joshua wrought a miracle which so far exceeded those of Moses, he would have been greater than he: these, we say, would hardly be worth mentioning, were it not to show to what strange shifts a favourite notion or system will drive men of the greatest learning. For 1st, the excessive heat of a vertical sun might be allayed by inter-f posing clouds and refreshing winds: none certainly ought to be more ready to grant this supposition than they who think, not that that day was longer, but that more execution was done in it than usual † (L). As to the next, we need not tell our readers that nothing is more common in such exigencies as these, than † Ita MASIUS, GROTIUS, LE CLERC post MAIMON. ubi sup.

(L) We may likewise add here, that the effects of such a violent heat, as is here supposed, might be nothing so dreadful or fatal as is pretended, especially to a people inured to it from their infancy, as the Israelites had been, during the space of forty years. History furnishes us with instances enough of marches and battles in as hot regions and seasons at least, though those excessive heats were nothing so natural to the armies that were exposed to them. Even these more northern climates have sometimes, nay very lately, endured such a degree of sultry weather, during some weeks successively, as came little short of that of the torrid zone, without any of those ill consequences which are urged by the other side.

for the foldiers, who carry their provision in their snapfacks, to take a piece in their hands and eat it as they march. The laft thing objected, that fuch a miracle would make Joshua a greater man than Moses, contrary to fome exprefs texts of fcripture, is too jejune to deferve an answer. Moses and Joshua were both instruments in the hands of GOD, to whose glory alone the greatness of the miracle redounds, without adding any preference to the one over the other, fince one miracle cannot be faid to be greater than another, with refpect to an Almighty power.

IT is plain then, that, if we admit the divine authority of this book, we cannot but look upon this tranfaction as altogether fupernatural, and of the number of thofe many which GOD was pleafed to work in favour of the Israelites; it will be therefore needless to dwell long upon our next enquiry, how far the ftorm of hail-ftones that preceded it was fo or not?

The rain of stones which fell upon the Canaanites.

HOWEVER, though we have ventured to give it the name of hail, not fo much in compliance with the modern tafte, as becaufe the original is capable of that fenfe, without any great violence being done to it; yet it is plain to thofe that underftand it, that the moft natural one is, that it was a ftorm of real ftones (M). The miffortune is, that men, who are more afraid than hurted, are apt to run themfelves into greater difficulties, than thofe they endeavour to avoid; and whilst they take fuch care to fcreen themfelves from the fufpicion of being over credulous, efpecially in cafes which carry the appearance of a miracle, they not only call in queftion the moft pregnant testimonies of the like facts in profane hiftory, both antient and modern, but likewife caft a diftant reflection on the divine hiftorian, and thofe infpired writers who have mentioned the fame facts after him, as if they had defignedly made choice of fuch terms in their recording of them, as would make them appear more fupernatural than they really were. For if nothing had fallen on the Canaanites but a common ftorm of hail, in which there was nothing extraordinary but the fize, why muft they be fupposed to have exaggerated it at any fuch rate?

Le Clerc's notion con-
futed.

BUT here our learned critics, Grotius and Le Clerc, who ufed to go hand in hand before, have taken a feparate tract: the former believes them to have been real ftones, becaufe he finds many parallel inftances of it in profane hiftory; and indeed it is no more than what has been fully proved by feveral eminent authors on that fide of the queftion. However, Le Clerc has not fcrupled to affirm, that it was nothing elfe but a large ftorm of hail; to call testimonies alledged out of hiftory, mere forgeries, and the endeavours of fome authors to account for it in a natural way, trifling and not worth confuting. How eafy he would have found the task, had he gone ferioufly about it, will be beft known by an impartial view of the testimonies themfelves, and of what has been urged to prove the poffibility of the thing from natural caufes.

Instances of it out of Hiftory.

As to the firft, we hope our readers will think it fufficient for our purpofe, to inftance in two or three of the moft pregnant and unqueftionable facts recorded in antient hiftory, and back them with fome few of a more recent date, but too authentic to be fo eafily eluded: and if the latter are of fuch a nature as to lead us to an eafy difcovery of their caufe, we fhall not be at a lofs for a fufficient ground to admit the poffibility, if not the reality of the former. It is no wonder that they, who lived in the early ages of the world, did look upon a ftorm of great ftones as too miraculous to be credited without ocular demonftration. Such prodigies happen fo feldom, that we find the Romans above a

*G. J. VOSS. in loc. CALM. Differt. on the fubject, and others.

(M) The text literally runs thus And the Lord caufed great ftones to fall, or to be caft, upon them, and many more died by the אבני הברד, Abne habarad, the hail-ftones, than by the fword; and it is this laft expreffion that made the Septuagint, and, after them, Josephus (17), and the author of Ecclesiasticus (18), to underftand them of a real hail of more than ordinary bignefs, in which there is nothing but what is agreeable enough to the genius of the tongue. But on the other hand it is certain, that it is fo far from being the obvious meaning of it, that the word hail feems rather to be ufed here to exprefs the vaft quantity, bignefs, vehemence, and execution of thofe ftones which then fell; and the expreffion of flying and falling as thick as hail is not only common to all the antient, but is likewife retained in moft modern languages; for which reason, feveral learned men have underftood it of a miraculous ftorm of real ftones, as being the moft eafy and natural meaning of the text (19).

(17) Ant. lib. v. c. 1. (18) Ecclef. xlv. 6. (19) H. GROTIUS, MARIUS, BONFRER, GER. VOSS. JUN. MURAT. & al. mult. Vid. CALM. Differt. on the fubject.

†

thoufand

- a thousand years after Joshua's time, very backward to believe the report of that which fell upon the mountain Alba, in the reign of Tullus Hostilius, successor to Numa Pompilius, 'till they had it confirmed by those whom they sent thither on purpose to examine it, who brought them word that the fact was not only true, but that those stones had fallen from the skies in the same manner as hail that is driven down by the wind'. They became in time more familiar and less questioned, especially after that remarkable one which fell upon the same mountain, and which the same author tells us 'lasted two whole days. The same, or something like it, is likewise affirmed to have been seen at Rome, Capua, Lavinium, and so many other places in Italy, by so many authentick authors', that we cannot see how they can with any modesty be called in question (N). We might here also take notice of some other kinds of stony rains, mentioned by ancient and modern authors, which are still more natural, as being occasioned either by vehement hurricanes, earthquakes, or by subterranean fires. Of the first sort were those which fell upon and routed the Persians, when they went to plunder the temple of Delphos, *, and are affirmed by other travellers to be very frequent in some parts of America †. Those that fell upon the Gauls, upon the like attempt, are attributed to a vehement hurricane by Pausanias, but to an earthquake by Justin *. The last sort is that which is caused by vulcanoes and subterraneous fires; and these are so well known, that we shall mention but two remarkable instances of it, of a very late date, namely, that which preceded the surprizing emersion of the isle of Santorino out of the Archipelago, in the year 1707, concerning which we have the following account: That a dreadful noise had been heard several days like that of thunder, or of great guns, during which volleys of stones all on fire were seen to rise out of the sea, and to fly up quite out of sight like so many rockets, and then fall into the sea again about five miles from the place whence they were thrown up. All this while the air was filled with a thick sulphureous smoke, mixed with cinders, which with much difficulty dispersed itself, and fell in such abundance, that the neighbouring countries were covered with it, and with small stones that fell with it. Something like this is what Montfaucon tells us happened in Italy, near the village Tripertola, where, after several terrible shocks and earthquakes, during which the air was darkened, and the ground was covered with stones and dust, which kept pouring down from the sky about the space of two days, at the end of which a mountain was observed to have reared

Some caused by hurricanes and earthquakes.

* T. Liv. lib. i. dec. 1. † Id. lib. xxv, xxx, & xxxiv. Vid. CALM. ub. sup. * Vid. & de Bell. Afric. c. 47. AMAN. Bell. Civit. lib. iv. AUGUST de Civit. lib. iii. c. 32. & al. * Vid. DIOD. SICUL. Bybl. lib. xi. † Vid. CORSEAL and FEUILLEE's Voyages. * PAUS. lib. i. JUST. lib. xxiv. sub fin.

(N) To these various instances, of which the authors, quoted above, have given us several other particulars, (such as that those stones that fell in that prodigious manner were sometimes red-hot, and at other times cold, sometimes like hard clods of earth, and sometimes like sand or dust;) we might add what is likewise recorded by others of equal credit, of stones that have been observed to be carried for some considerable time in the air, and thence fallen with great violence upon the earth. Such was that which is mentioned by Plutarch to have fallen in Thrace into the river Argos (20), which Anaxagoras fancied to have fallen from the sun (21), and which the author, from whom the former has it, tells us (22) was observed to fly about in the air like a luminous cloud, about the space of seventy-five days, during which time, several splinters did now and then break off and fly about like wandering stars before they fell down. The main stone itself was of such prodigious bigness, that Pythagoras could by no means think with Aristotle (23), that it had been broken off from some rock, and carried up into the air by some vehement wind, because, as he justly observes, it would have been impossible for it to have kept itself so long suspended there, as Damachus affirms it to have done. Pliny, who tells us, that it was still carefully preserved in his time, says, that it was magnitudine vehis of the bigness of a four-wheeled cart, or rather of a loaded waggon, of a dark burnt colour. Such was that likewise which is recorded to have fallen in Alsace, in the midst of a storm of hail, in November 29, 1630, (24) which our author (25) tells us he has seen in the great church of Anxiffem, where it is still preserved, and is like a large, dark, flint-stone, whose surface has been splintered by the fire, and weighs near three hundred pounds. Of the same nature were those which count Marcellin relates to have fallen in Thrace, A. D. 1452, and several others. For if such prodigious stones could either be engendered in the air, or carried up thither by the force of vehement winds, or of subterraneous fires, the like may be more reasonably supposed of those which fell upon the Canaanites, which had nothing so extraordinary either in their size, appearance, or effects.

(20) In Vit. Lisand. (21) Vid. DIOD. in Anaxag. & Not. MENAG. in Laert. (22) DAMACHUS. ap. Plut. ub. sup. (23) Meteorolog. lib. i. c. 7. (24) GESNER. & ANS. de BOOT. Hist. Lapid. & Gem. (25) CALM. ub. sup.

itself in the midst of the lake Lucrino; this happened according to our author <sup>a</sup> in the year 1538 <sup>7</sup>.

THE reader may find several other instances of the like, and perhaps of a more surprizing nature, in some of the authors above-mentioned <sup>a</sup> which we forbear to dwell upon; all that we shall add at present, is a remark or two on the possibility of some sort of stones, different from those of hail, being ingendered in the air, according to the hint we have given in the last note. How common hail is formed in the clouds is too well known to want any explanation; that dust, sand, earth, and other such materials, may be carried up a considerable height into the air by a strong whirlwind, is no more than what is commonly observed; here then we need but suppose that these, mingling themselves with other exhalations, whether sulphureous, bituminous, oily, vitrioline, and with the moisture of the clouds, are there conglomerated and hardened by their own weight, by the pressure of the air and clouds, and thence fall down when they can be no longer supported (O). There is nothing in all this but what is natural, and might, for aught appears to the contrary, have been the case of that which is mentioned in Joshua. We see therefore no reason for having recourse to allegory for fear of admitting the fact to be miraculous, as Le Clerc has, nor to the assistance of good or bad spirits to prove the possibility of the supposed miracle, as others have done <sup>a</sup>, since, if any thing was supernatural in it, it was only the directing of that storm to fall just at that time and place <sup>c</sup> upon the flying Canaanites. However, the reader is at his liberty to attribute the phenomenon to which of these systems he pleases, though the season of the year, the nature of the soil, of which we are going now to give the geography and natural history, and many other circumstances do rather incline us to ascribe it to the last.

<sup>7</sup> Vid. MONTFAUCON'S Diar. Ital. <sup>a</sup> G. VOSS. CALM. ub. sup. GASSEND. in lib. x. DIOD. LIBERT. de Meteor. Epicur. <sup>a</sup> MASIUS, BONFRERIUS, & al.

S E C T. III.

A Description of the Land of PROMISE.

THIS remarkable country, the greater part of it at least, at first called the land of Canaan <sup>b</sup>, or Chanaan (A) has been successively known by several names; as the land of Israel, the land of God, the Holy Land, and simply the Land; as also Judea or Judea, Palestine or Palestine, Syria Palestina, Syria, Cale-syria, Idumæa, or Idumæa, and Phœnicia or Phœnice.

<sup>b</sup> See before, pag. 322.

(O) Of this nature seem to have been those which an author of credit (26) tells us did fall in the neighbourhood of Abdus, to the number of twelve hundred, which he says were of the colour of rusty iron, smooth and hard, and of a sulphureous smell, not unlike in all these respects to those which are commonly called thunder-stones, or bolts. These he adds were observed to fall from a vehement whirlwind, which appeared like an atmosphere of fire, and were so large and heavy, that one of them weighed six score, and another sixty pounds.

To all this we may add, that these rains of stones were so far from being questioned either by the Greeks or Romans, that they were looked upon both by them, and by other less polite nations, as ominous; who therefore never failed of consulting the oracles, or endeavouring to avert the impending omen by sacrifices, and other religious rites, which are reported to have lasted nine days (27), inasmuch, that these kinds of heathenish expiations have induced some Christians to believe that the devil was the author both of those prodigious rains, and of the superstitious rites that were used to avert them (28), in order to confirm mankind in their idolatry. But as such overstrained notions need not to be confused in the age we live in, we shall close this note, and the subject, with observing, that it is not unlikely that the fabulous story of Hercules obtaining such a shower of stones from Jupiter, to crush those enemies, which his arm and valour could not overcome (29), might owe its birth to this we are upon. We have already observed under a former head, that the poets have joined in the character of that fabulous hero several characters and exploits, which seem plainly to have been taken from those of Moses, Joshua, Samson, and other Jewish worthies (30); what makes it very probable, that this rain of stones is of that number, is, that those enemies, against whom he procured it, are called the sons of Neptune (31), which expression, being divested of the fable, properly signifies any people that traffick by sea, and is very applicable to the Phœnicians, and to their neighbours the Canaanites. But this we submit to the reader.

(A) This name sometimes includes the whole land possessed by the twelve tribes; though it peculiarly belongs to no more than the country westward of the river Jordan. This being evident, (26) CARDAN. de Variet. lib. xiv. c. 72. (27) ALEX. ab ALEX. Genial. Diet. l. v. c. 27. ap. CALM. ub. sup. (28) Vid. MAB. in Job. x. (29) MELA lib. ii. Gall. Narbon. Plin. lib. v. Aëschyl. ap. Strab. lib. iv. & al. (30) GROT. de Verit. HURT. Demonst. Evang. (31) Vid. MELA. ub. sup.

- a THESE are the various names that have in general been imposed on this small part. It was called the land of Canaan, as a great share of it was originally possess'd by the descendants of the son of Cham of the same name; who being expelled and cut off, to make room for the Israelites, it thence was called after their name; to which we shall also add, that it was sometimes called the land of the Hebrews and sometimes the land of the Jews. It was called the land of God, as it was immediately given by him to the posterity of Abraham, the place of his more especial choice, and as he caused it to produce in proportion as his worship was observed or neglected; as it was also the place which he selected for his royal seat, and as here it pleased him to dwell, and more particularly in the temple of Jerusalem. It was by the Jews first called the Holy Land, and since by the Christians. By the Jews it was so called, as God declared it to be particularly his own, to be as it were his only seat, and solely appropriate to his service; besides, that God had promised it to his own people, upon the expulsion of its degenerate and idolatrous inhabitants (B). By the Christians it obtained this same name, as it was the great and stupendous scene of what was wrought and suffered for their salvation, and that of the whole world. It is sometimes simply called the Land, by way of pre-eminence, and as above all others; as when at the crucifixion it is said, there was darkness all over the land, which is generally supposed not to have extended beyond the limits of this. Whence it derived its appellation of Judea we have elsewhere shewn; Judab being the head, or chief of the tribes, communicated its name to the rest; besides, that the kingdom of Judab, standing after the dissolution of the kingdom of Israel, may have given farther ground for the extensive (C) and general use of this name. There are other, but erroneous accounts of the * See before, pag. 322. † See before ibid. ‡ 1 Sam. xiii. 9. 2 Kings vi. 23. Ezek. vii. 2. Matth. ii. 22. JOSEPH. Antiq. vii. 10, &c. &c. &c. § Idem ibid. l. xv. c. 7. ¶ PAUSAN. lib. vi. c. 24. JOSEPH. ubi sup. lib. vii. c. 9. † Vide RELAND. Palest. illust. lib. i. c. 3. ‡ Vide eund. ibid. c. 4. § Vide eund. ib. c. 5. † See before p. 421 A. ‡ See Numb. xi. 3. vii. 12, &c. Revel. vii. 5.

and agreed on, we shall only observe, that the Jews themselves make a distinction between the land of Canaan promised to their fathers, and recommended for its abundance of milk and honey, and the lands of Sidon and Og, which were to the eastward of the river (1). Moses plainly does the same (2) in this expression: Until I shall pass over Jordan, into the land which the Lord our God giveth us (3). But we must not forget that Canaan, in the general extent of it, may be divided into the larger and the lesser. The larger was to have extended to the Euphrates on the one hand, and the Mediterranean on the other (4). But though it was promised to the sons of Jacob, yet they never had peaceable possession of this wide dominion, not even when they had, in a manner, subverted all the Syrian powers (5). The lesser Canaan was confined to the land possessed by the nations particularly marked out for excision and expulsion (6). It is observed as an essential difference between the larger and the lesser Canaan, that in the former, when the Jews besieged a city, they were by God himself commanded to make offers of peace, while in the latter no conditions were to be granted on any account, but the people were to be destroyed, and utterly rooted out (7). Again, the land on this side Jordan was esteemed more holy than the land on the other; nay, such a wide difference was in this respect supposed to be between them, that the latter was even accounted unclean, if compared with the former, tho' possessed by the two tribes and a half (8). The one was barely called the land of your possession, the other, the land of the possession of the Lord (9).

(B) This region was holy to the Jews, as it was God's chosen seat, and as it had been promised to their forefathers upon the expulsion of its first profane and unclean inhabitants; but much more to the Christians, as there it was their salvation was wrought and effected (10). But the Jews did not account their whole possession to be equally sacred, as we have observed in the note next above; and that the Christians, seemingly, at least, give preference to some places above others, it may be needless to say. But the Jews particularly exalt this land far above all others else in the world, as they believe that here is to be the resurrection of the dead, and that persons buried elsewhere cannot enjoy a re-union of the soul and body, 'till the body has been transferred to the land of Israel (11). Abarbanel (12) pronounces, that whoever lives without the limits of the land of Israel is as he that is without God.

(C) That the name of Judea not only comprehended what the Jews possessed on this side of Jordan, but also what they held on the other, is plain, from Josephus's (13) Iudæa πέραν τῆς Ἰορδάνου, or Judea beyond Jordan, or the Judea of Jordan (14), by way of distinction. For the portion of Judab, whence this general denomination derives its origin, was not bounded by that river, but by the Dead-sea, or Asphaltite lake (15.) The extensiveness of this name, in honour of the patriarch Judab and his posterity, is thus foretold by Jacob, according to those who favour this translation of the text, (16) Juda, te confitebuntur (de nomine tui dicentur) fratres tui: Juda, thy brethren shall confess thee, or be called by thy name. This version is approved by a man (17) of great eminence, tho' different from any other

we

(1) Vide RELAND. Palest. illust. c. 1. pag. 5. (2) Deut. ii. 29. (3) Ibid. See before, pag. 340. Vide etiam RELAND. ubi sup. (4) Deut. vi. 24. (5) See before, pag. 382. (6) See before, pag. 322. (7) See FULLER'S Pisgab-fight, lib. i. c. 3. (8) Vide RELAND. ubi sup. c. 4. (9) See Joshua xxii. 19. (10) Vide RELAND. ubi sup. (11) Vid. eund. ibid. (12) Apud eund. ibid. (13) Antiq. lib. xii. c. 5. (14) Vid. RELAND. ubi sup. c. 6. (15) Vid. eund. ibid. (16) Genes. xlix. 8. (17) RELAND. ubi sup.

origin of this name. In short it was called Palestine, as being a part of that tract<sup>a</sup> or region very early so denominated (D); and this is the name that has since particularly prevailed with the christian doctors, and mohammedan writers<sup>m</sup>. It has also passed under the names of Syria Palestina, Syria*, and Cælo-Syria°, this being the ancient custom, as it is still at present with the Arabian geographers<sup>r</sup>. How this country came to be known by the name of Phænice we have sufficiently explained already<sup>q</sup>, and shall insist no farther thereon. We have already observed, that the whole nation of the Jews were sometimes called Idumeans<sup>s</sup>; and now add as consequential thereto, that the country of the Jews was sometimes called Idumæa; from the Edomites who seized on the southern parts of the country during the Babylonish captivity<sup>t</sup> (E). These have been, and are the several names of the land<sup>b</sup> promised to the descendants of Abraham, and these the best and most succinct reasons we have to assign for their variety.

Situation and Boundaries.

IT was a received opinion formerly, that this country was, as it were, the navel of the whole earth<sup>c</sup>, and exactly in the midst of the nations (F); a notion which may be well excused in those who had so slight a knowledge of the structure and extent of the world as the ancients. Its site, with regard to the several people round about, may be gathered from the geography of the several countries that precede in this history; wherefore we shall touch no farther thereon, than to exhibit the boundaries that have been assigned to this favourite land: but, not to enter into a long detail of critical niceties, we shall only say, that to the south it had the mountains or land of Edom<sup>v</sup>, and Amalek<sup>w</sup>; to the east it had the Asphaltite lake, the river Jordan, the sea of Tiberias or Galilee, and Samacbonite lake; to the north, it had the mountains of Libanus, or Antilibanus rather, or the territory of the Phœnicians; and to the west, it had the great or Mediterranean-sea. We forbear to set bounds to the Peræa, or land beyond Jordan, and content ourselves with what is more peculiarly the Land of promise. These were its natural bounds, which reached in length, that is, from south to north, about 3 degrees, or 180 miles; that is, from the 31st to the 34th degree of north latitude; but from east to west, that is, from

<sup>m</sup> Vide RELAND. ub. sup. c. 7. <sup>n</sup> See before, pag. 360. <sup>o</sup> STRAB. lib. xvi. <sup>p</sup> See before, pag. 361. <sup>q</sup> See before in the notes, pag. 392. <sup>r</sup> See before, pag. 510. <sup>s</sup> See before, pag. 317. Vide etiam RELAND. ub. sup. c. 9. <sup>t</sup> Vide eund. ibid. c. 10. <sup>v</sup> See before, pag. 308. <sup>w</sup> See before, pag. 318.

we have seen; but the completion of the prophecy in this sense, having been most remarkably made good, may incline us to embrace it. The common interpretation is, that his brethren should praise him, or pride themselves in him, which in the judgment of some may imply what is suggested above. Eusebius (18) attributes the prevalence of this name to the efficacy of the same prophecy. Alexander Polyhistor (19), derives the name from the children of Semiramis, Juda, and Idumæa; while Claudius Iulian (20) borrows it from one Judæus, the son of one Sparto who followed Bacchus to Thebes; absurd fables.

(D) We have elsewhere observed, that tho' this name properly belonged to no more than what is commonly called the Pentapolis of the Philistines, it had the fortune to spread itself over almost all the neighbouring regions (21). We have also touched on the vague and uncertain use of this name, together with those of Syria and Phænice (22). Dio Cassius (23), ignorant, as he himself confesses, of the origin of the name Judæa, tells us, that the name of Palestine was prior thereto; and Julian the apostate (24) speaks of the Jews as a handful of people, inhabiting a part only of Judæa. That the Philistines should have been considered above the Jews by the idolatrous nations of old, is no wonder, and thence it must seemingly have happened, that Palestine has been so much the name of all this tract for so many ages, and with such numbers of nations and sects as it has been.

(E) This is what we have formerly observed (25). It has been remarked a note or two higher (26), that Alexander Polyhistor derives Judæa from one Juda, the son of Semiramis, to whom he gives a brother by the same queen, called Idumæa, who according to him must have communicated this his name to his country. But not to insist upon such authorities, it is evident that this name naturally flows from the Edomites, who being vassals to those great monarchies, and ever active against the Jews (27), came into great consideration with the heathen, who may have accounted them more honourable than the Jews, and have therefore propagated their name beyond its natural bounds. Whence-soever it happened Idumæa was very often usurped for Judæa (28).

(F) This was also arrogated to themselves both by the Athenians and the Delphians. The Jews borrowed this notion from passages in scripture, such as these—This is Jerusalem: I have set it in the midst of the nations and countries that are round about her (29)—that dwell in the midst, or (as it is in the margin) the navel of the land. These expressions, taken in too vulgar and literal a sense, have tempted men (30) to pronounce the land of Israel to be in the midst of the habitable world, and to be the navel, as it were, of the earth. What the Delphians and Athenians had to say for themselves, as to this particular, may be best deferred till we come to treat of them distinctly.

(18) Demonstrat. Evang. lib. viii.

(20) Apud eund. ibid.

(23) Hist. Rom. lib. xxxvii.

(C).

(30) KIMCHI & HIERONYM. in Exek. ub. sup.

(21) See before, pag. 338.

(24) Contr. Christianos.

(27) See before, pag. 317.

(28) Vide RELAND. ub. sup. c. 9.

(19) Apud STEPH. BYZANT. in 'Eðvivois.

(22) See before in the notes, pag. 392.

(25) See before, pag. 316.

(26) In fin.

(29) Exek. v. 4.

the

- a the lakes of Asphaliis and Genezareth, to the Mediterranean, scarcely extended one degree towards the north, viz. from 37 to 38 deg. of north long. tho', on the south, it began much about the 36th degree. So that the broadest part was not much above 100 miles, and the narrowest about half that number. As to the boundaries of it after their several conquests and other acquisitions, they are not so easy to be settled (G).

- W<sup>e</sup> have already exhibited the division of this land by the Canaanites, its first inhabitants<sup>2</sup>, we are next to part it between the children of Israel. Simeon was the southermost of all: he had Edom to the south, the Dead-sea to the east, Judab to the north, to the west uncertain whether a desert tract, or inhabited land. Judab was the next: he had Simeon on the south, the Dead-sea on the east, Dan and Benjamin on the north, the Philistine on the west; Dan had the Philistine and Judab on the south, Benjamin on the east, Epbraim and the half tribe of Manasseh on the north, the Mediterranea-sea on the west; Benjamin had Judab on the south, the Jordan on the east, Epbraim on the north, Dan on the west; Epbraim and the half tribe of Manasseh, whom we join together in one common inclosure, had Dan and Benjamin on the south, the Jordan and part of Issachar on the east, part of Issachar and Asher on the north, the Mediterranean on the west; Issachar had Epbraim and the half tribe of Manasseh on the south and south-west, the Jordan on the east, Zebulun on the north, Asher on the west; Asher had the half tribe of Manasseh on the south, Issachar, Zebulun, Naphtali on the east, the Phœnician on the north, the Mediterranean-sea on the west; Zebulun had Issachar on the south, part of the Jordan and part of the sea of Galilee on the east, Naphtali on the north, Asher on the west; Naphtali had Zebulun on the south, part of the sea of Galilee and the Samachonite-lake on the east, the mountains of Antilibanus on the north, Asher on the west. To cross on the other side, Reuben and Gad had their portion along the eastern banks of the Jordan, between the Dead-sea and the sea of Tiberias, and the half tribe of Manasseh lay along the eastern shores of the sea of Tiberias and the Samachonite-lake; in this order was the land on this and that side of the river divided and distributed to the children of Israel under Moses and Joshua.
- d SOLOMON afterwards divided the land into twelve portions (H); but as the bare mention of this is sufficient for our present purpose, and as it is impossible, seemingly, to ascertain the limits and extent of each, we shall proceed to observe, that, under the second temple, it began to be divided into tetrarchies and toparchies, greater and smaller parts; the greater were Judea, Samaria, and Galilee (I); the lesser were Daroma, Geraristica, Sarona, and others (K); these were on this side of Jordan. The other side of the river was divided into Gilead, the Peræa, Gaulonites, Batanea, and Decapolis.

In after times, and under the christian dispensation, it was comprehended for

<sup>2</sup> See before, pag. 323.

(G) We need only observe, that the river Arnon is supposed to have been the first northern boundary of the children of Israel, on the other side of Jordan. With regard to the boundaries on this side of the river, Reland (31) takes notice of a great difference between the Hebrew and Samaritan pentateuch; his words are, Quod ad terminos Palaestinae attinet descriptos, Gen. x. 19. est observatum dignum pentateuchum Hæbreo-Samaritanum non nisi duos tresve extremos memorare, uti fluvium Ægypti & Euphratem vel mare magnum, licet in codice Hæbreo plurimorum aliorum locorum in finibus situm fiat mentio. Contextus Hæbræus ita habet; & termini Canaan sunt a Sidone, Geraram usq; Gazam, qua itur Sodomam, Gomorram, Adamam, & Tzeboim usq; ad Lefcha. Samaritanus hoc comma ita exhibet—Et fuit terminus Canaanæorum à fluvio Ægypti usq; ad flumen magnum Euphratem, & usq; ad mare posterius, i. e. occidentale. Vides insignem differentiam quæ inter Hæbræum & Samaritanum codicem intercedit.

(H) It is said (32) he appointed twelve officers over Israel, to provide victuals for the king and his household: each man his month in the year made provision. Now there was great inequality, as to extent at least, between the portions of land belonging to the tribes; so that to have taxed them alike had been a seeming hardship. It must therefore follow, that this new division was in equal parts, either in regard to extent or to production, and that this new division was very different from the old. Reland (33) has confronted Josephus with the Scripture as to this matter, and to him we refer the curious reader.

(I) Reland (34), in the map he gives us of this division, makes Idumæa encroach considerably upon Judea, but in his text takes no notice of it, either as a tetrarchy or toparchy. Perhaps he does this upon sufficient assurance that Judea and Idumæa were promiscuously usurped for each other, as we have observed before (35). To enquire farther into this were needless. We have only to add, that Galilee was twofold, the upper and the lower (36).

(K) Pliny (37) reckons up ten toparchies in this country; Jericho, Emmans, Lydda, Joppa, Acra-batena, Gophna, Thamna, Bethleptephene, Orine, Herodium. Josephus (38) has eleven, Gophna, Acra-batna, Thamna, Lydda, Emaus, Pella, Idumæa, Engadæ, Herodium, Jericho; a very obscure piece of geography, which we shall not take upon us to illustrate.

(31) Ub. sup. c. 25. (32) 1 Kings iv. 7. (33) Palest. Illust. lib. i. c. 29. (34) Ub. sup. c. 31. (35) See before note P. (36) Vide RELAND. ub. sup. (37) Lib. v. c. 14. (38) De Bell. lib. iii. c. 4.

the most part, if not quite, under the denominations of Palestina prima, Palestina secunda, Palestina tertia or salutaris.

AGAIN, it is divided into the hilly country and the low (L), which will naturally lead us, and no place more proper, to take a survey of the more remarkable mountains, vallies, and plains. The midland between the Jordan, and the Mediterranean, is on all hands allowed to be particularly mountainous, while the land towards the sea, mount Carmel excepted, and towards the river, is flat, except some gentle risings as at this day.

Mountains.

It may be reckoned inaccurate in us to comprehend the mountains of Libanus and Antilibanus, or either of them within the district before us, seeing they might have been more properly described in our geography of Syria, or Phanice; and we in part submit thereto, and the rather as we have tacitly, as it were, admitted them to have been a part of the proper Syria, when we formerly described the cedars of Lebanon among the natural curiosities of that country*. But having occasion to make mention of these hills once more, we would venture here to supply our former omission. These mountains, as to their extent and situation with respect to each other, have been very obscurely described by the ancients, and very confusedly understood by all the modern geographers, one seemingly excepted (M), who agrees very well with the only ancients (N), who have spoken with some degree of clearness relating thereto. It is a confirmed opinion, that, whether you call them Libanus (†) or Antilibanus, they derive their names from the whiteness of the snow, which lies upon them; which some seem to think it perpetually does (O); while others aver it is there but for a certain season only (P). St Jerome says, that no hill in the Land of Promise is more lofty, more woody, or thicker set than Libanus, and elsewhere* it is said to be the highest of all Palestine. The cedars, once the great pride and ornament of these hills, are now, in a manner, extinct<sup>b</sup>, though some few there are among the pines, cypresses, and other noble vegetables, here produced. Finally, these mountains have, at several times, been a place of refuge and retreat for robbers, and other desperate people in great numbers.

MOUNT Hermon (Q) appears next, like Libanus capped with snow (R),

* See before pag. 362. h. † Vide RELAND. ub. sup. c. 48. * In Zachar. ix. * THEODOR. in Pal. lxxi. <sup>b</sup> See before, sub. sup. <sup>c</sup> Vide RELAND. ub. up. c. 49.

(L) The Jews, in their Talmud (39) have a three-fold division of their country into mountains, vallies, and plains, allotting to each its peculiar produce (40); to the mountain the ash, to the valley the palm, and to the plain the mulberry.

(M) Maunderell (41) is the person we mean; who has very satisfactorily distinguished between the one and the other, which have been most unaccountably blended together, and confounded by all the geographers we have seen; but, as we shall copy these mountains from his map published by Reland (42), we may save ourselves the trouble of his verbal description.

(N) We mean Strabo and Pliny, who make them two distinct ridges running almost parallel with each other.

(†) Some have affected to derive it from Λιβανός, Libanus, the Greek for frankincense; but Reland (43) very justly remarks, that they should, in the first place, prove that any sort of that aromatic ever grew there.

(O) We have already touched (44) upon this; Rauwolf (45) will have it, that the snow rests on these mountains all the summer long. Le Bruyn (46) says, these hills are ever covered with snow. Sandys (47) observes, that, when he was in this neighbourhood, a Moor, returning from these snow-ropp'd mountains, in company with an English merchant, perished with the excessive cold, tho', at the same time, the heat in the vallies on both sides was excessive. Prince Radziwille (48) reports, that the snows on the tops of these mountains never melt away, tho' the heats here be far more intense and scorching than in Italy. Pheas (49) speaks of the mountains as covered with snow from the head to the foot; which agrees well with what Maunderell (50) relates. We have been the more particular upon this, as well formerly (51) as now, because it has been roundly and formally contradicted by a traveller of more than ordinary reputation.

(P) The person who so differs from all the rest is Monf. La Roque, or rather the chevalier d'Arvieux (52); but, it being so common for snow eternally to lie on the summits of great hills, we know not well, what to attribute that pretended absence of it which our author did there observe.

(Q) It was also called Baal Hermon (53), and seemingly by other names, not strictly to our purpose. Hilarius (54) derives Hermon from חרמון, anathema. Hermon, says he (55), is a mountain in Phanice, whose interpretation is anathema—It is reported—that the angels, when they descended from heaven for love of the daughters of men, assembled together upon this very lofty hill. That it was a place of ancient superstition may be not only gathered hence, but is also confirmed by Eusebius (56), who says, that on the top of it there was a famous temple held in high veneration with the neighbouring Heathen about, in Libanus and Paneas.

(R) Travellers have but little on the remarkables of this hill.

(39) In SHEVITH. c. 9. 2. (40) In GEMAR. Hierosolym. (41) Journey to Jerusalem. (42) Palestina. Illust. (43) In Palest. Illust. ub. sup. c. 48. (44) See before pag. 362. (D). (45) Itinerary into the East Count. part ii. c. 12. (46) Voyage au Levant, tom. 2. c. 57. p. 286. in 4to. (47) In his Travels, book iii. p. 163. (48) Peregrinat. Hierosolym. p. 27. (49) Apud RELAND. ub. sup. c. 48. (50) Journ. from Alep. to Jerus. (51) See pag. 362. (D). (52) See before ib. (53) Judges iii. 3. (54) In Pf. cxxxiii. (55) Ibid. (56) In Onomastico, ad vocem Asymon.

but

- a but for nothing more remarkable than the abundant dews which fall upon and about it (S).

MOUNT Carmel (T) on the skirts of the sea is the most remarkable head of land of all the coast, at least southward of it, on all hands famed for its fertility (V); of particular note among the ancients, for being, above all others, the favourite place of Pythagoras (W); but, by far, more revered among the Christians, as here they supposed Elias sojourned in a cave, sometime before he was ravished into heaven (X).

- b THABOR is the next mount we are to survey. There was a city of the same name. It was also called Itabyrion and Atabyrion (Y), and borrows its Hebrew name from its form (Z). It is remarkable for the regularity of its form, and proportion of its parts (A); for its being seated in the midst of a plain, at a distance from

(S) We were, says Maundrell (57), sufficiently instructed by experience, what the holy Psalmist means by the dew of Hermon, our tents being as wet with it, as if it had rained all night.

(T) This was a name common to both a town and a mountain, and is equally applicable to any fertile and woody place; or it may be understood of purple, which was fished at the foot of this same mountain (58). It was also a name common both to a mountain and a god (59). Another author (60), observing there are two Carmels mentioned by St. Jerome, supposes they are both mountains.

(V) This mountain is rich in olives and vines when husbanded, and abounding with several sorts of fruit and herbs, both medicinable and fragrant; though now much overgrown with woods and shrubs of sweet savour (61). But according to another (62), this mountain is round about, towards the sea-coast, so very bare and rough, that we may very well say with the holy prophet Amos, That the pastures of the herdsmen shall look miserably, and the top of the mountain dried up. Others there are who do not speak of this place, as it is at present, with any greater advantage, than, as of a rugged and barren rock (63).

(W) It was anciently called ἱεὺς Διὸς, (64) the holy mountain of Jupiter, if not rather, as it is thought (65), ἱεὺς καὶ ἱερὸς Διὸς, the mountain and temple of Jupiter. The name of Carmel was common both to the mountain and a god (66). In short, in such high veneration it was, either for its advantages of nature, or the famed traditions of old Paganism, that Pythagoras is reported (67) to have taken particular delight in it, and to have frequently amused himself alone in the temple. But Tacitus (68) denies there was here any temple, or image of a god, but an altar only held in great veneration.

(X) This is on all hands allowed, and on this account it came to be in such high esteem with the Christians, that they seem to have began very early to distinguish it by particular marks of piety. There was here a very large monastery, which by the envy of time, and the rage of the enemy, being brought to decay, the ruins of it were, as we may say, a new consecrated, by a Calabrian priest, who urged hither to the work, by some revelation, gathered together about ten monks, and restored the venerable credit of the place (69). "From hence proceeded the order of the Carmelite friars, as successors to the children of the prophets there left by Elias. They had their beginning, in the desart of Syria, in the year 1180, and were founded by Almericus bishop of Antioch; who is said to have received their white habit from the virgin Mary. This order Albertus, the patriarch of Jerusalem, transported first into Europe. There is yet to be seen the remains of their monastery, with a temple dedicated to the blessed virgin; and under it a little chapel, or cave, the ancient dwelling of Elias (70)—It must be a considerable number of years ago, without doubt, that a great many of this order lived hereabout, as still to this day doth appear, by their cloisters and churches, which by age are at present so mightily decayed, that they are left deserted and uninhabited (71). Their convent now is not on the top of the mount, where they had a lovely one, before the Christians lost the Holy Land, the ruins whereof are still to be seen; but there is a very little one somewhat lower, and needs no more but three monks to fill it, who would have much ado to subsist, if they had not some alms given them by the French merchants of Acre, who go often thither out of devotion.—Their church is said to be the very spot where Elias abode, and is very neatly cut out of the rock.—They have an excellent prospect, especially upon the sea (72). This mountain seems not to have much bettered its condition with regard to its religious state, tho' the late king of France did what he could to raise it to its former splendor (73); and the reason may be, because it has been pretty much the ordinary residence of an emir of the Arabs (74).

(Y) Names best known to the Greeks, and supposed to be derived from ἄβυρρον, Ab-dabbyr a place where cattle was led to pasture (75): Other places there were of the same name; in Rhodes there was a mountain called Atabyrum; in Sicily we meet with an Atabyrium; in Persia, with a city of the same name and another in Phenice (76). There was likewise a Ζεύς Ἀταβύριος, who was chiefly worshipped in Rhodes (77): but what relation this Atabyrian Jove may have had to our mountain, does no where plainly appear, tho' that some he had, may be easily concluded from what we lately observed of mount Carmel, that its name belonged both to the mount itself, and to a god (78).

(Z) טבור Tabor, is properly a navel.<sup>1</sup>

(A) In the seventh century, it is described to have been of wonderful regularity, verdant and florid, to have any other hill; for its fertility and beauty of production, and for its height (B),<sup>a</sup> but above all for being the scene of the glorious transfiguration (†), which has derived on it the particular veneration of Christians in almost all ages, but that here this splendid miracle was wrought is doubted by some (C).

(57) Journey from Aleppo to Jerus. p. 57. (58) BOCHART. Hier. pt. 2. lib. v. c. 9, &c. (59) TACITUS. (60) Cosmog. de Levant. p. 180. (61) SANDYS, ub. sup. p. 158. (62) RAUWOLF, ub. sup. p. 125. (63) THEVEN. Voy. au Levant, pt. 1. c. 58. (64) SCYL. CARYAND, in Minor. Hudf. vol. 2. (65) Vide RELAND. Palæstin. Illust. lib. i. c. 50. (66) Vide eund. ibid. (67) JAMBELICH. in vita Pythag. c. 3. (68) Histor. lib. 2. (69) JOHAN. PHOC. ap. RELAND. ub. sup. (70) SAND. Trav. lib. iii. p. 158. (71) RAUWOLF's Itinerary, pt. 3. c. 1. (72) THEVEN. Voy. au Levant, pt. 1. c. 59. (73) DE LA ROQUE Voy. dans la Palest. in the preface. (74) SAND. ub. sup. DE LA ROQUE, ub. sup. (75) Vid. Mich. ii. 12. & HILLER. in Onomast. sacr. ap. RELAND. ub. sup. c. 51. (76) STEPH. BYZANT. Ἐβρύρα. (77) POLYB. lib. ix. (78) See above note (W).

MOUNT Olivet, or the mount of olives (D), is the next that claims a place, and indeed, on some accounts, may almost do so before all others. It is about a have had an ample plain at top, surrounded by a great wood, with a large monastery, and many cells in the midst thereof (79). This monastery, or church, was dedicated to Christ, Moses, and Elias (80). The same author adds, it was by the inhabitants called Age Mons; which must have been, in some sort, a corruption of the Greek ἁγίου ὄρους, the Holy Mount, which denotes the veneration it was in, even in very early days, as well as at present. Sir John Mandevill tells us of an ancient tradition, "that upon this hill, at the last day, four angels will, with four trumpets, raise the dead from the beginning of the world, that they may appear alive before the face of our Lord, in the valley of Jehosaphat (81). But, not to insist farther on the received sanctity of the place, we will only add concerning its amenity as at this day, that "it has a plain area at top, most fertile and delicious, of an oval figure, extended about one furlong in breadth, and two in length. This area is enclosed with trees on all parts, except towards the south. It was anciently environed with walls, and trenches, and other fortifications, of which it exhibits many remains at this day (82)." Another traveller (83), describing the appearance of it more particularly, observes, that it seems to have been rather the work of art than of nature, and of wonderful beauty; that from the bottom to the top it looks like a continued spiral of cinder-coloured rock continually crowned with verdant trees, which agrees not amiss with the cut the former has given us to represent this same mount. A third (84) adds that most of the trees on this hill are hard oaks.

(B) Josephus writes, that this mountain is thirty stades or furlongs in height, and Adamnanus (85) agrees with him exactly therein; but, that it falls much short of this measure, whether considered perpendicularly, or obliquely, will appear by the undoubted testimony of modern travellers. Maundrell (86) says, he ascended it in less than an hour; and Thevenot (87) computes the ascent of it at not quite half a league, and at the same time observes, that some of his company went up on horseback; which plainly shews that the acclivity is nothing so abrupt as is commonly imagined by the sugar-loaf shape of this hill; so that, upon the whole, this modern account seems greatly to lessen the pretended perpendicular height of it. Before we close up this note, we must remember, that Adamnanus (88) likewise stretches the plain at top to twenty-five stades, which is very sufficiently contradicted by Maundrell, in the note above.

(†) This place having been had in great veneration by the Christians, as we have partly observed already (89), we have only to add, that there are still some remains of the religious state of it. Prince Radziville (90) writes, that, on the top of it, there is a middling sort of a church, between two cells, or chapels rather, according to him, erected by St. Helen, on the spot of the transfiguration.

Thevenot (91) on the contrary says, that there is here but one grott, and that but a little one, in which is a chapel, made up of four arches cross-wise; that the first is the entrance only; the second, opposite to it, the place where our Lord was transfigured; that on the right hand of this, the place where Moses stood; that on the left, where Elias; thus does he seemingly differ from the former traveller. A third there is (92) who varies from both, and tells us, that on the top of this mount there is a grott, which seems to be a part of some old ruins, all lined with great stones, and with many vaults still standing. The same author tells us the mount itself is so steep that there is no ascending it on horseback, which Thevenot contradicts (93.) Finally, we have a fourth eye-witness (94) who seems to vary from the three in the description he gives us of these remains, which is, that they are no more than three contiguous grotto's, made to represent the three tabernacles St. Peter proposed to erect, in the astonishment which possessed him at the glory of the transfiguration.

(C) Its being situated in such a separate manner has induced most authors to conclude, that this must needs be that holy mountain, as St. Peter (95) styles it, which was the place of our blessed Lord's transfiguration, related by Matthew (96) and Mark (97). There you read, that Christ took with him Peter, James, and John into a mountain apart; from which description they infer, that the mountain, there spoken-of, can be no other than Tabar. The conclusion may possibly be true; but the argument, used to prove it, seems incompetent; because the term ἄπρῳ, or apart, most likely relates to the withdrawing and retirement of the persons there spoken of, and not the situation of the mountain (98). Reland (99) thinks it in some sort rash to dispute a point, which has been so generally received for so many ages, but confesses himself in some doubt as to the thing, for many very strong geographical and other reasons, but particularly, because there is no mention made of the name of this hill, as there is of the mount of Olivet, mount Carmel, and others; tho' the sacred writers have been so very particular in naming the places where any thing memorable was wrought by Christ.

(D) By the Greeks, ἁγίου ὄρους or ἁγίου ὄρους; by the Jews, in their language, called the mount of Unction, or the mount of Olives, or oil. It was also called the mountain of three Lights, because it was lighted on the west by the fire of the altar; because on the east it received the earliest light of the sun, before the city; and because it produced much oil, an aliment of light (100). But it is rather supposed to have been called the mountain of three heads or tops, as Sardus, in the cut he gives us of it, describes it to be. For three summits it had, the first, in the middle, whence Christ ascended into heaven, the second

(79) ADAMNAN. de loc. sacr. lib. xi. (80) Itin. Sir WILLIBALD. ap. RELAND. ub. sup. (81) MAUNDELL. c. 10. (82) MAUND. Journ. from Alep. to Jerus. p. 113. (83) RADZIVIL. Peregrin. Jerosol. p. 43. (84) THEVENOT. ub. sup. c. 55. (85) Ub. sup. (86) Ub. sup. (87) Ub. sup. (88) Ub. sup. (89) See before in the last note but one. (90) In Peregr. Jerosol. ub. sup. (91) Voy. au Levant, ub. sup. (92) LE BRUYN Voy. au Levant, tom. 2. in 4to. (93) In the note before this. (94) MAUND. ub. sup. (95) 2 Epist. i. 18. (96) cb. xvii. (97) cb. ix. (98) MAUND. ub. sup. (99) Ub. sup. (100) RELAND. Palæst. Illust. lib. i. c. 52. Idem ibidem.

a mile distant from Jerusalem, and commands the best prospect over that city (E). It is said to have sometime been the residence of the Shcinah (F). It has been falsely, or rather inaccurately supposed to have been in, or on the skirts of Galilee (G). It was formerly famed for its fertility (H), and so it might still be if duly cultivated (I). It is likewise held in special veneration by the Christians (K) for what was there wrought, transacted, and fulfilled by our Saviour, and particularly for his ascension into heaven, nor is it much less revered even by the Mohammedans (L).

THE foregoing are the most considerable of the greater mounts, the more remarkable of the lesser are these; either on this, or on the other side of the river Jordan; mount Gilead, mount Bashan, mount Gilboab, mount Gerizim, mount Ebal, mount Sion, and others of lesser note.

WE will not enter into a nice disquisition of what were properly vales, <sup>Of the low-country, and first of the vales.</sup> and what were properly plains, in this country: whoever contemplates the face second to the southward of it, called the mountain of Offence, the third to the northward, and highest of all (1).

(E) In this the bulk of travellers are agreed, it being the loftiest eminence in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem, and overlooking the highest part of that city. But this must be observed, that, Jerusalem being itself seated high, it from thence looks to be no very lofty hill; tho' from other places it appears a mountain (2). Hence a poet (3) calls it a small hill.

(F) The Jews say it rested here during the space of three years and a half, to try whether or no the Jews would return to God, during which it cried out, Return to me, O my children, and I will return to you; and, that having expected in vain, it migrated again to its place (4). This is understood to have respect to Christ the true Shcinah, who often sojourned here, and continued so long his gracious endeavours to recal the Jews to the true worship of God (5).

(G) This mistake certainly arose from the disciples who were Galileans, tho' in a description of this mount it has been roundly asserted, that but two furlongs thence was Galilee and Cana where the marriage was, at which Christ turned the water into wine (6). Whence this extraordinary mistake arose is pretty well explained to us; for, on the highest ground of this mount, there was formerly erected an high tower, in memory of the apparition of the two angels to the apostles, after the ascension (7), from whence the tower itself, of which we shall speak in a following note, had the name given it of Viri Galilaei (8); and thence the mistake may very likely have derived its origin.

(H) It is thus described by an author (9) of the seventh century: few or no trees are there to be found, except the olive and the vine, according to the report of Aculfus; but, that wheat and barley might there flourish in a most kindly manner, may be plainly inferred from the nature of its soil which is quite productive.

(I) The west side of mount Olivet is "bedecked with olives, almonds, fig-trees, and heretofore, with palms; pleasant and rich, when husbanded but now upbraiding the barbarous with his neglected pregnancy (10).

(K) This mount is much resorted to by pilgrims, who visit Jerusalem; nor do travellers, who have been this way, forget to enumerate the several sanctuaries of this famous eminence; but it will be enough for us to consult one of them, who agrees with all the rest almost to a tittle as to what is here to be seen. He (11) tells us, they here shew, "about two thirds of the way up, certain grotto's cut with

"intricate windings and caverns under ground; these are called the sepulchres of the prophet. A little higher up are twelve arched vaults, under ground, standing side by side; these were built in memory of the twelve apostles, who are said to have compiled their creed in this place. Sixty paces higher you come to the place where they say Christ uttered his prophecy concerning the final destruction of Jerusalem (12). And a little higher, on the right hand of this, is the place where they say he dictated, a second time, the Pater-noster to his disciples (13). Somewhat higher, is the cave of St. Pelagia; and, as much more above that, a pillar signifying the place where an angel gave the Blissed Virgia three days warning of her death. At the top of the hill you come to the place of our blessed Lord's ascension. Here was anciently a large church, built in honour of that glorious triumph: but all, that now remains of it, is only an octagonal cupola, about eight yards in diameter; standing, as they say, over the very place, where were sat the last footsteps of the son of God here on earth. Within the cupola there is seen, in a hard stone as they tell you, the print of one of his feet. Here was also that of the other foot sometime since; but is has been removed from hence by the Turks into the great Mosch, upon mount Morab ——— About two furlongs from this place, northward, is the highest part of mount Olivet; and upon that was anciently erected the high tower we lately mentioned, ——— called Viri Galilaei. This ancient monument remained till about two years since, when it was demolished by a Turk, who had bought the field in which it stood." More of this sort is added by other travellers, but this shall serve our purpose.

(L) The Turks pretend so great a veneration for the building over the print of our Saviour's foot, on this mountain, that they have sometimes denied the Christians all entrance into it; so that they were allowed only to stand at the door, to perform their devotions, and view the holy stone of impression at the distance of about four cubits from them (14). This it seems was owing to the rigid humour of the then governor of those parts, tho' before it was free and open to both Christians and Mohammedans (15), as it has been so since (16). But notwithstanding this pretended veneration, on the part of the Turks, with regard to this and other places, it is shrewdly doubted (17), whether they do it "out of real devotion, or for lucre's sake, and to the end that they may exact money from the Christians for admission into them."

(1) Vid. eund. ibidem. (2) PHOC. in Descript. Loc. Terr. Sanct. (3) PERDIC. EPHES. in Descript. Hierosolym. (4) Vid. eund. ibid. (5) Vid. eund. ib. (6) Anonym. ap. eund. ib. (7) A7s i. 10, 11. (8) MAUNDR. Jour. from Alp. to Jerus. pag. 105. (9) ADAMNAN. de Loc. Sanct. lib. i. ap. RELAND. ub. sup. (10) SANDYS ub. sup. (11) MAUNDR. ub. sup. (12) Mat. ii. 4. (13) Luke xi. 1, 2. (14) RADZIV. Peregrin. Hierosolym. pag. 74. (15) Idem ibid. (16) SANDYS ub. sup. (17) MAUNDR. ub. sup.

of the country, so very remarkably distinguished into high lands and low, <sup>a</sup> may think it a needless task; and besides, it has been done to our hands with all the accuracy and industry imaginable <sup>1</sup>. To proceed then, the vale of Gerar was where Isaac sojourned, when he departed from Abimelech <sup>2</sup>. the vale of Shittim, whose situation is quite uncertain. The vale of Hinnom or the valley of the children of Hinnom, near the walls of Jerusalem (M), remarkable for the superstition there practised in times of old (N). The vale, or valley of Salt, of note for the overthrow of the Edomites <sup>3</sup> there. The vale of the Rephaim, called also the vale of the Titans, and of the Giants (O), of uncertain situation (P). The valley of Jeboshaphat (Q), mentioned but once in scripture <sup>4</sup>, close in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem, and supposed to be <sup>b</sup> the place of the last and general judgment (R). The vale of Berachab or Bles-fing (S), in the wilderness of Tekoa. The valley of Shaveb (T), or the king's dale <sup>5</sup>, famous for the interview between Abraham and Melchisedeck. The valley of Elab, or of the Terebinth (U), where David slew Goliath. Others we forbear to mention.

Plains.

We shall only take a cursory survey of the plain part of this country, tho' a very considerable portion of it. In Palestine there are two great plains, the one properly so called, and divided by the Jordan, one hundred and fifty miles in length; the other called the great plain of Esdraelon, or of Legion <sup>6</sup>. The former of these, according to Josephus <sup>7</sup>, extended from Scythopolis on <sup>c</sup> the sea itself of Tiberias, to the Asphaltite-lake. In the New Testament <sup>8</sup> it is called the region about Jordan (W). Besides, there was, as we just now said,

<sup>a</sup> Vide RELAND ub. sup. c. 54. <sup>1</sup> See before, p. 346. <sup>2</sup> See before, p. 316. <sup>3</sup> Joel iii. 2, and 12. <sup>b</sup> Gen. xiv. 17. <sup>4</sup> Vide RELAND ub. sup. c. 55. <sup>5</sup> Antiq. lib. vi. c. 2. <sup>6</sup> Matth. iii. 5.

(M) Eusebius (18) writes, it was close, or near to the walls of the city on the east side; but Reland (19) is rather inclined to believe, it lay southward of the same (20).

(N) This superstition we have already (21) dwelt on, and given a sufficient description of the spot in general (22).

(O) So rendered, by the Seventy, and Josephus; whence St. Jerome (23) hastily supposes the Rephaim of scripture to have been the Titans, and giants of the fabulous ancients. But, that the Rephaim were one of the ten nations of the Canaanites, we have shewn elsewhere (24); nor have we forgot to observe all that can be well said of them down to their exit and migration (25).

(P) Eusebius (26) places it within the portion of Benjamin; but Bonfrere will have it to be in the tribe of Judah; but we forbear so useless and uncertain an inquiry.

(Q) According to St. Cyril (27), it was a few stades or furlongs eastward of Jerusalem, a bare spot, and fit for riding. Aben Ezra (28) takes it to be the same with the valley of Berachab, Bles-fing, or Praise, so called by Jeboshaphat, in memory of the signal victory we have mentioned above (29); and Kimchy (30) supposes it to have been situate in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem, where, perhaps, Jeboshaphat erected some building, in memory of that action. Concerning the situation of this valley, Sir John Mandeville (31) expresses himself thus, "Between Jerusalem and the mount of Olyvate is the vale of Josaphat, under the walls of the cytee." What he adds afterwards of its being so called from a fabulous king of that name, said to have been converted by a Christian hermit, is ridiculous; but, with respect to the situation of the vale, Thevenot (32), Radzi- ville (33), and, if we except Reland, we may add the whole class of travellers, ancient and modern, agree with him.

(R) This tradition took birth from this text of scripture (34), I will also gather all nations, and will bring them down into the valley of Jehoshaphat, and soon. Which expression might have been more properly taken in a symbolical sense: Jeboshaphat signifying the judgment of God. But hence, says Reland (35), the Jews have gathered, that the general judgment is to be on mount Olivet; adjoining to which many have persuaded themselves, this valley of Jeboshaphat to be, tho' upon a very slender argument. Reland then is not satisfied with the situation of this valley, so universally laid down by travellers; and no body has ever considered the geography of these parts like him.

(S) Called from them in the Latin of the Vulgate, Vallis Benedictionis; and in the Greek of the Septuagint, Κοιλάς Ευαγγελίας, the valley of Bles-fing, or Praise, which name was given to it on account of the overthrow and miraculous rout of the Moabites (36), Ammonites (37), and of the Edomites (38), or inhabitants of mount Seir, in their war combined against Jeboshaphat.

(T) In the Greek of the Septuagint, it is called, Κοιλάς τῆ Σαβῆ, or τῆ Σαβῆ; the valley of Saba, or Saby; which by the same is interpreted to mean τὸ πεδίον τῶν βασιλέων, the Field of Kings.

(U) By Aquila and Theodotian rendered Κοιλάς ὁ ὄρεος (39), the Valley of the Oak.

(W) So the Greek interpreters have rendered it, περίχωρος τῆ Ἰορδάνῃ (40), and τὰ ἔρημα τῆ Ἰορδάνῃ (41), or the wilderness of Jordan, and that such it might, properly enough, be called, or at least comparatively, will hereafter appear.

(18) Ad vocem Γαζερών. (19) Ub. sup. c. 54. (20) See before, pag. 294. (21) Ibidem. (22) See before in the notes of pag. 322. (23) In Comment. ad Gal. iii. (24) See before in the notes of p. 322. (25) Ib. p. 324. (26) In Onom. ad voc. Εμπερ Πάφιν. (27) Comment. in loc. Joel. (28) Ap. RE-LAND. ub. sup. (29) 2 Chron. xx. 26. (30) Ap. RELAND. ub. sup. (31) Cap. 8. (*) Vide etiam MAUND. ub. sup. pag. 103. (32) Cosmog. de Levant, pag. 177. (33) Peregrin. Hierosolym. p. 60. (34) Joel. iii. 2. (35) Ub. sup. (36) See before in the notes of page 291. (37) See before, p. 297. (38) See before, p. 315. (39) EUSEB. in Onomast. ad vocem Ηλᾶδ. (40) 2 Chron. iv. 17. (41) Isa. xxxv. 2.

a another great plain, which from the city of Jezreel, and Legion (X); is called the plain of Jezreel, or Esdraelon (Y), or the great plain of Legion (Z). Besides these which are most remarkably distinguished as flat parts of the country, the whole coast from mount Carmel, to the southernmost borders of the land, is a plain and a level; excepting here and there a gentle hill, or sand-heap. This great extent was not at all known by the same name under the second temple°. The northern part of it, from Joppa to Cæsarea, and no more, as some will have it, was called Saron and Saronas (A). To the southward of this, was the plain of Sephela (B). The other plains, as that of Jericho (C), which may be included into the great plain, properly so called, we forbear to mention.

b Of the wildernesses, or deserts of this country, we shall not have much to say; Wildernesses and deserts. though by these we are not always to understand places quite uninhabited, and destitute of all useful production (D); since in the very first and chief of them, which is the wilderness of Judab (E), we find the cities of Beth-arabab, Middin, and Secacab, and Nibshan, and the city of Salt, and En-gedi; six cities with their villages. The wilderness of Gibeon. Josephus represents all the mountainous tract, from Jericho to Scythopolis, as quite barren and uninhabited, and under the same character includes all the space washed by the Jordan from the sea of Tibe-

° Vide RELAND. ub. sup. ° Vide eund. ibid. ° Vide eund. ibid. ° Judg. i. 16. ° Josh. xv. 61, 62. ° 2 Sam. ii. 24. ° De Bell. Judaic. lib. iii. c. 8.

(X) Now supposed to be called Legune (43). Reland (44) thinks this great plain, was partly in Samaria, and partly in Galilee, and that thence we have the μὴν πᾶσι Σαμαριτῶν, Magnus Campus Samaritidis of Josephus (45).

(Y) So the seventy call it Πεδίον μὴν Ἐρζεν-λῶν, with a little variation, the name either way being supposed to have been moulded by the Greeks, from the Hebrew name Jezreel (46). Eusebius places it in the tribe of Issachar, and adds, that it extended from Scythopolis to mount Carmel †. If it be objected, that no such great extent is given to it, either in scripture, or by St. Jerome; we answer, that to this great level it may have happened as to seas, which are divided into many portions, distinguished by different names, borrowed from the considerable places on the coasts (47); so that the plain of Esdraelon, or Jezreel, peculiarly so called, may have been of small circumference, while the name itself, by a usual custom among men, may have extended itself over the whole of what it was only a part; instances of which it were needless and endless to give.

(Z) Eusebius calls it, μὴν πᾶσι ὁ Λεγεῶν, Campum Magnum Legionis; and St. Jerome calls it, Latissimum Campum, vel Campum Maximum, or, adding the name, Grandem Campum Legionis (48).

(A) In our version Sharon, it afforded excellent pasture, and is by the prophet (49) compared with Carmel, Bosban, and Lebanon, for beauty and fertility. Eusebius and St. Jerome mention three plains of that name (50), one situate between the lake of Genesareth, or sea of Tiberias and mount Taber; and the other situate between the Cæsarea of Palestine and the city of Joppa. Besides these, we read of a third (51) belonging to the tribe of Gad, and consequently on the other side of the Jordan. Reland indeed is unwilling to admit of this last; his reason for it is, that the Gadites are there said to have dwelt in Gilead, and in Bosban, and in her towns; but, of Sharon, it is only said that they dwelt in her suburbs (52), which being appointed chiefly for cattle (53), he supposes they crossed the Jordan, to feed their cattle, in one or other of the two Sharons on this side (54). But whoever considers, that their own land of Bosban was to the full as fertile and fit for pasture, will scarce imagine that they would bring their cattle so far into other tribes on this side, merely for the sake of food; and since Sharon, in the places above quoted, seems to be used proverbially to express the beauty and fertility of a region, why may not we suppose it to have been given to many more places than these, on either side Jordan, since both abounded with such fertile plains.

(B) So called from the Hebrew שפלה, Shephelah, properly signifying a low land, and is equally applicable to the one plain and the other (55); this extended itself eastward and southward of Eleutheropolis.

(C) Josephus (56) writes, that Jericho stood in a plain, which others (57) call a vale; but, whether vale or plain, it must, by its situation, have been a part of the great plain divided by the Jordan; and may have been called the vale or plain of Jericho, by the rule we have observed five notes above, in speaking of the great plain of Jezreel.

(D) Reland (58) observes, that the Hebrew word, which the Greeks render ἡμίμυς, and the Latins, Solitudines, does, in its strictest import, mean no more than barely an uncultivated place; and thereupon remarks, that, tho' St. John is said to have proclaimed the gospel in the wilderness of Judea, it is plain it was not such a desert as was quite wild and inhospitable, for that it had cities, whose inhabitants were the first auditors to whom the Baptist foretold the immediate advent of the Messiah. He then quotes Jewish doctors (59), who acquaint us, that the smaller cattle, as sheep, goats, and the like, were not fed in the land of Israel, but in Syria, and the wildernesses, as we render the original word, of the land of Israel. Upon the whole he supposes, that all such places were by the Jews considered in opposition to those which afforded corn, wine, and oil.

(E) Many, says Reland (60), are of opinion, that the wilderness of Judab was on the other side of Jordan, and there placed the wilderness of St. John the Baptist. But, by the authority of the Jews themselves, he sufficiently evinces this to be a mistake.

(43) See MAUNDER. Journ. from Alep. to Jerus. (44) Ub. sup. (45) De Bell. Judaic. lib. ii. c. 2. (46) See WELL's Geog. voc. 2. sub fin. † Sub voc. Jazreel & Arbela, Vid. & Bell. Jud. lib. iv. c. 2. (47) RELAND. ub. sup. (48) Vide eund. ibid. (49) Vid. int. al. Isai. xxxiii. 9. xxxv. 2. Cantic. ii. 1. (50) Sub. voc. Sharon. (51) 1 Chron. v. 16. (52) Ibid. (53) Numb. xxxv. 3. Josh. xiv. 4. (54) Ub. sup. (55) Vide RELAND. ubi sup. (56) De Bell. Judaic. lib. v. c. 4. (57) Vide RELAND. ubi sup. (58) Ibid. c. 56. (59) In Cod. Bava Rama. (60) Ub. sup.

rias, to the Asphaltite-lake (F). To these we may add the forests or woods of <sup>a</sup> this land; as the forest of Hareth (G), whither David retired. The wood of Ephraim<sup>1</sup>, where Abalom perished on an oak; and the forest of Lebanon<sup>2</sup>, where Solomon built him a house. Others we pass over.

Seas.

HAVING thus taken a transient view of the mountains, plains, dales, and solitudes of the country before us, order requires us next to consider the waters which are properly said to have belonged to it; and first of the seas. Of these are commonly and more accurately reckoned but four, the Mediterranean, the Dead-sea, the sea of Tiberias, and the Samachonite-sea. The Mediterranean was by the Jews called the Great-sea, the sea of the Philistines, the Salt-sea (H).

THE Dead-sea (+), or the Asphaltite-lake (I), called also the Salt-sea (K). Much has been said and supposed of this famous, or as most will have it, infamous lake; as that nothing will sink in it, and that it rose up from the submerision of the vale of Siddim<sup>3</sup>, where once, as is most generally concluded, stood the five cities of Sodom, Gomorrhah, and the other three. On this account has it been abhorred and detested, and represented as a prodigious and everlasting monument of the just judgment of God, to deter mankind from the sins committed by those, who thus drew down on them the fierce wrath and vengeance of the Almighty. Now, tho' it were a seeming rashness to contradict what has been so very universally advanced, and received among Christians, with relation to the origin of this lake, it has all been very solidly contradicted, and, if it were lawful so to say, refuted even by the authority of scripture itself<sup>4</sup> (L). But travellers, misled by the common tra-

<sup>1</sup> 2 Sam. xvii. 6—9. <sup>2</sup> 1 Kings vii. 2. <sup>3</sup> See before, p. 323. <sup>4</sup> Vide RELAND. ub. sup. c. 38.

(F) Hence Reland (61) takes occasion to condemn the geographers who rashly, and presumptuously crowd both sides of the Jordan thick with cities and villages; but, at the same time, makes allowances for their zeal, and warmth of imagination, unguided by documents, or the least degree of certainty.

(G) This forest was evidently within the tribe of Judah, by the words of the prophet Gad, who said unto David, abide not in the bold, depart, and get thee into the land of Judah (63).

(H) Bockart (64) is angry with Mamonides for saying, the purple fish was found in the Salt-sea, imagining he thereby meant the Asphaltite lake; but that he meant the Mediterranean, and expressed himself not improperly, has been sufficiently shewn (65).

(I) It is so called for that it breeds no fish, nor sustains any thing that has life, because of its excessive saltiness (66). A late traveller (67), however, says, he has some reason to suspect this, observing, among the pebbles on the shore, two or three shells of fish resembling oyster-shells; and, "that they were thrown up, by the waves, at two hour distance from the mouth of Jordan," which he mentions, lest it should be suspected they might have been brought into the sea that way. As for the common tradition, that birds, attempting to fly over this sea, drop down dead into it, the same traveller (68) saw it actually confuted by several birds who flew over and about it, without the least visible harm.

(K) So called from the quantity of bitumen in and about it. It was anciently supposed, that great quantities of this combustible substance were thrown up by this sea (69). And travellers (70) represent it as in great plenty on the shores of it. Whatever there might have been formerly, it seems it is not now to be found every where upon the shore, tho' it is gathered in great quantities near the mountains on both sides. It exactly resembles pitch, and cannot readily be distinguished from it, but by the sulphureousness of its smell and taste (71). This bitumen seems not to have been sufficiently or at all distinguished from a sort of combustible stones found on the shore which are a black sort of pebbles, and, being held in the flame of a candle, soon burn, and yield a smoke of an intolerable stench (72); but have this extraordinary property, that by burning they lose only of their weight, and not at all of their bulk.

(L) It is to the highest degree impregnated with salt; inasmuch, that Galen (73) supposes it in specific gravity to be as much beyond other sea-water, as sea-water is beyond the water of rivers, and that it was impossible to immerge in it; and elsewhere adds, that, by the addition of salt, it would be possible to make any water as bouyant as this. The same physician elsewhere has it, that the saltiness of this sea is attended with a bitterness and unpleasantness. All this agrees well enough with what we are told of it at present, except that bodies will immerge in it, tho' not so easily as in other water (74).

(M) It is Reland (75) who professedly undertakes this task. To enter into a detail of his arguments would exceed our bounds, we shall therefore only touch on some principal heads. 1. He observes, that the five kings of Sodom, Gomorrhah, and the rest, are said to have met in the vale of Siddim, as if it was the place of their rendezvous and not of their immediate abode. 2. The sacred penman nowhere says, the five cities were in the vale of Siddim. 3. In the whole series of scripture there is no mention made of the submerision of the same five cities. 4. He proves, that this supposed submerision is contradictory to many passages he cites of holy writ. He contends, that some, if not all of the five cities, were not on the spot where now stands the Dead-sea. The scripture itself is what he chiefly builds on throughout this whole argument; tho' he finds no mean authorities elsewhere to support him in his opinion, which a dition, and blinded by an irregular zeal, have for the most part (M) represented it as a place dismal to behold, all sulphureous, bituminous, and combustible. Nor has it been less seriously averred, that the ruins of the five cities have been actually seen in the water even in these latter times (N). This sea, in its present state, is inclosed on the east and west with exceeding high mountains; on the north it has the plain of Jericho, or, if we take in both sides of the Jordan, the great plain properly so called; on the south it is open, and extends beyond the reach of the eye. In length it is said to be twenty four leagues, and in breadth six or seven. Its water is limpid and clear. On the west side of it is a promontory, where they pretend to shew remains of Lot's metamorphosed wife * (O).

(51) Ibid. (63) 1 Sam. xvii. 5. (64) In HIERONIMO, pt. 2. lib. 5. c. 9. (65) Vide RELAND. Pal. Illustr. lib. i. c. 37. (66) Vide HIERON. in Comment. ad Ezek. xlvii. (67) MAUND. Journ. from Alep. to Jerusalem, p. 84. (68) Ibid. (69) Vide RELAND. ub. sup. (70) BROCARD. Descrip. Terr. Sanct. c. 7. (71) RADZIV. Jerosolim. Pereg. p. 95. BROCARD. ub. sup. (72) Idem ibid. cude etiam RADZIV. ub. sup. (73) Apud RELAND. ub. sup. (74) MAUND. ub. sup. (75) Ub. sup.

b THE sea of Tiberias, called also the sea of Kinnereth, Kinneroth, Gbinnereth <sup>a</sup>, Sea of Tiberias, Cinneroth <sup>b</sup> (P), the water of Genesar <sup>c</sup>, lake of Genesaret, and Genesareth (Q), <sup>21</sup> was also called the sea of Galilee. According to Josephus * it was one hundred furlongs in length, and about forty in breadth. The same historian <sup>d</sup> commends it for the temper of its water, which exposed in the night to air, as the inhabitants near were wont to do in summer-time, became as cold almost as snow itself. It is every way by the same author set in opposition to the Dead-sea; especially as this afforded no sort of fish, and the other abounded with it. The one is represented as a water every way pleasant and agreeable, the other as every way forbidding and horrid.

c THE Samachonite-lake is next in order. Whence it derives its name is uncertain <sup>e</sup> Samachonite-lake (R). It is chiefly remarkable for the thickness of its waters *. Its length was sixty furlongs or about fifteen miles; its breadth thirty furlongs, or about seven miles and half <sup>f</sup>. It is supposed, that this may be the lake mentioned by Pliny † on account of its odoriferous reeds; but this is mere conjecture.

Not far from this is the lake of Phiala, the true source or fountain-head of the river Jordan, tho' whether it was so or no was long disputed <sup>g</sup> (S). This which we leave to be discussed by such as think it of importance sufficient to require it.

<sup>a</sup> MAUND. Journ. from Alep. to Jerus. p. 84, 85. <sup>b</sup> Numb. xxxiv. 11. <sup>c</sup> Josh. xii. 3. <sup>d</sup> 1 Macc. xi. 67. <sup>e</sup> De Bell. Judaic. l. iii. c. 18. <sup>f</sup> Ibid. <sup>g</sup> Ibid. <sup>h</sup> Idem ibid. l. iv. c. 1. <sup>i</sup> Lib. xii. c. 22. <sup>j</sup> RELAND. Palest. Illust. l. i. c. 41. p. 264.

(M) Geographers, says Maunderell (76) in their writings and maps, generally describe a smoke ascending from the surface of this lake, but for his part he could see nothing of the kind. It is also observed, as a most wonderful circumstance, that this lake, as Josephus (77) observes, should change colour three times a day, which prince Radziwille (78) confirms as an eye-witness: in the morning, says he, it was blackish, at noon bluish, in the evening yellowish, and as it were mixed with ooze (79). A variety which plainly proceeds from natural causes, and is easily accounted for by the nature of its situation, and the land about it, with the help of a little optic. The infernal apples also mentioned by Josephus (80), and Tacitus (81), to be on the borders of this lake, all fair and beautiful without, and all foot and ashes within, which have against all experience existed in the sickly imagination of the superstitious votaries, who have fondly resorted hither, are now concluded never to have been in nature (82); for nothing, not the least trace of that kind, is now to be found.

(N) Concerning this, we shall give you Maunderell's own words (83): "I diligently surveyed the waters, as far as my eye could reach; but neither could I discern any heaps of ruins, nor— But yet I must not omit what was confidently attested to me by the father Guardian, and procurator of Jerusalem, both men in years, and seemingly not destitute either of sense and probity, viz. that they had once actually seen one of those ruins; that it was so near the shore, and the waters so shallow, at that time, that they, together with some French men, went to

"it, and found there several pillars, and other fragments of buildings". Maunderell has, at least, as much weight with Reland (84) as any modern traveller whatsoever, and perhaps more, but yet is this last very loath to admit of such visible remains of the original five cities.

(O) It seems the natives here have different stories, at different times. They told prince Radziwille (85), there was no such thing as Lot's wife's pillar of salt to be found, and about a century afterwards they tell Maunderell (86), that there is a stump of it still left, and point out to him the very place where it is. In short, it is somewhat wonderful they cannot always find a lump of salt in such a place as this, to pass current for what has been so eagerly inquired for, and sought after.

(P) These names are thought to be derived from a musical instrument which is supposed to have been nearly of the form of this sea: but Reland (87) chuses rather to borrow them from the city of that name, in the tribe of Naphtali, on the borders of the lake.

(Q) These names are supposed to have been formed from the foregoing; but Reland (88) is rather inclined to have them from the country of Genesar, or the borders of this same lake; celebrated by Josephus (89) for fertility of soil, and felicity of climate.

(R) In the Greek of Josephus, it is written, Σαμαχωνίτις λίμνη, and Σαμαχωνίσις, which some derive from Samach, a fish, or from the Samachon (90).

(S) This doubt was settled by Philip the Tetrarch, who casting straws or chaff into the former, they were found to come out of the latter at Panion.

(76) Ubi sup. (77) De Bell. Judaic. l. v. c. 5. (78) Ubi supra. (79) Ibid. (80) Ubi supra. (81) Hist. l. v. (82) Vide MAUND. ubi supra; vide etiam RADZ. ubi sup. (83) Ubi sup. (84) Ubi sup. (85) Ubi sup. (86) Ubi sup. (87) Ubi sup. c. 39. (88) Ibid. (89) De Bell. Judaic. l. iii. c. 8. (90) Vide RELAND. Palest. Illust. l. i. c. 40. p. 262.

name, which signifies a vial, was common to other waters of the same kind. <sup>a</sup> It is situated in the midst of a most delightful country, which is also so very commodious for traffick, that marts or fairs are held all the summer long, by the neighbouring people <sup>b</sup>.

The Jordan.

To pass over other lakes and waters of inferior note and degree, we will proceed to the river Jordan, which, rising from the lake of Pbiala, enters the Samachonite-lake, whence gliding along it divides the sea of Tiberias, and thence discharges itself into the Dead-sea. The origin of its name, or names, is somewhat obscure (T), and scarce worth dwelling upon; this being by far the principal stream of these parts, it is by way of eminence called the River<sup>c</sup>: the rest of this country being mere brooks in comparison of it. Josephus<sup>d</sup> makes mention of a lesser Jordan, whose fountain-head he places about Panion, while he derives the other, or greater Jordan, from mount Libanus<sup>e</sup>; but he is not to be understood here as meaning two distinct rivers; but as dividing the same river into two parts, which are greater or less, as nearer to or farther from the original spring (U). To have a just idea of the course of this river, we must remember<sup>f</sup>, that, taking its rise from Pbiala, it runs under ground for the space of one hundred and twenty furlongs, or fifteen miles, and, breaking forth at Paneum, goes through the Samachonite-lake; whence proceeding again to the distance above-mentioned of fifteen miles, it streams through the sea of Tiberias, and thence holds its course through a vast and horrid desert, till it loses <sup>c</sup> itself in the Asphaltite-lake. Here it is noted<sup>g</sup>, that Josephus speaks but of one original spring belonging to this river, a demonstrative proof that this lesser Jordan is no river distinct from his greater, and that no more than different parts of the same main stream are to be understood thereby. It is remarkable of the Jordan, that, in the time of harvest, it is most full, and apt to overtop its banks<sup>h</sup>; contrary to the general nature of rivers, which are most full in time of winter: whence it may possibly have been that some have imagined that there was some kind of subterraneous communication between this river and the Nile of Egypt (X). But, to wave so unlikely a matter, the banks of this stream are a harbour for lions, and other wild beasts who take shelter amidst the reeds and canes<sup>i</sup>, <sup>d</sup> which here so remarkably abound; and not only abound, but also grow so thick and tall, as to obstruct the sight of the river (Y); together with the willows,

<sup>a</sup> SANCH. Secret. Fid. Crucis, apud RELAND. ub. sup. <sup>i</sup> JOSEPH. Antiq. l. v. c. 1. <sup>b</sup> Ibid. c. 2. and l. viii. c. 3. <sup>c</sup> Antiq. l. v. c. 1. <sup>d</sup> Ibid. l. iii. c. 18. <sup>e</sup> Vide RELAND. ubi sup. <sup>f</sup> Vide RELAND. ub. sup. and before p. 553. d. <sup>g</sup> MAUNDRELL's Journ. from Alep. to Jerus.

(T) It has been a commonly received opinion, that this river is called יַרְדֵּן, Jarden, as if it derived from יָרַן, Jor and דָּן, Dan, or the River of Dan, because it took its rise near the city of Dan, or because it had its rise from two springs, the one Jeor, the other Dan. That the first of these derivations is unlikely we shall now attempt to shew, and that the second is false has been partly demonstrated in the note above. To suppose it to have received any part of its denomination from the city of Dan is very unlikely, seeing it was called Jorden long before the city of Dan was built. But you may say, it may have been so called by way of prolepsis. But why Den should be changed into Dan may be difficult to account for; so that, after all, it is most natural to borrow this name from יָרַן, descendit, labitur. The Arabs call it Arden, and Ordonnon; the Persians, Herdum; and the Nubian geographer (or the Sharif Edrisi) Zacchar, which in Arabic signifies tumid, full, or overflowing its banks, and therefore a name properly enough applied to the Jordan (91).

(U) Examples of this kind might be quoted in great number to confirm this (92), as in the Vetus Vechta, and Vetus Renns, and the Α-ναγινωσκων, and καινως, mentioned by Vibius Sequester; by which it was never understood, that these rivers, so distinguished into old and new, were to be deduced from different springs, but to be upper and lower parts of the same.

(X) The more to confirm this, it has been reported, that the Coracinus, a fish reputed to be peculiar to the Nile, has been taken in the Jordan. But this concludes nothing positively; for the Coracinus, as much as it is a native of the Nile, is to be found elsewhere (93).

(Y) Prince Radziwille (94) writes, that on this side of the river, in the place where Chriit was baptized, there is a shady thicket, about half a mile (a German one we suppose) in length, and a bow-shot in breadth; and that here were trees which bore the likeness of willows, but, upon a nice examination, proved not exactly so in fact. He adds, that he could perceive nothing of the locusts and wild honey, which afforded sustenance to St. John, whom, with others, he supposes to have sojourned in this wilderness. Maundrell (95) also observes, that this part is so beset with bushes and trees, such as tamarisks, willows, and others, that you can see no water till you have made your way through. — He adds, that on the other side there seemed to be a much larger thicket, than on the side they were. To this effect do the travellers this way in general deliver themselves.

(91) Vide eund. ibid. c. 43. p. 271, 272.
(94) In Peregrin. Jerosolym. p. 98.

(92) Apud eund. ibid. (93) Vide Athenæum.
(95) Journ. from Alep. to Jerus. p. 81.

tamarisks,

a tamarisks, and other native vegetables of these banks (Z). The stream of this river is so strong and rapid, that a man cannot stem it in swimming; but the dimensions of it are by no means large, the breadth of it, where it should be seemingly greatest, not exceeding sixty foot (A). It was formerly fordable in some places, and may be so still, tho' we know of none that particularly takes notice of it. It seems also to have been formerly crossed in boats or ferries.

To describe, or even to enumerate the other rivers, either on this or that side of the Jordan, were too minute, and indeed needless, and contrary to our custom hitherto; for which reason we shall only add, that the Arnon seems to deserve the place next to Jordan; and proceed to observe, that the productions of this land b were many, excellent, and in great plenty. This country was anciently much renowned for its fertility, and well corresponded with the figurative description of it, that it flowed with milk and honey; nor at this day are there wanting signs and sufficient indications thereof, tho' now it is as it were decayed and neglected. But the present barren state of this country having prevailed on some to imagine, it never was what the scripture represents it to have been, we shall, with the same design, and in the same order, observed by a learned man, who has made this favourite region his study more than ever any body did before, and to sounder purposes, proceed to display what it affords for the use of its inhabitants.

c AND here it may be necessary to observe, that, as fine a country as Egypt Fertility. is on all hands allowed to be, it submitted, and still submits, to this, in some very noble productions, and particularly wine and oil, two of the most useful liquids to man, next to water; to go about to prove which, were to suppose the reader ignorant of what he cannot possibly but know, and be convinced and assured of (B); as for water it is plain, there could have been no excessive want of that, for how should the men and cattle have subsisted at all without it? That they had sufficient for their use, at least, must be readily granted, and has been so fully proved to our hands, that it were needless for us to add any thing to it. Then for meats, and wherewithal to relish them, and serve them d up; the Asphaltite-lake produced a salt, which, in the judgment of Galen, was for digestion and extenuation preferable to all other salts whatsoever. As for wheat and barley, and other kinds of corn and grain, they had them in such abundance, that it is in scripture (C) particularly denominated the land of wheat, &c.

<sup>a</sup> GULIEL. TYRIUS. Hist. xxii. 20. apud RELAND. ubi sup. LAND. <sup>b</sup> Vide eund. l. i. c. 46.

<sup>c</sup> Vide RELAND. ibid. <sup>d</sup> RELAND.

(Z) Maunderell distinguishes the banks of this river as twofold: these are his own words (96): "On the farther side of the forementioned convent [dedicated to St. John] there runs along a small descent, which you may fitly call the first and outermost bank of Jordan; as far as which it may be supposed the river does, or at least did anciently flow, at some seasons of the year, viz. at the time of harvest, Job. iii. 15. or as it is expressed, 1 Chron. xii. 15. in the first month, that is, in March. But at present, [whether it be because the river has, by its rapidity of current, worn its channel deeper than it was formerly, or whether because its waters are diverted some other way] it seems to have forgot its ancient greatness: for we could discern no sign or probability of such overflowsings, when we were there; which was the thirtieth of March, being the proper time for these inundations. Nay, so far was the river from overflowing, that it ran at least two two yards below the brink of its channel." The Jordan seems then to be very different from the river it was formerly.

(A) This is Maunderell's measurement (97), in which the most sincere travellers are pretty nicely of a mind with him. As for depth, the same pilgrim says, it was deeper than his height. The water is turbid, the natural consequence of its rapidity; to which Radersville (98) adds, it is very wholesome, and incorruptible in its nature, as he sufficiently found by the experiment of some of it he brought away with him.

(B) This land was among other things preferred to Egypt, in that it enjoyed the benefit of rain (99); and that it exceeded this last for wine and oil is no less certain; for tho' it cannot be denied, but Egypt had her olives (100), they were certainly inferior to those of Palestine. Hence the adage among the Talmudists (1), What did the ten tribes? They sent oil into Egypt. Solomon, we know, sent yearly to the king of Tyre twenty cors or measures of pure oil (2). Then for vines, the Egyptians had none at all. Herodotus says (3), they drank a liquor made of barley, to supply their want of wine (4). Accordingly Judea is by Rabshakeh called, a land of vineyards, a land of oil olives (5). In a word, says Reland, who knows not, that the wine of Ascalon, the wine of Gaza, and Sarepta, were famed among the most remote nations?

(C) It is there called, a land of wheat and barley (6).

(96) Ibid. (97) Ibid. (98) Ubi sup. (99) Vide Proc. GAZ. ad Deuteronom. (100) Vide THEOP. de Conf. Plant. lib. vi. c. 12. (1) In Icha Rabbah. fol. 85. 3. (2) 1 Kings vi. 11. (3) Lib. ii. c. 77. (4) See before p. 5. (5) 2 Kings xviii. 32. (6) Deut. xiii. 8.

(D). That

(D). That oxen, sheep, goats, and the like, together with fowl, were in no degree wanting, appears by the frequent sacrifices, and by the pasture grounds occupied by the two tribes and half on the other side of Jordan, not to mention the pastures of Sarona, and the plains about Lydda, Jamnia, and elsewhere. For fish, the Jordan and sea of Tiberias yielded a sufficient supply, as may be gathered from the New Testament, nor are we told, that they are at this day deficient therein. Besides the sea not only afforded quantities sufficient for the people on the coast, but helped to subsist even the citizens of Jerusalem, from whence they had according to St. Jerom* a gate called the fish-gate in their metropolis, to say nothing of the fish that was certainly taken in the other streams and waters of this land. Plenty of honey, besides what was collected by the bee, was there to be had in the woods, and flowing from trees (E). Of trees, the palm, of this country, and of shrubs, the balsam, are eminent above all others. The fruit of the palm of this country was thought the only one of the sort capable of being kept for a future store (F). The balsam of Jericho (G) is famous beyond any thing of its kind, and applauded as the peculiar product of this happy country (H); and a most precious drug it was among the Greeks and Romans, as every ordinary scholar cannot but know. Wool must have been a natural commodity in a country which fed such flocks of sheep, and cotton is the common product of these parts, and of this country particularly about Lydda, and the plain of Esdraelon. To go about to prove all this by authorities, ancient and modern, were endless, and mere affectation. Let it suffice, that we observe of this small region, that to have sustained such numbers of inhabitants, who, in a manner, lived upon their own growth, without any considerable assistance, by foreign commerce, it must have been by far a more noble and fertile place, than it is by some, at present, absurdly enough represented.

Extent.

THIS once happy land being situate between the fourth and fifth north climate †, its soil could hardly be other than fertile, tho' greatly diversified, as the country happened to be mountainous or plain, close or * Apud RELAND. Pal. Illust. lib. i. c. 57. p. 382. † See pag. 569. a.

(D) And well it seems to have deserved it, seeing Solomon could annually afford to send the king of Tyre a present of twenty thousand cors or measures of wheat (7).

(E) This seems to be an extraordinary production; but is nevertheless supposed to have been the μέλι άγριον, or wild honey St. John found in the wilderness (8). Our author cannot agree with Bochart, that this wild honey was gathered by the industrious bee; but recurs to Diodorus Siculus, who speaking of the Nabataeans, who inhabited these parts, tells us what this wild honey, or μέλι άγριον, may have been, where he says that, in their trees they have a honey they call wild, which they drink mixed with water; as also to Pliny, who, speaking of what he calls the Elacomeli or oil-honey, says, that it flows from the olive; and that, in the maritime parts of Syria, it comes spontaneously, flowing from the trees, of a fat substance, thicker than honey, finer than rosin, and sweet of taste: and hence infers why Maunderell (9) was so sensible of a strong smell of honey in the maritime parts of Palestine. We have had occasion formerly to speak of a honey made dates †, probably the same sort which Jacob sent to Joseph into Egypt. But whatever this wild honey was, we may guess at its abundance by that which Jonathan found flowing from the trees and received such refreshment from*.

(F) This is the opinion of Theophrastus (10); and doubtless he had good ground for what he says. In three sandy places only, says he, is the fruit of the palm fit to be laid up for store. These places are Jericho, Pbasaelis, or Archelais and Livias.

(G) Theophrastus (11) leaves us in some doubt, as to the spot which produced this precious balm, saying, in general, that it grew in the valley of Syria; which is thus particularized by Justin (12): "There is a valley surrounded by mountains, as it were with a wall--and the extent of the place may be about two hundred acres. Its name is Hiericho [Jericho]. In this valley there is a wood most famous for the fertility and amenity of its trees, but, above all, for the balm and opobalsam." The same is attested by Strabo, Josephus, and others.

(H) So writes Josephus, Pliny, and Dioscorides. But [says Reland] (13), Prosper Alpinus and Peter Bellonius, will have it, that these are mistaken, because it now grows in Judea nowhere but in gardens; and requires there to be tended very carefully; whereas balsam of every sort comes from Arabia, as from its native soil, and is thence conveyed into other regions. But I, for my part, [continues he] am of opinion, that Josephus and Dioscorides wrote nothing but the truth; for there is no reason why plants, which seventeen hundred years ago flourished in one country, may not, in length of time, be produced in countries far distant therefrom. But supposing even the nature of the soil to have changed? it would be no such great wonder. We shall have occasion to say something more of this valuable plant in the sequel.

(7) 1 Kings ubi sup.

(8) Vide RELAND. Pal. Illust. lib. i. c. 57. p. 382.

(9) Journ. from A-

lep. to Jerus. p. 66.

† See before p. 455. in fin. (Y)

* 1 Sam. xiv. 26. & seq.

(10) De Hist.

Plant. lib. xi. c. 8.

(11) Ubi sup. lib. ix. c. 6.

(12) Lib. xxxvii.

(13) Ubi sup.

- a open, bordering on salt waters or fresh, with several circumstances of situation, must naturally have propagated an almost endless variety of things pleasant and useful, necessary for life, and incentive to luxury. In short, such a country it must have been, as Dionysius of Halicarnassus (I) would have preferred in his choice. But to recur to authorities for all this, even from the most approved writers of antiquity, Greek and Roman, would be, as we apprehend, to no purpose, and draw us into a length we would avoid as much as possible; we shall therefore content ourselves with this general summary, which will raise a sufficient idea of this chosen seat, that, when carefully husbanded, it was inferior to no place else in the world. We would only add, that the soil is so very
- b light, that it is ploughed with the least labour, tho' returning an exuberant increase (K), and that the nature of it is such, that to plough it deep were to destroy almost the hopes of any tolerable crop (L).

How it has happened, that this country has changed face from such beauty to such deformity, may be with no great difficulty understood; for overwhelmed by calamities of the most bitter and destructive sort, and its natives driven out to wander the wide world over, and the very soil itself groaning under the heavy pressure of divine vengeance, it became quite another place. And more particularly after the merciless and mutual devastations during the holy war between the Christians and Mohammedans. This great and blindly zealous

c strife has ever since subjected this now unhappy spot to perpetual ravages and insecurity, from the Arabs and other wandering tribes; so that, upon the surface of the whole earth, there is not a place more dangerous or comfortless to travel in, than is now this promised land, as by every traveller we are told. How then can we, with any justice, compare the present with the ancient aspect of this country? So that it is vain to object the sterility and naked rocks now beheld, and the rather as nothing we are told is plainer, than that these stony heights were once covered with soil (M). But what must this country have been, to have withstood the unparalleled and continued rage of the enemy it has so cruelly suffered? or what cannot an enemy do to destroy and utterly * See MAUND. pag. 64.

(I) He says (14) he should not so much value a country for one production only, nor would chuse to dwell where, at the same time the fields should be fruitful, there should be a total want of all the other necessities of life, or at least a scarcity of them; but that he would chuse a country which should be as much as possible sufficient of itself, or stand the least in need of foreign assistance. This he thinks to have been the happy lot of Italy.

(K) Brocard (15) says he has often with his own eyes seen two oxen only at the plough; and that the land stands in need of manure of no sort, being naturally very fat and rich.

(L) The soil being shallow, if the plough went deep, the clods would dry up by the heat that would be reverberated from the stony bottom. In Syria therefore they make use of small ploughs, says Theophrastus (16).

(M) Maundrell's words upon this occasion being very remarkable, and particular, we cannot help transcribing what he says (17). — "All along this day's travel — the country discovered a quite different face from what it had before, presenting nothing to the view, in most places, but naked rocks, mountains, and precipices. At sight of which pilgrims are apt to be much astonished, baulked in their expectations; finding that country in such an inhospitable condition, concerning whose pleasantness and plenty they had before formed in their minds such high ideas, from the description given of it in the word of God: inasmuch that it almost startles their faith, when they reflect how it could be possible for a land like this to supply food for so prodigious a number of inhabitants, as are said to have been polled in the twelve tribes at one time; the sum

" given in by Isaiah (18) amounting to no less than thirteen hundred thousand fighting men, besides women and children. But it is certain, that any man, who is not a little byassed to infidelity before, may see, as he passes along, arguments enough to support his faith against such scruples. — For it is obvious, for any one to observe, that these rocks and hills must have been anciently covered with earth, and cultivated, and made to contribute to the maintenance of the inhabitants, no less than if the country had been all plain: nay, perhaps, much more; forasmuch as such a mountainous and uneven surface affords a larger space of ground for cultivation, than this country would amount to, if it were all reduced to a perfect level — For the husbanning of these mountains, their manner was, to gather up the stones, and place them in several lines along the sides of the hills, in form of a wall. By such borders they supported the mould from tumbling, or being washed down; and formed many beds of excellent soil, rising gradually one above another, from the bottom to the top of the mountains — Of this form of culture you see evident footsteps, wherever you go in all the mountains of Palestine. Thus the very rocks were made fruitful: and perhaps there is no spot of ground in this whole land, that was not improved, to the production of something or other ministering to the assistance of human life; for, than the plain country, nothing can be more fruitful, whether for the production of corn or cattle, and consequently of milk." — He then proceeds to shew how this whole country, so wild at present, may have been, as it doubtless was, a paradise both for pleasure and production.

(14) In Antiq. Rom. lib. i. p. 28. (15) In Descript. Terr. Sanct. c. 11. (16) Ubi sup. lib. iii. c. 25. (17) Journey from Alep. to Jerusalem. (18) 1 Sam. xxiv.

lay waste a country? Josephus* to our purpose writes, "The marching of "his army [Simon's] was the same thing to the people, that a flight of locusts
 "are to a wood: not a leaf, not a spire of grass was there left; not any "thing more than a desert, that they left behind them — Then the malicious
 "rage of Simon, and his keen animosity against the Idumeans was still a farther
 "aggravation — In fine, what with burning, demolishing, devouring the fruits "of the earth, or trampling them under foot, Simon's troops did not leave so "much, even in a fruitful well cultivated country, as the least sign or memo"rial of what it had formerly been." This, and much more, is to be found in this and other authors; and, if after this any one should think fit to object to us, what is said by Strabo, relating to Jerusalem (N), as if it included the whole country; we shall answer, that they deal expressly against the plain sense of Strabo, who confines himself to a space only of sixty furlongs, which the more rocky and inaccessible it had been, so much the more apt and conven-nient to be the seat of the metropolis, and great arsenal of the nation, as experience evinced.

The Cities.

The cities of this land we shall forbear to describe, tho' few cities have been of greater splendor, or on all accounts more worthy of notice: but as,
 in our larger geographical sections, we have avoided the task, as too tedious, and exceeding the bounds we prescribe to ourselves, as well as to avoid repetition, and anticipating what may be more properly mentioned in the body of our history † we shall do by these now as we formerly † did by those of Egypt, refer them till they come to be occasionally mentioned, or described, and proceed to what is more immediately to our present purpose.

Natural rarities.

Meaning the more remarkable things and rarities of this country, which as nicely as we can distinguish, and separate them, we will divide into the natural and artificial; though we might also, with great reason, divide them in general into the false, doubtful, and certain; but we shall leave that to the reader's own discretion or discernment. Upon mount Carmel they find melons, olives, and such like fruits in stone, most exactly imitating those vegetable productions, both within and without, and the melons even when opened emitting an agreeable smell; our author † adds, that here also are found a kind of oysters of the same nature, and even, as reported, bunches of grapes of the same stony consistence; but whether owing to petrification, or the wanton imitation of nature, is left undecided — Near Rachel's tomb, not far from Bethlehem, is a small spot of ground, whereon are picked up a little sort of small round stones, exactly resembling peas; owing, as they pretend, to a miracle wrought by the blessed virgin, who, to punish a surly rustick who refused her a handful of that pulse, converted them into stones*. The sand of the river Belus, as supposed, not far from Acra or Ptolemais, is famous for being an excellent material for the making of glass, and not only so, but for having ministered the first occasion and hint of that fine invention †. (O) — In the way from Jerusalem to the Jordan, descending a steep hill they shew what they call the fountain of the apostles;
 so called from a tradition current, that here the apostles were wont to refresh themselves in their frequent journeyings between Jerusalem and Jericho † — Soon after, on the same road, they shew the mountainous desert where our saviour was led by the spirit to be tempted of the devil; a most miserable and barren place, so seemingly torn and disordered, that the beholder is ready to * De Bell. Jud. lib. v. c. 7. † See e. g. the city of Jerusalem describ'd in the appendix to this volume. † See before p. 176. d. * LE BRUN, Voyage au Levant, &c. vol. iv. pag. 308, in 4to.

 † MAUNDER. Journ. from Alep. to Jerus. pag. 87. SANDYS, &c. † MAUNDER. ubi sup. pag. 56.
 † Idem ibid. pag. 79.

(N) He mistakenly says (19), that Moses led them to the place where Jerusalem stood, which he easily obtained, as it was a place not worth the contending for; for that it was rocky, though it abounded with water; and the country about, for the space of sixty stades or furlongs, dry, barren, and rocky. But what is this to the purpose? this was but a small part of the country, and concludes nothing in prejudice to the rest; for what country is there that wants its deserts, wilds, and rocks?

(O) The Sidanians are reported to have taken the first hint of this noble invention from the following accident: A band of travellers having, as was then usual, reared an itinerary hearth with some large pieces of nitre upon this sand, and set some fern on fire under a kettle to boil their victuals, perceived the sand and nitre to melt and incorporate with the fern ashes, and presently after to run into a liquid and transparent stream which hardened as it cooled, (20) and has been since improved to the degree of use and beauty in which we now see it †.

(19) Lib. xvi. (20) *JOSEPH. de Bell. Jud. l. 1. Pliny, Hist. Nat. l. 5 & 36. † Vid. Sz-
 EEC. Epist. 90. Hist. of human industry, Ch. 9.*

believe,

- a believe, the earth had suffered some extraordinary convulsion, in which its very bowels have been turned outwards <sup>4</sup>. ——— Next to this, which is seemingly a part of it, is a mountain called Quadrantana, or Quarantania, of steep and most dangerous ascent, where, as they say, the devil took our blessed saviour to tempt him with the delusive sight of the earth and its glories <sup>5</sup>. And here they shew also a number of stones, which they will have to have been the very same the devil would have had converted into loaves <sup>6</sup> (P). On the top of this same mount is a small chapel, and on the prominence of it another, about which are many caves and holes where, as hideous as the place was, hermits and anchorites took up their solitary abode <sup>7</sup>. ——— At the distance of some
- b leagues from the Dead-sea there are such saline efflorescences, as are observed in the valley of Salt, near Aleppo <sup>8</sup>, after the winter's inundation; a demonstrative sign that the whole plain about must be, in an extraordinary manner, impregnated with that mineral <sup>9</sup>. ——— At about an hour's distance from the Dead-sea, the ground is uneven, and varied into hillocks, and much resembling the places in England where there have been anciently lime-kilns; which are suggested to have been the pits where the kings of Sodom and Gomorrab were overthrown by the four kings <sup>10</sup>. ——— In the plain of Jericho is a very remarkable fruit, called by the Arabs Za-cho-ne, it grows on a thorny bush, with small leaves; and both in shape and colour resembles a small unripe walnut. The
- c kernels of this fruit the Arabs bray in a mortar; and, putting the pulp into scalding water, skim off an oil, which rises to the top; which oil taken inwardly for bruises, or applied outwardly for green wounds, is preferred to balm of Gilead <sup>11</sup>. ——— In the same plain also are found what they call roses of Jericho, of a very miraculous nature. They are said to give ease to women at the time of delivery <sup>12</sup>; and to blow only on Christmas-eve, according to some <sup>13</sup>, or on all the festival days of our lady, according to others <sup>14</sup> (Q); notions now on all hands exploded (R). To these we may add the wood olive of the same place. The outward coat of it is green, and like that of the common olive we eat; but, being taken off, you find a nut of woody consistence. This has ribs

<sup>4</sup> MAUNDREL ibid. pag. 79. <sup>5</sup> Idem ibid. p. 80. <sup>6</sup> RADZIV. Peregrin. Jerosolym. pag. 99. <sup>7</sup> Vide eodem in loc. sup. cit. <sup>8</sup> See before, p. 310 b. <sup>9</sup> MAUNDR. ubi. sup. pag. 81. <sup>10</sup> Idem ibid. pag. 83. <sup>11</sup> Idem ibid. pag. 87. <sup>12</sup> RADZIV. ubi. sup. p. 98. <sup>13</sup> THEVEN. Voy. au Levant, p. 4. l. lib. i. c. 41. LE BRUYN, Voy. au Levant, vol. 4. pag. 277. in 4to. <sup>14</sup> THEVEN. ubi. sup.

It is by this excellent invention (in which the artist doth as it were imitate the great Creator in forming by his breath an infinite variety of creatures for use and pleasure, of which our drinking and looking glasses make up but the most inconsiderable part) that we are able to confine the most volatile spirits, the greatest corrosives, the finest perfumes, and even irrefragible mercury.

It is by this metal that we are enabled to supply the loss of the crystalline moisture, and as it were renew our sight in proportion to its decay either by age or study. It helps us to bring distant objects some hundreds of times nearer, and to appear some hundreds of times larger than they do to the naked eye: And to discover new worlds and new stars in the infinite space round us.

What useful discoveries have been made by microscopes not only in the animal and vegetable, but in the other, especially the till then invisible part of the creation, were endless as well as needless to enumerate.

In a word, by our barometers and thermometers we can sit at home and observe, and even foresee the changes that happen in the atmosphere. By the air-pump an infinite number of discoveries have been made on the nature and qualities of the air, and by our burning-glasses we can Prometheus like, fetch fire from heaven, melt, burn, calcine, or vitrify the hardest bodies; all which and an endless train of other useful inventions do owe their rise to this accidental discovery, and will we hope atone for our dwelling so long upon it.

(P) The same author observes, in the same place, that those, who would have this desert to have been what we commonly call a wilderness or wood, are most egregiously mistaken; for that nothing like a tree is here to be seen, but rocks only, and most rugged cliffs.

(Q) The property of these roses, as they are called, seems to bear some affinity with Sir John Maundeville's (21) fabulous origin of roses in general, which is in substance as follows: That a young maiden, having been unjustly condemned to be burnt for incontinence in a field near Bethlehem called Floridus, prayed to God that he would give the spectators some miraculous tokens of her innocence. Accordingly, the wood about her was no sooner kindled but it was miraculously quenched. With this surprising addition, that the sticks that had been burnt were turn'd into red; and the rest into white rose-trees. Which according to this tradition were the first white and red roses, that ever man saw.

These legends, absurd as they are, serve, however, to shew the superstitious credulity of those times, and the advantages which the mercenary priests made of it; for if so sincere, so worthy, and so sensible a man as Sir John most plainly appears to have been, by that part of his travels which is properly his own, and which is not commonly half so much valued as it ought to be, could be so monstrously gulled of his senses, in this and other respects, what must we conceive, think ye, of the common rate of his contemporaries?

(R) It seems they will not blow, except they are put into water; but, in that case, they will blow in any length-ways, and is of the thickness of an almond-shell, and the kernel within a is like a pistachio, within side of a chestnut brown, and insipid to all likelihood<sup>2</sup>. — Between Jerusalem and Betlechem was the valley of Rephaim, so famous for the overthrow of the Philistines by David<sup>3</sup>. — Between the same places is shewn the turpentine-tree, in the shade of which the blessed virgin is said to have reposed (S), when she was carrying Christ in her arms, to present him to the Lord at Jerusalem<sup>4</sup>. — Between Betlechem and the convent of St. John the Baptist is that famous valley, where the angel made such prodigious havock of the great Sennacherib's mighty army in the space of one night<sup>5</sup>. — Either in or close upon the skirts of this same valley is a village, called Bootesbellab, which is reported to have this strange property, that no Turk or Mohammedan b can live in it above two years<sup>6</sup> (T). — In less than an hour from this same place is the fountain where they falsely (V) say, Philip baptized the Ethiopian eunuch. — Somewhat beyond this is the wilderness of St. John; a wilderness it is called, because very rocky and mountainous, tho' when well cultivated, it will produce plenty of corn, wine, and oil<sup>7</sup> (X). — An hour within this wilderness is the cave and fountain, where, as they say, St. John exercised those severe austerities related of him by the evangelist Matthew<sup>8</sup>. — Not far from this same cave are some old locust-trees, which our author<sup>9</sup> calls the any season, and at any hour (22.) Besides they are not peculiar to the plain of Jericho; they are to be found elsewhere, and particularly in the deserts about mount Sinai (23); and yet people are still so fond of this idle notion, that they are resolved never to part with it; some of these we know, but their names must be a secret in this case, tho' well known in others.

<sup>2</sup> LE BRUYN, ubi sup. pag. 278. <sup>3</sup> MAUNDR. ubi sup. pag. 87. <sup>4</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>5</sup> Idem ibid. pag. 91. <sup>6</sup> MAUNDR. ubi sup. pag. 92. <sup>7</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>8</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>9</sup> Idem ibid.

(S) The tradition of the country goes, that this tree bent itself, to afford the virgin a more perfect shade than it could otherwise have done (24).

(T) Where strength can be of no avail, art, they say, may be used. In this instance, the Christians have, it seems, out-witted the Turks, who, weak enough to believe, there may be truth in the story, leave the village to them, without molestation (25). Sandys (26) takes this same place to be called Rezec, and adds, that the Christians have the good luck to keep it to themselves; the place having, as the report went, actually proved mortal to such Mohammedans as had attempted to make it the place of their abode: So that, if actual experience has given birth to this notion, it may be doubted, whether the Turks took the fright of themselves, or whether it was artfully injected by the Christians. Thevenot (27) calls it, Boticella, and tells us, a report goes, that no Turk can live there above eight days. Prince Radziwille calls this village, Bethagil: but that it is the same place meant by the three former travellers is evident, by the situation he gives it, agreeing therein with them, tho' at the same time he magnifies the miracle still more than Thevenot (28). He says, no one circumcised can survive the third day here; but that on the third night they would surely die; which, he says, was most solemnly affirmed to him, even by two Arabians, who had almost experienced the truth of it to their cost. The same Arabs told him, that the first night they were taken with a violent pain in the head; that, on the second, their whole body so swelled up, that, for fear of immediate death, they were obliged to be removed; and that the one of them was four, the other six, months ere they were restored to their former health. In fine, that, when he arrived near the place, no Mohammedan that was with him would venture in, but, to avoid the danger, chose rather to go round about. As it were to confirm this marvellous relation, he instances another place indued with the same destructive property to all the circumcised, which is a nunnery about three miles from Damascus, where none under the circumstances of circumcision can outlive the third day. This, he says, is ordered, as many affirm, by the special grace and favour of God, in order to protect the chastity of the virgins from the unparing lust of the Pagans or Infidels. Stories most religiously cultivated, and, by the weak, as greedily swallowed.

(V) False it seemed to our traveller, and a thing impossible. His objection is the inaccessibility of the place, for an horseman, and much more for a chariot, such as the eunuch rode in. However he grants, that the road to it may have been smoother formerly than now, and thinks there are some indications which seemingly declare it to have been so (29). Prince Radziwille, (30) not so free with his objections to the most palpable fallhoods imposed on him in these parts, his superstition devouring his great good sense, takes occasion from the nature of this fountain to combat the doctrine of the Anabaptists. They, says he, cite this baptism of the eunuch as an example to justify their practice; but continues, that had they seen the place they would be of another mind; that the spring is so inconsiderable, as scarce to afford water enough to wet both feet together; and thence concludes, that Philip only took up the water, and poured it on the eunuch's head, and in that manner baptized him. Le Bruyn (31) seems to destroy this piece of criticism, by saying, that the water of this same spring falls into a basin made of very large stones; by which description we might imagine it to be a very handsome and convenient dipping-place. It is strange, that, when travellers take upon them to describe a place, they cannot do it to purpose.

(X) We know of no traveller but our author, that takes notice of this; the rest speak of it as of a compleat desert or wilderness. Radziwille (32) takes notice of nothing here in the vegetable way, except a few small tufts of poor bushes.

(Y) These

(22) THEVEN. Voy. au Lev. part 1. lib. ii. c. 41. LE BRUYN, Voy. au Lev. vol. 4. pag. 278. in 4to. (23) THEVEN. ubi sup. (24) LE BRUYN ubi sup. pag. 234. (25) MAUNDR. Journ. from Alep. to Jerus. pag. 91. (26) In his Travels, pag. 142. (27) Voy. au Lev. part 1. lib. ii. c. 47. (28) In Peregrin. Jerusalem. pag. 88. (29) MAUNDR. Journ. from Alep. to Jerus. pag. 92. (30) Ubi sup. (31) Voy. au Lev. vol. iv. pag. 207. in 4to. (32) Peregr. Jerusol. pag. 89.

- a monuments of the ignorance of the middle times (Y). ——— A little from hence is the valley of Elab, where David slew the giant; as also Modon, on a high hill, the burying-place of the Maccabees *. ——— Between the convent of St. John and Jerusalem in the convent of the holy cross; as by the Greeks it is called, they shew you the earth which nourished the root that bare the tree, which yielded the timber that made the cross. The hole in the earth where stood this tree is shewn, under the high altar; and marvelously revered by the pilgrims, who are such very stocks as to fall down and worship it *. ——— About a furlong from the church of the holy sepulchre, they shew the place where stood the house of Zebedee. The Greeks, who have possession here, pretend, that Zebedee, being b a fisherman, was wont to bring fish from Joppa hither, and vend it at this place. ——— A little farther on is the place where anciently, as they say, stood the iron gate which opened to Peter of its own accord *. ——— In Jerusalem also they point out the very place where, as they say, our Lord appeared to the three Maries; as the friars there will have it, tho' the evangelist Matthew records but one *. ——— In the Armenian church, in this same city, built upon that part of mount Sion within the walls, they shew the place where St. James, the brother of St. John, was beheaded; and in a small chapel, on the north side of it, the very spot of his decollation *. ——— In the same church they shew three large rough stones, held in great veneration, for that c one of them was the very stone on which Moses cast the two tables, when violently moved with indignation at the idolatry of the Israelites; and the other two, for that they were brought, the one from the place of Christ's baptism, the other from the place of his transfiguration *. ——— A little farther, they shew the place where stood the house of Annas the high-priest *. ——— A little without Sion-gate, under the altar of a small chapel, belonging to the Armenians, they boast of the very stone that was laid to secure the door of our Saviour's sepulchre (Z) *. ——— In the court of the chapel, built where Annas's house is said to have stood, they have an olive-tree, of which they have a tradition (A), that Christ was for some time chained to it, by the order of Annas, d to prevent his escaping *. ——— Near a little cell belonging to a chapel, built where stood the house of Cajaphas, which they will have to have been the prison where Christ was kept, till the next morning, they point out the place where Peter by a threefold perjury denied his master <sup>b</sup> (B). ——— Not much farther,

* Idem ibid. * Idem ibid. pag. 94. RADZIV. Peregr. Jerosol. pag. 90. LE BRUYN, &c. * MAUND. ubi sup. pag. 98. <sup>b</sup> Idem ibid. * Idem ibid. RADZIV. &c. * MAUND. ubi sup. pag. 99. * Idem ibid. * Idem ibid. * Idem ibid. * Idem ibid. pag. 100.

(Y) These trees the friars aver to be the very same that yielded sustenance to the Baptist; and the credulous pilgrims, who dare not be wiser than their blind guides, gather the fruit of them, and carry it off with great devotion (33). This being the case we can by no means suspect our author of saying more than he saw or heard, we only wonder there should be such a silence as there is with the other pilgrims of note, concerning these extraordinary trees. Prince Radziville (34) is at a loss to know how St. John subsisted here, so far was he, seemingly, from hearing of, or seeing these locust-trees. Possibly it may be a new device.

(Z) "It was a long time kept in the church of the Sepulchre; but the Armenians, not many years since, stole it from thence by stratagem; and conveyed it to this place. ——— It is two yards and a quarter long, high one yard, and as broad as much, ——— plastered all over except in five or six little places, where it is left bare to receive the immediate kisses and other devotions of pilgrims (35)."

(A) A tradition, it seems, which varies a little. This tree, which, by our traveller, stands in the court before what was the house of Annas, is, by prince Radziville (36), removed to the house of Cajaphas; and this he not only does, but also forgets the story of Christ's having been chained to it. But Thevenot and Le Bruyn continue the tree in its first place, the former (37) saying, that he was bound to it, till he received sentence; the other (38), that here he was made fast, when Malchus gave him the buffet; for Malchus they will certainly have this anonymous person to have been.

(B) Travellers all agree, that this happened at what they shew for the spot where Cajaphas's house once stood; but they differ a little in the description of the spot. Prince Radziville (39) tells us, there is an olive-tree on the supposed spot; Thevenot changes it for an orange-tree (40); Le Bruyn (41) mentions no tree at all. There is also some variation, as to where the cock was perched when he crowed; prince Radziville (42) talks of both an olive and an orange-tree in this same court, and says, the cock crowed upon the latter; Thevenot (43) writes, that some seven or eight steps from the orange-tree, he mentions, is the place of the pillar where the cock crew: Le Bruyn (44) tells us, they shew a piece of the pedestal of the pillar, whereon the cock crew twice; and that in memory thereof the cock himself is represented in marble upon the wall.

(33) MAUND. ubi sup. (34) Ubi sup. (35) MAUND. ubi sup. pag. 100. (36) Peregr. Jerosol. pag. 99. (37) Voy. au Lev. par. 1. lib. ii. c. 49. (38) Voy. au Lev. vol. iv. pag. 177. in 4to. (39) Ubi sup. (40) Ubi sup. (41) Ubi sup. (42) Ubi sup. (43) Ubi sup. (44) Ubi sup.

without the city-gate, near the church of the Canaculum, is a well which is a said to mark out the place where the apostles divided from each other, in order to go every man to his charge<sup>1</sup>. — On the west of the valley of Hinnom, is the place called anciently the Potter's-field, but since, the Field of Blood, and, for the particular veneration it has obtained among Christians, the Campo Sancto: a small spot of ground, not above thirty yards long, and half as much in breadth<sup>2</sup>, whose earth is of so extraordinary a nature, that if a dead body be but laid upon it only, and not at all covered, it will consume it away to the bare bones, within less than twenty four hours, say some<sup>3</sup>, or within eight and forty, according to others<sup>4</sup> (C); but the suddenness of this effect is disputed (D). — In the valley of Jebosaphat is, 1. The well of Nebemias,<sup>b</sup> so called, because it is reputed to be the same place whence that restorer of Israel so miraculously recovered the fire of the altar, after the Babylonish captivity, as mentioned in the first chapter of the second book of the Maccabees<sup>5</sup>. 2. A little higher on the left hand, in this same valley, is a tree, supposed to mark out the place where the prophet Isaiab was sawn asunder<sup>6</sup>. 3. About a hundred paces higher on the same side, is the pool of Siloam<sup>7</sup> (E). 4. About a furlong farther, on the same side, is a fountain called after the blessed virgin; because, as reported, she was wont to resort to this water; but at what time, and upon what occasions, is not agreed<sup>8</sup> (F). 5. Over-against this fountain, on the other side of the valley, is the place called Siloe, where Solomon is said<sup>c</sup> to have kept his strange wives; and above it a hill, which they will have to have been the Mountain of Offence; because Solomon there built his high-places<sup>9</sup>. 6. On the same side, and not far from Siloe, they shew another Aceldama, or Field of Blood; so called, because here, as they pretend, Judas, by the just judgment of God, met with his compounded death<sup>10</sup>. — In the side of the ascent from the valley of Jebosaphat to the city of Jerusalem, they shew a broad stone, on which they will have it the protomartyr St. Stephen was stoned to death; and not far from thence a grott where, they tell you, the outrageous zealots threw his body, after they had sated their cruel rage upon him<sup>11</sup> (G). — Between the foot of mount Olivet and the brook Cedron,<sup>d</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>2</sup> Idem ibid. pag. 101. <sup>3</sup> RADZIV. Peregr. Jerosol. pag. 64. <sup>4</sup> SANDYS, pag. 145. <sup>5</sup> MAUND. Journ. from Alep. to Jerus. pag. 102. <sup>6</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>7</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>8</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>9</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>10</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>11</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>12</sup> MAUND. ubi sup.

(C) Prince Radnville (45) professes to have been an eye-witness, that this earth performs the effect within twenty four hours; and Sandys (46) verily believes, it will perform what is said of it, in eight and forty hours. A greedy grave he (47) calls it and great enough to devour the dead of a whole nation. It is now the great sepulchre of the Armenians, who, for a small gratuity, admit the dead bodies of other nations; so that it may be still called a place of burial for strangers. It is walled in, that the bones of the Christians may not be abused by the Turks (48); and the one half of it is taken up by a building in the nature of a charnel-house, square, and twelve yards high, with little open domes at top, convenient to let down the dead bodies. This charnel-house is the proper place of burial (49).

(D) Maundrell (50) tells us, the earth here is, as he expresses himself, of a chalky substance; and that, looking down through the holes formerly mentioned, he could see many bodies under several degrees of decay; and that thence he conjectured, and, seemingly, with good reason, that this grave does not make the very quick dispatch commonly reported.

(E) From this pool all the gardens in the valley of Jebosaphat are said (51) to be abundantly watered. The Turks, it seems, hold this water to be sacred, and a number of them, almost every day, wash themselves therein. For, tho' by the ablution of any water they fancy themselves to be cleansed from sin, they particularly expect it here. It has a descent to it by steps (52); and contains not above half an acre of ground. How much sooner its water may be valued, (53), it seems to be sometimes wanted; for we have a witness (54), who saw it dry in the bottom.

(F) As there is nothing too ridiculous to be expected in the traditionary stories here, it need not be wondered, that they are silly enough to say, that here the virgin was wont to wash her clouts (55). Sandys (56) is ashamed to account for the name this spring is honoured with; but Le Bruyn (57) has a cleaner reason than is assigned above, and only says, that the same holy person was here wont to draw water, as she returned from mount Sion. It was also called the fountain of the dragon (58); and the descent to it is pleasant and commodious, by several steps, (59). It is replenished with pleasant waters (60), which are said to be an immediate cure for fevers, if either bathed in or drank of (61).

(G) The stones hereabouts have a red rust upon them, which, they say, gives testimony of the bloodshed of this holy person (62).

(45) Peregr. Jerosol. pag. 64. (46) Travels, pag. 145. (47) Ibid. (48) RADZIV. ubi sup. (49) MAUND. Journ. from Alep. to Jerus. pag. 101. Vide etiam SANDYS, ubi sup. (50) Ubi sup. (51) RADZIV. Peregr. Jerosol. pag. 63, 64. (52) Vide eund. ibid. pag. 64. (53) SANDYS, pag. 146. (54) Idem ibid. (55) RADZIV. ubi sup. pag. 63. THEVEN. par. 1. lib. ii. c. 49. (56) In his Trav. pag. 147. (57) Voy. au Lev. vol. iv. pag. 184. in 4to. (58) RADZIV. ubi sup. (59) LE BRUYN, ubi sup. (60) SANDYS ubi sup. (61) THEVEN. ubi sup. (62) Vide SANDYS, ubi sup. pag. 145.

- a they shew you Getbsamene, an even plat of ground, not above fifty seven yards square, of great fame for its olive trees, which are said to be the very same which stood here in the days of our Saviour * (H).— At the upper end of this garden is a flat naked ledge of rock, reputed to be the place on which the apostles, Peter, James, and John fell asleep during the agony of our Lord; and a few paces thence, a grotto, where they say Christ suffered the bitter pangs of his approaching passion †, — About eight paces from the place where the three apostles slept, they shew a small shred of ground, twelve yards long, and one broad, supposed to be the very path on which the traitor Judas walked up to Christ, saying, Hail master, and kissed him ‡ (I). — Not far from the gate of St. Stephen they shew the palace of Pilate, or place rather, where it stood § (K). — From this spot you have a fair prospect of the place where the temple stood, on the top of mount Moriab ¶. — Coming out from the house, pretended to have been Pilate's, is a descent, where was anciently the scala sancta ††. — From this same house they carry you along the Dolorous Way, as it is called; in which walk they first shew the place where Pilate brought forth our Lord to present him to the people, with that mystic saying, Behold the Man! Secondly, where Christ fainted thrice under the weight of the cross. Thirdly, Where the blessed virgin swooned away at so tragical a spectacle. Fourthly, Where St. Veronica presented to him the handkerchief to wipe his bleeding brows. c And, Fifthly, where the soldiers compelled Simon the Cyrenian to bear his cross ‡‡. — At Nazareth, they shew the place of the annunciation §§, to be resumed hereafter. — Not far from mount Hermon appears the mount of Beatitudes, where our Saviour delivered his sermon recorded in Matthew ¶¶. — Lastly, In this same neighbourhood they shew the Mount of Precipitation, as they call it, or the brow of the hill, from whence the Nazarites would have thrown down Christ, incensed at the sermon he preached to them, recorded by St. Luke †††. These, with those we have occasionally mentioned before, in the course of this section, are the more remarkable natural curiosities of this country; we now proceed to the artificial, as well as we can distinguish or separate them.

- d * Idem ibid. † Idem ibid. pag. 106. ‡ Idem ibid. § Idem ibid. ¶ Idem ibid. †† Idem ibid. ††† Idem ibid. pag. 107. § Idem ibid. pag. 112. § Idem ibid. pag. 115. § Ch. v. & seq. ap. eund. ibid. pag. 115. ¶ Ch. iv. 24. & seq. ibid. pag. 116.

(H) In virtue of this tradition the olives, and olive stones, and oil, here produced, became an excellent commodity in Spain (63). But that these trees cannot be any thing like so ancient as pretended is evident by the repeated testimony of J. Sephus (64), that Titus, when he besieged Jerusalem, felled all the trees, within about an hundred furlongs of that city; and that, in consequence of this, the soldiers were obliged to go to that distance for timber, to make their mounts when they assaulted the temple. But, after all, they have seemingly more to say for themselves, in support of what they give out concerning these olive-trees, than of many other important matters they are very confident of; for, the olives here being of an extraordinary size, they, according to the philosophy of these parts, conclude the trees that produce them must be of an extraordinary age (65).

(I) Our author (66) observes, that this narrow path is separated by a wall, from the midst of the garden, as a terra damnata; “a work the more remarkable, says he, as being done by the Turks, who, as well as Christians, detest the very ground on which was acted such an infamous treachery.”

(K) Prince Radziwille (67) talks of the palace of Pilate itself, as still standing, or at least in his days, and particularly takes notice of a court belonging to it, paved with marble, which he supposes to be the very same St. John (68) calls the pavement; and adds, that it had on each hand a portico supported by porphyry columns, where that Roman governor was wont to sit in judgment, and observes, it was then the residence of the Turkish chief. Sandys (69) also makes mention of this same palace, which he will have to have been the same; but, according to him, the chief remains of it are, at the west corner, a pair of stairs, which lead to Pilate's place of judgment; an ancient arch that supports a ruined gallery; and in the east side a two-arched window, where, as they say, Pilate presented Christ to the people. Thevenot (70) adds, that under this two-arch'd window there is this inscription Tolle, tolle, crucifige eum. Le Bruyn (71) delivers himself exactly to the same purpose, and they all agree the place in their time to have been the residence of the Turkish basha, and the place of judgment for the city. But it is possible they may have been misled, and confounded the palace of Herod with that of Pilate, just by it; for Maundrell (72) takes notice of little more than an ordinary Turkish house, on the spot when he was there. He adds (73) that, among other remarkables in this pretended house, they shew a room, where, they say, our Saviour was scourged; but that, when he was there, it was no better than a weaver's shop. All our travellers agree, that from this house you have the fullest and most commodious prospect of the ground whereon stood anciently the temple.

(63) MAUND. ubi sup. pag. 105. (64) De Bell. Judaic. lib. vii. c. 15. (65) Vide LE BRUYN, Voy. au Lev. vol. iv. p. 191. in 4to. (66) MAUND. ubi sup. pag. 106. (67) Peregr. Jerosol. pag. 91. (68) C. xix. v. 13. (69) In his Trav. pag. 150. (70) Voy. au Lev. par. 1. lib. ii. c. 37. (71) Voy. au Lev. vol. ii. pag. 180. in 4to. (72) Journ. from Alep. to Jersal. pag. 106. (73) Ubi sup. pag. 107.

Artificial
rarities.

Worthy of notice are the ruins of Ptolemais, or St. John d'Acra, or Acra, <sup>a</sup> from the Hebrew name Accho. These ruins look as if the city had consisted of castles only, without the intermixture of private dwellings; it had two walls well fortified with bulwarks and towers, and each wall had a ditch lined with stone, and many secret posterns beneath; but now the huge walls and arches, turned topsy turvy, lie like rocks upon the foundation <sup>b</sup>. In the fields without these, once extraordinary works, are seen scattered up and down great balls of stone, of at least thirteen or fourteen inches diameter, part of the ammunition used in battering the city, the use of guns being then unknown <sup>c</sup>. Of the ruins within these broken walls, which, by some tokens of more than ordinary magnificence and strength, appear above the rest, are, 1. The cathedral dedicated to St. Andrew, not from far the sea-side, and high and conspicuous above the rest. 2. The church of St. John, the titular saint of this city. 3. The convent of the knights hospitallers, whose remaining walls bear sufficient testimony of its former strength. 4. The palace of the grand master of the order, still exhibiting a large and noble stair-case, and part of a church, still remaining in it. 5. Some remains of a large church formerly belonging to a nunnery <sup>d</sup>. Some pretend to farther and greater discoveries of particular places (L): but all we think worth adding is, that there are here ruins of a palace which had our king Richard for founder, as is not only acknowledged on all hands, but confirmed also by the passant lion <sup>e</sup>. ——— Sebesta, or the ancient Samaria, which, tho' now as it were wholly obliterated, and turned into garden-ground, yet retains some token of what it formerly has been; for on the north side of it is a large square piazza, incompassed with pillars, and on the east some poor remains of an old church, said to have been built by the empress Helena, over the place where St. John the Baptist was both imprisoned and beheaded <sup>f</sup> (M). ——— Just without the city of Naplouse, in the narrow valley between mount Gerizzim and Ebal, is a small mosch, called by the name of Joseph's sepulchre, it being a tradition current in these parts, that the bones of that patriarch were here interred, after their transportation out of Egypt <sup>g</sup>. ——— About the third part of an hour from the same town of Naplouse they shew <sup>d</sup> Jacob's well, not more famous for its author, than memorable for the conference our Saviour here had with the woman of Samaria (N). This well is at present covered with an old stone-vault, into which being let down through a very strait hole, the mouth of the well itself is discovered. It is hollowed out of the firm rock, is about three yards in diameter, and thirty five in depth, five of which our traveller <sup>h</sup> found full of water, and thereby confutes a superstitious story that has taken root among Christians (O). ——— The next thing that, most deserves our attention, is the stately and much frequented church of the holy sepulchre in Jerusalem. But as it may be needless to describe it in words, when we have so many exact plans and draughts of it, we shall hasten to what is remarkable in and about it. 1. Mount Calvary, with the very individual hole where the cross of

<sup>a</sup> SANDYS, lib. iii. pag. 159. <sup>b</sup> MAUND. Journ. from Alep. to Jerus. pag. 54. <sup>c</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>d</sup> SANDYS, ubi. sup. pag. 160. <sup>e</sup> MAUND. ubi sup. pag. 59. <sup>f</sup> Idem ibid. pag. 62. <sup>g</sup> Idem ibid. pag. 63.

(L) Thevenot (74) reckons there are the remains of about thirty churches still to be seen, and particularly of one above the rest, where the knights had a treasure (which they distinguished with a piece of marble) and which, says he, not many years ago was brought away in a ship, which came for that end to Acra, tho' pretending only to buy goods. Sandys (75) relates, that this treasure was in a vault of the same church, which, being known to the successors of these knights, was, about forty years before his time, fetched away by the galleys of Malta, the inhabitants forsaking the town as soon as they landed. By Maunderell (76) it appears, that this same church was the cathedral itself of St. Andrew.

(M) "In the body of this church you go

"down a stair-case, into the very dungeon "where that holy blood was shed." The Turks hold this place, and over it have erected a small mosch; into which they will admit a Christian for a little piece of money (77).

(N) This well seems at present to have been too far from Samaria for women to come thither to draw water; but it is pretty evident to the curious observer, that the city extended much farther this way formerly than it does now (78).

(O) It has been idly reported, and as simply believed, that this well is dry all the year round, except on the anniversary of the day our Saviour sat on it; but then bubbles up with abundance of water (79).

(74) Voy. au Lev. part. 1. lib. ii. c. 53. (75) In his Trav. lib. iii. p. 160. (76) Journ. from Alep. to Jerus. pag. 55. (77) Ibid. pag. 59. (78) Ibid. pag. 63. (79) Ibid.

- a our Lord was planted, and the very cleft (P) said to have been caused by the earthquake at his passion*. 2. The stone of unction, or the very place where his body was anointed and prepared for burial†. 3. The sepulchre where he was deposited to the hour of his resurrection‡. ——— A little without that gate of Jerusalem, called the Damascus-gate, they carry you to a large grot, which they pretend to have been some time the abode of Jeremiab: On the left side of it, they even point at the prophet's bed, which is no more than a shelve from the rock, about eight foot from the ground; and not far from hence is the place where they say he wrote his Lamentations§ (Q). ——— Not far from hence are the famous grot, called the sepulchres of the kings, but of what kings is uncertain (R); but, that they were used as repositories of the dead, appears sufficiently by some coffins at present there, and which we shall take notice of in the sequel of this description. The whole is a work of such vast labour and expence, that it may fairly be pronounced a royal work, being all hewn out of the natural rock, and consisting of an entrance made through the rock, a court of about forty paces square, hollowed out of the same, on the south side of which is a portico, nine paces long, and four broad, wrought also out of the same. This portico has a kind of architrave in front, once adorned with sculpture of fruits and flowers, but now defaced; and on the left of this portico you descend towards the sepulchres. First you come into a large room, about seven or eight yards square, exactly and most exquisitely formed, so that it may be called a fine chamber, hollowed out of one solid piece of marble. From this you may pass into six rooms more, one within another, and all of the same fabrick with the first; but the two innermost are deeper than the rest, having a second descent of about six or seven steps into them. In every one of these rooms, the first excepted, are stone coffins placed in niches in the sides of the chambers; once covered with handsome lids and carved with garlands; but now most of them (S) are broken to pieces. But what most of all surprizes the observer, is the artifice of the doors of these chambers, all cut out of the same rock, and turning upon hinges of the same stone with the rest. This ingenious contrivance which, at first, appears so very puzzling to understand (T), has
- d

* Idem ibid. pag. 72. † Idem ibid. pag. 73. ‡ Idem ibid. § Idem ibid. pag. 76. * Vide RADZIV. LE BRUYN, MAUND. &c.

(P) "This cleft, as it now appears, is about a span wide, at its upper part, and two deep, after which it closes: but it opens again below, (as you may see in another chapel contiguous to the side of Calvary) and runs down to an unknown depth in the earth. That this rent was made by the earthquake, that happened at our Lord's passion, there is only tradition to prove: But that it is a natural and genuine breach, and not counterfeited by any art, the sense of any one that sees it may convince him; for the sides of it fit like two tallies to each other; and yet it runs in such intricate windings, as could not be counterfeited by art, nor within the reach of any instruments (80)."

(Q) "This place is at present a college of Derwises, and is held in great veneration by the Turks and Jews, as well as the Christians (81)".

(R) Prince Radziwille roundly pronounces the kings of Judab to have been interred here; imagining they were formerly within the wall of the city, tho' now without it (82). Other travellers (83) give into the same seeming mistake; while Maundrell (84) considering more maturely of the thing concludes it certain, that none of the kings of Judab, or Israel, were here intombed, unless, perhaps, Hezekiah, and is not certain that these may not be the sepulchres of the sons of David, mentioned in scripture, (85).

(S) Maundrell (86), by this, seems to insinuate, that several of these coffins were still entire, and Radziwille (87) observes, that he also saw bones remaining in several of them; so that, whether broken or entire, one would naturally imagine there was a greater number; while Le Bruyn (88) takes notice of no more than three, the one broken, and the other two entire. Radziwille, (89) computes, that about forty odd might have been here conveniently deposited in the cells or niches in the sides of these chambers, each containing two coffins. Le Bruyn (90) computes, that about fifty might have been here received in the same manner; but as, in such obscure and damp places, people are a little uneasy, and, however great their curiosity may be, somewhat in a hurry to get out, we are not to expect, but travellers will, in such cases, vary a little, if not a great deal, from each other.

(T) Travellers are quite lost in admiration at it, and, particularly, Le Bruyn (90), who may have had some judgment in things of this nature, is astonished, that they should be done of one and the same piece of hard rock, and especially by lamp-light, for no other was here to be had.

(80) MAUND. pag. 73. (81) Ibid. pag. 76. (82) Peregr. Jerus. pag. 104. (83) Vide LE BRUYN, THEVEN. &c. (84) Journey from Alep. to Jerus. pag. 76. (85) 2 Chron. xxxii. 33. (86) Ubi sup. pag. 77. (87) Ubi sup. (88) Voy. au Lev. vol. ii. pag. 195. in 4to. (89) Ubi sup. (90) Ubi sup.

been, seemingly, well explained of late (U), and the thing appears no longer a mystery, tho' otherwise very extraordinary in itself. — Returning from hence to the city of Jerusalem, not far from Herod's gate, is shewn a grotto full of filthy mire and water, which passes for the dungeon in which Jeremiab was kept by Zedekiah. — Going out of St. Stephen's gate to Bethany, they, at the entrance into that village, point at an old ruin, which they call Lazarus's castle, and suppose to have been the habitation of that favourite of Christ; and, at the bottom of a small descent, not far from the castle, is shewn the sepulchre where he was raised from the dead (X). — About a bow-shot from hence they point at Mary Magdalen's habitation. — Within about a furlong of the river Jordan, is an old ruined church and convent, dedicated to St. John, who is supposed, here, or hereabouts, to have baptized our Lord. — On the road between Bethlehem and Jerusalem, they still shew, 1. The house of Simeon. 2. The impress of Elias's body. 3. The well where the star appeared to the eastern magi. 4. Rachael's tomb. — At Bethlehem they shew the very place of our Saviour's nativity (Y); the very manger in which he was laid (Z); the chapel of Joseph his supposed father; the school of St. Jerome, and other such places. — In the neighbourhood of this place are pools and gardens, said to have been the contrivance and delight of King Solomon (A); the pools are three, in a row, one above another, so disposed that the water may from the uppermost descend into the second, and from the second into the third. They are quadrangular, and all of the same breadth, being about ninety paces; but in length they differ, the first being about one hundred and sixty paces long, the second two hundred, and the third two hundred and twenty; all lined with wall, and plastered, and containing a great depth of water. At the distance of about one hundred and sixty paces, is the spring whence they derive their waters, which the monks here will have to have been the Sealed Fountain (B). The gardens may be said to be now no more, and the spot, at present, seems to be but little adapted to such a use (C). — On the west, as the former on the south side of Bethlehem, they shew you the well David so passionately thirsted after; but it is rather a mere cistern supplied with rain, and, otherwise, of no particu-

* MAUND. pag. 176. † Idem ibid. pag. 78. ‡ MAUND. Journ. from Alep. to Jerus. pag. 79.
 § Idem ibid. ¶ Idem ibid. pag. 81. †† Idem ibid. pag. 87. ‡‡ Idem ibid. §§ Cant. iv. 15.
 • MAUND. ibid. p. 88. • 2 Sam. xxiii. 15.

(U) Maundrell (91) took notice, that the only door, left hanging, did not touch its lintel by at least two inches, and believes it might have been easily lifted up and unhinged; and that the doors, which had been thrown down, had their hinges at the upper end twice as long as those at the bottom, by which the whole artifice very plainly discovers itself.

(X) In this sepulchre you descend by twenty-five steep steps, which letting you down into a small square room, you thence creep into a lower and lesser room, about a yard and a half deeper, in which the body is said to have been laid. This place is in great veneration with the Turks, who use it as an oratory, and demand a small caphar of such Christians as desire to see it (92).

(Y) The church of the nativity, or manger, at Bethlehem, is a most sumptuous and elegant structure, tho' unfortunately subject to the insults of the Infidels of those parts (93). The spot, where Christ is supposed to have been born, is marked out by a marble slab; and over it, upon the altar, is another, with this inscription, HIC DE VIRGINE MARIA IESUS CHRISTUS NASCIDI GIGNATUS EST (94). But to enter into a detail of all the costly particulars of this sanctuary, or of the church, and other parts belonging to it, would by far exceed our length.

(Z) It is cut out of the rock (95), about two foot from the floor; but now flged with white marble, as well as the rock that roofs it (96).

(A) He is supposed to allude to these works, where (97), among the other instances of his magnificence, he reckons up his gardens, vineyards, and pools (98).

(B) In confirmation of this opinion, they pretend a tradition, that king Solomon shut up these springs, and kept the door of them sealed with his signet; to the end that he might preserve the waters for his own use, in their natural freshness and purity. Our author (99) adds, it was not difficult thus to secure them; they rising under ground, and having no avenue to them, but by a little hole like the mouth of a narrow well. The whole, as described by travellers, must have been a stupendous work.

(C) The soil is rocky, and so bad, that our author (100) thinks Solomon displayed his wealth more than his wisdom, if he made choice of it for the purpose supposed; tho' after all, if it is so very plain, that here was his sealed fountain (1), it is not unlikely, that here also was his enclosed garden (2). The situation seems to correspond with this description, the spot being a rocky valley, descending from the pools, and inclosed on each hand by high mountains (3).

(91) Ubi sup. pag. 78. (92) MAUND. Journ. from Alep. to Jerus. pag. 97. (93) Vide RADZIV. LE BRUN, THEVEN. &c. (94) Vide RADZIV. (95) Idem. pag. 84. (96) SANDY'S Trav. pag. 146. (97) Eccl. ii. 5, 6. (98) MAUND. ubi sup. p. 88. (99) Idem ibid. pag. 89. (100) Idem ibid. (1) Cant. ubi sup. (2) Ibidem. (3) MAUND. ubi sup.

- a lar estimation. But, about two furlongs from thence, you behold the remains of an old aqueduct, which anciently conveyed water from Solomon's pools to Jerusalem, and which, very much to the honour of that great monarch, is reckoned to be a work of his. It goes along the surface of the ground; and consists of large stones (D) perforated and let into each other, after the manner of pipes; and, for the greater security, covered with a course of smaller stones, firmly cemented together with a very strong mortar; a work which formerly extended five or six leagues, and, seemingly, designed for eternity; tho' now so destroyed by violent hands (E), that there is only a fragment of it here and there remaining. In Bethlehem, they shew a grotto cut out of a chalky rock; where they pretend the blessed virgin concealed herself and her child, to avoid the murderous fury of Herod, some time before she fled into Egypt; but the whiteness of this place they will have to have been, not natural, but miraculous. (F). Between Bethlehem and Jerusalem, in what is sometimes called the Desart of St. John, is a convent called after the name of that saint, supposed to stand on the spot where he was born. This convent has, of very late years, been re-built from the ground; and is, at present, a large, square building, uniform and neat all over, but chiefly remarkable for its church; consisting of three isles, and, in the midst, an handsome cupola; and under that a mosaic pavement, equal to, if not surpassing, the finest works of the ancients, in that kind. At the upper end of the north isle, by a descent of seven steps, you come down to a very splendid altar, erected, as they say, over the very place where the Baptist was born. About three furlongs distant from this convent, they point at what they call the house of Elizabeth, the Baptist's mother (G); formerly a convent, tho' now an heap of ruins, and only remarkable for a grotto, in which, they tell you, the blessed virgin saluted Elizabeth, and pronounced her magnificat. At the distance of about three quarters of an hour from the convent of St. John, in the way to Jerusalem, is a convent belonging to the Greeks, and called the convent of the Holy Cross, a neat structure, and pleasantly situated, but chiefly to be taken notice of, as they pretend it to stand over the very spot where grew the tree that supplied the timber that made the cross. In Jerusalem, close by the church of the holy sepulchre, is what they shew for the prison of St. Peter. It is a prison still. About a furlong from thence, is a small church, as they say, built over the house of St. Mark. It is in the possession of the Syrians, who venture to shew you the very window at which Abdiah looked out, while Peter knocked at the door; and in this same church they let you see a folio manuscript of the New Testament, in Syriac, which, if they are to be believed, is now about nine hundred years old; and a still greater curiosity, namely, a little stone font, used by the apostles themselves in baptizing. Upon that part of mount Sion, which is within the walls of the city, stands a con-

* MAUND. ibid. pag. 90. * Idem ibid. pag. 91. * Idem ibid. p. 92. * Idem ibid. pag. 93. * Idem ibid. pag. 94. * Idem ibid. 99. † Acts xii. 13. * MAUND. ubi sup.

(D) Our author (4) leaves blanks for the dimensions of these stones, and we know of none that has been curious enough to supply the defect; but that they are very considerable appears by his manner of expressing himself.

(E) The blame is, in this case, thrown upon the Arabs, who, for the sake of an immediate and ready supply of water (5) make no scruple to tear up all before them, and, by degrees, entirely to demolish this solid and magnificent work.

(F) They say the stone of this grotto owes its chalky and extraordinary whiteness to some milk, which fell from the virgin, while she was giving suck to the holy infant, which converted the colour of the native rock. And so possessed are they here with this chimerical notion, as to imagine, the chalk of this place has a miraculous virtue of increasing the milk of women. And for this supernatural property is the same highly valued, as well by Arabs, and Turks, as by Christians (6). This notion having taken such root with all ranks, and sects, lumps of this chalk are carried to Jerusalem, and there impressed with the seal of the city, to be thence sent into Europe. Our author adds, that he met with a physician at Venice simple enough to ask him for some of it for a lady, a patient of his, who was defective in her milk.

(G) "If you chance to ask, how it came to pass, that Elizabeth lived in one house, when she was big with the Baptist, and in another when she brought him forth? The answer you are like to receive is, that the former was her country, the latter her city habitation; and that it is no wonder for the wife of one of the priests of better rank (such as she was, Luke i. 6.) to be provided with such variety (8).

(4) Idem ibid. pag. 90. (5) LE BRUYN, ubi sup. pag. 216. (6) MAUND. ubi sup. pag. 91. (7) LE BRUYN, ubi sup. pag. 221. (8) MAUND. ubi sup. pag. 93.

vent of Armenians, whose church is built over the very place where St. James, the brother of John, was beheaded. In this church are two altars of extraordinary splendor, decked with rich mitres, embroidered copes, crosses both of silver and gold, crowns, chalices, and other church utensils without number. In the midst of this same church is a pulpit made of tortoise-shell, and mother of pearl, with a beautiful canopy or cupola over it, of the same fabric; the tortoise-shell and mother of pearl being so very exquisitely blended together, that the workmanship far exceeds the materials'.----- A little without Sion gate, is the church of Canaculum, where, they say, Christ instituted his last supper" (H).----- At a little distance from hence are the ruins of an house where the blessed virgin is said to have breathed her last: and, a little farther b down the hill, is a grot, where, they say, St. Peter so bitterly lamented his inconstancy to his master".----- From a garden on the south side of mount Moriab, they conduct you to several large vaults, annexed to the mountain, on that side, and running, at least, fifty yards under ground. They were built in two isles, arched at top with huge firm stone, and sustained by tall pillars, each of one single stone, and two yards in diameter; conjectured to have been some subterraneous work made to enlarge the area of the temple "(I).----- To these may be added, the beautiful gate of the temple (K), which, says our author, can be only observed by a transient survey, because of the superstition of the Turks" (L).----- At the bottom of mount Sion, is what they c call Bathsheba's pool, supposed to be the same she was in when David was so smitten with her beauty; but others suppose it to have been a smaller one in a garden just within Beitlehem gate, and both, perhaps, equally right".----- At a small distance from the first of these pools, a little below the Campo Sancto, or Field of Blood, as it was anciently called, is an intricate cave or sepulchre, consisting of several rooms one within another, in which the apostles are reported to have hid themselves when they forsook their master, and fled. Its entrance discovers signs of its having been anciently adorned with paintings".----- In the valley of Jehosaphat are two noble antiquities called the sepulchre of Zachary (M), and the pillar of Abfalom (N), as also the sepulchre of Jehosa- d phat".----- Near the corner of the city wall, on the opposite side of this valley, <sup>1</sup> Mavuo. ibid. pag. 99. " Idem ibid. pag. 100. " Idem ibid. " Idem ibid. " Idem ibid. pag. 101. " Idem ibid. " Idem ibid. pag. 102. " Idem ibid. pag. 103.

(H) " It is now a mosch, and not to be seen by "Christians (9)."

(I) Our author (10) thinks Josephus (11) seems to describe some such work as this, erected over the vault, on this side of the temple.

(K) Travellers are somewhat short in their descriptions of this gate. Prince Radziwille (12) represents it as lofty, great, and ascended to by steps, which he went up, but dared not go over the threshold, for fear of polluting the area of the temple of Solomon.

(L) Whatever may have been the milder temper of these people, when they permitted prince Radziwille to ascend the steps leading up to it, as in the note above, they are since, it seems, grown to that height of jealousy, that they will scarce admit of a stranger's turning his eyes towards it, as he passes by. The reason is, the Turks have a strange notion of the more than ordinary sanctity of the area or place within it, where stands a beautiful mosch, which they have erected, as they pretend, on the very spot where stood the temple of Solomon. They have a notion, that if a Christian, or any other, does but set foot in the area it stands upon, his prayers will have such irresistible prevalence with God, that nothing he could ask of heaven could be refused him; and fondly imagine, that, as Christians would not fail to pray, that the Turks might be driven out, and the Chri- stians enter again into possession of the city, the prayer would be infallibly heard, and inevitably granted (13); so that they cannot bear to see a Christian so much as offer to look that way.

(M) Supposed to be the same who was slain between the temple and the altar. " All of the natural rock, eighteen foot high, four square, and " beautified with doric columns of the same unparaded stone, sustaining the cornish, and topped " like a pointed diamond (14)."

(N) It is sometimes called the tomb or sepulchre of Abfalom (15); and it hath, indeed, rather the looks of such, than of, what it is otherwise commonly called, a pillar. He was not buried there, but it is imagined, he erected, or rather, had it wrought out of the stone, in his life-time, " to " preserve the memory of his name, after the " death of his three sons", -- yet entire of a good " fabric, rising in a lofty square; below adorned " with half columns, wrought out of the side and " corners, of the doric form; and then changing into " a round, a good height higher, doth grow to a " point, in fashion of a bell; all framed of the " growing stone (16)."

Travellers for the most part observe, that there is always a great and daily encreasing heap of stones lying near it, thrown thereat, both by Jews and Turks, in detestation of Abfalom's rebellion against his father David.

(9) Idem ibid. pag. 100. (10) Idem ibid. (11) Antiq. lib. xv. c. ult. (12) Perogr. Hierosol. p. 117. (13) Ibid. pag. 118. (14) SANDYS, pag. 147. (15) RADZIV. Peragr. Jerosolym. pag. 62. (16) Compare a Sam. xiv. 27. & xviii. 18. (16) SANDYS, ubi sup.

Plate 12. Vol 1.

vent of Armenians, whose church is built over the very place where St. James,<sup>a</sup> the brother of John, was beheaded. In this church are two altars of extraordinary splendor, decked with rich mitres, embroidered copes, crosses both of silver and gold, crowns, chalices, and other church utensils without number. In the midst of this same church is a pulpit made of tortoise-shell, and mother of pearl, with a beautiful canopy or cupola over it, of the same fabric; the tortoise-shell and mother of pearl being so very exquisitely blended together, that the workmanship far exceeds the materials'.----- A little without Sion gate, is the church of Cenaculum, where, they say, Christ instituted his last supper<sup>m</sup> (H).----- At a little distance from hence are the ruins of an house where the blessed virgin is said to have breathed her last: and, a little farther<sup>b</sup> down the hill, is a grot, where, they say, St. Peter so bitterly lamented his inconstancy to his master<sup>n</sup>. ----- From a garden on the south side of mount Moriab, they conduct you to several large vaults, annexed to the mountain, on that side, and running, at least, fifty yards under ground. They were built in two isles, arched at top with huge firm stone, and sustained by tall pillars, each of one single stone, and two yards in diameter; conjectured to have been some subterraneous work made to enlarge the area of the temple<sup>o</sup> (I).----- To these may be added, the beautiful gate of the temple (K), which, says our author, can be only observed by a transient survey, because of the superstition of the Turks<sup>p</sup> (L). ----- At the bottom of mount Sion, is what they<sup>c</sup> call Bathsheba's pool, supposed to be the same she was in when David was so smitten with her beauty; but others suppose it to have been a smaller one in a garden just within Bethlehem gate, and both, perhaps, equally right<sup>q</sup>.----- At a small distance from the first of these pools, a little below the Campo Sancto, or Field of Blood, as it was anciently called, is an intricate cave or sepulchre, consisting of several rooms one within another, in which the apostles are reported to have hid themselves when they forsook their master, and fled. Its entrance discovers signs of its having been anciently adorned with paintings'.----- In the valley of Jebosaphat are two noble antiquities called the sepulchre of Zachary (M), and the pillar of Abfalom (N), as also the sepulchre of Jebosaphat<sup>d</sup>. ----- Near the corner of the city wall, on the opposite side of this valley,

<sup>a</sup> MABUND. ibid. pag. 99. <sup>m</sup> Idem ibid. pag. 100. <sup>n</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>o</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>p</sup> Idem ibid. pag. 101. <sup>q</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>r</sup> Idem ibid. pag. 102. <sup>s</sup> Idem ibid. pag. 103.

(H) "It is now a mosch, and not to be seen by Christians (9)."

(I) Our author (10) thinks Josephus (11) seems to describe some such work as this, erected over the valley, on this side of the temple.

(K) Travellers are somewhat short in their descriptions of this gate. Prince Radziwille (12) represents it as lofty, great, and ascended to by steps, which he went up, but dared not go over the threshold, for fear of polluting the area of the temple of Solomon.

(L) Whatever may have been the milder temper of these people, when they permitted prince Radziwille to ascend the steps leading up to it, as in the note above, they are since, it seems, grown to that height of jealousy, that they will scarce admit of a stranger's turning his eyes towards it, as he passes by. The reason is, the Turks have a strange notion of the more than ordinary sanctity of the area or place within it, where stands a beautiful mosch, which they have erected, as they pretend, on the very spot where stood the temple of Solomon. They have a notion, that if a Christian, or any other, does but set foot in the area it stands upon, his prayers will have such irresistible prevalence with God, that nothing he could ask of heaven could be refused him; and fondly imagine, that, as Christians would not fail to pray, that the Turks might be driven out, and the Chri- stians enter again into possession of the city, the prayer would be infallibly heard, and inevitably granted (13); so that they cannot bear to see a Christian so much as offer to look that way.

(M) Supposed to be the same who was slain between the temple and the altar. "All of the natural rock, eighteen foot high, four square, and beautified with doric columns of the same unparaded stone, sustaining the cornith, and topped like a pointed diamond (14)."

(N) It is sometimes called the tomb or sepulchre of Abfalom (15); and it hath, indeed, rather the looks of such, than of, what it is otherwise commonly called, a pillar. He was not buried there, but it is imagined, he erected, or rather, had it wrought out of the stone, in his life-time, "to preserve the memory of his name, after the death of his three sons", — yet entire of a good fabric, rising in a lofty square; below adorned with half columns, wrought out of the side and corners, of the doric form; and then changing into a round, a good height higher, doth grow to a point, in fashion of a bell; all framed of the growing stone (16)." Travellers for the most part observe, that there is always a great and daily encreasing heap of stones lying near it, thrown thereat, both by Jews and Turks, in detestation of Abfalom's rebellion against his father David.

(9) Idem ibid. pag. 100. (10) Idem ibid. (11) Antiq. lib. xiv. c. ult. (12) Peregr. Hierosol. p. 117. (13) Ibid. pag. 118. (14) SANDYS, pag. 147. (15) RADZIV. Peregrin. Jerosolym. pag. 62. (2) Compare 2 Sam. xiv. 27. & xviii. 18. (16) SANDYS, ubi sup.

A MAP of the Journey in the Wilderness, and of the Conquest and Division of the Land of CANAAN, by the Children of Israel according to this History.
Plate 12. Veli.

- a is a short end of a pillar, jetting out of the wall: whereon the Turks fable, Mohammed shall sit in judgment, at the last day, the whole world being gathered together in the valley below, to receive sentence from his mouth <sup>1</sup> (O). ----- A little further northward, is the gate of the temple; at present walled up; the Turks having a prophecy, that their destruction is to enter by that gate; the completion of which they endeavour to obviate by this means <sup>2</sup> (P). ----- In the bottom of this same valley is what they will have to have been the sepulchre of the blessed virgin; with a magnificent descent of forty-seven stairs: on the right hand, as you go down, is the sepulchre of St. Anne, the mother, and, on the left hand, that of St. Joseph, the husband, of the blessed virgin <sup>3</sup>. ----- In the pretended house
- b of Pilate, they shew the room where Christ was mocked with the ensigns of royalty, and buffeted by the soldiers <sup>4</sup>. ----- They pretend likewise still to shew the pool of Bethesda, one hundred and twenty paces long, forty broad, and at least eight deep, but void of water. At its west end it discovers some old arches, now dammed up <sup>5</sup> (Q). ----- As also the pool of Gibon, about a quarter of a mile without Bethlehem gate, westward, a stately relique, one hundred and six paces long, sixty seven broad, lined with wall and plaister, and, when our author was there, well stored with water <sup>6</sup>. ----- At Nazareth, besides the church which stands in a cave, supposed to be the place where the virgin Mary received the angelical salutation (R), they shew the house of Joseph, the very same as they tell you, where the Son
- c of God lived for near thirty years, in subjection to man <sup>7</sup>. These and other particulars, we have occasionally mentioned before, both in the text and the notes, are the more noted remarkables of this promised and destined land; whereon we leave the reader to make his own observations.

<sup>1</sup> Idem ibid.
ibid. pag. 108.

<sup>2</sup> Idem ibid.
<sup>b</sup> Idem ibid. pag. 113.

<sup>3</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>4</sup> Idem ibid. pag. 107.

<sup>5</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>6</sup> Idem

(O) To this the Mohammedans add, it seems, a most ridiculous tradition, but first, we are told (17) they also report, that Mohammed is to sit on the end of this pillar, to observe whether our Lord judge the Christians well or not; that, if he judge them righteously, Mohammed will give him his sister in marriage, together with a great dowry; that, this done, Mohammed shall turn himself into a sheep, and the Turks nestle into his wool, like so many fleas; that, thus incumbered, he shall fly into the air, and shake himself very hard; that those who stick fast to him shall be happy, and those that fall from him shall be damned (18); so very ridiculous a story, that, had we not met with it in so grave an author, we should ne'er have taken notice of it; and, after all, we are afraid this is a story fathered upon them; but what can't men be brought to believe!

(P) All travellers this way take notice of this particular, and most add, that for the very same reason, and out of the same superstitious dread, they shut up all the other gates of the city, every Friday, 'till morning-service is over, adding, that on that day the destined work of their expulsion is to be effected.

(Q) "These some will have to be the five porches, in which sat that multitude of halt, lame, and blind, [John v.] But the mischief is, instead of five, there are but three of them (19).

(R) "Just at the section of the cross [of this church] are erected two granate pillars, each two foot and one inch diameter, and about three foot distance from each other—supposed to stand on the very places, the one where the angel, the other, where the blessed virgin stood at the time of the annunciation. Of these pillars, the innermost, being that of the blessed virgin, has been broke away by the Turks, in expectation of finding treasure under it; so that eighteen inches length of it is clean gone, between the pillar and its pedestal. Nevertheless, adds our author, it remains erect; tho' by what art it is sustained, I could not discern. It touches the roof above, and is, probably, hanged upon that; unless you had rather take the friars account of it, viz. that it is supported by a miracle (20).

(17) THEVEN. Voy. au Lev. lib. ii. par. 1. c. 50.
pag. 187. (20) MAUND. Journ. from Alep. to Jerus. pag. 112.

(18) Idem ibid.

(19) MAUND. ubi sup.

S E C T. IV.

The religion, government, laws, customs, learning, arts and commerce of the J E W S.

The Jewish government was a Theocracy.

THE institution of the Jewish religion and commonwealth is by Moses <sup>a</sup> attributed wholly to God; for which reason Josephus makes no scruple to distinguish the latter from all the other governments in the world by the name of Theocracy<sup>b</sup>, or a government under the immediate command and direction of God: and, indeed, tho' this theocracy has often varied under Moses, Jeshua, the judges, kings, and high-priests, and the divine authority differently interposed during those revolutions, yet God was still looked upon as the supreme monarch of the Israelites. We have seen, in a former section, that he was the sole director of every momentous transaction under Moses, and the dictator of the main body of his laws. Jeshua, though not honoured so far as to receive the divine commands from the mouth of God, yet always consulted <sup>b</sup> him by the Urim, upon all emergencies. The judges were valiant and wise men, whom God made choice of to govern the people, and to deliver them from time to time, from those thraldoms which their frequent rebellions brought upon them. Accordingly, when Gideon had delivered them from the Midianites, and the people offered the government to him and his posterity, he modestly replied, that neither he nor his sons<sup>c</sup>, but the Lord God should rule over them. When, in process of time, their desire for a king was grown to such a height, that all Samuel's expostulations could not divert them from it; tho' he told them, that by so doing they rejected the Lord from ruling over them; God was pleased to nominate Saul, and, after him, David, to the regal dignity, <sup>c</sup> and to make it hereditary in the posterity of the latter, reserving to himself, nevertheless, the power of altering the succession from the eldest to a younger branch, whenever he saw fit, as he actually did in his immediate successor Solomon. Nay, we may say, that God himself, foreseeing that they would be for a kingly government, did reserve to himself the choice, and prescribed some wholesome laws for the conduct of those who should enjoy the regal power<sup>d</sup>; and if, at any time, either the kings or the people refused to be directed by him, or disobeyed the laws which he had given them, they never failed of some severe punishment, to remind them of their dependence, and to recall them to their duty. The kings of Israel, indeed, after their revolt from those of Judah, <sup>d</sup> did reign more arbitrarily, but their endeavours to shake off the yoke of God proved a source of endless evils to the rebellious tribes; till, at length, when neither his prophets exhortations and threatenings, nor his severe judgments, could bring them to obedience, he entirely cast them off, and condemned them to an endless captivity. Thus not only the kingdom of Judah, but even that of Israel, corrupt and idolatrous as it was, continued still under a kind of Theocracy, until its dissolution. This is what will more evidently appear by the sequel of this history.

Their laws.

As for their laws, the greatest part of them were given to Moses on mount Sinai, and the rest, at different times, and as occasion required, as we have seen <sup>e</sup> in a former section †. Whether, therefore, we look upon them as the first body of laws that ever was compiled, (whilst other nations had not so much as a name for it, as Josephus<sup>d</sup> had endeavoured to prove against his learned antagonist, from the writings of Homer, the most ancient writer, in which the word Nomos [law] is not so much as once mentioned;) or whether we suppose, with others<sup>e</sup>, that the Egyptians and other nations had already laws of their own, and that Moses was permitted by God, to model and improve his own by them, by altering or retaining what he liked or disliked, concerning which we shall not repeat what has been already said upon that head<sup>f</sup>; it is plain, that

<sup>a</sup> Cont. Apion, lib. ii. <sup>b</sup> Judg. viii. 22, 23. <sup>c</sup> Vide Deut. xvii. 14. & seq. † Vide sup. pag. 519. b, & seq. <sup>d</sup> Cont. Apion, ibid. <sup>e</sup> SPENCER, de Leg. Ritual. Jud. pass. LE CLERC, & al. <sup>f</sup> Vide sup. pag. 198. d. § 16. (Y) & alib. pass.

- a the greatest part of them were dictated by God himself, and that the rest received; if not the finishing hand, yet at least their sanction and approbation from him. And indeed if we consider that they extended to all duties, cases, and exigencies, whether moral, political, or ceremonial; that the moral were to be of eternal obligation; that the political were to endure as long as the Jewish polity; that great part of the ceremonial were typical of, and consequently to last, at least, till the coming of the Messiah; if we consider further, that the priests and rulers were to be no more than the bare guardians of them, and that they were forbid, under pain of death, and of the divine curse, to add, diminish, or alter the least part of them; it will be scarce credible that Moses would have given them such a firm and durable sanction, and backed it with the divine authority, had any but God been the author or confirmer of them.

- OUR design, however, is not to dwell here upon the display of their excellency above those of all other nations, much less to confute all the empty cavils that have been raised against them from different quarters. This has been already done by Josephus, Philo, Maimonides, Moses Gerundensis, and a great many more among the Jews, and by a greater number of learned divines, both of this and other churches, to whose province it belongs more particularly<sup>a</sup>. We might indeed conveniently enough have followed their distinction of them into moral, political, and ceremonial, and so have given the following body of them under those three heads: especially because such a distinction is generally thought to be hinted at by the three different terms which Moses makes use of, laws or precepts, judgments and statutes<sup>b</sup>; but if we consider, that Moses makes use of some other terms likewise to express them by, such as ordinances, testimonies, and some others in a very undeterminate sense; that he calls the same laws sometimes by one, and sometimes by another of these names; and, lastly, that this distinction will not hold with respect to very many of those laws, which are partly moral, and partly ceremonial and political, and so vice versa, we shall have little ground to think, that the Jewish law-giver designed to intimate any such distinction of those terms. Thus the law concerning the seventh day, or day of rest, is partly ceremonial and typical, and partly moral and political, as it was designed as well for the ease and rest of the labourers, servants, and slaves, as for that of their masters<sup>c</sup>. To this we may add here, that these laws did likewise differ with respect to their observance and obligation. Some of them, such as the making the tabernacle, altar, setting up the blessings and curses on mount Ebal and Gerizzim, were to be observed but once for all; others were to last no longer than the time of the Messiah, and others to the end of the world. When therefore they are commanded to observe all the laws and ordinances of Moses, some of which were of no force out of the land of Palestine, the Jews, in those cases, understand the precept, not of an actual observance, but of a constant remembrance, and readiness to obey them, whenever they shall become in force again<sup>d</sup>.

BESIDES, as we are writing the history of the Jews, it may perhaps be thought more proper that we should give the body of their laws in the same order and method in which they themselves have collected and digested them out of the five books of Moses, in which they lie scattered, and which they call, by way of excellency, Ha-thorab, the law (A); but the truth is, they have jumbled them so together, without order or method, and blended them so with those which they pretend were delivered by God to Moses, and conveyed by oral

<sup>a</sup> Vide inter al. GROT. SELDEN, PUFF. CUMBERL. GASTREL, LABBAD. CUN. BASNAG. <sup>b</sup> BASNAG. Republ. Hæb. lib. i. cap. 18. <sup>c</sup> Confer Exod. xx. cum Deut. v. 19. <sup>d</sup> Vide MURST. præf. in lib. sequent.

(A) This תורה Thorab, or law, they divide, as we do, into five books, which they call by the first word of each: thus, they call Genesis בראשית Beresbith, that is, in the beginning; Exodus they call אלה שמות, Elle-shemoth, these are the names; Leviticus ויקרא Vajiera, and he called; Numbers וידבר, Vaidabber, and he spake; and, Deuteronomy אלה הדברים, Elle-badevarim, these are the words. These five books, or pentateuch, are again subdivided into fifty four פרשות parashoth, or sections, of unequal lengths, according to the subject; so that, by joining two of the shortest together, they read the whole law once a year. The generality of the Jews attribute these divisions, and the constitution of reading them on the sabbath, to Moses; but the Christians, with more probability, to Esdra (1), from whom it was continued, even to the times of the apostles, if not longer (2). The first parasha reaches from oral tradition (B), that our readers would be rather confounded, than instructed by them. Those that are willing to be further satisfied about it may see the abridgment which Munster has given us of them, and of the Jewish comments upon them, with his version of each, as he has collected them from their Talmud and other rabbinic works. All, therefore, that we shall say further of it is, that they divide these laws only into negative and affirmative (C,) in imitation of the decalogue, which not only begins with three negative laws, but contains, in all, eight of that kind, and but two affirmative. Accordingly, they reckon up the negative laws to the number of three hundred sixty five, and the affirmative to two hundred and forty eight; in all, six hundred and thirteen: and as they have a wonderful skill in fetching some significant mysteries out of every text and subject, they have not failed to apply the first number to the days of the year, and the second to the number of parts in a human body; and to affirm, that God designed thereby to inculcate, that not a day of our life ought to pass without meditating upon this law of God, nor any member of our bodies be enjoyed, which is not consecrated and employed in his service, according to that saying of Ecclesiastes, fear God and keep his commandments, for that is the whole [duty] of man. These, and all such like moralising reveries, is what they have drawn from their Cabbala, or oral tradition, of which from Gen. i. and 1. to Gen. vi. 9. and is called Bereishith; the second reaches to Gen. xii. 1. and is called Noach, from Noah being the chief person mentioned in it; the third, which reaches to Gen. xviii. is called Lek Leka, go thy ways, from the command of God to Abraham to go out of his native land; and so of the rest.

(1) Vide PACKHURST Alazrab. sect. de Parashab. (2) Vide Act. xiii. 15, & 27. xv. 21.

The Jews have always expressed a greater veneration for these five books, than for any of those which they received afterwards, tho' they look upon the latter as divinely inspired: the reason they give for it is, that Moses, being in many respects, vastly superior to all the other prophets, and inspired writers, a great preference ought to be given to his writings, upon that account; and they have been so superstitious in this respect, that they look upon it as a crime to lay any of the sacred books upon those of Moses; whereas, they think, the latter may be laid upon any of the others.

(B) To the written law the Jews do likewise add the oral one, which, they pretend, was also given by God to Moses, during his abode on mount Sinai. For first they think it absurd to suppose, that he spent all that long interval of twice forty days in the bare writing of the written-law, for which less than one quarter of that time was more than sufficient. They affirm therefore, that he was taken up all the rest of that while in learning the oral law by heart, which he afterwards did carefully deliver by word of mouth to Aaron, Eleazar, and to his servant Joshua, and these to the seventy elders, from whom it passed to all the prophets, the three last of whom, Haggai, Zachariah, and Malachi, delivered it to the grand Sanhedrin; from whom the wise men of Jerusalem and Babylon received it. Thus they affirm, that this oral law, given to Moses, was transmitted from one generation to another, entire and uncorrupted, under the name of קבלה Cabbalah, or tradition, which was afterwards committed to writing by several hands in that volume which they call the Talmud, consisting of two parts, the Mishnah, and Gemarrab, to which they give, by far, the preference to the written books; whence comes that saying of theirs, the Mikdash, or Old Testament, is like water, the Mishnah like wine, and the Gemarrab, being more plain and perfect, like Hipocras, or the richest of wines. For they add, secondly, that the obscurity of the written law, its seeming inconsistency in several respects, and the ill use which God foresaw would be made of it by the wicked, rendered the oral one very necessary, since without it the other would have proved in many respects useless, if not dangerous. These learned gentlemen, who love to call themselves מרביצי התורה, Merabitzze bathora, fixers of, or givers of, rest to the law, do tell us that the obscurity of it is obvious to every reader: as for the inconsistencies, they are such as these; that in one place it is said, thou shalt eat unleavened bread seven, and in another six days: in one place it is said, thou shalt offer the passover to the Lord thy God, sheep, oxen, &c. and in another, only a male lamb without blemish: one text says, that the Lord came down upon mount Sinai, to speak to the people; and another says, that he spoke to them from heaven. These are the mighty contradictions which they pretend cannot be reconciled without the help of the oral law (3). Well might Christ say of them, that they strained at a gnat, and swallowed a camel (4), since these are but trifles, compared to those which we meet with among these learned compilers of the Talmud, and their commentators, tho' they all pretend to expound all these seeming difficulties, and pretended contradictions of the written, by the help of this oral law: for this reason we shall not spend any more time in confuting this vain pretence of theirs, nor the absurd and fabulous comments with which it is stuffed, but shall content ourselves with giving now and then a sketch of them, in a note, as we go on with the body of their laws, as well when they are judicious and right, as when they are superstitious or wrong, and deserving of the censure which our Saviour pass upon them, that they had made the word of God of none effect by their tradition (5).

(C) These they call, according to the genius of the Hebrew tongue, מצוות לא תעשה Mitzvotb la taghaffeh, and מצוות עשה Mitzvotb ghaaffeth, that is, commandments, thou shalt, or shalt not do, or, as we render it, negative and affirmative; concerning which they make this difference, that, if a man sin against the latter, it will be forgiven him upon his repenting or doing some penance for it; but he that sins against a negative precept cannot be cleared by any acts of repentance, but continues under the guilt of it until the day of expiation, at which time it will be forgiven. He that commits a sin worthy of death cannot be sufficiently cleared on the expiation day, or by any thing but by God's severe chastisements; but as for those that prophane or blaspheme the name of God, nothing can expiate their sin, but their being put to death for it.

(3) Vide MAIMON. prefat. in Mishn. MUNST. prefat. in Mitzvotb-bathora. CUN. BARNAG. & al.
(4) Matt. xxiii. 24. (5) Mark vii. 13, & alib.

- a we have given an account in a late note : however, it must be owned, that their Caraites, a wise and ancient sect among them, did always reject it, and applied themselves wholly to the plain meaning of the text ; but these are but few, in comparison of the rest, and are mortally hated by them ; the reader may be convinced of it, by one instance, among a thousand. The Caraites are all very rich, and are so often at a loss for a wife among themselves, that they would gladly purchase one at any rate, from their other brethren, the Talmudists ; but, as well as these love money, they never could yet be persuaded to give one of their daughters to any of them, tho' never so rich, and themselves never so indigent.
- b BUT here it will be necessary to observe, that tho' this Jewish Cabbala, or oral tradition, is justly rejected by all the Christians, as being stuffed with the most carnal and ridiculous notions ; yet there is another Cabbala, which has been received by some of the ancient fathers, and is to this day strenuously defended by many learned moderns. This they call, by way of distinction, Kabbla, or reception, and contains that mystical sense of the Old Testament, in which, it is pretended, the writers of the New understood and explained it, which sense they affirm has been conveyed to them from Moses by the prophets, not by a human tradition, but by divine inspiration, as being very different, if not contrary, to the obvious and literal one. This, they think, is plain from the interpretation, which some of the evangelists, particularly St. Matthew as well as St. Paul, give of several prophecies quoted by them, particularly those which the reader will find in the margin †, †, in a sense so foreign from the literal one, that it cannot, in their opinion, be justified without having recourse to this Christian Kabbla, as they term it. We have no business to enter into the merits of this question, which has been so lately and so learnedly debated by the writers for and against the accomplishment of literal prophecy. All that we shall venture to say farther is, that, if such a mystical and primary sense be admitted, it must be confined to the writers of the New Testament, who, besides their being inspired, could prove their interpretations by miracles ; for it is plain, that some of the primitive fathers have gone such great lengths in that way, that Origen, learned as he was, has made himself ridiculous by them, and saint Jerom and Austin, tho' more moderate than he, have in many cases over-shot the mark †† ; but to return to the written laws, we shall endeavour to give the main body of them under such distinct heads and classes, as shall give our readers a clear idea of them, and, to avoid prolixity, we shall take the liberty to abridge some, and to omit those that are either of small consequence, or whose design is not sufficiently understood. For the same reason we shall subjoin to every law the ceremonies, customs, and usages that relate to it, as well on the account of the immediate connexion they have to one another, as because the latter are often explanatory of the former ; that so the reader may at one view have a compleat system of the Jewish laws, religion, government, manners and customs, as they all flowed from the same divine original. As for the laws, they generally run in the stile of the five or six following ones, which we give only as a specimen of it, but which for that reason shall follow no further.
- c
- d
- e
- f

Laws against idolatry, and for the pure worship of the only true God.

THOU shalt have no other Gods before, or besides, me <sup>1</sup>.

YE shall not profane or take in vain (D), but hallow, God's holy name <sup>a</sup>.

Laws against idolatry.

YE shall utterly destroy all the idols, altars, groves, and all other monuments of Canaanitish idolatry <sup>a</sup>.

YE shall not tempt the Lord your God (E), as ye did in the wilderness <sup>a</sup>.

f YE shall make no image or representation of God, from the likeness of any of the celestials, terrestrial or aquatick bodies <sup>a</sup>.

†, † Matt. ii. 15, 17, 23. Rom x 6. & seq. comp. with Deut. xxx. 12, and Eph. v. 31. with Gen. ii. 24. Hebr. ii. 6. with Ps. lxxxiv. & al. †† Vide int. al. HIERON. in Matt. xxvii. 51. Vide BASNAG. ex CANAEN. RHENFORD, Op. Philolog. & al. Vide MUND. חֲסוֹת הַתּוֹרָה מִשּׁוּם חֲסוֹת הַתּוֹרָה. <sup>1</sup> Exod. xx. 3. <sup>a</sup> Exod. xx. 7, Levit. xvii. 32. & al. <sup>a</sup> Deut. xii. 2. & seq. <sup>a</sup> Deut. vi. 16. <sup>a</sup> Exod. xx. 4. Deut. iv. pass. & v. 8.

(D) That is, as the Jews understand it, rightly enough, by giving it to idols, as Aaron did, when he called the molten calf the Gods that brought Israel out of Egypt. This is one of those sins which they think cannot be expiated but by the death of the sinner ; and for which Aaron must have undergone that fate, had not Moses interceded for him.

(E) This precept they understand of those who serve God only in hopes of some temporal advantage, which they look upon as a lesser kind of idolatry.

YE shall not bow down nor worship any kind of idol (F) <sup>a</sup>.

WHOSOEVER enticeth another to commit idolatry shall be stoned as soon as he is convicted of it <sup>c</sup>.

THE spoil of an idolatrous city shall not be saved upon any account, but be publickly burned. The inhabitants of it shall be put to the sword, and the place shall be no more rebuilt, but continue an heap for ever <sup>c</sup>.

THE silver, gold, and other precious ornaments belonging to idols shall not be turned to advantage, but be destroyed with the utmost abhorrence <sup>c</sup>.

WHOSOEVER sacrificeth his seed to Moloch (G), whether he be an Israelite or a sojourner in the land, shall be stoned to death <sup>c</sup>.

THERE are several more to the same purpose interspersed and often repeated <sup>b</sup> in the four last books of Moses, which we need not dwell longer upon. Of the same nature are also those which forbid all commerce, intercourse, contracting of affinity with idolatrous nations, and all kind of imitation of their ways, lest they should insensibly draw them into their idolatries; of the same kind were those which condemned the use of familiar spirits, enchantments, observing of times and omens <sup>a</sup>, divinations, resorting to wizards and necromancers, and such like, under pain of death <sup>a</sup>; as also the rounding of the corners, or temples, of the head, and marring the corners of their beards, cutting their flesh, or making any marks upon it <sup>a</sup> for the sake of the dead; and lastly the promiscuous use of apparel in either sex, in imitation of the Canaanites <sup>c</sup>.

Positive laws concerning the worship of the one true God.

Laws concerning the true worship of God.

THAT the Lord, who delivered his law from mount Sinai, is the only God in heaven and earth (H) <sup>b</sup>.

THAT he alone is to be loved with all one's heart, mind, and strength <sup>a</sup>; that he only is to be feared above all things <sup>a</sup>, and his name to be sanctified.

THAT they shall engrave his laws in their hearts, diligently teach them to their children and grand-children; and wear them for a sign upon their head, as frontlets between their eyes, and write them upon the gates, posts, and other parts of their houses <sup>c</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> Exod. xx. 5. Deut. v. 9. & alib. <sup>b</sup> Deut. xiii. 1. & seq. & alib. pass. <sup>c</sup> Ibid. ver. 15. & seq. <sup>d</sup> Ibid. vii. 25, 26. <sup>e</sup> Levit. xx. 2. <sup>f</sup> Ibid. xix. 26, 31, & alib. <sup>g</sup> Deut. xviii. 9. & seq. <sup>h</sup> Levit. xix. 27. & seq. <sup>i</sup> Deut. xxii. 5, &c. <sup>j</sup> Exod. xx. 1. Deut. vi. 4. <sup>k</sup> Ibid. ver. 5. <sup>l</sup> Ibid. ver. 13. <sup>m</sup> Exod. xiii. 9 & 16. <sup>n</sup> Deut. vi. 8. & seq.

(F) A man is not, according to them, to stoop down before an idol, tho' it were to take a thorn out of his foot, or to take up any thing that he has dropped, or even to take up a little water to drink, tho' ever so thirsty, lest it should be looked upon by any by-stander as an act of respect to it; in all such cases therefore they must sit down upon the ground, with their backs to it, and then no such scandal can be taken (6). However no idolatry was deemed capital, unless accompanied with one of these four things, rearing an altar, offering sacrifice, burning incense, and adoration (7).

(G) We have already given an account of this Ammonitish deity and its worship, in the history of Ammon †. All that needs be added here, with respect to the different opinions of authors, both Jewish and Christian, concerning the meaning of the phrase of making their sons and daughters to pass through the fire, which we there took notice of, is, that there are several express texts of scripture which prove, that it was neither a bare leaping over a fire, nor a being carried between two fires set close by one another; but a real burning of them to death (8). In the second book of Kings it is said, that the Seppharvantes burnt their children in the fire, to Adramelech and Anammelech their gods (9); which we have shewn elsewhere were, in all probability, the same with Moloch ‡. 'Tis plain from the prophet Amos (10) and St. Stephen (11), that the Israelites had been much addicted to the worship of this idol, whose tabernacle they are said to have carried about with them in the wilderness, but that they should continue it in Canaan after Moses had made it capital, and God had expressly told them, that he would set his face against such offenders, and exterminate them from the midst of his people (12), is somewhat surprizing, and yet the sequel of this history will shew, that several, even of the kings of Judah, were guilty of that abominable cruelty. How it came to be at the first introduced into the world, we have elsewhere endeavoured to account for *. As for what is commanded concerning the destroying of all the monuments of idolatry, the Jews understood it only of those places which became theirs by conquest, beyond which the command did not extend; and as to the idolatrous cities, they affirm, that they were first of all to forewarn them, and if they forsook their idolatry, they were to be spared, but if they persisted, they were then to be destroyed. They likewise understood the prohibition of turning any of the spoil to their advantage in so strict a sense, that they thought it even unlawful to sit under the shade of any of their trees. But it is plain, that this great aversion to idolatry and idolatrous things did not shew itself, till they had severely smarted for their too great propensity to it under the Babylonish captivity.

(H) This precept in one place † begins thus: שְׁמַע יִשְׂרָאֵל יְהוָה אֱלֹהֵינוּ יְהוָה אחד Hear O Israel the Lord our God, the Lord [is] one; — where it is observed, that the y ain in the first, and the

† Deuter

(6) Vide Tractat. Abodah Zarah seu de Idololatria. (7) Vide Munnst. in præc. 17. neg. † Vide sup. p. 393, 394. (8) Vide Pf. cvi. 37, 38. Ijai. lvii. 5. Jerm. xix. 4, & seq. Ezek. xvi. 21. xxiii. 29. & alib. (9) 2 King. xviii. 31. ‡ Ubi sup. (10) Amos w. 26. (11) Act. vii. 43. (12) Levit. xx. 3, & seq. * Vide sup. p. 472. e, f. † Deut. vi. 4.

7 Daleb is the last words, are majuscule, or letters of a larger size than the rest. Whether they were originally written in that manner, as containing some important mystery, as the Jews pretend, or whether altered afterwards by accident, or with design, is not easy to determine: sure it is, they not only urge it as an unanswerable argument against the Christian doctrine, of the Trinity, but from too literal an interpretation of the verses following, they wore these words written on parchment about them, as bracelets and frontlets, and placed them at their beds, doors, &c. just as it is there prescribed. Some ancient fathers (13) were of opinion, that this had been constantly practised, from Moses 'till after our Saviour's time, and that he wore them himself; tho' upon what foundation is hard to guess. Lightfoot and others believe, that they were universally used in our Saviour's time (14); and St. Jerom assures us, that they were so in his, and that those, who did not wear them upon their foreheads, were esteemed irreligious (15). However that be, it is not to be doubted, but their superstition in this respect has still gained ground; this is plain from the many scrupulous niceties which they are bound to observe in the making, writing, and calling of these phylacteries (16).

This verse, which they call the Shemah, from the first word of it, they are likewise obliged by an express command in the oral law, to repeat twice a day; that is, in the morning at sun-rising, and in the evening just as it is set. There is likewise a great deal of superstitious trash prescribed in the Talmud, about the repeating of the words; the eyes, lips, and fingers must be still, that the mind may be wholly intent upon the words; some letters are to be pronounced swiftly, and others slowly; no ordure or dead carcass ought to be nearer the place where the person repeats it, than four cubits at least, and then he is to turn his back to it; but, if the place will not permit such a distance, the ordure is then to be covered up, and the eyes kept from it, and a great deal more to the same purport (17), which it were needless to dwell longer upon. However, since they urge this text so strenuously against the Christians, we shall beg leave, before we dismiss this note, to examine whether the ancient Jews understood it in the same sense as the moderns do: some learned converts from Judaism to Christianity seem to have proved the contrary from their most ancient writings (18); but, as proselytes are always suspected of being over-zealous, there have not been wanting those eminent Christians who, after a mature examination of their evidence, have confirmed it, as we think, beyond all possibility of replying. We shall single only one from among those many, not only as he was very well versed in this kind of learning, but because, as he was not a priest, but a statesman, he may be less suspected of partiality; we mean the great Philippe de Mornay (19), who, among other ancient authors, quotes rabby Simeon ben Jehai, who, in his Zohar, a book by the Jews acknowledged to have been written before the Talmud, if not before Christ (20), quotes the exposition of rabby Ibba, of this text, to this purport, that the first יְהוָה, Jehovah, which is the incommunicable name of God, is the father; by אֱלֹהִים Elohim is meant the son, who is the spring of all knowledge; and by the second יְהוֹיָכִן is meant the holy ghost, proceeding from them, and he is called אֵחָד Achad, one, because God is one. Ibba adds, that this mystery was not to be revealed 'till the coming of the Messiah. The author of the Zohar goes on, and applieth the word bely, which is thrice repeated in the vision of Isaiah (21) to the three persons in the deity, whom he elsewhere calls three sons, or lights, three sovereigns—without beginning, and without end.

It must be owned, that the genuineness of this passage is disputed by the Jews, as well as the authority and antiquity of the book itself by some Christians (22); but as to the first, it is known, that they make no scruple of denying all that makes against them, and that where they dare not do it, as in the case of the sacred writings, they will manifestly pervert the sense, and appeal to the oral law; and as for the Christians, 'tis to be feared they are all but too apt to be partial to their favourite systems, and to over-shoot the mark on both sides. However, tho' it is out of our province to enter any further into the controversy, how far the doctrine of the trinity was, or might be known to the ancient Jews, from several places of the Old Testament, urged against them; yet we beg leave to make an observation or two out of their Talmud, which seem to make very much against them, because they have not yet been taken notice of by any author that we know of. There is one section in it (23), written dialogue wise, in which are several questions, as first, why the names of God, Elohim, Zabaoth, &c. are in the plural number? and secondly, why they are joined to verbs in the singular? [thus, for instance, the first verse of Genesis says, Elohim bara, where God is in the plural, and created in the singular, which our divines have applied to the trinity in unity] and thirdly, why God speaks in some places in the plural number, as, let us make man, &c. in our image, &c. (24)? Now it is plain, that to all these questions, or rather objections, the Talmud gives us no answers but what are plainly illusory; and such as the compilers would most probably have suppressed, as well as the questions, had they not designed thereby to make a kind of a tacit acknowledgment, that these irregular expressions contained some mystery, which they did not think lawful to divulge. This was the reason why a learned rabbi (25), who was severely charged with having betrayed the mysteries of his religion, because the straitness of his circumstances had forced him to accept of the generous offer from a Roman cardinal, of a large salary for teaching the Hebrew tongue, protests among other things, which he urges in his own vindication, that he had never so much as explained the first verse of Genesis.

But what will convince our readers, that this was the case of the writers of the Talmud, is the answer that is given in the chapter above quoted, to the question, why the throne of God is in the plural number in Daniel's vision (26). The words in the Chaldee are כְּרִסְוֹן רִמְיוֹ, Carsovan remio, which our version renders the thrones were cast down, contrary to the express meaning of the verb רָמָה which signifies to raise, to exalt and set up, in which sense all the Jews do rightly understand it. The question therefore that is asked is,

(13) ORIG. CHRYSOST. HIERON. EUPHYM. in Matt. xxiii. (14) LIGHTFOOT, SCALIGER, MALDON, & al. (15) HIERON. in Matt. xxiii. vide & THEOPHILACT. in loc. (16) Vide LEO de MODEN. Ceremon. Jud. part i. c. 12. (17) Vide WOTTON's Verf. of the Mishnah. sub voc. Shemah. (18) Vide inter al. RAYMOND. MARTIN, Pugio Fidei pass. (19) Advertisement aux Juifs, c. 3. Vide si lubet MEYER Theolog. de Myster SS. Trinis. HAYEMAN, Jooden Vegh Wyzer, & al. (20) Vide BUXT. few. Tiberiad. in voc. יְהוָה Zohar. BARTOLOC. & WOOLF. Biblist. Rabin. (21) Ch. vi. 3. (22) Vide WOOLF. Biblist. Rabin. No. 2175. p. 1134. & seq. (23) Tract. Sanhedrin. (24) Gen. i. 26. iii. 22. & alib. & Vide sup. p. 44. note (o) (25) Elias Levis. vide pref. ejusd. in Grammat. Hebraic. (26) Dan. vii. 9.

THAT they shall circumcise their hearts, as well as their flesh * (I); and a be no more rebellious to him, but serve him sincerely, cleave unto him, and swear by his name alone †.

THAT the whole law shall be read by the priests to all the people, men, women, and children, every seventh year, at the feast of the tabernacles †, and the substance of it shall be learned by heart by every Israelite; and that every king of Israel shall be obliged to write a copy of it with his own hand, from that which was by Moses committed to the custody of the Levites, in order to be constantly read and observed by him * (K).

THAT all blessings shall be thankfully acknowledged to come from God (L), and his punishment submissively received, as fatherly chastisements, or trials of b their obedience †.

THE law shall be engraven upon stones, and set up upon an altar, and the blessings of obedience, and curses for disobedience, shall be publicly set up upon the mounts Gebal and Gerrizzim, for a perpetual remembrance †.

No forgiveness, or deliverance from punishment for any disobedience shall be expected, without a deep sense and acknowledgment of the fault †.

BURNT offerings, sacrifices, tithes, vows, firstlings of the flock, and free-will-offerings, shall be brought and sacrificed at no other place but that which the Lord shall appoint †.

Laws, positive and negative, concerning the sabbath, passover, and other c festivals, holy days, and fasts.

Laws concerning the sabbath.

THE sabbath, or seventh day, shall be kept holy * (M). No servile work shall be done in it, by master, servant, slave, stranger, or cattle †. There shall no fire be kindled on that day †, nor any thing bought or sold. No per- son * Deut. x. 16. & alib. pass. † Ibid. ver. 20. † Ibid. xxxi. 9. & seq. ad 19. * Ibid. xvii. 18. & seq. † Ibid. viii. pass. † Ibid. xxvii. 1. ad fin. 28. pass. † Ibid. xxx. pass. † Ibid. xii. 5. & seq. † Exod. xxiii. 12. xxxiv. 21. Deut. 5. 12 & 39. & alib. † Exod. xx. 8. & seq. Deut. v. 12. & seq. † Exod. xxv. 3.

why the throne, on which the ancient of days was to sit, is put in the plural † after several trifling answers which are there given as the solutions of several learned rabbies, the last but one of whom pretends that the plural implies the thrones of God and David; the last and concluding one is to the following purpose, that it is blasphemy to set the creature on the throne of the Creator, blessed for ever, and closes the whole with these notable words, if any one can solve this difficulty let him do it, if not let him go his way and not attempt it. The meaning of it being too obvious to want explaining we shall wholly submit to the reader, and only add, that something very like this seems to be intimated in that distinction in their creed; about the unity of God, namely, that he is one by an oneness or unity peculiar to himself †.

(I) What is meant by the circumcision of the heart needs not be told, it being here and elsewhere put in opposition to stubbornness, rebellion, and stiff-neckedness. We have already spoken of that in the flesh in another section (27); the manner in which it was performed shall be shewn when we come to speak of the Jewish ceremonies.

(K) What the abstract or substance of the law was, we have elsewhere shewn †, but the Jews conclude, from the words of Moses (28), write ye therefore this song, &c. that every private man was obliged to write likewise a copy of it; but it seems rather, that he only enjoined them to learn it by heart †. They add that, if the king had not writ a copy of it before he came to the crown, he was obliged to write two after it, the one to be deposited in his treasure-house, and the other to be kept about him for his daily meditation and instruction (29).

(L) This command of praising the Lord for his blessings, they also extend to saying grace at least before meat, in which their strictness is such, that, if a man through inadvertency chance to neglect it, he is bound, if he is gone abroad, to return home, as soon as he recollects his omission, and perform that duty. They likewise enforce from it the necessity of washing of hands before eating, and affirm that he that eats with unclean hands is equally guilty with him that eateth unclean meat. They add many more of the like superstitious niceties, for which, however, they own, they have no positive command either in the written or oral law; except that one which enjoins them to submit to the ordinances of their wise men (30.). Well therefore might our Saviour so often reprove them, for being stricter observers of these human injunctions, than they were of the more weighty points of the law of God, justice, mercy, &c. (31.)

(M) What that sanctification of the sabbath consisted in before David, or rather Solomon's time, except repairing to the tabernacle, if they dwell near it, rehearsing the wonders which God had done for them, and a total cessation from work, is not easy to guess. We have endeavoured in a former section (32) to account for this indolent observation, from which the day is called שַׁבָּת, Sabbath, or rest. The Jewish doctors have stretched this abstinence from work to the most superstitious degree. They extend it not only to every business that that tends to the getting of food and raiment, such as plowing, sowing, reaping, threshing, and the like, which they make to amount to thirty nine negative precepts, besides many others which are as appendixes to them; such as those that follow: grafts must not be walked upon lest it be bruised by it: a horse must not be rid lest it be galled; if wet of any kind fall upon one's cloaths it must not be wringed out, nor dirt be brushed off them; an apple must not be put to the fire to roast, or any liquid be mingled with mustard, tho' never so dry; a flea must not be caught whilst it hops about, but if it fasten upon the flesh it may; vermin that is ingendered by the sweat of the body, such as lice, &c. reptiles and insects that sting, such as vipers, scorpions, wasps, gnats and the like, may be killed; and so may mad dogs and wild beasts, if they assault one, but, if quiet or running from one, they must be let alone.

* Art. 1. (27) Sup. p. 427. (R). † Sup. p. 540. (F). (28) Deut. xxxi. 19. * Vide sup. p. 542. 2. and (H). (29) Vide præcept. affirm. 24, 25. (30) Vide præc. affirm. 27. (31) Matt. xv. 3. & seq. (32.) Sup. p. 540. sub fin. (E).

Whatever ought not to be done in publick, is likewise forbid to be done in private; tho' they do not all agree in this, some of them thinking it lawful to do some things in private, such as wiping any dirt or filth off one's cloaths and the like in a corner, which it would be unlawful to do in sight of others. If a house chance to be set on fire, nothing is to be saved from the flames but the victuals and cloaths designed for the sabbath, unless it be a chest or bag in which there is a sacred book, in which case it may be carried off, tho' there chance to be also money in it. It is not lawful to ride in a coach or cart tho' a heathen drive it. No singing, dancing, playing upon instruments, or any kind of noise is allowed, tho' it were to quiet a cross child. No cause is to be tried, accounts made or cast up, or marriages solemnised. No discourse about buying and selling, or any other worldly matter, much less loose and profane talk is to be suffered; a field, vineyard, orchard and the like is not to be visited on the sabbath, with many more of the like nature. However they allow it to be violated in cases of dangerous sickness, by administering any help to the sick; a woman may be assisted in her labour, or even be cut open, if she die in it, and there be any hope of saving the child.

The positive precepts concerning the sabbath run much in the same strain, we shall only instance in two or three of them. On that day every one is obliged according to their circumstances to put on clean linnen, to wear better cloaths than ordinary, to eat flesh, fish, or fowl, to drink wine, and to eat at least once in six hours. Care also is to be taken that a clean table-cloth be laid, and the victuals set upon it, the beds made and the lamps lighted before the entrance of the sabbath, which begins and ends with them on or about sun-set according to the saying in Genesis, the evening and the morning were the first day (33).

A learned Jewish author tells us †, that they were obliged in all districts and towns throughout Israel to blow the trumpet on the evening of the sixth day, six different times from some eminence, whence it might be easily heard at a due distance, so that they who were abroad in the fields might have timely notice to repair to their habitations before the sabbath began. Accordingly, at the sound of the first trumpet, they left off work, and began to march homeward: at the second sounding, all shops, stalls, and places of trade were shut up: at the third the pots and kettles were taken off the fire, the tables cover'd, and the meat dressed for the sabbath was set upon them, &c. The last trumpet was generally about sun-set; and on the next night, as soon as they could perceive two or three stars in the sky, the trumpets blew from the same places to proclaim the end of the sabbath; at which time the head of the family, after a short prayer, wished himself and the rest a good week, as he did a good sabbath at the entrance of it. From this blowing of these trumpets from some high places, a cabbalistical philologist (34) hath concluded, that the מוסף השבת, Musaf-hassabat, the vail, or as our version renders it the covering of the sabbath, which king Ahaz took away from the temple (35), was some kind of watch-tower on the top of it, from which the priests used to proclaim the entrance and exit of the sabbath to those that lived at Jerusalem. But, for aught we can see, it might as well have been any thing else.

The Jews are fallen into several extravagant notions about the sabbath, some of which we shall but just hint; such as that the obligation of sanctifying it is of much greater force than any other command; that it is the soul and totum of all the rest; so that he that violates it breaks all the rest. That on that day the demons, satyrs, and other such hurtful creatures shun the light of it, and do not return from deserts and dark caverns to infect mankind till it is over, with many more of the like nature, which the reader may see at full length in Leo de Modena (36).

It must be owned however, that many of the wiser Jews do make the sanctification of the sabbath to consist in duties of a more noble nature, than these talmudical trifles; namely, in meditation on the wonderful works of God, in the study of his law, and instructing those that are under them in it (37). Some of them do even maintain, that they used to assemble themselves every sabbath, even from the time of Moses, to hear the law read and expounded (38). And this is likewise believed by several learned men among the Christians (39), who infer it from the words of St. James, that Moses ἐκ πόλεως ἀρχαίου has in every city them that preach him, being read in the synagogues every sabbath day (40). All that we dare say is that the much greater number are of opinion, that this custom was not set on foot till Ezra's time. All that the priests were commanded to do on the sabbath was only to set the new shew-bread on the tables, to take away the old one (41), and to offer the meat, drink, and burnt offerings peculiar to that day (42); however their ancient doctors did since clog it with such a number and variety of precepts, and subtilities; and those that came after have been so divided about the right meaning of them, and their practice has so often varied, that it is impossible for them to know whether they kept it right, or not. This made some of their rabbies say, that, if they could but observe two sabbaths as they ought, God would soon put an end to all their miseries (43).

Whether the observation of the sabbath or seventh day be as old as the creation, as some authors both Jews and Christians contend for, from those words of Moses, and the Lord blessed the seventh day and sanctified it (44), or whether that text means no more than that God set apart that day to be afterwards observed by the Israelites, as the far great-son shall be put to death for any crime whatsoever, no travelling shall be allowed on the sabbath* (N).

(33) Gen. i. 5. vide MÜNST. in loc. & præcep. negat. & affirm. de sabbat. † MAIMON. Traß. Törah cap. v. fesh. 27. vide GOODWIN's Moses and Aaron, l. iii. c. 3. § 10. (34) RHEINFERD Op. Philolog. dissert. 18. (35) 2 King. xvi. 18. (36) Cerem. Jud. part. iii. c. 1. vide & MÜNST. in Gen. ii. 1. & Exod. xx. & præc. affirm. 29. (37) Vide MÜNST. in Exod. xx. MEYER. de Temp. Sacr. cap. ix. § 66. (38) PHIL. in vit. Mos. JOSEPH. cont. Apion, lib. ii. Talm. Hieros. Traß. McGill. MAIMON. Tephilab, & Bircath-bacchanim, & ad. mult. (39) Vide COCCIJ Sum. Theol. c. xxi. § 14. & seq. GROT. & MEYER. ubi. sup. (40) Act. xv. 12. comp. with ver. 36. (41) Levit. xxiv. 6, 8. (42) Num. xxviii. 9, & seq. (43) Vide BUXTORF. Synag. Jud. c. xi. (44) Gen. ii. 3.

THE sabbath-breaker shall be stoned<sup>1</sup>; with several others, either to the same purpose, or of less moment.

Laws relating to the three grand festivals, the passover, the feast of the weeks, and the feast of the tabernacle.

The three grand festivals.

THREE times a year shall all the male children appear before the Lord their God, at the place by him appointed; namely, at the feast of unleavened bread, or passover, at the feast of the weeks, or pentecost, and at the feast of tabernacles. They shall not come empty-handed before him but every er part of the fathers and Christian commentators understand it; is a question which, tho' more curious than important, has been very strenuously debated on all hands. The Jews are as divided about it as we are; for whilst some affect to call the sabbath their spouse, as being granted to the Jews alone exclusive of all other nations (45), others affirm that all the patriarchs and all good men did observe it up to Adam, whom they pretend to have been the author of the 92d psalm, intitled, a psalm or song for the sabbath day (46). They likewise interpret the words in Genesis, because Abraham — has kept my charge, of his keeping the sabbath (47). The same they affirm of Jacob, and add, that the reason of his taking up his lodging in the open field in his way to Mesopotamia was, that it happened to be the eve of the sabbath, so that he was obliged to stop there as soon as he perceived that the sun was about setting (48). Job's offering sacrifices for his seven sons, every seventh day, is likewise understood of his keeping the sabbath, tho' another reason seems to be given in the text (49.)

<sup>1</sup> Ibid. xvi. 29, & alib.

<sup>1</sup> Ibid. xxxi. 14, 15.

Josephus and Philo go still further, and affirm that the observation of it had been preserved among the Gentiles. The former says, that there was scarce any nation either Greek or Barbarian, that did not in some measure conform to the observance of the sabbath (50); and Philo assures us (51), that it was not a festival peculiar to any nation or country, but common to all, and kept as a kind of birth-day of the world. He adds in another place that the Jews, whilst in Egypt, having quite forgot the seventh day, God was pleased to indicate it to them by sending them manna six days, and staying it on the seventh (52). We find likewise several ancient writers among the Heathens, such as Homer, Hesiod, and others quoted by the fathers, who speak of the seventh day as sacred to religion (53). Something like this may also be gathered from that absurd account which some others, particularly Tacitus and Plutarch, give of the Jews observing it in imitation of the Heathens, who consecrated that day to Saturn according to the former (54), or to Bacchus according to the latter, who adds that he was also named Sabbos, because they used frequently to shout out the word Sabbos at his festival (55). However as these testimonies would at best amount to a bare probability, and seem contradicted by some express texts both in the writings of Moses and some of the prophets (56), which intimate that the sabbath was given to the Israelites for a memorial of their deliverance from Egyptian bondage, and to distinguish them from all other nations; the far greater part of Christians, both ancient and modern, have declared for the other side (57); and it must be owned that, if that festival had been instituted and kept from the beginning, we cannot see why Moses should be so exact and cautious in the particulars he gives about the institution and observance of it, especially in his prohibition of gathering manna on that day; unless we suppose with Philo, that the Israelites had quite lost the memory of it.

We must beg leave to close this note with taking notice of that expression in one of the gospels (58), ἐν σαββάτῳ ἡμετέροισιν, in the second prime sabbath, or as our version more clearly renders it, on the second sabbath after the first, which has puzzled a world of commentators, till Jos. Scaliger did hit upon an explication (59), which has been universally approved and followed ever since (60). We need not to trouble our readers with the various conjectures of the rest. That of our author carries its own evidence, being founded on the Jewish manner of computing the sabbaths from the feast of the passover to that of the weeks, or from Easter to Whitsunday. The first of these, namely, that which immediately followed the two great feasts, or the first and last day of the passover, was by them called שבת שני ראשון, Sabbath, Sheni-reshon, the second prime sabbath; the next was called the second second, or the second after the second prime; the third second third, and so unto the seventh, which last did immediately precede the feast of the weeks or pentecost (61). The fact for which this sabbath is recorded by the evangelist, namely, Christ's disciples plucking and rubbing the ears of corn, confirms this exposition, their harvest happening always between Easter and Whitsunday.

(N) Tho' the text do expressly say, that they shall not stir out of their place, yet it could mean no other than a prohibition of going out to gather manna, for it is plain they were obliged to repair to the tabernacle from all parts of the camp, and afterwards to the temple from all quarters of Jerusalem (62); however the Jews understand it of going out about worldly business, or for a every man shall offer unto the Lord according to the ability wherewith he hath blessed him * (O).

(45) Vide SELDEN & Rabbin. ab eo citatos. (46) Vide Chald. Paraphr. Targum, in titul. Ps. xcii. Middrash Tehill. Talm. Babyl. Tract. Sanhedr. & al. (47) R. SALOM. in Gen. xxvi. 5. (48) Beresh. Rabb. Paraph. 79. Talm. Tract. שבת R. BECHAI, & al. (49) Vide ABENEZ. in Job i. 25. (50) Cont. Apion. lib. ii. ad fin. (51) De Opific. Mund. (52) In vit. Mos. lib. i. (53) Vide EUSEB. præp. lib. xiii. c. 12. CLEM. ALEX. Stromat. lib. v. & al. (54) Histor. lib. v. (55) Symposiac. lib. iv. (56) Vide Exod. xxxi. 13. Deut. v. 15. & alib. pass. vide & Jerem. xviii. 22. Ezek. xx. 12, 20. (57) JUST. Dial. cont. Tryph. TERTUL. cont. Jud. lib. iv. IREN. cont. Hæres. lib. iv. & al. vide SELD. de Jur. Natural. Gent. BUXT. discipl. Hæbr. lib. iii. c. 13, & seq. SPENC. de Leg. Rit. Hæbr. JUN. LE CLERC. CALM. Comm. in Gen. ii. & al. mult. (58) Luk. vi. 1. (59) De Emend. Temp. lib. vi. (60) Vide LIGHTFOOT. CAUSAB. BARON. JUN. GROT. in loc. GOODWIN's Mos. & Aar. Sir ISAAC. NEWT. & al. (61) Vide s. lib. Mishnam Tract. מנחות cap. 5. (62) Vide Levit. xxiii. 3.

Of the passover.

WE have already spoken of its institution, and the occasion and design Easter or of it in a former section †; the laws relating to it are to the following passover purpose.

It shall be of perpetual obligation, both to the Israelites and to all circumcised proselytes *.

No circumcised person, whether of the seed of Abraham, or admitted into b the commonwealth by circumcision, unless hindered by sickness, journeying, or some pleasure; and indeed upon any account, beyond what they call a sabbath's day's journey; this distance is not indeed fixed by Moses or any other prophet, but is determined at two thousand cubits. And tho' they differ among themselves about the length of that measure, some making it much longer than others, yet they agree that the safest way is not to exceed two thousand moderate paces (63), and this seems to be pretty near the distance between Jerusalem and the Mount of Olives, which St. Luke calls a sabbath day's journey (64), of which we have already spoken †; however he that exceeded that distance was not judged a violator of the sabbath, but came off with a beating, whereas the breaker of it was to be stoned to death (65).

* * Dent. xvi. 16, 17. Exod. xxiv. 23, & alib. † Sup. p. 500. * Exod. xii. 14, 24, & alib.

(O) The Talmud however exempts from this obligation, 1. The women, who were to take care of their families, unless their husbands permitted them to go with them, as in the case of Hannah and the virgin Mary. 2. Boys under 12 years of age, who were not under the obligation of the law, or called בתורה בני, Ben-torah, that is, the sons or disciples of the law, till they were entered into the 13th, and this seems to be the reason why Christ did not make his first appearance among the doctors at the feast, till he had attained to that age. 3. All old men above sixty. 4. All the sick and impotent, lunatics, &c. And lastly, all that either lived at such a distance from the tabernacle, and afterwards from the temple, or were any otherwise so weak, that they could not perform the journey on foot.

Nothing could be more wisely calculated to preserve the union of the Jewish nation, already so strongly cemented by their religion, laws, weights, measures, customs, &c. which were common to them all, than this frequent and universal concourse to the chief place of worship. But here arise two very great difficulties: first, how Jerusalem could contain such prodigious multitudes, as did flock to those solemnities from all parts of Judea; and secondly, how the Israelites could leave their towns and villages destitute of males, without the greatest danger from those nations which were still left amongst them, and would be ready, no doubt, to embrace every opportunity of retrieving their lands and liberties. Add to this, that those, who lived upon the borders of the land, ran still a greater risk of being invaded by their neighbours, if they had left their country under no better guard than that of old men, women, and children.

To the first difficulty, besides what has been hinted in the geography of the land, concerning the capacity of Jerusalem; it may be answered first, that they did not all appear together on the same day, but that they took it by turns, and stayed in the city but one night; and on the next morning, having performed their devotions, they departed, and made way for others. This is plain from the instance of Elkanah; and secondly, that there were tents and other conveniences for their reception, not only in the empty spaces within, but likewise in all convenient places without the walls of the city. And if this be thought still insufficient for so vast a concourse, what is answered to the second difficulty, of their leaving the country too much exposed to their enemies, will easily remove all that is left of the first.

And here we need not have recourse to improbable conjectures, as Cunæus, Basnage, and others have done, who think that this obligation lasted no longer than during their abode in the wilderness, when their nearness to the tabernacle did easily admit of it. For, besides that, if this had been the case, there would have been no need for Jeroboam to set up the golden calves to prevent his ten tribes going to Jerusalem, their history furnishes us from time to time with sufficient testimonies, that these festivals were kept constantly till after our Saviour's time, as it plainly appears from the vast multitudes that were at Jerusalem, from all parts of the world at the feast of pentecost, when the holy ghost fell upon the apostles. Neither need we secondly suppose with others, that they only sent a certain proportion of men, as one in ten or twelve to Jerusalem, to be as it were the representatives, and to offer the gifts of the rest, whilst these kept the solemnity in their own towns. For, if any such thing had been either allowed or practised, we should certainly have met with something of it in holy writ, whereas the contrary doth rather appear, from the instances above-mentioned. But since there was a permission from God, that they, that were unable to celebrate the passover on the first month, should do it in the second, as we shall see in the next note; will it not be more reasonable to suppose, that they might extend this indulgence also to the other festivals; so as that one half of the males should stay at home to guard their houses, whilst the others went up, and at their return, to go and partake of the solemnity of the second month. It is indeed urged that there was a promise from God, that none should desire their lands whilst they went up to appear before him, but, besides that their natural backwardness in believing him gives us little reason to think that they would commit their wives, children, and all that was dear to them to some legal impurity, shall omit the annual celebration of it, under the penalty <sup>2</sup> of being cut off from his people * (P).

(63) Vide MAIM. Traß. שבת, c. w. f. 27. GOODWIN'S Mos. & Aar. lib. ii. c. 3. § 10. (64) Abi i. 12. † Vide sup. p. 546. (L) (65) Vide MAIM. ubi sup.

No servant or stranger shall eat of it, unless he become circumcised <sup>7</sup>.

THE feast (Q) shall begin on the eve of the fourteenth day of the month Abif, or, as the original expresses it, between the two evenings <sup>2</sup>, at which time the paschal lamb shall be killed (R); and the festival be continued, till the one and twentieth day of the same month at evening.

THE

* Numb. ix. 13, 14.

<sup>7</sup> Exod. xii. 43, & seq.

<sup>2</sup> Ibid. ver. 6. See the margin of our Bible.

his sole care, whilst they went so far from them to worship him, it is plain that those promises were only conditional, that is, as long as they continued steadfast in their obedience, which was so seldom their case, that had their faith in his promises been stronger than it was, yet their disobedience gave them but small encouragement to lay hold on them to such a degree.

(P) We have already given the most probable meaning of this penalty *, and indeed, considering that the principal end of this institution was, not only to perpetuate the memory of all the wonders which God did in Egypt and at the Red-sea, but also to make it a standing and irrefragable monument to all posterity of the truth and certainty of those amazing works †; nothing could be more expedient than to enforce the observation of it under some severe penalties. However, it is evident by the sequel, that they did not understand it of a capital punishment, such as was to be inflicted on blasphemers, idolaters, sabbath-breakers and the like, seeing they not only omitted to celebrate it during their abode in the wilderness without any visible excuse (66); but were afterwards guilty of a most shameful neglect of it during several wicked reigns, till Hezekiah and after him Josiah revived it (67), as we shall see in its proper place.

As for those who by reason of any legal impurity, whether accidental or voluntary, were unfit for, and those who were hindered by any lawful impediment, from celebrating this festival with the rest of the people on the month Nisan, they were ordered to keep it with the usual ceremony, on the following month called Jair. This indulgence was granted by God himself in favour of some men who had defiled themselves by assisting at the burial of some relation (68); and was afterwards made use of by the priests and Levites, who being under some legal impurities, when the king commanded them to revive this festival at its usual time, were forced to postpone it to the next month (69).

(Q) This festival is called in the original פסח, pesach, from the verb passach, which signifies to pass by, or leap over, and not from the Greek, πάσχω, to suffer, as if it had been prophetic of Christ's suffering at that feast, as some ancient fathers have imagined for want of understanding Hebrew (70). God himself explained the etymon, where he commanded them to tell their children, that this was the sacrifice of the Lord's passover אֲשֶׁר פָּסַח, After-passach, who passed by or leaped over the houses of the Israelites (71). It was to begin בֵּין הָעָרֵבִים Ben-baharvaim, between the two evenings (72) of the 14th of the month, called by Moses, Abif, which properly signifies the stalk that bears the ear of corn, because wheat begins to be ripe about this time. This month was afterwards called Nisan, and answers to our March and April. The expression between the two evenings is variously taken. Some reckon the first evening to be between noon and sun-set (73), others between two and six (74), but the most rational opinion, and the most received, is, that the first evening is that which immediately follows sun-set, and that the second begins when that planet is so far sunk below the horizon, that the stars do visibly appear above it (75).

The computation of this new year began at the first new moon that happened nearest, or upon the vernal equinox; with this rule, that the preceding full-moon, how near soever to it, belonged to the last month of the former year. Now as they had no astronomical tables to regulate those conjunctions, but were forced to guide themselves by the first appearance of the new moon, all their diligence, in sending out people to observe it from high-places at sun-set, could not prevent great irregularities happening in their months and years, because sometimes it is not to be seen till the second or third night, nor even then if clouds interpose. Add to this, that they were in all other respects so negligent of their chronology, that it is no wonder if so many learned men have laboured so much to correct and adjust it (76), and with so little success. However, as to the new moons, and those festivals which depended upon them, and indeed all other computations of time, they were committed to the care of the priests and judges, and the people were obliged to abide by their calculations, whether they proved right or wrong (77).

(R) This ordinance of the paschal lamb our learned Spencer thinks to have been one of those which God expressly appointed in opposition to the Zabian and Egyptian worship, in order to cure, as he expresses it, the Israelites of their itch of idolatry, because the ram among them was sacred to Jupiter. He adds also that the ceremony of killing, dressing, and eating of it, namely, neither boiled nor raw, but roasted, with the head and all the other appurtenances, that a bone of it should not be broken, &c. were in like manner opposite to those that were used in sacrifices by those idolaters (78).

As to the Egyptians, the reader may see by what we have often said on that head, that this pretended contrariety is at best but very lame and xxx. & xxxv. pass.

* Sup. p. 500. d. † pag. 505. See the last note

cont. Jud. c. 10.

(73) D. KIMCHI. ap. Munst. in loc.

EZR. SALOM. & al. in loc.

NIER. GENEBR. USSER. Sir Is. NEWT. BEDFORD, & al.

De Leg. Rit. Habr. lib. ii. c. 24.

(68) Vide Numb. ix. 6, & seq.

(74) CALM. DiA. sub voc. Pague.

(76) Vide infra, p. 610. H. & al. vide & SCALIGER. ubi sup.

(77) Vide præc. affirm. 46.

(78) Ibid. ver. 6.

(66) Vide sup. pag. 555. a.

(69) 2 Chron. xxx. 3.

(71) Exod. xii. 27.

(72) Ibid. ver. 6.

(75) MOS. GERUND. ABIN-

(76) Ibid. ver. 6.

(77) Ibid. ver. 6.

(67) 2 Chron.

(70) TERTUL.

(71) Ibid. ver. 6.

(72) Ibid. ver. 6.

(75) MOS. GERUND. ABIN-

(76) Ibid. ver. 6.

(77) Ibid. ver. 6.

- THE first and last day shall be kept holy and free from all servile work, even as the sabbath, except only that on the former victuals may be dressed, but not on the latter<sup>a</sup>; those two days shall likewise be solemnized by an holy convocation<sup>b</sup> (S).

No leaven of any kind shall be used or even kept in the house during those seven days, whosoever useth any leaven on those days, shall be cut off from Israel<sup>c</sup> (T): all leaven therefore shall be removed out of the house before the paschal lamb is killed<sup>d</sup>.

- ON the first day of the passover shall be offered a burnt sacrifice of two young bullocks, one ram, and seven lambs of the first year; with some other offerings of less value<sup>e</sup>; and on the second day of the feast shall be offered, besides the usual sacrifices, a sheaf of the first fruit of that year's harvest; no new corn shall be eaten in any way before the first sheaf has been presented unto the Lord<sup>f</sup> (V). Some other ordinances of less moment about this and other festivals are interspersed in the pentateuch, which we therefore omit.

<sup>a</sup> Compar. Exod. xii. 16. with xxxv. 3. <sup>b</sup> Ibid. ver. 16. <sup>c</sup> Ibid. ver. 15, 19. <sup>d</sup> Ibid. 34. 35, & alib. vide præc. aff. 347. <sup>e</sup> Num. xxviii. 19, & seq. <sup>f</sup> Levit. xxiii. 10, & seq.

imperfect. 1. Because as they, instead of sheep, sacrificed goats to him, so here Moses ordains the killing either a lamb or a kid; and 2. because even they once a year killed a ram in honour of that God, and clothed his golden statue with the skin of it; so that there was nothing in this paschal lamb so very proper to obliterate that piece of idolatry in the worship of Jupiter.

As for the feast of the זֶמֶן, Tzboim, or זֶמֶן, Seboim, we dare venture to say, that it is at least a very bold assumption in our author, to make it more ancient than Moses, when he tells us himself in another place (79) that nothing is more obscure and uncertain, than its origin and antiquity, and that there are as many opinions as authors, and errors as opinions about it. He quotes every where the testimony of Ben Maimon, who tells us among other things (80), that he came to understand the design and meaning of a great number of Moses's laws, by being conversant with the religion, worship, and ceremonies of the Zabians; from which, he adds, that Abraham, who was brought up in them, had been converted. But of what weight the opinion of a Jew, and he far from a strict one, can be of, to account for the design of the Mosaic laws, or of what authority his testimony can be, who lived but in the 12th century, to prove the Zabians to have been so considerable a sect in Abraham's, or even in Moses's time, that God should take such care to preserve his people from their idolatry, by giving them a great number of ceremonies that were quite opposite to theirs, we submit to the reader. Dean Prideaux seems indeed very fond of Maimon's notion, and wonders that any one should dislike it (81), but brings neither proof nor testimony sufficient to back it. However, as to the paschal lamb, we may more justly wonder, that any Christian should fetch its origin from so dark and muddy a source, when the writers of the New Testament have pointed to us one that is so much clearer and more divine, its being a type of Christ. We shall find a more proper place to speak of the nation, or rather sect of the Zabians, and to shew how little their boasted antiquity is to be depended upon.

(h) We find no precept about the keeping of the five intermediate days, except the eating of unleavened bread, and abstaining from very laborious works. The rabbies have supplied that defect by their comments. They allow that time to be spent in mirth, and all lawful recreations; they enjoin all, especially the women, to wear the gayest apparel, to eat flesh, fish, and fowl, and to drink wine. Weddings are forbid during this, and the other two grand festivals, lest the joy, that attends the former, should make them forget the occasion of the latter. Some allow labours of necessity to be done during those five days, and others think it unlawful to take up a straw to pick their teeth. However, they all agree that women may shave and wash themselves, or even their cloaths upon some occasions (82). There is one merry injunction of theirs, that obliges every man and woman, tho' they be so poor that they live by alms, to drink at least four bumpers of wine on the first night of the passover, whilst they are rehearsing the wonders wrought by God in Egypt and at the Red Sea (83), with some more of the like nature not worth repeating (84).

(T) This curse is understood to extend only to the person that eats any thing that has leaven, and not to him who only keeps it within his doors, and whose transgression is only punished with a certain number of stripes. But, in the former case, their doctors are so strict, that they even forbid eating a fowl, in whose crop is found one single grain of corn, because it is apt to ferment where it meets with moisture. They have likewise several wild distinctions with regard to liquors that are, or are not apt to ferment, which are more nice than true, and consequently not worth being dwelt upon (85).

(V) We shall have occasion to speak of all the different kinds of first-fruits which were to be offered to God as a token of their submission, gratitude, and dependance, and of the manner of offering them, when we come to speak of offerings in general. As for this sheave we are now speaking of, it was to be of barley, because it is the first corn that is ripe about this time in that country. It was reaped on the evening of the 15th day of Nisan, and was to be offered up in the name of the whole nation. Thus far the text. The Jews add, that as soon as the evening of the first day of the passover was come, at which time the second began, and in which some kind of works might be done, the בֵּית דִּין, Beith-din, or great council assembled, and deputed three men to go and gather the sheave with

(79) Ubi sup. c. i. sect. 1, 2, & seq. (80) Morè Nervoeh. part iii. c. 29, & 40. Havodab Zarab. c. 11, 12, & alib. pass. (81) Connex. part i. lib. iii. (82) Vide præc. neg. 75. (83) Pr. aff. 40. (84) Pr. neg. 77, & seq. (85) Ibid. pr. 77, & seq.

The feast of the weeks, or pentecost.The feast of weeks.

THIS feast was instituted in memory of the law being given upon mount <sup>a</sup> Sinai, fifty days after the exod (W), and to oblige the people to appear before the Lord, to offer the first-fruits of their harvest (X), as an acknowledgment of his absolute right and dominion over them and their land, and of their dependance upon him.

SEVEN weeks, or fifty days, were to be reckoned from the sixteenth day of the month Nisan, which was the second of the passover, and the fiftieth day was to be the first day of this festival (Y).

THE sacrifices ordained upon this day were to be, besides the two loaves, seven lambs of the first year, one young bullock, and two rams, to be for a burnt offering; together with their usual meat and drink offering, and likewise a kid for a sin <sup>b</sup> offering, and two lambs for a peace offering (Z). No servile work was to be done on that day, save that victuals might be dressed, and a holy convocation was to be called, as on other solemn festivals <sup>c</sup>.

The feast of the tabernacles.The feast of tabernacles.

THIS festival was ordained in memory of the forty years abode of the Israelites in the wilderness; for which reason it is called the feast of the tabernacles, or tents (A); not only because they lived in tents, or booths, during all that time, but because it was to be celebrated in such kinds of booths, made of the

<sup>a</sup> Levit. xxxiii. 15, 16, 18, 19. Exod. xxiv. 22. Numb. xxviii. 27, & alib.

with a kind of solemnity, at which great crouds from the neighbouring cities flocked to Jerusalem, within whose territories it was to be gathered. These deputies asked three times whether the sun was set, and were as often answered by the by-standers in the affirmative. They then asked three times leave to reap the sheave, and it was no sooner granted, but they entered into three different fields, each with a sickle in his hand, and gathered each a distinct parcel, which they put into three different boxes, and brought them to the temple. Here they were threshed, winnowed, and parched, and an Homer, which contains about three pints, was filled with it, and presented to the priest, who poured a quantity of oil, and threw some incense upon it, and having heaved it to the Lord towards the four points of the compass, he threw some part of it on the fire of the altar, and the rest he kept for himself. After this ceremony, it was lawful for every man to begin his harvest (86).

(W) The reader may remember, that the Israelites came out of Egypt on the 15th of the 1st month Abib, or Nisan (87), and came to Sinai on the 3d day of the 3d month, two days after which the law or decalogue was given in the presence of all the people (88).

(X) Some commentators are of opinion, that every family was bound to offer two loaves of the first-fruits of the new corn; but it is more reasonable, that there were but two in all, offered in the name of the whole nation, as the first barley-sheave was, which we mentioned in the last note but one. These loaves were made of wheat, because the wheat harvest was ended about the time of this festival.

(Y) It is therefore called in the original שבועות Shewuoth, Chagg Shebushoth, or the feast of weeks, from the 7 weeks which were reckoned from that of the passover; as, from the fifty days, the Greeks gave it the name of pentecost. Neither the text, nor Josephus, nor any ancient Hebrew writer, tells us whether or no this feast lasted seven days, like these of the passover and of the tabernacles. However, the modern Jews keep it but two days, during which all servile work, except dressing their meat, is wholly set aside. As for their other ceremonies on those two days, as they are foreign to our purpose, the curious reader may see them in Leo de Modena (89).

(Z) There is some difference between the sacrifices that are ordered on this festival, in Leviticus and in Numbers (90). Josephus joins them all together (91); but whoever compares them, will rather think that there is some error of the transcriber, either in one or the other of these places. Buxtorf tells us, that the Jews were so afraid lest they should be mistaken in their calculation of this festival, and that of the passover, that they kept it two days instead of one. He instances in one place of Judith (92), in which the Greek seems to confirm his assertion, and by that means removes the difficulty which has been started, of our Saviour's eating the passover one day before the rest of the Jews (93).

(A) The original calls it חג המנוחות, Chagg Hassukoth, the feast of the tents or booths, from which the Greeks gave it the name of Σκηνοπηγία, Skénopégia (94). Tho' the text says, it was appointed in memory of their abode in the wilderness; yet the Chaldean paraphrast seems to have understood it, not of their living in tents, but in the open air, when he renders the word סוכות, Succoth, Tents, by מללא ענני, the shade of the clouds. It is likewise thought to have been instituted as a feast of thanksgiving for the conclusion of their harvest and vintage, which did generally end there about this time, which answers to the beginning of our October.

(86) Vide מנחות ס. Maimon. תמידים ומוספים. Abenezr. in Dent. xxvi. & al. (87) Exod. xii. 3, 6, 41, 51. (88) Ibid. xix. 1, 13, & seq. vide sup. p. 502, 2, & p. 512. & seq. (89) Cerem. Jud. part iii. c. 4. (90) Comp. Levit. xxiii. 18, 19. & Num. xxxiii. 27. (91) Ant. lib. iii. c. 10. (92) Judith viii. 6. (93) Synag. Jud. vide & Cyril Alex. in Job. xiii. Chrysost. Homil. 82. Epiphani. Eutym. Paul. Burg. Scalig. Jansen. Maldon. & al. mult. (94) LXX, & 1 Maccab. x. 21. 2 Maccab. i. 8, & alib.

- a branches of several sorts of trees, such as willows, palms, olives, and the like (B), and erected in the most decent and convenient manner <sup>a</sup>.

THIS feast was the third grand one, and equal in solemnity to the other two, except in what related particularly to the passover. It began on the eve of the fifteenth day of the seventh month called Tisri, which was the first of the civil year, and answered to part of our September, by which time all the harvest being finished and brought in, they returned their solemn thanks to God for it <sup>1</sup>. It was to last seven days, the first and last of which were kept with the greatest strictness (C), by repairing to the tabernacle, or temple, with palms and other branches in their hands, by marching round the altar, and singing the praises of God; by sacrifices

- b peculiar to the solemnity, over and above the usual ones, and by a cessation from all servile works, except cookery <sup>b</sup>.

THEY were likewise obliged to dwell in those booths all the seven days, and to eat and drink, and lay in them (D), unless lawfully hindered <sup>1</sup>.

THE

<sup>a</sup> Levit. xxiii. 40, & seq. & alib. ver. 14, ad fin.

<sup>1</sup> Exod. xxiii. 16.

<sup>b</sup> Numb. xxix. 13, & alib.

<sup>1</sup> Ibid.

(B) Moses gives us a fuller description of this feast (95) than of any other, probably because it was not to be celebrated till after they were settled in the promised land; but as to the particular trees of which the booths were made, and the manner of their structure, they are not so easily understood. The first wood that is mentioned there is עץ חרר, Gbez-badar, goodly tree, or as the original imports, rich or magnificent wood, which the Jews will have to be the citron-tree (96). The others are the תמר, Tamar, or Palm; the 3d עץ עבות, which signifies any thick or bushy wood; and the last נהלי נהלי, which certainly signifies river or water willows; but when Nehemiah (97) directs the people what branches to gather for the revival of this feast, he calls the first זית, Zajith, the olive; the second עץ שמן, Gbez-shemen, fat or oily wood, which is applicable to any wood that abounds with turpentine, as the pine, fir, &c. the third is called הדס, Hadas, concerning which we know little but the name; and to these three he adds the palm and thick wood, concerning which we are also in the dark, tho' the Jews think it was the myrtle, which they have used ever since; and several interpreters have translated it so accordingly; in particular Josephus (98), the Syriac, the generality of rabbies, and Christians. However, the two first are differently named from those in Leviticus, but whether they are the same trees or not, is neither certain, nor of great importance. It is rather more likely, by this difference of names in those two places, that they were not so scrupulous about the exact choice of them, as about getting such as were the most beautiful, fragrant, and convenient, that the land could afford, and especially such as would best keep their verdure during those seven days. This at least was the case of the wise Caraites, who, despising the niceties of the Cabbalists, thought they sufficiently answered the design of the law-giver, if they lived in such tents or booths as their forefathers had done in the wilderness; whilst the Talmudists and their commentators have rather obliterated it by their numberless additions to it <sup>a</sup>.

(C) The first day of this festival was ushered in by a general procession, in which the men carried branches of those trees mentioned in the last note, some in one hand, and some in the other, waving them about to the four winds, and singing some psalms or hymns proper for the solemnity, and crying Hosannah! which word doth properly signify, save, we beseech thee; from this word the last day of the feast, on which this ceremony of carrying palms round the altar was performed seven times, and with greater solemnity, in memory as is pretended (99), of the taking of Jericho <sup>a</sup>, was called Hosannah Rabbah, or the day of the great Hosannah.

The Jews add, that every Israelite who neglected to carry these branches any morning of the solemnity, and to go with them round the altar of burnt-offering, was not to eat during all that day. The hundred and eighteenth psalm is likewise supposed to have been sung on, if not composed for that festival, because there are not only several expressions in it that have an affinity to it, such as these: אֲנִי יְהוָה הוֹשַׁע נָא אֲנִי יְהוָה הוֹשִׁיעָה נָא אֲנִי יְהוָה הוֹשִׁיעָה נָא (100); but also from the very analogy of the whole composition, with the ceremonies of that feast; such as the praying more particularly for the coming of the Messiah, for the prosperity of the next year, the fetching of water from the pool of Siloh, and the like; but whether these and several other particulars, which they observed in it, were used during the standing of the first temple, or were afterwards introduced by Esdra, and others of their great synagogue in process of time, is too uncertain to be dwelt longer upon. As for the ceremony of fetching water from Siloh's pool, it seems to be of much later date, and to have been introduced but a little before our Saviour's time, tho' some of the Jews attribute the institution of it to the prophets Haggai and Zachariah (1). Our Saviour is thought to have alluded to this, when he cried in the temple, on the last day of this feast, If any man thirst, let him come unto me, &c. (2).

(D) The Jews except out of this number the sick and their nurses, and those who could not bear either the dampness of the earth, or the fragrancy of the boughs. They add, that as these booths

(95) Levit. xxiii. 40. (96) Vide MUNT. in loc. (97) Nehem. viii. 16. (98) Antiq. lib. iii. c. 10. Rabbin. LEO JUD. JUN. in loc. BASHAG. Rep. Hæb. tom 1. lib. ii. c. 24. & al. mult. * Vide Mishn. Tract. Sukkah, Arbab. Thurim. MAIMON. Tract. שופר, & alib. (99) BASHAG. ibid. * * * * * HOSFIR. Orig. Fess. c. 7. MUNT. in calend. & al. (100) Pf. cxviii. 25. (1) Vide CUN. ubi sup. CALN. sub voc. pentecost. MEYER, Fess. Heb. GOODWIN, Mos. & Aar. & al. vide Mishn. sub tit. סוכה, & WOOT. & al. Comment in ead. (2) John vii. 37, 38.

THE sacrifices peculiar to this feast were, on the first day, thirteen bullocks, <sup>a</sup> two rams, fourteen lambs of a year old; all without blemish, which were offered up in a burnt offering, with their usual meat and drink offerings, consisting of a certain quantity of flour mingled with oil, and some wine. To these was added, likewise, a kid, for a sin-offering, which was offered up in the name of the whole people of Israel; besides the usual morning and evening sacrifices, which were never to be intermitted, and those which any one might offer out of devotion. On the second day they offered twelve bullocks, fourteen lambs, with their concomitant offerings of flour and wine, and a kid, as on the first day; and thus on the third, fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh, they offered the same sacrifices, with this difference only, that they lessened every day one bullock, so that on this <sup>b</sup> last day they sacrificed but seven (E); as for the other offerings, they continued booths were not to be covered with any thing but branches, and these not to be set up so thick, but that they might see the stars through them; they were allowed to retire into their own houses whenever it rained through them (3). It is not at all unlikely, that from these ceremonies of carrying branches in their hands, &c. Plutarch might take it into his head to affirm, that the Jews celebrated this feast to Bacchus, and that they entered into their temples with branches of the vine and thirfe in their hands, tho' he knew not what was done in the inside of them (4). It is true, that Josephus, speaking of this feast, and of the nosegay or bunch of greens which the Jews wore in it (5), calls it ispeolawn, which among the Greeks signified a bunch of olive tyed up with wool, on which did hang great variety of fruit. This nosegay used to be carried by a child, and laid at the gate of the temple of Apollo (6). But our author here tells us, that the Jewish one was made up of myrtle, willow, and palm, on which hung little sprouts of peach, or, as others render it, young citrons. However that be, Spencer has from thence fancied, that it was instituted by Moses in imitation of the Heathen, who about that time used to celebrate some feasts to their gods, with the same mirth and solemnity (7); but Moses gives us a quite different reason, namely, that their posterity might know that God had made the Israelites to dwell in booths at their coming out of Egypt (8), and elsewhere, that they departed from Rameses, and encamped at Succoth (9), so called from the booths which they reared up there, the place abounding with proper materials for them.

Walton adds another reason to this of Moses, namely, that it was on the 10th day of the month Tisri, that Moses came down the second time from the mount, and brought them the joyful news that God was appeased for the sin of the golden calf, and that he had ordered the tabernacle of the congregation to be reared up (which that idolatrous defection had obstructed for a time) in token that he did now no longer disdain to be among them, seeing he vouchsafed to dwell with them in the tabernacle (10); and as he observes there, that this happened six months after the exod, it doth account for that feast being instituted in that month, rather than in the first, in which the people began to live in booths or tents. Maimon gives indeed another reason for it, namely, that that season was fitter to dwell in booths, than the other (11); but he forgets that if there be any difference between the months Nisan and Tisri, that is, between March and April, and September and October, the former seems to have the preference. And therefore the learned R Jacob Levita doth judiciously enough observe, that God did chuse the latter for the celebration of that feast, because that was the time in which the cold mornings, winds and rains, obliged people to quit these kind of dwellings, who had lived in them all the summer, for the sake of coolness; whereas, had he appointed it in Nisan, the 15th of which answers to about the beginning of our April, there would have been nothing singular enough to have put them in mind of the occasion of it, seeing that was the season in which people left their houses for such airy booths (12). However, as this festival was likewise instituted as a thanksgiving for the conclusion of their harvest and vintage; upon which account it was also called חג לולב, Chag lulabb, the feast of branches, and סוכות, the feast of gathering *; this is reason sufficient for its being appointed in that month, in which the whole was generally finished. Several interpreters, both Jewish and Christian, have thought that the psalms which are intitled על הגיתית, Gbal-Hagittith, which are the 8th, 81st, and 84th, were composed for this solemnity, because the word Gittith signifies a wine-press (13). But Leo de Modena (14) tells us, that the psalms which begin with הללויה, Halleluja, that is, the 111, 112, 113, &c. to the 118, were the proper ones to be sung on that day. Those, who are curious to know how the Jews do observe this feast since their dispersion, may find a full account of it in the same author and place.

(E) The reason which the Jews give for lessening one bullock every day is, that the whole number of them offered in those seven days amounted to 70, which they say is the number of the nations for whom these sacrifices were offered, that they might dwindle by little and little, till they were all brought under the scepter of the Messiah, who is emphatically called the desire of all nations (15). Those, who have called this 8th day the Hosanna-rabba (16), are certainly contradicted by all the Jews, who affirm that it was the seventh day (17); as for this eighth day, on which there was to be what most interpreters render, as we do, a solemn assembly; the Hebrew word עצרת, Gibzereth, signifies

(3) Vide MUNT. in Levit. xxiii. Præc. aff. & neg. & aut sup. citat. (4) Symposiac. probl. v.
 (5) Ant. lib. iii. c. 10. (6) Vide Gl. ff. in voc. (7) De Leg. Rit. Jud. lib. i. c. 6, & lib. iii. c. 8.
 (8) Levit. xxiii. 42. (9) Exod. xii. 37. vide sup. pag. 446. c. 502. a. (10) Harmon. Evang. ad
Luc. iii. 21. ap. MEYER de Temp. Sacr. cap. 16. § 3. (11) Mere Neworb. lib. iii. c. 43. סוכות, de
Rit. Jud. per tot. an. Vide MEY. ubi sup. § 4. (12) סוכות, *de Fest. Jud. p. tot. ann. * Vide ABAR.* in Levit. 23. MEYER, & al. (13) Vide THEOPH. in John vii. (14) Cerem. Jud. part. ii. c. 7.
 (15) Heggai ii. 7. Vide HOSPIN. Orig. Fest. in sac. GOODWIN'S Mos. & dar. lib. iii. c. 6. § 8. (16)
GOODWIN, ubi sup. CALM. in voc. Tabernacle. (17) Vide Mishn. ubi sup. Shulchan, Haruch, Aibah, Turim, & al.

- a tinued the same throughout. On the eighth or last day, which was the most solemn of all, and on which they were to hold a solemn assembly, and to abstain from all servile work, they offered but one bullock, one ram, and seven lambs, besides the goat for a sin-offering, and the usual and voluntary sacrifices<sup>1</sup>; which last did rise and fall, according as their harvest had been more or less plentiful. Lastly, on this day the first fruits of those things, which were of latter growth, were brought up and offered to God, and these came sometimes in such numbers, that they were forced to continue the feast one day longer<sup>a</sup>.

The Feast of the trumpets and new moons.

- WE have already taken notice, that the month Tisri was the first of the civil, as that of Abib or Nisan was of the sacred year; this feast was appointed to be kept on the first and second day of that month. It was to be ushered in by the sound of the trumpets, to be kept holy, free from all servile work, and to be distinguished from other new moons, by particular sacrifices<sup>a</sup>.

- As the scripture doth no where give the reason of this festival, authors are much divided about it; the Jews, in general, believe it was instituted in memory of the creation, which happened on that month (F) †, though some rabbies think that it was also in memory of Isaac's deliverance, and of the ram that was caught by the horns, and substituted for him<sup>a</sup>. Some of the fathers think it was in memory of the law being given upon mount Sinai<sup>a</sup>, at which time the trumpet and thunder was heard: others lastly, from some of the ceremonies observed by the Jews by way of preparation for, and from some of their notions about this festival (G), have fancied that it was to put mankind in mind of the general resurrection, which is to be ushered in by the sound of the trumpet<sup>a</sup>; but the most probable reason for this feast, and for proclaiming the entrance of the civil year by the sound of the trumpets, seems to be in order to render it more observable, seeing all their contracts, mortgages, bargains, and such like, as well as their sabbatic years and jubilees, were to be regulated by it<sup>a</sup>; for which reason the trumpets ceased not to sound every where, from sun-rising to sun-setting<sup>a</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> Ibid. ver. 14, ad fin.    <sup>a</sup> Vide SIGONIUS, BERTRAND, CUNÆUS, MEYER, GOODW. & al.    <sup>a</sup> Levit. xxiii. 24. Num. xxix. 12, & seq. † Vide sup. p. 48. c.    <sup>a</sup> Vide R. SAL. FAG. MUNST. & al. in Levit. xxiii.    <sup>a</sup> BASIL. in Ps. lxxxi. THEODORET. Qu. 32 in Levit.    <sup>a</sup> Vide GOODW. ubi sup. § 6.    <sup>a</sup> Idem ibid. § 5.    <sup>a</sup> Vide SHINDLER, sub voc. שופר.

signifies a retention, or as our margin hath it (18), restraint, for which reason they affirm, that after the seventh day was over, and so consequently the festival, the people used to stay, or to be detained one day longer (19). On this day it is, that the Jews end the last parasha or section of the pentateuch, and, immediately after, begin the first, that they may not seem to be better pleased with having ended the one, than with beginning the other (20), and for this reason it is called חג שמחת תורה, the feast of joy of the law (21).

(F) The Gemarrab doth positively affirm, that בחדשי נברא העולם, the world was created in the month of Tisri, for which reason it is thought that this feast was ordained to prevent the old or civil year being obliterated by the sacred, and observes that that of the tabernacles was to be kept בתקפת השנה, at the revolution or return, or as our version renders it, though not so properly, at the end of the year †. And the mishnah adds, that the first day of this month is the head of the year, from which the seventh year, the jubilee, &c. are to be computed (22).

(G) The ancient Jews had a notion that God passed a kind of judgment upon men at this time, for the good or bad deeds of the foregoing year, according to which he ordered his blessings and punishments for the next (23). The mishnah expressly says---that at the beginning of the year they pass before him like sheep, according to the saying of the psalmist (24), from the place of his habitation he looketh upon the inhabitants of the earth, he formed their hearts alike, and considers [or makes a scrutiny of] all their works. For this reason they thought that nothing could be more proper to awaken men from their sleep of sin, than the sound of the trumpets, according to that of the prophet Joel (25), blow the trumpet in Sion, sanctify a fast, &c. Accordingly MAIMON observes, from the Megillat-tahanith, that the trumpets, which were more solemnly blown on fast-days, were proper to excite men to prepare themselves during the ten days, that were between this feast and the next filling day, or day of expiation for the work of repentance (26). Remarkable is the speech which a learned Jewish rabbi has transmitted to us (27), which then used to accompany the sound of the trumpets. Awake, awake from your sleep, awake, ye that deal in vanity, for deadly is the sleep that holdeth you. Consider seriously in your hearts who

(18) Levit. xxiii. 36.    (19) Vide MUNST. ibid. MEYER, de Fest. c. xvi. § 15.    (20) BUXTORF in Abbreviat. & Synag. Jud. c. 28. vide & ABAR. in Deut. 31.    (21) ר' אלעזר, Exod. xxiii. 16. & xxxiv. 22. † Vide MAIM. Kidush hakodesh c. 9.    (22) Traß. ראש שנה, cap. 1. vide & Levit. xxv. 3, 5, 6.    (23) Ubi sup.    (24) Ps. xxxiii. 14, 15. Vide HOTTING. & WOOTTON, in Mishn.    (25) Ch. ii. pass.    (26) More Neusch. part iii. ch. 43.    (27) ר' שם טוב.

The proper sacrifices for this solemnity were a bullock, two rams, and seven a lambs, offered up in a solemn burnt-offering, with the usual addition of flour and wine, in the name of the whole nation, besides the kid for a sin-offering, and the daily and monthly sacrifices †.

The new moons.

New moons.

THE Israelites were commanded to observe the first day of every month or moon, and to offer, besides the usual sacrifices, a burnt-offering of two young bullocks, one lamb, and seven rams, with the usual quantity of flour, wine, and oil †. The most solemn of all the twelve was that of the month Tifri, which we spoke of last, and which was kept holy upon a particular account. The rest had nothing to distinguish them from common days, except the sacrifices above-men- b tioned, which were accompanied with the sound of the trumpets (H); making better cheer, and perhaps using some kind of devotion or assemblies peculiar to those days. We find nothing like it, indeed, enjoined by Moses; but one may gather the former from David's excuse for absenting himself from Saul's table on the first day of the month, and Saul's resenting it, ‡; and the latter, from what the Shunamite's husband said to dissuade her from going to the prophet Elisha, that it was neither new moon nor sabbath ¶.

HOWEVER, though in all other respects this day was like a common day, they were very scrupulous in the observing it; and as the space of the moon's entering and coming out of the partile conjunction of the sun belongs one half to the old, c and the other to the new month, and they had no sure way of computing it with any exactness or certainty, they observed two days, namely, the last day of the old, and the first day of the new, for greater security. That this custom began very early, seems plainly intimated in the instance we have given of Saul, wherein it is said, that he excused David for his absence on the first day, but resented it on the second.

† Num. xxix. 3, & seq. ‡ Ibid. xxviii. 11, 12, &c. § 1 Sam. xx. 5, 18, 27. ¶ 2 Kings iv. 23.

it is that ye are going to appear before to give an account, &c. The apostle seems to allude to this in his epistle to the Ephesians (28).

Hitherto there is nothing either improbable or absurd; but that is more than we can say of the additions which have been since made to the Talmud; we shall only instance in one or two of them: they believe that God keeps three books, one of the good, a second of the bad, and a third of those that are neither one or the other. The first is the book of life, the second that of death, and those, that are in the third, are to be transferred either to the first or second, on the next expiation day, according as they grow better or worse. Those two books have two kinds of pages, the one for this life, the other for the next; and it is on this day that they think their names are written for that year. Upon this account they take particular care, whatever they do the rest of the year, to be well employed about this time. Some appear at the synagogue in white, others in their shrouds, in token of repentance; others will plunge themselves gradually into the water, confessing their sins, and imiting their breasts, as they sink lower and lower, till they are over head and ears in it; and lastly, others will give themselves 49 lashes on their bare backs, or procure somebody to do it for them; and after these mortifications, and suitable prayers, &c. they wish one another the happiness of being written down for a good year (29).

(H) The fixing the time of the new moon, for want of astronomical tables, was done in this manner. The first men that observed, or thought they did observe the new moon, were to repair with all speed to the grand council, and give notice of it. And enquiry was then made, 1st, whether the persons were credible witnesses, and secondly, whether their report agreed with such computations as they were then able to make; in which case the president proclaimed the new moon, by saying מְקֻדָּשׁ, Mekudash, it is consecrated, which word was twice repeated aloud by the people; after which it was ordered to be proclaimed every where by the sound of the trumpet, or by other ways, according to the times and places (30).

Some authors have denied that these new moons were proclaimed by the trumpet (31), and think that only the first in their civil year was so; whereas the contrary is plain, from the express command of Moses (32), to blow the trumpet in the beginning of their months; but whether the distinction which the Jews make between the trumpets which the text calls חֲצֹצְרוֹת, Chatzotzereth, and those that are called שופר, Shoper, and between the sound that is called תְּרוּעָה, Terugbah; and that which is called קוֹל, Col, voice, and תִּקְעָה, Tikagb, be so well founded as they pretend, is hardly worth enquiring. They affirm, however, that these two instruments differed in length, shape, and sound, and that the one, which was the noblest of the two, was sounded on the first day of the new year, and the other on the first days of the month (33).

(28) Ch. v. 14. Vide GOODW. ubi sup. § 6. (29) Vide BUXTORF, Synag. Jud. HOSPIN, GOODW. LEO de Moden. & al. (30) Vide HOTTINGER, in GOODW. ubi sup. § 7. sub note 5. (31) GOODW. ubi sup. § 4. (32) Num. x. 10. (33) Vide HOTTING. ubi sup. sub note 3.

- THIS irregularity of the moon obliged them likewise to make some transpositions of the days of the month, in order to fix the beginning of that of Tisri; and of the rest of the months according to that (I). But how early these transpositions began, is what cannot easily be conjectured. All that we know is, that Scaliger has taken an infinite deal of pains to find out, and rectify them, and that they have since been of great use in many cases, as may be seen by the book itself, and by the authors quoted in the margin*.

- THESE are all the feast-days that were appointed by the Mosaic law; the Jews added, in process of time, several others, in memory of some great mercies, such as that of Purim or Lots, in memory of their deliverance from Haman's cruelty<sup>2</sup>, b the dedication of the second temple, and many more, which we shall not need mention here, because they are below our epocha. All that needs be added to the foregoing is, that there was a command, that if any part remained unconsumed of the sacrifices offered on those solemnities, after the first and second day, or even before, if the flesh of them had contracted any filth, fly-blow, or ill smell, it was not to be eaten, but burned to ashes<sup>3</sup>.

Laws concerning the sabbatic and jubilee years.

- c THE sabbatic or seventh year, and the jubilee, which happened once in seven times seven years, are also to be looked upon as solemn times. They were appointed by God, and designed for rest and rejoicing; and as they did bear a kind of analogy, or rather, were a kind of consequence of the sabbath, or seventh day, they may upon that account be also reckoned among their solemn festivals.

- THE Mosaic law distinguishes four sorts of years: 1. The civil, according to which all political matters were regulated, consisting of twelve solar, and afterwards of lunar months (K), beginning at the month Tisri, or September, as we said above. 2. The sacred, which began at the month Nisan, or March, which was the seventh of the civil year, and regulated the order of all their religious ceremonies; to that the passover, which happened in the middle of that month, was, as it were, the mother of all the other festivals. 3. The sabbatic or seventh year; and 4. The d jubilee or fiftieth year, which was kept at the end of seven weeks of years. We have already said as much as is necessary concerning the two first.

THE

* De Emendat. Temp. HOSPIN. Orig. Fest. BUXT. GOODW. MAY. USSER. & MUNSTER, & al. mult.    <sup>2</sup> Either c. ult. ver. 20, & seq.    <sup>3</sup> Levit. vii. 15, & seq. Præc. aff. 207, 208.

(I) The reason of this transposition was threefold, monthly, political, and mixt (34); the monthly was lest they should celebrate the new moon, before the old one was expired. The political was lest two sabbaths or days of rest should follow one another, because, as it was forbid to dress victuals, bury their dead, &c. on such days, they thought it a grievance to live two days upon cold meat, and to keep the dead bodies so long above ground. The mixed transposition is that which is done upon an account that is partly menstrual, and partly political. These distinctions are in many respects very judicious and necessary; but they have branched them out at such a rate, and with sub-distinctions, and nice rules for the right use of them, that we chuse to refer the readers, that are curious about such things, to those authors mentioned above.

We shall only add, with respect to these Neomeniæ, that our Spencer has a long dissertation to prove, that the Heathen did likewise observe them in honour of the moon (35); but what he would insinuate from it, that the Jewish ones were appointed in imitation of the others, is what we think a wild conjecture; neither do we see any reason for supposing that either side did borrow this rite from the other, for, the worship of the moon being common to almost all the Heathen, it was natural enough for them to pay her some particular honour at her first appearance, without knowing any thing of the Jewish laws; and as for the other side of the supposition, it is what we have already opposed upon other heads, and shall avoid repeating here †.

(K) It is plain by the calculation which Moses gives us of the days of the flood (36), and elsewhere, that the year consisted of 365 days, and consequently of 12 solar months, the last of which consisted of 35 days; and it is more than probable, that, having been brought up in Egypt, he had learned that way of reckoning from them, because they are generally allowed to be the first inventors of it, as we have seen in their history*. Besides that, it must have been the most known and easy method to the Israelites, who had been accustomed to it during their long abode there. Scaliger (37), and others after him, have indeed supposed that they had an intercalary month once in sixscore years, but it is plain that the scripture hints nothing like such an intercalation, or year of 13 months; though it is not easy to guess what they did with the

(34) SCALIG. ubi sup. lib. ii.    (35) De Leg. Rit. lib. iii. c. 1. dissert. 4.    † Vide sup. p. 427. (R) § 16. (Y) & (Z).    (36) Gen. vii. & viii. pass.    * Vide sup. p. 218. c.    (37) De Emend. Temp. lib. iii.

Laws concerning the seventh year.

THE sabbatic year was to be kept every seventh year; the observation of it consisted chiefly in the five following articles.

1. A total cessation from all manner of agriculture <sup>a</sup>.
2. In leaving all the product of their ground to the poor, the orphan, and the stranger <sup>b</sup>.
3. In the release of all Hebrew slaves, unless they voluntarily renounced their proffered liberty, and chose to abide by their old masters; in which case, they were to be brought before the judges, and to have their ears bored in their presence, in token that they freely embraced a perpetual servitude, or at least till the year of jubilee <sup>c</sup>.
4. In the remission of all debts from one Israelite to another; but this did not extend to strangers, who were excluded that benefit <sup>d</sup>.
5. It was to begin and end on the month Tifri, or September, that so there might be sufficient time for gathering all the fruits of the earth of that year, and for sowing it again the next year, that so the land might not lie fallow two years together <sup>e</sup> (L). Some other laws we find relating to this year, such

<sup>a</sup> Levit. xxv. 4.

<sup>b</sup> Ibid. ver. 6.

<sup>c</sup> Exod. xxi. 2, & seq. & alib.

<sup>d</sup> Deut. xv. 1, & seq.

<sup>e</sup> Levit. xxv. 9.

the six additional hours of the Egyptians to the 365 days, without some such supposition. However Moses, by the express command of God (38), did afterwards compute the year by moons, for that is the meaning of the word חודש, Chodesh, from החדש, to renew, tho' our English version renders it month; and these answered partly to each of our months, and partly to the next.

The same authors have imagined that the Israelites had no names for their months before the captivity (39), because they are often distinguished only by their numbers, as first, second, &c. yet it is certain, we find some of them called by particular names long before; thus we have seen, that the first month of the sacred year was originally called חסיו, Abib. We find likewise that of ח, Zif, (40), חסיו, Ethanim (41), and כול, Bull (42); from which it is not improbable that the others might likewise have their names, tho' they are not recorded, and are oftener mentioned by their numbers. As for the etymology of those names, as well as of those which they used after the captivity, about which the learned have puzzled their brains more than the thing deserves, we think them too uncertain to trouble our readers with it, and shall content ourselves with subjoining a list of the names themselves, which is as follows:

	Days
1 Tifri	30	Answers to our Months
2 Marcheshwan	29
3 Chaslev	30
4 Thebet	29
5 Sebat	30
6 Adar	29
7 Nisan	30
8 Iyar	29
9 Sivan	30
10 Tammuz	29
11 Abb	30
12 Elul	29
		September
		October
		November
		December
		January
		February
		March
		April
		May June
		July
		August.

To this list they added, in process of time, the intercalary month, which they called חסיו, Veadar, that is, and, or the second Adar, as that was the last of the sacred year.

(L) This year is by Moses called by several names, as שנה השבעית, Shanah hasbe'ith, the seventh year שבת הארץ, Sabbath haaretz, the sabbath, or rest of the earth; שמיטה לידיה, Shemitah Ladonai, the release of the Lord, and the like. The time of the year, in which it was to begin, is nowhere fixed by Moses, but is easily gathered from that of the jubilee, which was to begin on the 10th of the 7th month (43), and from the reason of the thing given under that article, as well as from the generality of Jewish authors. Neither is it agreed how soon this sabbatic year was observed after their entrance into Canaan, concerning which, it would be endless to mention all the different conjectures of the learned, both Jews and Christians. The reader may, if he pleases, consult the authors quoted in the margin (44); all that we dare advance on the subject is, that, if any opinion appears to us more probable than another, it is that of the learned archbishop Usher, who fixes it on the seventh year after the manna ceased, at which time they began to sow and till the ground †. Cunaeus speaks still more particularly to the same effect; his words run thus (45): there is no necessity for beginning the epoch of the seven years at the division of the land of Canaan, but rather at the death of Moses, which was the 41st year after the exod, and then the first sabbatic year will be on the 7th after the passage of Jordan; so that, after having been taken up six years in the conquest and dividing of the land, the 7th proved in all respects a year of rest, seeing they rested from their conquests, and peaceably enjoyed the fruit of them, and of the conquered land.

There is likewise no small dispute, whether the release of debts, and of slaves, was to take place at the beginning or end of the sabbatic year. The original orders it to be done שבע שנים, at, or from, the end of seven years; from which Maimon would infer, that it was not to take place till the seventh year was expired; but tho' there is some difference between saying at the end of seven years, and at the end of the seventh year, yet is it generally believed to have taken place at the beginning of it, because the week of years was then complete.

(38) Exod. xii. 2. (39) Vide HOTTING. in GOODW. lib. iii. c. 1. § 13. note 3. (40) 1 Kings vi. 1. (41) Ibid. c. viii. 2. (42) Ibid. vi. 38. (43) Levit. xxv. 9. (44) Gemar. Kiddush. Gemar. Hieros. in loc. Sedar. Halam. MAIMON. de Shemitah & Tobel, pass. ABARBAN. in Jus. xiv. 12, & alib. R. DAV. GANTZ. in Zemach, & al. SCALIGER, Annot. in Chron. EUSEB. & alib. GOODW. Mos. & Aar. lib. iii. c. 9. MUNST. Calend. MEYER de Temp. Sacr. cap. 17. CUN. CALM. & al. † Sub A. M. 2554. (45) Vide BASNAG. Rep. Heb. rom. ii. c. 8.

- a as that those servants, who were released in it, should not go away empty, but that a compensation should be made to them for their service<sup>f</sup>; that they should not withdraw any needful assistance from their poor brethren, by reason of the nearness of the seventh year<sup>g</sup>; with some others relating to the opening of their fields, orchards, and vineyards to all comers, and the like (M). Among these, was that remarkable one, which we have taken notice of in another place, of reading the law before all the people on the day of pentecost. For as they were to abstain from all works of husbandry, there is no doubt but there was a greater concourse to hear it, than could have been at any other intermediate year.

- THE reasons and excellence of these laws, as well as those that relate to the jubilee, are obvious to every one, being extremely proper to breed up a faithless and stubborn nation in a constant dependence upon, and subjection to the divine providence, and to inspire them with sentiments of mercy and beneficence towards their poor brethren, servants, slaves, and strangers, by reminding them of their Egyptian slavery, which is assigned as one of the reasons of this institution<sup>h</sup>; to which we may add another, namely, the great advantage which the land received by being left fallow every seventh year. However, the generality of the Jews, and a great number of Christians, both ancient and modern, have looked upon the main design of these institutions to be typical of the millennium or thousand years rest; for as the pentateuch consecrates the seventh day, the seventh year, and the seven times seventh year to rest, they conclude, that the world will last six thousand years in the state we see it in; or, as R. Elias in the Talmud expresses it, two thousand years without the law, two thousand under the law, and two thousand under the Messiah<sup>i</sup>; after which comes the grand sabbath of one thousand years; but this is too nice a point for us, and which we willingly refer to the divines; only we beg leave to observe, from a modest hint of the learned Mr. Mede<sup>k</sup>, that as long as we persist in denying the second appearance of Christ upon earth, in as glorious a manner as his first was obscure, we shall hardly be able to convince Jews, that he is the true promised Messiah; because we can give no tolerable reason why the prophecies concerning his humiliation and sufferings should be understood in a literal, and those of his exaltation and glorious reign; in a spi-
- c
- d

<sup>f</sup> Dent. xv. 13, & seq. <sup>g</sup> Ibid. ver. 7, & seq. <sup>h</sup> Ibid. ver. 15. <sup>i</sup> Tract. Sanhedr. § Helec. Vide HOSPIN. GOODW. MEY. MUNST. & al. <sup>k</sup> Clav. Apocalyp. ad fin.

(M) It may be, perhaps, asked, what they lived upon during that year, if they must relinquish the product of all their lands to the poor? But it must be remembered, that they were allowed to take as much out of it as was sufficient for themselves and their families (46). However, as some of them made a scruple to touch even any of these, we may reasonably suppose, that they made what provision they could against that time, of such things as could be easily preserved, such as corn, wine, oil, olives, raisins, figs, dates, pulse, and the like; and as to herbs, roots, fruits, and all kind of סמסין, or things of spontaneous growth, they might gather them in their own or any other ground. Though even this, some of their rigid scribes pronounce unlawful; not so much because the law expressly forbids it, as for fear of transgressing by too great a liberty (47). But the misfortune is, that before the Babylonish captivity, they were so far from being such scrupulous observers of these laws, that, their prophets were continually upbraiding them with the universal breach of them, and in particular, for defrauding and oppressing the poor in this point; but, after they had been chastised for their incorrigible disobedience, they ran into the contrary extreme, and this produced that vast number of glosses and ordinances, which we find in their Talmud and rabbinical writings, and which grew up to such a height of superstition, that it almost obliterated the main end and design of the law. Though it must also be owned, that they were not alike strict, and that some of their head doctors and lawyers took as much pains to find out pretences for eluding the law, as others did to have it scrupulously observed. We shall give but one instance, which relates to the express command of remitting all debts on this and the jubilee year, where, besides their excepting several articles, such as what we may properly call a tavern score, or what a man owes to a victualler; debts for which either pledge or bond has been given, and the like, the famous Hillel, a man in the highest repute amongst them, next to the inspired writers, observing that the rich forbore to lend to the poor, by reason of the approaching year of release, made an ordinance, that, upon a man's putting a caveat in the judges court to this effect: This I deliver to you the judges of this place, such a one and such a one, to the end, that whatever money I lend, I may challenge it whenever I please, he should be free from this law of remission (48). This plainly shews, that the command was designed to extend to all debts, else there would have been no occasion for their refusing their assistance to the poor upon that account, much less for God's forbidding it so expressly as he did (49).

(46) Levit. xxv. 6. (47) Vide BEN. MAIM. ubi sup. Tract. שבועות, cap. vi. (48) Ibid. c. x. & seq. Vide HOTTING. in GOODW. ubi sup. note 6. MUNST. JUN. MEY. & al. (49) Dent. xv. 9.

ritual sense. Whereas, were the doctrine of the Millennium, which is far from a being anti-evangelical in any but a Jewish and carnal sense, generally received, it would effectually answer one of their strongest objections, without casting the least reflection on the Christian religion, whilst the Jews were left at their liberty to take it in as gross, and we in as spiritual and refined a sense as we saw fit (N).

Law relating to the Jubilee.

Jubilee year. THIS solemnity is the last, and most considerable, that God enjoined to the Israelites. It was to be celebrated every fiftieth year<sup>1</sup>, and had this advantage over that of the seventh, that it released all slaves that had refused their liberty; annihilated all debts, and restored to every man all his lands, houses, wife, children, and possessions, however alienated; and every Hebrew servant or slave to his own tribe and family, liberty and property, how, and upon what account soever he had been deprived of them<sup>2</sup>, during those fifty years: for this reason it is, that we think, after many commentators, that it was called Jubilee, or Yobel, because it restored every thing to its pristine state (O). However, it must be observed, that this privilege extended no further than to the original Israelites, or to those who had been incorporated into their religion and commonwealth by circumcision; these, indeed, might claim the benefit of it, tho' they had been sold for slaves for any crimes, even by the sentence of the grand sanhedrin<sup>3</sup>; but as for the Gentiles, they were wholly excluded from it<sup>4</sup>.

SOME think that the Israelites were wont to reckon by Jubilees, as the Greeks did by Olympiads, the Romans by Lustra, and the Christians by Indictions<sup>5</sup>; and probably enough they did so, because they were always to have regard to that year in all bargains of lands, houses, and the like, which generally sold for more or less, according to their nearness to, or distance from it<sup>6</sup>. The case was somewhat different with respect to the sale of houses that were within walled towns, though not of those that were in the country, for those might be redeemed at any time within the space of twelve months, by paying the whole sum of the purchase, but if they were not redeemed within that time, they were

<sup>1</sup> Levit. xxv. 8, & seq.    <sup>2</sup> Ibid. ver. 28, 41, & alib.    <sup>3</sup> Ibid. ver. 40.    <sup>4</sup> Ibid. ver. 46. Vide MAIMON. Tract. עבדים, c. 9.    <sup>5</sup> HOSPIN. Orig. Fcst. c. 9. GOODW. HOTTING.    <sup>6</sup> Levit. xxv. 27, & seq.

(N) We do not pretend to take upon us to shew how far this doctrine can be proved from the scriptures of the Old and New Testament, especially from the prophecies of Ezekiel, Daniel, and of the Revelations. The reader may see that subject copiously treated by Mr. Mede, above-mentioned, among many others. But with respect to the Jews expectation of a glorious Messiah, it is so strongly riveted in them, that they have even gone so far as to acknowledge two Messiahs; namely, one suffering and obscure, despised and persecuted, whom they believed to have appeared at the time foretold by the prophets; and the other a glorious one, of the seed of David, whose kingdom is to reach unto the end of the world, and is still expected by them; tho' they own themselves altogether in the dark, concerning the time of his coming. But this notion of a twofold Messiah is plainly opposite to that prophecy of Isaiab, which appropriates those those characters to one and the same person (50). However, as to this first character, it is plain the ancient Jews were not fond of publishing it, whatever notion they might have of it. This is plain from the Septuagint's paraphrase of that verse of the psalmist (51), in which the Messiah is represented as voluntarily taking upon him the form of a servant, by an expression alluding to the law of boring those servants ears that refused to be released, spoken of under this article. The words in the original are אונים כרית לי, Oznaim sarita li, mine ears has thou bored; these interpreters fearing, in all probability, lest such a servile mark should be thought too derogatory to his character, have rendered it σώμα εἰς κατασκευήν μου, a body hast thou prepared me, or adapted for me, which in the main comes near to the same purpose, and only softens very much in the expression, the first implying by the boring of the ears, that Christ freely submitted himself to become God's perpetual servant, and the other, that God had given him a body fit for the service he had voluntarily undertaken at his coming into the world. This is therefore the reason of the difference between the words in the original, and in the quotation from it by the apostle to the Hebrews (52), and is a further confirmation of the writers of the New Testament making use of the Septuagint version; and this will, we hope, apologize for this digression, if it may be deemed such.

(O) Authors are fallen into various opinions about the etymon of this word, some thinking that it

(50) Esaï. liii. p. tot. & alib. Vide R. MART. Pag. Fid. DUPLESS. Advertif. au Juifs, GROT. & Verit. BARTOLOC. Biblot. Rabbinic. MUNST. CALM, & al. mult. (51) Pf. xl. 6. comp. with ver. 8, & seq. (52) Hebr. x. 5.

- a were not to return to their original owner at the year of Jubilee (P). As for the possessions of the priests and Levites, they had certain privileges and immunities, which shall be spoken of in a more proper place *.

- DURING the whole twelve months, all kind of agriculture was expressly forbid; the poor had the benefit of the harvest and vintage, and of all the product of that year, and all other things of that nature went on after the same manner as they did in the sabbatic year. The beginning of it was by God's own appointment fixed to the seventh month Tisri, which is about the time of the autumnal equinox; but in what year after they entered into the land of Canaan they celebrated the first Jubilee, and whether from the beginning of every forty-ninth or fiftieth-year, is not easy to determine. As to the former, the Jews began to reckon the first of the fifty years, from the fourteenth after Joshua's passing the Jordan. Their computation ran thus, according to the learned Maimon *: "From their entrance into Canaan, to their being carried out of it, are seventeen Jubilees; and the year, in which they went into captivity and the temple was destroyed, was the seventh or sabbatic year, and the thirty-sixth of the eighteenth Jubilee, which they prove thus: the first temple stood 110 years; after which there was an end of that epocha; the land then did lie waste seventy years, and then the second temple was built, which stood likewise 120 years. In the seventh year after its restoration, Esra went up to Jerusalem; and from this time began a second epocha.
- c "On the thirteenth after the rebuilding of the temple, they celebrated the second sabbatic year, and seven weeks of years, or forty-nine years, being elapsed, they consecrated the fiftieth; for though they did not celebrate the Jubilee after their return from the captivity, nevertheless they continued to compute the years of it, in order to celebrate the sabbatic ones (Q)." Thus far Maimon; but here it must be observed, that he has followed the reckoning of Josephus, Pbilo, and of all the Jews, who not only place the first sabbatic year, and consequently the Jubilee, seven years later than Usher and Cuneus, namely, from the fourteenth year after their entrance into Canaan, but allow fifty compleat years to every Jubilee; whereas that primate, and with him a great number of learned Christians * think,
- d that it was celebrated every forty-ninth year, as we shall see presently. However, as he has here rectified the Jewish chronology in some other respects, so he reckons but the same number of Jubilees that Maimon doth, before the destruction of the temple; as the reader may see in the table at the end of his annals, under the word Jubilee.

THE first of them he fixes on the 3318th year of the Julian period, which is the 2609th of the world, or 1396 years before Christ, and the seventeenth or last before the captivity in 4102 of the Julian period, 3393 of the world, and it is so called from the Hebrew יָבֵל, Yobel, which signifies a trumpet made of rams horns, from the Arabic, Jobelab, a ram; because the Jubilee was proclaimed by the sound of that instrument (53). Others, that it is a felicitous word, in imitation of the sound of that instrument (54); others again think, that it comes from Jubal, the first inventor of musical instruments (55): but we prefer that which derives it from the obsolete root יָבַל, Yabal, in hiphil, הִבִּיל, bobil, which signifies to recal, restore, bring back, &c. which is what the Jubilee did. The reader may see that word occur in many places of scripture, and particularly in the Psalms, where, among others, he will find this expression: יָבִילוּ שֵׁי לַמּוֹרָה, Tobilu sei lam-morah, they shall bring presents to him that is to be feared. (56).

* Ibid. ver. 29, 30. * Ibid. ver. 32, & seq. * Ibid. ver. 8, 9. * Ubi sup. c. x. ex Verf. BECKII. * HUGO CARDINAL. GERARD, MERCAT. in Chronol. JOS. SCALIGER, PETAV. CALVIS. LANSBERG, CAPELL. CUNÆUS, SPANHEIM, JUN. LE CLERC. & al. mult.

(P) The Jewish lawyers add another exception, from what authority we cannot find, that these who sold their houses, lands, &c. in order to traffick and make a gain of the purchase money, or indeed upon any other account than to supply the necessities of life, were excluded the benefit of the Jubilee (57).

(Q) There is some difficulty in apprehending what that author means by keeping up the computation of the Jubilee, in order to observe the sabbatic years, for the latter used to regulate the former, while it continued, but after it ceased, the sabbatic years could easily be kept in their course without it; and so they did accordingly; for Josephus tells us, that Alexander the Great remitted to the Jews the seventh year's tribute, upon that very account (58).

(53) Rabbin. ser. Omn. Vide KIMCH. in Rad. sub voce. יָבֵל, GOODW. MEY. MUNST. &c. (54) BOCHART. Hieros. BECKIUS Annot. in MAIMON. Shemitah veyobel, note 5. (55) GOODW. HOTTING. &c. (56) Ps. lxxvi. ver. penult. vide & Job x. 19. xxi. 30, 32. Jerem. xxxi. 9. & alib. (57) MAIMON. Shemit. veyobel, c. xii. (58) Jos. Ant. lib. xi. c. ult.

612 before Christ. As for the remainder, which he has carried down to the thirtieth, or to the year of the world 4030, they are only added, in order to make a compleat calculation of them to the thirtieth year of Christ, or to the beginning of the gospel. For it is plain, as Maimon observes in the place above quoted, that the Jews observed no Jubilee, after their return from the Babylonish captivity, either with respect to the cessation of agriculture, the restitution of lands, manumission of slaves, or any of those ends for which it had been instituted. Neither, indeed, was it practicable; for, the seventy years captivity having quite obliterated the memory and pretension to their forefathers land, every one, at their return, settled himself as well as he could, in the confusion that then reigned, after which their affairs did take a quite new face in Judea; whilst a very considerable number of their brethren chose to continue in the place of their captivity.

THE next controverted point is, whether it was celebrated on the forty-ninth or on the fiftieth year? We have already given a list of the principal authors who are for the former; those who declare for the latter (without reckoning Philo, Josephus, the Targums, and all the Jews in general, Karaites, as well as Talmudists) are still more considerable.—Among these we reckon some of the fathers<sup>7</sup>, and a great number of moderns<sup>8</sup>. The truth is, that either hypothesis may be defended from the different expressions which Moses makes use of in the institution of it; and on the other hand, there are certain difficulties in each of them, which cannot be easily solved. We shall content ourselves with a bare hinting of them. In one place he expressly commands them to number seven sabbaths of years, or forty and nine years, and on this last to proclaim the Jubilee by the sound of the trumpet<sup>a</sup>; and in the very two following verses he says, that the fiftieth year shall be that of the Jubilee. The grand objection against the first of these is, that if Moses had meant that the forty-ninth should be the Jubilee year, there would have been no necessity for his forbidding all kind of agriculture, and the like, on that year, since that was forbid of course, by its being likewise the sabbatic year, for seven times seven make forty nine. On the other hand it is objected, that, if the fiftieth year was to be the Jubilee, it will follow that the land must have had two sabbaths, or lain fallow two years, which is thought an unreasonable supposition, since, without a miracle, it must in all likelihood have caused a dearth in the land. This Cunæus insists very much upon, in favour of the forty-ninth year, though he passes by the great difficulty above-mentioned, as of no weight; but we think this objection of the two concurring sabbaths may be more easily answered. For in the first place, those, who are for the fiftieth year, do rightly enough observe, that there is no necessity for supposing that the land rested two years, seeing the lawgiver's intention seems fully answered by the repose of one, and that upon the account of its being sabbatical; and that therefore, when Moses says that the fiftieth shall be a year of rest, he uses only that round number, to express the uneven one of forty-nine. There is, indeed, hardly any other way of reconciling the difference of Moses's expressions; and one may add, that as the solemnity began on the first month of the civil, which was the seventh of the sacred year, it might be called indifferently the forty-ninth or fiftieth year, without any contradiction or difficulty. What convinces us further, that this is more than a bare conjecture, is, that Moses makes use of the same calculation for the feast of pentecost. The analogy, which seven weeks of days bears to seven weeks of years, is obvious to every eye; now as it is plain, that the pentecost did not begin on the forty-ninth, but on the fiftieth day; so we see no reason why the same may not be allowed, with respect to the Jubilee.

HOWEVER, as to those who will not easily forego the notion of the land resting two years in this case, we beg leave to observe, secondly, that even such a supposition may be well enough granted, without the pretended inconveniency of causing a dearth in the land. For to say nothing of the extraordinary blessing which was promised to them upon such occasions, as long as they did religiously observe these ordinances, it is certain that the natural fertility of the land, and the provision which every one might lay up during

<sup>7</sup> EUSEB. S. JEROM. AUGUST. GREG. MAG. ISIDOR, & al.    <sup>8</sup> TOSTAT. BONFRER. FACIUS, JUNIUS, DRUSIUS, VILLET. HOTTINGER, SCHINDLER, PFEIF. HEIDEKKER, LEWSDEN, CALMET, & al.    <sup>a</sup> Levit. xxv. 8, 9.

- a the foregoing years, might easily prevent any such danger. We meet with a more signal instance of it in the time of Hezekiah, when the prophet Isaiab sent him word that he should be delivered from the threatening power of the king of Affyria, and, as a token of it, commands the people to live on that year upon such things as grew of themselves, and on the next upon such as sprung from the same, and on the third year to sow and plant<sup>b</sup>. Here indeed the Jews pretend that the middle year was a sabbatic one, but, whether it were so or otherwise, it is plain that there were to be at least three years without any harvest; for on the first year it is said they should eat, not the fruit of the foregoing harvest, but that which grew of itself, and that which was sown on the third could not be gathered till the fourth; and yet we do not find that there was any dearth upon that account. Upon the whole therefore, we are more inclined to the latter opinion of the Jubilee being kept every fiftieth year.

THIS year was to be celebrated with the greatest tokens of joy, because it was designed to put them in mind of their Egyptian servitude, and to prevent their imposing the like on their brethren. But whatever joy the masters and land-holders might outwardly express, we need not doubt but that of the slaves and poor was sincere, at the sight of their approaching restoration. 'Tis true, this was not to take place till the tenth day of the month, otherwise called, the day of expiation, which was therefore kept as a solemn fast; but, during the nine preceding days, the slaves were wholly exempt from doing any work for their masters, and spent that time in eating, drinking, and other diversions, and wore garlands about their heads, not unlike the Roman saturnalia; and as soon as the tenth day was come, the sanhedrin caused the trumpet to sound all over the land, upon which they were restored to their liberty at that very instant, and the rest to their possessions<sup>c</sup>.

IT is plain the design of this ordinance was to prevent the too great oppression of the poor, as well as their being liable to a perpetual slavery. By this means also their law-giver prevented the rich accumulating lands upon lands, and preserved, as much as possible, the freedom and order of Israelitish families, and a kind of equality of their possessions, than which nothing could more effectually inspire them with a particular fondness for their country and patrimony, whilst they knew that this last could never be alienated from their posterity above the space of half a century at the most. And that it wrought such an effect upon them is plain, among many others, from the instance of Naboth, who chose to incur the king of Israel's displeasure, rather than to part with a small portion of his inheritance to him; tho' for his tenaciousness he fell a sacrifice to Jezebel's resentment, and lost both that and his life<sup>d</sup>.

Expiation-day, or day of atonement.

- c THIS is the last solemn day that was of divine institution. It differed Expiation-day. from all the rest in that they were days of joy and thanksgiving, but thus a day of fasting, humiliation, and confession of sins, and the only one of that kind of divine appointment<sup>e</sup>, if we except that occasional one which God enjoined the Israelites after their setting up the golden calf<sup>f</sup> (R); but which we do not find to have been made annual by Moses, or observed by the people till after the captivity, when they became so religious that they

<sup>b</sup> 2 King. xix. 29. <sup>c</sup> Vide MATTH. Halak Shemitz Veyobel. <sup>d</sup> 1 Kings xxi. pass. <sup>e</sup> Levit. xxiii. 26, & seq. <sup>f</sup> Exod. xxxiii. 5, & seq.

(R) And yet we do not find one word of fasting, on that solemn occasion of humiliation, nor even on this day of expiation, unless we suppose it to be implied in the words, afflicting your souls. However, it would be absurd to deny, that fasting had been in use long before Moses's time, because he has not taken notice of its being practised by any of the old patriarchs; or that it was not intended as part of solemn humiliation, because it is not expressed in so many words. The contrary seems rather to follow from his silence, not only because the early custom of fasting among the Heathens upon all particular occasions, as in the case of the Ninevites, (59), and many others, shews it to have been discovered by the light of reason; but because the very course of nature seems to give it a sanction, for when men are visited with any sensible affliction, or threatened with any immediate danger, it never fails of palliating the appetite, and inclining them to fast. And appointed as many fasts for every miscarriage and misfortune that had happened to their nation before it, as filled near the fourth part of their calendar<sup>f</sup>; but this is not the proper place to speak of them. Those, who conjecture that this expiation-day was ordained in memory of the golden calf, do limit the design of it too much, seeing it appears rather instituted to expiate for the sins of the whole nation, both publick and private; but more particularly for those of the foregoing year. This is to be plainly inferred from the name which Moses gives to it (S), as well as from the confession of sins, and other remarkable ceremonies, which he enjoined to be used on that day, of which we are now going to speak. We shall say nothing of the typical relation it bears to the grand expiation wrought under the gospel, it being out of our province.

(59) Jonah iii. 5, 6.

It was to begin, as as other solemn days, on the evening of the ninth day of the seventh month, and to last till the evening of the tenth, during which time they were obliged to abstain from all labour and pleasure, and to continue in the work of mortification, under the penalty of being cut off from among their people. They were likewise to hold a solemn convocation, confess their sins, and to offer a peculiar sacrifice for them by fire<sup>g</sup>.

THE high-priest's office on this day was still more solemn and awful. It was the only time in the whole year on which he was permitted to enter into the most holy place, under pain of sudden death from the Lord<sup>h</sup>; and therefore he was obliged to prepare himself for that grand ceremony, in that extraordinary manner<sup>c</sup> which was prescribed by God himself, as follows: he was first of all to wash himself, not his hands and feet only, as at other times, but his whole body. The Talmud adds, that he was to abstain, during seven whole days, from all matrimonial commerce, and from every thing that might cause an accidental pollution, and thereby render him unfit for this duty<sup>i</sup>; secondly, his mitre, breast-plate, and other priestly ornaments were to be set aside that day, and he only to appear clothed in linnen; this garb did consist only in a linnen mitre or cap, a coat, breeches, and a girdle. He was in the third place to offer, as soon as he came to the holy place, a young bullock for a sin-offering, and a ram for a burnt-offering for himself, and his whole house, confessing his and their sins over them. After this<sup>d</sup> he received from some of the heads of the congregation a couple of kids for a sin-offering, and a ram for a burnt-offering, for the whole congregation. Then were two goats set before the tabernacle, and the high-priests cast lots for them, which of the two should be sacrificed on that day, and which should be sent away; and this latter was called Hazazel (T), or scape-goat. He then entered into the holy of holies, with his censer in one hand, and a large quantity of fine incense

<sup>f</sup> Vide Mishn. Megillath Tahanith, per tot. LAMY, CALMET, & al.

<sup>g</sup> Levit. xxiii. 27, & seq.

<sup>h</sup> Ibid. xiv. 2. <sup>i</sup> Vide præc. affirm. 209.

And what evinces, that this practice was well known among the Israelites, is the many instances which we meet with from Moses's time. Thus after their unexpected defeat before Hai, Joshua and all the elders of Israel continued prostrate before the ark from morning till night, without eating or drinking (60); the same was practised by the eleven tribes upon another occasion (61); by all the people at Mizpeh, in token of their repentance, for having served Baalim and other strange gods (62); and more particularly by David, in hopes of saving the life of the child he had got by Bathsheba (63). And by these, and many more instances of the like nature, it appears, that they not only abstained from eating and drinking, but from all other things that might refresh either the body or mind. Accordingly, the Mishna forbids these six things on these days, eating, drinking, bathing or washing, anointing, putting on of shoes or sandals, and matrimonial intercourse (64), for every one of which, they quote one or more precedents out of the sacred books.

(S) The original calls it יום הכפורים, Yom kaphurim, the day of expiations or atonements; because on that day there was an atonement made for the sins of the whole foregoing year, and of the whole people. For which reason the Talmud calls it by way of excellence יום־אָמָה, Yoma, the day; and perhaps likewise from a tradition they had, that it was on that day that Adam began to repent of his transgression, and God was reconciled to him (65). For the world, and consequently our first parents, according to them, were created on the first day of this month, as we have seen before; their transgression and punishment followed immediately after, and so consequently their repentance; for which reason, some of them think, that this day was appointed in memory of the fall †.

(T) We have here followed our version, and the generality of commentators, who derive the word

(60) Josh. vii. 6. (61) Ibid. xx. 26. (62) 1 Sam. vii. 6. (63) 2 Sam. xii. 16.
(64) Tr. Yoma. (65) Rab. ELEAZER, in Talmude. Vide ABARB. Comm. in Levit. xxiii. † Vide sup. p. 59. b.

- a beaten small in the other, that the smock of it might fill the place, so as to cover the mercy-seat from sight : and as soon as he had set the censers upon the altar, he came out and dipped his fingers into the blood of the bullock, which he had offered for himself, and went and sprinkled it towards the mercy-seat eastward seven times. This done, he killed the goat for the people's sin-offering, and went and sprinkled the mercy-seat with the blood of it, as he had done with that of the bullock, and by these aspersions the tabernacle was purified from all the pollution it had contracted by standing in the midst of that sinful people. During all this ceremony, that is, till this solemn atonement had been made for the sins of the priests and people, neither priests, nor any person, were permitted to come either within the tabernacle, or even into the courts of it.

As soon as these ablutions were ended, and the priests and people purified, the goat, whose lot it had been to escape (V), was brought to the high-priest, who laid his hands upon its head, and confessed his own sins, and those of the whole nation, in words to this effect : O LORD, thy people, the house of Israel, have sinned, have rebelled against thee ;—and now, O Lord, I beseech thee, forgive word לְחַזְזֵל, Ghazazel, from לָז, a goat, and לָזַח, to go, or to escape ; in which they have followed the Septuagint, who have rendered it ἀπομαρταλῶ, and the Latin after them emissarius (67) : and it is certain, that the verb לָזַח, Azal, is often used in that sense in the Old Testament (68). However, from Moses's words (69), it should rather seem, that Azazel is the name of the place whither the goat was led ; for he says, that the man who lets the goat go לְחַזְזֵל, lebazazel——which last cannot properly be rendered any other way than to Hazazel ; and in this sense most of the Jews, and some Christians, have taken it (70) ; and some of the former do tell us, that it is a mountain distant about ninety furlongs, or about eleven thousand paces from Jerusalem (71).

And here we cannot but take notice of a strange notion which Spencer has taken into his head, that this Hazazel was neither the name of a place, nor of the scape-goat, but of a devil, unto which the goat was sent by the messenger (72). He mentions one Mark, an arch Heretic, who pretended to have a demon of that name, by whose assistance he performed wonders (73), and from this, and some expressions, which he found in some cabalistical writings, and in those of Julian the apostate, he pretends, that this scape-goat was sent with its load of sins to the devil, in which notion he is followed by some others *†, who believe that both the sacrificed goat and the scape one were typical of Christ, and think the first to be significative of his death, and the other of his being exposed to, and overcoming the power of satan. But as for us, we should rather prefer Mr. Le Clerc's opinion, that Hazazel was a steep and cragged precipice, down which the goat was thrown : and this is not only more agreeable to the original, as we observed above, and to the Jewish notion of its being a rocky mountain, but the same author has further proved it from the words of Moses, that it should bear all their iniquities אֶל אֶרֶץ גִּזְרָה, el eretz Gazarah (74), which doth properly signify, not only an uninhabited land, or a land of separation, as our version renders it, but a land that is cut off or broken off from another, such as precipices are. It might also be probably enough called Hazazel, from its being inhabited only by goats, as Hottinger observed in his notes upon Goodwin. Le Clerc doth further confirm it by a new etymon of the word Azazel, which we shall not dwell upon. Neither is it easy to guess either what was done to the goat, or what became of it, after it was brought to the place appointed. The Talmudists, if we may rely on them, affirm, that it was thrown down a precipice, and broken in pieces by the fall. They add, that during the high-priesthood of Simon, surnamed the Just, which was signalized by many remarkable tokens of the divine favour, the goat used to fall in pieces before it had reached half way to the place ; but that, after his days, it used to be caught and eaten by the Saracens (75).

(V) How these lots were cast doth not appear from scripture. What the ancient Jews tell us of it is, that there was an urn brought unto the high-priest, into which he threw two wooden lots, upon one of which were written the words, FOR THE LORD, and on the other, FOR AZAZEL, and after he had shaken them, he put both his hands into the urn, and brought up the lots, the one in his right, and the other in his left ; and as the goats stood on each side of him, their fate was determined by the lot that came up in the hand next to them. They also used to draw a good omen of God's being pacified with them, if the right hand chanced to draw the lot that was for the Lord, as they say it happened all the time of the high-priest mentioned in the last note. As for the rest of their customs, observed on that day, such as their mutual asking and granting forgiveness for past offences, making restitution, and the like, though they are probably as old, or very near, as the institution of this feast, yet we rather chuse to refer our readers for them to the two last quoted books ; or, if he pleases, to Leo de Modena and Buxtorf (76).

One thing, however, is worth observing, that, on the eve of this solemnity, the Jews of old used to take a white cock, if it was to be had,

if

(67) LXX. AQUIL. SIMMACH. THEODORET. BOCHART. de Animal. Sacr. MARCH. Secul. ix. PAGN. JUN. & al. (68) Vide KIMCH. in rad. BUXTORF. Thes. in voc. (69) Levit. xvi. 26. (70) MUNST. AR. MONT. & al. (71) Targ. JONATH. R. R. SAAD. GAON. KIMCH. SALOM. ABENEZ. & al. (72) Dissert. in hirc. emissar. (73) Vide EPIPHAN. Hæres. 34. *†† TURRETIN. COCCER, ALTINO MEYER, & al. (74) Levit. xvi. 22. Vide LE CLERC. in loc. (75) Mishn. Traß. יוֹסֵד, vide & MAIM. in שׁוֹמֵר הַכֹּפָרִים. (76) Cerem. Jud. part iii. c. 6. Vide & BUXTORF. Synagog. Jud. c. 20.

give their sins, rebellions, and backslidings, by which they have offended thee, according as it is written in the law of thy servant Moses: in that day he shall make atonement for you, he shall cleanse you, and you shall be clean from all your sins before the Lord (W) †. The confession being ended, he delivered the scape-goat to a man appointed for the purpose, who conducted it into a desert place, and there left it to shift for itself, according to some, or threw it down a steep precipice, according to others, as we have seen in the last note. After this ceremony, the high-priest washed himself all over, and having changed his cloaths, or, as seems most likely, having put on the ephod, mitre, breast-plate, and his other priestly garments, he was to offer a burnt-offering of two rams, one for himself, and the other for the people. As for the man that conducted the scape-goat, he was deemed unclean, b till he had bathed himself, and washed his cloaths; as were also those who carried away the flesh, blood, and entrails of the bullock, and goat of the sin-offering, to be burnt without the camp *.

It was likewise on this day that the high-priest did give the people the solemn blessing prescribed by Moses<sup>1</sup>, in which he pronounced the unutterable name of God, of which we have spoken in another place *; for, according to the Jews<sup>m</sup>, the uttering of that word had been forbidden upon any other occasion by a particular law ever since the stoning of a notorious blasphemer<sup>a</sup>; but, whether true or not, the pronouncing of that tremendous name, joined to the sacred awfulness of the place, may be reasonably supposed to have filled him with c uncommon dread whilst he stayed in it, which is the reason why he usually made what haste he could decently out of it, lest he should be struck dead for some accidental miscarriage or inadvertency during his short stay there; and when he came out, he went backwards, keeping his face still towards the mercy-seat, and bending towards the ground. All these things, no doubt, took up a considerable time; the residue of the day was spent in prayers, and other works of mortification; and they were so afraid of shortening it, that they begun it half an hour sooner, and ended it half an hour later than other feast-days; after which the trumpet gave notice that the solemnity was expired, and then they dressed themselves in white, or at least put on clean linnen, and, after a blessing, sat d down to break their fast. They seldom failed making a plentiful meal, and to rejoice that their sins were now expiated; but above all, the high-priest expressed a more

† Levit. xvi. 30. * Ibid. xvi. pass. ibid. vi. 30. Vide FAG. in loc. HOTTING. & al.
<sup>1</sup> Numb. vi. 24, & seq. * Vide sup. p. 485. note (T). <sup>m</sup> PHILO. in vit. Mos. lib. iii.
 JOSEPH. Talmud. & al. <sup>a</sup> Levit. xxiv. 10. & seq.

if not, of any other colour but red, and, after a prayer, they struck their heads with that of the cock three times, saying, bear thou my sins, suffer thou the death I have deserved, die thou for me, and make thou reconciliation for me, that I may be admitted into a blessed life, with all the people of Israel. After which they killed the cock, confessing that they deserved the death they inflicted on him, and threw his entrails on the top of the house, in hopes that the crows would bear them and their sins into the wilderness. 'Tis true, this ceremony is looked upon by the Dutch Jews as sinful, and that Leo de Modena, who owns that it was practised heretofore in the Levant and Italy, adds, that it was afterwards left off, because it was found to be a meer piece of superstition, for which no tolerable reason could be assigned. But he seems to have forgot that they gave one which, however ridiculed by our learned Goodwin, is not without a singular meaning. It is this: the word גִּבּוֹר, Geber, in the scripture, signifying a man, and in the Talmud and Chaldee, a cock, the divine justice required, that, as Geber in the first sense had sinned, Geber in the other sense should bear his sin. Now what other foundation can this custom have, than the prophecies that the Messiah, as Geber, in his human nature, should expiate for the sins of man; unto whom therefore they substituted this typical Geber, or cock, till the antitypical one should accomplish that expiation by his death. And might not the Christians, urging this against them, be the motive of their abolishing it? Might not moreover, the Πῆσι-ἱμῶνα of the Gentiles, those human victims, which they chose out of the dregs of the people, to sacrifice yearly to their gods, by way of expiation (77), and their Καθάρματα, which they offered in times of plague, famine, and other publick calamities, and on whom they so liberally bestowed all the curses, which they thought due to themselves, have their original from hence (78); this is what the apostle justly complains was practised against the first Christians (79), since there hardly happened any publick calamity in the empire, but they were immediately persecuted with the utmost cruelty, as the cause of them; and were looked upon as proper victims to avert the divine anger.

(W) He was likewise to make such another confession when he offered the bullock for himself and family, before he ventured to enter into the holy

(77) Vide SUID. in voc. πῆσι-ἱμῶνα. (78) Vide Vet. Scholiast. in Aristoph. (79) 1 Cor. iv.
 13. Vide BUDD. Annot. in Pandect. de pœnis. GOODWIN'S Mos. & Aar. lib. iii. c. 8. § 7, & seq.

- a a more than ordinary joy, that he had gone through the solemn and dangerous office of that day, and was come alive out of the most holy place* (X).

Laws concerning other expiations or atonements.

- BEFORE we leave this subject of expiations, it will not be amiss to give an account of some others, which were enjoined by Moses upon their contracting of any legal impurities, such as those of a woman after child-birth, of a man by touching of any unclean thing, as a dead body or carcase, or an unclean person, as a leper, and the like, and secondly by the breach of any one branch of the law, whether knowingly or through ignorance. By these and such like the persons contracted a kind of legal defilement, from which they could not be cleansed, but by offering such sacrifices as the law appointed (Y); and this purification was to be performed in the following manner. The person who had committed any trespass, whether knowingly or ignorantly, was to bring his victim or sin-offering to the door of the tabernacle. This offering was to be a bullock or a goat, if it was for a priest, and if for a layman, a goat, sheep, kid or lamb, and if the person was too poor to afford one of these, then two pigeons or turtle doves, or even a small quantity of flour was accepted of. One or more then of these, according to the nature of the trespass, or the circumstance of the person, were brought to the priest, and the person to be purified brought his victim, and having confessed his sin, laying his hands upon the head of it, killed and offered it up. The priest then took up some of the blood of it with his fingers, and applied it to the horns of the altar of burnt-offerings, and poured the remainder at the foot of it. He then took the fat of the caul, kidneys, and the rump, and burnt it upon the altar, and, having prayed for the person, pronounced him pardoned and absolved from his trespass; the flesh of such victim, thus offered, belonged to the priest alone; none other was to eat of it. This ceremony was performed somewhat more solemnly when the king, high-priest, or the whole nation had committed a trespass, but in the main it came much to the same purpose.
- d

As for legal pollutions, such as we mentioned above, there was added another ceremony for their cleansing; namely, the ashes of the red heifer reserved for that purpose. The ceremony of killing and burning it, as it was prescribed by Moses, was after this manner: The high-priest was to take care that it was without spot or blemish, and that it had never been yoked. It holy of holies, only, instead of the house of Israel, he only mentioned that of Aaron. The reader may find it in the Mishna, in the place above-quoted. It is plain however from the ceremonies which he was to perform there, that he was to enter four times into it on that day; 1. To set the incense a burning; for he went in with both his hands full, and could carry nothing else with him (80). 2. When he carried some of the blood of the bullock that was offered for himself (81). 3. When he carried some of that which he offered for the people (82). And 4. when he went to fetch out the censer and fire. The Talmud adds, that it was death for him to go in the fifth time. And therefore when the apostle says that he went in but once a year (83), it is plain he has followed the version of the Septuagint, which render the words אחד בשנה, Achad beshanah, by  $\alpha\pi\alpha\chi\epsilon\tau\iota\varsigma$   $\epsilon\tau\iota\varsigma$   $\epsilon\tau\iota\varsigma$ , but it is certain it might have been more properly rendered one day in the year.

* Vide Mishna, Tract. Yoma. MAIMON. Tract. Yom. hakiphur. MEYER, c. xv. § 9. † Vide Levit. iv, v, vi, pass. ‡ Numb. xix. per tot.

(X) The Jews add several other particularities relating to this day, which we dare not affirm to have been in use during the first temple; such as these, that the scape-goat was escorted all the way by priests and laymen, to the place appointed; that, between the temple and it, there was a cauey made on purpose, with ten different stages on it; that as soon as the goat was thrown down the precipice, and broken in pieces by the fall, notice was immediately given to the people, who waited impatiently for the news in the temple, by proper signals set up at convenient distances, with many more of the like nature.

(Y) We believe it is scarce necessary to observe here, that, in the language of the Old Testament, all transgressions, before they were expiated, are compared to a filth or defilement contracted by the transgressor; and the pardon that attends this expiation of them, to an ablution or purification from it. It is according to this allusion that the Septuagint have rendered the words כופר and כפר, Kopher and Kaphar, as likewise those of חטא and חטא, Tabar and Chatab, when this last signifies a forgiveness, by  $\alpha\beta\alpha\delta\iota\sigma\mu\omicron\varsigma$  and  $\alpha\beta\alpha\delta\iota\lambda\epsilon\iota\varsigma$ ; and it is in the same sense that the writers of the New affirm Christ to cleanse and purify us from our sins by his blood.

(80) Levit. xvi. 12, 13.

(81) Ibid. ver. 14.

(82) Ver. 15.

(83) Heb. ix. 7.

was to be carried out of the camp, where he killed it, and made a seven-<sup>a</sup> fold asperision of the blood with his fingers towards the sanctuary; after which a large fire being kindled, it was flung into it, with its skin, entrails, and other appurtenances, and a bundle of cedar-wood, hyssop and scarlet, and burnt to ashes before his face, himself helping to cast her into the fire; and this was to be done in the presence of all the people. The ashes were then gathered and laid up for use, and all that had had a hand in this ceremony were to be unclean until evening. When ever afterwards any person had contracted a pollution, such as made him unclean seven days, he was to be sprinkled with water, in which some of these ashes had been thrown, on the third and seventh day, on which last he was to be clean; but, if he neglected being sprinkled on the third, he was not to be clean till the tenth day.<sup>b</sup> This law was so severe against those who were polluted by the touch of a dead body, or by coming into the tent or room where it lay, that, if they offered to go to the tabernacle before they had been thus purified, they were to be cut off, as having polluted the sanctuary. The very vessels that were in the place uncovered, as well as the place itself where the corps lay, were likewise defiled, till sprinkled with this water of separation, as it is called in the text. How often this grand ceremony was repeated from Moses to the captivity is not agreed. Some affirm that the heifer which was burnt by Elcazar, Aaron's son, did last them all that time; others that there<sup>c</sup> was one burnt every year, and that some of the ashes of it were sent to every city and town in Israel (Z). Whether or no this sacrifice was to be numbered among the burnt-offerings which were made for the whole nation is a dispute amongst the learned both Jews and Christians, which we shall not enter into; sure it is that the author of the epistle to the Hebrews looked upon it as a figure of Christ, who therefore suffered without the gates of the city, even as the heifer was burned without the camp••; and whose blood is of much greater

<sup>a</sup> Vide HIERON. Epist. 27. •• Heb. xiii. 11, 12.

(Z) It is justly wondered, that this water thus mixed with the ashes of the red heifer should purify the unclean, and at the same time pollute not only those who assisted at the slaying, burning, and gathering the ashes of it, but even those who sprinkled the unclean person with it (84). The Jews have a very ancient tradition that Solomon, who was master of all other mysteries and knowledge, and could account for every precept in the law, even those which forbade the eating of swine's flesh, or wearing of mixtures of linnen and wool, yet own himself ignorant of the meaning of this red heifer (85). However our Spencer has ventured to dive deeper than he, by the help of his infallible rule of relation, either of conformity or opposition to the Egyptian rites, he ranks therefore the red heifer under this last class, because that nation sacrificed nothing but male animals, and that they had an aversion to all red-hair'd creatures, and even to the colour itself, whereas the Mosaic law makes no distinction of colours in any case but this (86). But we beg leave to observe here, that the Jews were as little fond of the red as the Egyptians, and that Moses commanded the use of scarlet in sacrifices for sin, only to express the guilt of it. Accordingly all the inspired writers compared sins of the deepest guilt to crimson and scarlet, as they did innocence to white (87); and this we think doth sufficiently account for the colour of the heifer.

And here we beg leave to subjoin a remark to the same effect, which is, that in the 22d psalm, which abounds with many particularities relating to Christ's passion, there is one expression, not hitherto observed, nor rightly rendered by any translation that we know of. It is where he is called a worm and no man (88), for it is plain the word תולעת Tbolagbath, is no where used in scripture, but to express either the crimson or scarlet colour itself (in which case it is commonly joined to the word שני Shani, and signifies double dyed); or at most, the insect from which that dye is made, unless it be figuratively taken to imply a deep degree of guilt, as in the place above quoted out of Isaiab. The most literally therefore that the psalmist's words can be rendered would be, As for me, I am a scarlet insect or worm, and not a man; but the figurative sense will be plainly this; I bear the scandal and reproach of the deepest guilt, and am wholly free from it; I am reputed a sinner, and yet am free from sin. But this by the by. We shall only add, that the Jews, Maimon excepted, whom Spencer affects to follow, allow, that there is a deeper mystery in the ordinance of the red heifer, than any in the whole scripture, and highly condemn the presumption of those who pretend to dive into that deep abyss (89.) However what was a mystery to the Jews is sufficiently explained to the Christians by the apostle to the Hebrews, in the place quoted above, and to which we think Spencer has given but a jejune and illusory answer (90).

(84) Num. xix. 7, 8, 10, 21.

(85) Mishn. Tract. de מוסף מרוב מניין. More Nenech. p. 3.

c. 26. vide Et lib. Jalcut Et al.

(86) De Leg. Rit. Lib. ii. c. 15.

(87) Vide int. al. Isai. i. 18.

(88) Jer. 6. (89) Vide Mishn. ubi sup. R. ABR. SEBA. in Zetar Hamor. fol. 118. Et seq. R. R. SALON. ABENEZ. ABARBAN. Et al. (90) Ubi sup. Jer. 6. obj. 3.

- a efficacy towards the purging and sanctifying of men, than that of bulls and goats, the ashes of an heifer, or any other legal sacrifices *.

Laws concerning some other sacrifices and oblations, not mentioned under the former heads.

AS we had occasion to mention the sacrifices that were enjoined to be offered upon every solemn festival, under the head of each, and of those which were offered by way of expiation for sin; we shall now mention those few others that remain unspoken of. These may be reduced under the seven following heads. 1.

- b The daily sacrifice. 2. Peace-offerings. 3. Meat and drink-offerings. 4. Offerings for cleansing. 5. First-fruits. 6. First-born, and 7. Tythes. Besides these, there were other occasional sacrifices, some of them directed by some prophets, as in the case of Samuel<sup>1</sup>, and Elijah<sup>2</sup>, and others observed by particular families, which were rather feasts than sacrifices, as appears by the pretence which David made for absenting from Saul's table<sup>3</sup>, and the like, of which we shall take no further notice, they being entirely arbitrary; as for those that were to be offered at the consecration of the high-priest, and of other inferior priests, they will be better seen in another place.

- c 1. The daily, or, as it is called in the original, the continual sacrifice, consisted first, and before all things, in burning a certain quantity of incense upon the golden altar, after which they were to offer two lambs of the first year, and without blemish, as a continual burnt-offering for the whole nation; these were burned every morning and every evening, and with a slower fire than ordinary, that it might last the longer. They offered likewise a certain quantity of wine, and of flour, mixed with oil, for a meat and drink-offering. This was ordained by God upon mount Sinai<sup>4</sup>, and is therefore called continual, because it was not to be interrupted by any other sacrifices or solemnity, as we have seen under the article of each festival.

- d 2. Peace-offerings; this sacrifice was either eucharistical in acknowledgment of some mercies received from God, or supplicatory, in order to obtain some blessings from him, or out of meer devotion in honour to God, or lastly, upon account of some vow. These were all free and voluntary, there being no law that obliged the Israelites to them, except where it is said, that they should not appear empty before the Lord, but be liberal in these kind of sacrifices, according as God had blessed them. It was likewise left to them, to offer what beasts they would, without regard to sex or age, so they were of the clean sort, and free from any pollution or defect. The votary was to bring it to the door of the tabernacle, lay his hands upon the head of it, and kill it. The priest then took some of the blood, and sprinkled it upon, and round the altar, and poured the remainder upon the ground, at the foot of it. All the fat of the offering, the kidneys, and, if it were a sheep or lamb, the rump were burnt upon the altar, after the priests had laid them upon the hands of the person, and directed him to wave them to the four points. The breast and shoulder of the victim was the perquisite of the priest in waiting, and the rest belonged to the owner, who might then dress and eat it how and with whom he would, as if it had been killed within his own gates<sup>5</sup>.

- f 3. The meat and drink-offerings; these we have already spoken of occasionally, because they used to accompany the burnt-offerings of every festival, the daily and all other sacrifices made with fire. They consisted of a certain proportion of wine, oil, and fine flour, to every beast that was sacrificed. Thus, for instance, with a bullock they offered half an hin, that is, about a wine gallon, of wine and oil, and three tenth deals, or wine pints of flour; to a ram, was allowed the third part, and to a lamb the fourth part of an hin, and so proportionably of the flour<sup>6</sup>. Besides these, there were some others of the same nature, which were to be offered by the poor, who could not reach a higher offering, of which we have said enough already.

4. Offerings for cleansing. We have spoken of some of them above, under the head of expiation. There remain two more, namely, that of two pigeons, which which a woman was to offer for her purification after child-bed, in case she could not afford a lamb; or even a small quantity of flour and oil, if the pigeons were also above her circumstances<sup>a</sup>; and that of two sparrows, which the leper offered, after his cure, for the cleansing of himself<sup>b</sup> and his house<sup>c</sup>. In both these cases, one of the birds was instead of a lamb for a burnt-offering, and the other for a sin-offering. The first bird was to be killed in a clean earthen vessel over a running water; after which the priest took the other bird, with a bunch of cedar-wood, scarlet and hyssop, and dipped them in the blood, and sprinkled the person or house seven times with it, and then pronounced them clean, and the living bird was let loose. The person was likewise to add three tenths of flour mingled with oil, and a log of oil. These quantities of flour and oil were made into cakes, <sup>b</sup> and offered up to God. Some were of barley, others of wheat-flour, some had leaven, and consequently came not near the altar<sup>d</sup>; others had none. All of them were to have some salt. Some were voluntary, others not; some dressed one way, and some another, as the reader may see more fully at the end of the following note (A).

<sup>1</sup> Ibid. ix. 13. <sup>2</sup> 1 Sam. ix. 12. xii. 9. xvi. 2, & seq. <sup>3</sup> 1 Kings xviii. 30, & seq. <sup>4</sup> 1 Sam. xx. 29. <sup>5</sup> Exod. xxix. 38. Num. xxviii. 6, & seq. <sup>6</sup> Levit. iii. pass. <sup>7</sup> Numb. xxviii. pass.

THE next under this head is the shew-bread, called in the original, the bread of faces (B), because it was always to stand before the Lord upon the golden table in the holy place. It was to be made of the purest wheat, into twelve loaves or cakes, answering to the twelve tribes. The priests were to take care to bring fresh ones warm every sabbath-day in the morning, at which time <sup>c</sup> they took away the old, which were to be eaten by none but priests. Each loaf was to contain two tenth deals, or about three wine pints of flour, and to be set up in two rows, six to each row, one loaf upon another. The Jews tell us, that there were some double plates of gold between each loaf, to give them air, and prevent their growing mouldy. This offering was accompanied with incense, with which the loaves were to be perfumed, but they were to be without leaven. Some commentators say, that there was a quantity of wine offered with

<sup>a</sup> Levit. xii. per tot.<sup>b</sup> Ibid. xiv. 4, & seq.<sup>c</sup> Ibid. ver. 49, & seq.<sup>d</sup> Ibid. ii. 11.

(A) It will not be amiss to observe here, that all the offerings, which had life, were called קורבן, Corban, and those which had not, מנחה, Minchah; the first is derived from קרב, Karab, to approach, because the victims were brought to the door of the tabernacle, the other signifies a present; but both of these consisted of such things as were commonly eaten, if we except the incense and the wood, which were likewise called offerings. The Corban was always looked upon as the most sacred, and was therefore called קדש קדשים, or most holy, the others קדש קלים, or holy things of a lighter, or inferior nature. These Minchahs were of five sorts. 1. Of bare flour. 2. Made into cakes, and baked in an oven. 3. Fried in a pan. 4. Upon a gridiron. And 5. The first fruits, of which we shall speak under the next head. Again, these cakes were either kneaded with or fried in, or only rubbed over with oil, which was always that of olives; and as none of these three were to have any leaven, so neither were they to have any honey (91). If this last was at all offered, it was by itself, and under the notion of first-fruits.

There is one of Moses's laws which expressly forbids the priests to offer any thing to God, that is in any way marred or spoiled, and particularly any bread from the hands of a stranger, as being polluted and corrupt (92); by which some understand any kind of sacrifices, and others only that of these cakes, or meat-offerings; but in either case there is no doubt, but if a stranger was so well disposed as to offer any sacrifice to the God of Israel, the priests could furnish him with either victims or bread ready baked, provided he payed the price of them †. But be that as it will, it seems from two or three texts, that they had a constant reserve of loaves or cakes, kept in baskets for those who came to offer up these meat-offerings, or any other sacrifices that required them (93). And here we might add likewise, under this head, the meat-offerings of the Nazarites, and the cake of jealousy; but they will be better seen in their proper places, when we come to speak of them in the sequel.

(B) The words are לחם פנים, Lechem-phanim, which name some, especially of the Jews, affirm to be given, because the loaves had four phanim or faces, that is, were four-square (94); but it is more likely that they were so called from their standing continually, לפני מלכיהם, Lipnei-melchihem, before the Lord. Some have thought it improper to place this shew-bread among the meat-offerings, because they were not offered upon the altar as these were. For our part, we think with some others, that the sacred table on which they were set (which may not improperly be deemed an altar) their being kept before the Lord, and called hallowed bread, and as such allowed only to be eaten by the priests, may easily excuse our ranking them under this class, rather than any other, especially they being accompanied with incense, and offered in the name of the twelve tribes. The Jews add, that they were covered with leaf-gold; but do no where tell us where they are commanded to do so.

(91) Levit. ii. 11, 12. (92) Levit. xxii. 24, 25. † Vide Num. xv. 14, & seq. (93) Compar. Exod. xxix. 32. & Num. vi. 15, & alib. (94) Vide Maim. Treat. חמדין, ABR. HAROFH. שלמי גבורים, & al.

- a them, but the text mentions nothing but incense and salt *. These loaves were called the hallowed bread, in opposition to the common sort which every body might eat †.

5. FIRST-FRUITS. We have already spoken of those that were offered at Easter, Whitsuntide, and at the feast of Tabernacles; and these were offered in the name of the whole nation; but besides them, every private man was likewise obliged to bring the first-fruits of his fields, orchards, and vineyards, to the tabernacle, and afterwards to the temple, as an acknowledgment that God was the giver of them. Neither the time nor the quantity being prescribed by the written law, the former was left to the convenience of the people, and the latter was determined in some sort by their wise men, yet so as to leave room for generosity to exert itself more or less according to the disposition of each person. Thus it was agreed, that they ought to offer at least the sixtieth part of the product; but some did offer the fiftieth, and some even the fortieth part *. After the building of the temple they were all obliged to bring them thither, and the ceremony was performed as follows.

As soon as the person who came to offer them had reached the court of the priests, the Levites began to sing the 30th psalm, after which the person made this confession: I do this day make a publick acknowledgment before the LORD your God, that I am entered into the good land which he swore unto our fathers that he would give us (C). Whilst he was speaking these words, he took his basket off his shoulder, the priest lending him a hand, and, whilst these two held it up, he made an end of his confession in these remarkable words prescribed by Moses †, A Syrian ready to perish was my father, and he went down into Egypt, and sojourned there with a few, and became there a nation great, mighty, and populous; and the Egyptians did evil intreat us, and afflicted us, and laid upon us hard bondage. And when we cried unto the Lord God of our fathers, the Lord heard our voice, and looked on our afflictions, our labour and oppression. And the Lord brought us out of Egypt with a mighty hand and stretched out arm, and with great terribleness, with signs and with wonders;
d and brought us into this place, and has given us this land, a land flowing with milk and honey. And now behold I have brought the first-fruits of the land, which thou, O Lord, hast given me. After this the basket was set before the Lord by the side of the altar, and he offered the burnt-offering and peace-offering which were always to accompany the first-fruits, and having paid his devotions to God, he went to make merry with his acquaintance with his share of the peace and meat-offerings. And here he was likewise obliged to impart some portion of his good cheer to the fatherless, widows, and to the Levites, that they might rejoice with him. And this the rich, who sacrificed a bullock, * Exod. xxv. 30. Levit. xxiv. 5, & seq. † Vide 2 Sam. xxi. 3, 4. ‡ Vide Mishn. Tract. Terumoth & Bekorim, & commentat. in eund. vide & MAIM. in loc. † Deut. xxvi. 4, & seq. Vide MUNK. JUV. & al. in Levit. xxii. xxiii. & Deut. & xxvi.

(C) The Talmud adds several other remarkable particulars concerning the bringing the first-fruits to the temple, which we can neither warrant nor disprove to have been used during the first temple. They are as follows. As soon as a man was got to the foot of the mount on which the temple stood, he was to take up his basket (in which the first-fruits, or rather a sample of them, were laid, not confusedly, but every sort by itself) and put it on his shoulders, and carry it up to the priest's apartment. They tell us that the kings themselves were not dispensed from it. These baskets were more or less magnificent, that is, from those made of gold wire to the common coarser ones, according to the circumstances of the persons. To prevent confusion as much as possible, they used to join themselves by troops of four and twenty to a troop, which drove before them a bullock crowned with olive-branches, and having his horns tipped with gold or silver, which was to be offered with their first-fruits. They generally had a man to go before them, playing upon a flute or some such instrument, and in that order they marched to Jerusalem singing some psalm or hymn proper for the occasion. As soon as they came near the gates of Jerusalem, the inhabitants used to go out to congratulate, and bid them welcome. These first-fruits did not consist of all the different products of the earth, but only of six kinds; namely, barley, wheat, grapes, figs, dates, and olives; to which some add apricocks, or peaches and pomegranates. These first-fruits are not indeed called in the text מנחות, Menachoth, or offerings, from Mincha mentioned in a former note, nevertheless we have ventured to rank them under that class, because they were offered up at the altar (95). They add, that, after each band had performed their duty in the manner mentioned above, they were to lie one night in the city, and then return to their homes (96).

(95) Vide Deut. xxvi. 10, & alib. (96) Vide BARNAG. ex Cunnæ tom. 3. lib. iii. c. 2.

might be the more ready to do, because they were forbid to leave any fragments a till the next day <sup>1</sup>.

UNDER this head we may add the first cake of every lump of dough that exceeded the bulk of forty eggs, of which the woman was obliged to set aside one part to be given to the next priests or Levites <sup>2</sup>, in order to sanctify the rest. But as Moses did not determine the quantity, it was left to the discretion either of the master or mistress of the house, till the rabbies assigned the twenty-fourth part of that which was baked for one's own family, and the forty-eighth part of that which was designed for sale <sup>3</sup> (D).

6. FIRST-BORN. The Mosaic law makes a threefold distinction of these; namely, the first-born of men, of cattle, and of the product of the earth (E). <sup>b</sup> We have already spoken in a former section of the first of these, of the reason of their being consecrated to God, and of their redemption by their parents †. And here we must observe, that the word first-born of the males must not be restrained to the eldest son; for he may be eldest, and yet not first-born. And therefore Moses adds, that first opened the womb: so that it was possible among the Jews, where polygamy and polygyny was allowed, for a man to have several first-born, and all to be redeemed at the price of five shekels, as soon as they were thirty days old, at which time they were presented to the priest, and the mother offered the sacrifice of her purification, mentioned in a former article, and, the price being payed for the child's redemption, he <sup>c</sup> began then to belong to the parents, and not till then ¶ (F). How they redeemed them since the destruction of the second temple is out of our purpose. The reader may see it in Leo de Modena and other Hebrew rabbies; only we may observe that the children of the priests needed not to be redeemed at any time.

THE first-born of clean beasts, such as calves, lambs, kids, and the like, were also consecrated to God; but with this difference, that they could not be redeemed, but were to be brought to the tabernacles or temple, and there be killed, the blood was poured at the foot of the altar, the fat burnt upon it, and the rest of the flesh was the priest's perquisite, with this precaution, however, <sup>d</sup> that if the beast had any natural or legal defects, such as blindness, lameness, the want of a limb and the like, it was not to be sacrificed: the priest took it home, and there killed and eat it; and might invite whom he would

<sup>1</sup> Levit. vii. 15, & alib. <sup>2</sup> Num. xv. 19, & seq. <sup>3</sup> Vide Mishn. Tract. חלה, c. 1. † Vide sup. p. 502. c, d. ¶ Exod. xiii. 2. Num. xviii. 15, & alib.

(D) The Jews, we are told, were so scrupulous in this, that, if they could come at neither priest nor Levite, they threw the cake into the oven and burnt it to ashes, before they put the bread into it (97). This is one of the three things that are committed to the care of the women, who were to say a blessing at the same time that they separated the paste; and this extended according to them to the bread that was made of wheat, rie, barley, wild barley, and oats.

(E) We must remind our English readers, that this expression has no such harshness in the original, as it has in ours, and other languages, because the word which in these is rendered first-born, in the original, is בכור, Becor, which properly implies the principal or most excellent of every thing or creature in its kind, whether in a good or bad sense. Thus God expresses himself concerning David, I will make him my first-born, higher than the kings of the earth (98); where the word means nothing like first-born in a strict sense. On the other hand, a most cruel death is in Job called בכור מוות, Becor-maveth, the first-born of death (99); and Isaiab called the poorest, or rather the weakest of all בכורי דלים, Becore-dallim, the first born of the weak (100). It is therefore probable that this word was figuratively applied to the first-born, to imply their excellency in strength and dignity, according to Jacob's expression to Reuben, his eldest son (1).

(F) According to this law we find the virgin Mary redeeming her child Jesus (2); nevertheless it has been much disputed, whether he was subject to this or not, tho' he is allowed on all hands to have been her first-born. Some think he was not, because he did not break open the seal of her virginity (3). Others, thinking that every male opening the matrix is equivalent to every first-born male, maintain that he was to be redeemed (4). But some of the fathers have still improved this argument, affirming, that in strictness of speech this law of redemption was only applicable to Christ, seeing he was the only male child that did properly open the womb of his mother, whereas in other women it was opened, if not before, yet at least when the first-born was begot. For which reason they think this law to have been wholly typical of Christ (5).

<sup>1</sup> (97) Mishn. Tract. חלה, PHIL. de Præm. Sacerd. HIERON. in cap. 45. Ezek. Maim. Leo de Moden. & al. (98) Pf. lxxxix. 27. (99) Job xviii. 13. (100) Isai. xiv. 30. (1) Gen. xlix. 3. (2) Luke ii. 22, 23. (3) CYRIL. HIEROSOL. Homil. de Octurf. Domin. (4) Vide CORNEL. a lapid. on Exod. xiii. & ant. ab eo citat. (5) ORIGEN, IERTUL. AMBROS. & al. ap. CALM. sub voc. premier ne.

- a to partake of it, as of any other common meat. But if it was an unclean beast such as an ass, a dog, and the like, the owner was at his liberty either to redeem it with a lamb, or with five shekels of money, or to break the neck of it<sup>a</sup> (G).

As to the first product of the trees, all that is meant by it is, that every new planted tree was to be reckoned uncircumcised and impure during the first three years. It was not lawful to gather, much less to eat the fruit of it; on the fourth year, all that grew upon it was the Lord's, and consequently the perquisite of the priests, from whom however the owner might redeem it if he thought fit by an equivalent<sup>b</sup>: but from that time the owner was at liberty

- b to make the same use of them as he did of his old ones<sup>c</sup>.

7. TITHES. These and the first-fruits, and the redemption of the first-born, were the most constant and considerable income of the priests and Levites; tho' the first is by far the more ancient, as we have seen in several places of this history*. However, we confine ourselves to those prescribed by the laws of Moses, in which he has been so strict, that he ordained, that, of all those which consisted of clean animals, none should be redeemed at any rate, but that they should all be sacrificed to the Lord; and that those which consisted of the fruits of the earth, such as grains, fruits, and the like, should not be bought off, without paying one fifth part more than their intrinsic value<sup>d</sup>. We need not here observe, that they were given to them as an equivalent for their not having any share in the division of the land, nor any portion or inheritance with the rest of the people (H).

- THESE tithes were of four sorts; namely, 1. Those which were thus assigned to the tribe of Levi<sup>e</sup> (I), and these not being of the higher rank of holy things; all the Levites, men and women, clean or unclean, might eat of them. 2. The tenths of these tithes which were assigned to the priests, for these last did not gather the tithes themselves, but that office belonged to the Levites, who were not to touch any part of them, till they had paid that proportion to the priests<sup>f</sup>, and had sent it to Jerusalem. 3. After a layman had payed his first tithes to the Levites, he was obliged to set aside a second tenth, or exchange it for an equivalent in money, with an addition of a fifth part above the value; and this he was obliged to bring to Jerusalem, and there make a feast, and invite, besides his friends and relations, the priests and Levites to it<sup>g</sup> (K).

<sup>a</sup> Vide Num. xviii. 17, & seq. Exod. xiii. 13. Deut. xv. 20, & seq. * Vide præc. affirm. 137. <sup>b</sup> Levit. xix. 23. <sup>c</sup> Vide sup. p. 323. a. & note (S). 440. d. <sup>d</sup> Levit. xxvii. 30, & seq. <sup>e</sup> Num. xviii. 20, & seq. Deut. xiv. 22, & alib. vide & 2 Chron. xxxi. 4, & seq. <sup>f</sup> Num. xviii. 25, & seq. <sup>g</sup> Deut. xii. 17, 18. xiv. 22, 23.

(G) N. de Lyra, a learned convert from Judaism, tells us, that dogs and such like creatures of no intrinsic value were never to be redeemed, but put to death, by reason of a precept in Deuteronomy, against bringing the hire of a whore, or the price of a dog into the house of the Lord (6); wherein he is followed by the learned Boschart and others, as the most received opinion of the rabbies (7). But we question very much whether the generality of the Jews were so exact as to observe which came out first of a whole litter, it is more likely that the more scrupulous destroyed them all for security's sake.

(H) And, perhaps too, with a very judicious view of making them more careful to keep up the religious observance of God's laws among the people, too prone naturally to back-slide; since their income was sure to rise and fall, according as the spirit of religion and obedience proved more or less vigorous.

(I) Some authors have been of opinion, that every man was obliged to bring or send by proxy these first-tithes to Jerusalem (8); but besides that, there doth not appear the least shadow of a precept for it, it seems rather from the second tithes, which the Levites were to send to Jerusalem (9), to the priests, that the first was to be payed upon the spot, or at furthest in the cities of the Levites. And indeed it would have been too great trouble and expence, especially for those that dwelt at a considerable distance from Jerusalem, to have even sent them thither. If it be objected, that it was equally so to the Levites, the answer is obvious, that it was much easier for them to send a tenth part, than to carry the whole thither, and be forced to bring nine parts back to their respective homes.

(K) That this tenth is different from the first that was payed to the Levites, whatever some commentators have thought to the contrary, is plain, 1. Because the first was the hereditary right of the tribe of Levi, which would have starved without it, and this was consumed by the owners and their friends. 2. The Levites were obliged to refund a tenth part of the first to the priests, but in this they were only invited as guests. 3. The first was payed all the land over, but this only at Jerusalem.

(6) Deut. xxiii. 18. (7) Vide Mishn. MAIM. & al. & MUNST. in loc. (8) JOSEPH. Ant. lib. iv. c. 8. Vide SIXT. AMAS. de Decim. & ant. ab eo citat. (9) Comp. Deut. xiv. 22, 23, with Nehem. x. 34, & seq.

4. The last kind of tithes, which Moses commands, was to be set by every a third year, and be consumed in feasts at home, to which they were obliged to invite the Levites, the poor fatherless, widows, and strangers * (L).

WE read indeed of another kind of tithes, such as Samuel threatened the Israelites, their king, if they persisted in the choice of one, would levy upon them out of their fields, vineyards, and flocks *. But as there is nothing of such a right mentioned by Moses in the rules which he settled for the conduct of their future kings *, it is likely the prophet only forewarns them of what they would be apt, rather than of what they might lawfully do.

WHAT the first sort of tithes consisted in, which were thus appropriated to the maintenance of the priests and Levites, whether in all great and small cattle, and other kinds of animals, as well as all sorts of grain and fruits, or only in the latter, is not easy to determine. The Jews, if we will believe some of the learnedest among them †, affirm that they had no share nor title in the former, and that the flesh of all those creatures that were decimated belonged to the owners; and Obadiah de Bartbenora adds, that there is not one passage in the whole law that proves, that the priest had a right to any part of it *. It is hardly worth the while to dive further into this matter, because we cannot attain to any certainty about it. As for the manner in which the cattle was usually decimated, we shall give it in Maimon's own words *. "A man, says he, who out of ten lambs, for instance, should have c
" let aside one, or ten out of an hundred, would not be reckoned to have paid
" the tithes of them: the right way therefore of doing it was as follows. They " did shut up all the lambs, kids, or calves, in a stable, which had one " door so strait that two of them could not get out a-breast: they then " brought their dams to the door, that their young ones, hearing their voice,
" might strive to get out; pursuant to what is said in Leviticus xxvii. 32.
" Every thing that passeth under the rod. Accordingly it was required, that these " young ones should come out of themselves, and not be driven out; and as " fast as they came out one after another, they that stood by told them one,
" two, three, and so on to ten. This tenth was immediately marked with red d " lead, and whether it were male or female, whether with or without blemish;
" the owner said, this shall be consecrated to pay the tithes. If it was fit, it " was then to be sacrificed to God; if not, it might be killed and eaten
" where the owner pleased; for it could be neither redeemed nor exchange-
" ed † (M).

* Deut. xii. ver. 28, 29. † 1 Sam. viii. 15, & seq. * Deut. xvii. 14, & seq. † Vide MAIMON. in Becoroth, c. 6. * BARTHENOR. in Zebachim, c. 5, & al. * MAIM. ubi sup.
b Vide BASNAG. Rep. Heb. tom. iii. lib. 33. c. 4.

(L) It is however more likely that this last tenth differed in nothing from the third, but only in that this was spent at home every third year, and the other at Jerusalem on the other two years; so that there might be properly but three sorts of tithes, that of the Levites, of the priests, and these last, which were rather a kind of eucharistical agape, which the Jews therefore called מעשר עני, and the Greeks εὐχαριστία, the tenth of the poor, and Tobit the third tenth (10).

(M) The reader will not perhaps think it amiss, if we add some few remarks concerning their manner of sacrificing their living creatures, not so much with regard to their slaying them, concerning which all that needs be said is, that they were extremely careful to let out all their blood, and to avoid every thing that might stagnate it in any part; but with respect to some ceremonies that were used by way of distinction between the sacrifices of a more, and those of a less sacred nature. Of the first sort were all the burnt-offerings and sacrifices for sin, and those were always killed on the north side of the altar; whereas those of the lower sort, such as peace, free-will, and all eucharistical offerings, were killed in any part within the court of the sanctuary. As for birds, the priest pinched their neck with his thumb-nail, and that which was for a burnt-offering had its neck quite pulled off, but that for sin only broken (11). We have already spoken of those victims of the first rank, whose blood was carried and sprinkled within the tabernacle, that of the others they only poured at the foot of the altar, except touching the horns with some of it, on some occasions (12). The Jews add, that there was a grate through which the blood did fall into a kind of sewer which carried it into the brook Cedron (13). However, as for these aspersions they were always to be repeated seven times; and from them, as well as the seven days of the week, of the week of years, and of seven weeks of years, as likewise from the seven-fold circumvection of the ark round the walls of Jericho, Naaman being commanded to plunge seven times in Jordan, and many more of the like nature the (10) Tob. i. 8. (11) Levit. i. 15. v. 8, & alib. (12) Levit. xvi. 14, 15, & alib. (13) Vide Misp. Tract. Middot.

- a To these kind of offerings we might add some others, such as that of incense, which the priests only were to burn every day upon the altar of perfume (N), before the morning and evening sacrifice, and the high-priest once a year in the holy of holies, both which we have already said something of, and those which were offered on solemn festivals, new-moons, sabbaths, and the like, besides some others of less note; but we have already dwelt too long upon this article, and shall only add, that as Jerusalem became afterwards to the Jews, what the camp was during their abode in the wilderness, those victims, which were ordered to be burnt out of the camp, were, after the building of the temple, to be burned out of the walls of the city.

the Jews, especially the Cabbalists, tell us great wonders of the number seven, too great indeed for us to enter upon.

The next thing was the flaying and dividing the victims, according to the design for which they were offered, wherein we shall only take notice of one circumstance with respect to the burning the fat of them; namely, that, if it was a sheep or lamb, they always burned also the rump (14), because they are commonly very fat; especially in that kind of Syrian sheep whose rump was between two and three cubits long, and weigh'd as far as 30 or 40 pounds (15). So that not being able to drag them after, without wounding them against the ground, the shepherds laid them upon a kind of sledge, which the creature drew after it. Hence one may understand the meaning of that prohibition in the Mishna (16), the sheep shall not be sent to pasture on the sabbath, that bath its sledge tyed to it. As to the burnt-offerings of four footed beasts, the priests were obliged to wash their legs and intestines in water before they burnt them (17). This was done in a place by itself, that the court might not be defiled with their dung. Philo thinks there is a mystery in it, and that it implies, that we ought to wash away all our sinful filth before we present ourselves to God (18). Grosius says almost the same things concerning the fat of the kidneys, &c. which were not to be eaten, but burned, those parts being the seat of lust (19). But, however that be; it is certain, that they were not allowed to eat any fat except that which stuck to the flesh. After these sacrifices were duly dissected and salted, a number of priests brought them upon the altar with the usual quantity of wine and cakes. They were more or fewer, according to the days and the sacrifices, and each carried one piece thither. Thus every common day, at the morning and evening sacrifice, when there were but nine in waiting; the first carried the head and right foot; the second the two fore-feet, or hands, as the rabbies call them; the third the back-bone, liver, and kidneys; the fourth the breast and neck; the fifth the ribs; the sixth the inwards and legs in a dish; the seventh a cake to be joined to the lamb; the eighth the cake that belonged to the high-priest; and the last brought up the wine for the drink-offering; each having his province decided by lot. All these pieces of the victim were to be set upon the altar, close by one another in the same order as they were in before their being dissected, according to what is enjoined by Moses; and the priests, the sons of Aaron, shall lay the parts, the head, the fat, in order, &c.

(20); after which the fire was kindled and kept under them till they were consumed. This formality however was observed only for those burnt-offerings which were made for the whole people, but not for those which private men offered for themselves. There are many more particularities relating to these and other offerings, the bare mention of which would be too tedious; the reader may see them at full length in the Mishna and the two rabbies mentioned above, and more particularly in Cunæus. All that we shall add is, that whatever was to be burnt of them upon the altar was to be done, not with common, but with sacred fire, which was preserved for that purpose (21).

(N) Some authors who have inadvertently followed St. Austin's mistaken notion, that this altar stood in the most holy place, have affirmed accordingly, that none but the high-priest was to offer it up, and have even maintained, that Zacharias, the Baptist's father, was invested with that dignity. These have been sufficiently confuted by Cunæus, among many more. However there is one expression in Moses (22), which seems to favour that notion, where he says; that Aaron shall burn incense every morning, &c. But the Jews have made it plain, that the high-priest never offered it but on expiation-day, and on the first day of his installation; on all other days, it was left to the priest in waiting, as the lot fell out (23), exclusive of the Levites, and all other persons, under pain of death. This mixture, which our version doth simply call incense, was rather a perfume, the composition of which is prescribed by Moses, and forbid under pain of death to be used by any but priests, or any where but in the sanctuary (24), tho' any other composition might, and was lawfully used, as appears by several places of scripture. Thus we read that Hzekiab shewed several sorts of them among other rarities of his treasure-house, to the king of Babylon's ambassadors (25); and king Asa had some such like sort used at his funeral (26).

As to the reason of this continual burning of incense, tho' we grant that it might be typical of the prayers of the saints, yet we believe we may take that of the learned Maimon along with it, that the multitude of victims, that were continually offered up, would have made the holy place smell like a slaughter-house, and consequently have inspired the comers rather with disgust and contempt, than awe and reverence, had it not been overpowered by the agreeable fragrantcy of those perfumes (27).

(14) Levit. iii. 9. & alib. (15) Vide HERODOT. lib. iii. PLIN. Nat. Hist. lib. viii. c. 48, & al.
 (16) Vide Tract. Sabbath. c. 4. (17) Levit. i. 9. (18) De Anim. Sacr. (19) Comm. in Levit. iii. 5.
 (20) Levit. i. 8. (21) Comp. Levit. x. 1, 2. & xvi. 12. (22) Exod. xxx. 7. (23) Vide Luke i. 9.
 (24) Exod. xxx. 34, & 39. (25) 2 King. xx. 13. (26) 2 Chron. 16. ult. (27) Ap. BARNAB. in Cun. tom. ii. lib. i. c. 12.

Laws concerning vows.Laws concerning vows.

AS these made a solemn part of the Jewish worship and offerings, they <sup>a</sup> may properly be joined as an appendix to the former, tho' their being free and arbitrary doth not permit us to put them in the same rank. How soon they began to be in use, we have seen an instance of in Jacob's vowing the tenths of all his acquisitions, as he went to Padan-aram †; however we confine ourselves to those under the Mosaic dispensation, concerning which that law-giver made several regulations, in order to direct and enforce the performance of them <sup>c</sup>.

Vows were of a twofold nature; namely, 1. Of such as devoted the thing vowed, whether men, beast, money, or any part of a man's possession to the service of God <sup>d</sup>. 2. Of such as devoted them to utter destruction <sup>e</sup> (O). <sup>b</sup> Under the first head it plainly appears, that persons that were sui juris might vow themselves, their children, or any part of their possessions to God. We say sui juris, because the vows of a son or a daughter, of a wife or slave, were of no further force, than as they were approved or disapproved by those under whose power they were <sup>f</sup>. So that a parent, husband, or master, if he heard the vow when it was made, or when he came afterwards to be informed of it, was at liberty either to give it a sanction, or to disannul it: but if the latter, he was obliged to do it on the same day, according to the text, or in twenty four hours, according to the Jewish doctors.

OF persons vowing themselves in this sense, we meet with no plain instance, <sup>c</sup> but of their vowing their children we have, among others, that of Samuel, who was dedicated to God by his mother's vow, ratified, as is to be supposed, from what we just now hinted, by her husband <sup>g</sup>; and he was accordingly consecrated to God's service all his life-time. However in these cases the law of Moses allowed of a redemption or commutation for a sum of money, which was either greater or less, according to the age and sex of the person vowed, for which the reader will find a rate fixed to each of them, and an allowance made for those who were not able to pay that sum, in the chapter above quoted concerning vows <sup>h</sup>. It was otherwise with respect to cattle, lands, or the product of them, and the like. For these could not be redeemed or <sup>d</sup> exchanged, in any case, except, where a man had vowed, for instance, a lamb, calf, or any such creature, which, before the time came of his offering it, had contracted any legal defect, which made it unfit for sacrifice. For in such cases he was to substitute another that was perfect and equivalent unto it, and, if the beast which a man had vowed was an unclean one, he was, besides the equivalent, to add a fifth part of its value by way of fine <sup>i</sup>. The same was to be observed if it was a house, field, or the like. As for the first-born of cattle, they could not be vowed, because they belonged to God already <sup>k</sup>.

Anathema's.

THE case was quite different, with respect to those things which were vowed to destruction; for they could not be redeemed at any rate <sup>l</sup>. That <sup>c</sup> which had life was to be put to death, and that which had not was to be destroyed by fire, or some other way. We meet with various instances of it in the Jewish history, but shall single only a few of the most remarkable. We may remember, that the children of Israel vowed the whole kingdom of Arad to destruction, and that all the cities of the Canaanites were under the same

† Vide sup. p. 472. b. <sup>c</sup> Levit. xxvii. pass. <sup>d</sup> Ver. 2, & seq. <sup>e</sup> Ver. 28, 29. <sup>f</sup> Num. xxx. pass. <sup>g</sup> 1 Sam. i. 21, & seq. <sup>h</sup> Levit. xxvii. 3, & seq. <sup>i</sup> Ibid. ver. 13. <sup>k</sup> Ibid. ver. 14, & seq. <sup>l</sup> Ibid. ver. 28, 29.

(O) The original distinguishes them by the words נָדַר, Nadar, which signifies to vow in the first sense, and חָרַם, Charam, which implies to lay a thing or person under an anathema, or to devote it or him to destruction. Several learned commentators indeed will not allow of this last meaning, when it relates to men; but think that those persons, who were thus vowed, were to become wholly devoted to God beyond the possibility of redemption (28): but the reader may see, by the instances which we shall give above, that it meant quite another thing; namely, the death of the person, and extermination and destruction of the thing anathematized; and that the difference between the first and second vow was, that the first might be redeemed, but not the second.

- a anathema <sup>a</sup>, and more particularly Jericho; and that Acban and all that he had fell under the same curse, because he had saved some of the plunder of that city, <sup>a</sup>, which was to have been destroyed. As for Jephtha's vow, besides that it was not exactly of the same nature, and authors are much divided about the manner of his fulfilling it, it will be more proper to examine it when we come to the history of that judge. The Israelites, assembled at Mizpeh, vowed those to destruction that did not assist in punishing the tribe of Benjamin, for their barbarous usage of the Levite's concubine <sup>a</sup>; and Saul would have sacrificed his own son Jonathan, for ignorantly incurring the curse, which he had laid upon those that should eat or drink whilst he was in pursuit of his victory;
- b had not the whole army strongly opposed it. By all which instances and many more that could be brought, it appears that nothing less than death was the lot of the persons devoted by this kind of vows.

THOSE who think that, when they related to human victims, they meant no more than that they should be dedicated to God's service as long as they lived, do, indeed, object the abhorrence which God expresses against all kind of human sacrifices; but we beg leave to observe, that the case here is not about sacrifices, but vows, and such as, for aught appears to the contrary, by all the instances we meet with, were not in the power of private men to make, but only either of the whole nation, as in the case of the land of Arad, c or of the kings and judges, as in the other instances above-mentioned. Besides they seem altogether to relate to those idolatrous nations they were a going to conquer, the measure of whose sins had already provoked God to pass sentence of destruction against them; in which case, if they bound themselves by a solemn vow to put it in execution, they would be more likely to fulfil it. Accordingly we find them very exact where that was the case, and as remiss when it was not, else they had not left so many nations undestroyed, to be a continual snare to seduce them into all manner of idolatries. If therefore it was of so great consequence to them to remove all such dangerous incitements, we need not wonder if they were in some measure led into it by the stronger

d obligation of an oath. But after all, this precept may be only an enforcement of that vow, which Moses had exacted of the whole nation a little before his death <sup>a</sup>*, of observing all the commandments of God, one of which was the extirpation of all these nations, with all their monuments of idolatry; in which case the meaning of those words will be only this, that, as they had solemnly vowed it to God, they must not pretend hereafter to exempt themselves from it, upon any pretence whatever (P).

WHAT curse Jonadab the son of Rechab had laid upon his posterity, if they did not observe his arbitrary injunctions, of abstaining from wine, from planting, sowing, and the like, doth not appear; but how strict observers they were

c of them we may conclude from their answer to Jeremiab, when he invited them to drink wine <sup>a</sup>. We shall conclude this article with a short account of the Nazarites, often mentioned in the Old Testament, who were persons that either Nazarites.

<sup>a</sup> Num. xxi. 1, & seq. Deut. vii. 23, & seq. xx. 15, & seq. <sup>a</sup> Josh. vi, & vii, pass. <sup>a</sup> Judg. xxi. 5. *†* Vide sup. p. 541. b. <sup>a</sup> Jerem. xxv. pass.

(P) Those who understand the original know that the future tense is very often used for the past, and so vice versa: so that the words may be properly rendered, shall have vowed, instead of shall vow. These two verses therefore seem to us to come in as an exception to the regulations which Moses had made a little before, concerning the redemption of those things which had been vowed in the first sense; and which he therefore prefaces with the word אם, if, notwithstanding or nevertheless, whatsoever shall be vowed in the second sense, that is, to destruction, whether of men or beasts, &c. shall not be redeemed, but be put to death: that is, ye have all bound yourselves by a solemn oath to destroy all those nations that will not accept of proffered peace, and forsake their idolatry, and to eliminate all that belongs to them, remember therefore that there is no redemption for them, and that if you suffer yourselves, either through pity or covetousness, to spare any of them, you will not only incur the punishment of perjury and rebellion, but be insnared into greater guilt, by conforming to their ways. Had Sam been mindful of this, he had not saved the king of Amalek, and the choicest of the cattle and plunder (29). When therefore he made that weak and puerile excuse, that he designed the latter as an offering to God, Samuel did justly reprove him, by shewing him how vain it was to pretend to atone for one open violation of God's command by another.

(29) 1 Sam. xv. 9, & seq.

dedicated themselves, or were so by their parents, to observe the laws of Nazaritehood. These were of two sorts; namely, of such who obliged themselves to it only for some short space, as a week or a month, and those who were bound to it all their life, and these were most commonly dedicated by their parents. Of this kind were Sampson and Samuel<sup>a</sup>, and all that we find peculiar in their way of life was, that they were to abstain from wine and all intoxicating liquors, and to wear their hair to its full length. As for those of the first sort, they were moreover to avoid all defilement, even that of entering into a house where a dead person was; for, if they chanced to be polluted by it before the term was expired, they were obliged to begin a-fresh<sup>b</sup>. Women as well as men might bind themselves to this vow, and, after it was accomplished, they presented themselves to the priest, who brought them to the door of the tabernacle or temple, where they offered the sacrifices prescribed by Moses in such cases<sup>c</sup>, after which he caused their heads to be shaved, and the hair to be thrown into the fire which was under the sacrifice, and then pronounced them freed from their vow.

Those that lived at such a distance from the temple, that they could not reach it by that time their vow was expired, might shave their heads at what place soever they found themselves, at which time they set aside the price of their sacrifice, in order to bring or send it to the temple by the next opportunity. This is what we find St. Paul did, who made this vow at Corinth,<sup>e</sup> shaved his head at Cenchrea, and went soon after to Jerusalem, to accomplish it by the usual offering<sup>f</sup>.

Laws concerning the Priests, Levites, and Netbinims.

Laws concerning the Priests.

THE two last things to be considered under this head of the worship of God, or, as it is commonly called, the commands of the first table, are, 1. The persons, and 2. The things, which were in a more peculiar manner consecrated to his service. Of the first sort were the priests, Levites, and Netbinims; of the second, the tabernacle, and afterwards the temple, with all the pompous apparatus of utensils prescribed by God himself to Moses on the mount, in order to inspire the carnal people with a greater awe and reverence for his religion. As to the tribe of Levi, we have seen above how and upon what account it was separated from the rest, and appointed for this important office†. Before that time the priesthood, or sacrifice, is generally thought to have belonged to the first-born; and when Moses ratified the covenant between God and the people at the mount, he acted the part of chief-priest, and chose a set of young men to act under him‡; but after the tribe of Levi had been thus set apart for the inferior, and the family of Aaron for the higher offices of the ministry, it became a capital crime for any other tribe to interfere with them in the sacred function; insomuch that God's vengeance did miraculously display itself in the punishment of the first offenders, Corah, Dathan, and Abiram, and in confirming the priesthood in that family by the supernatural budding of Aaron's rod§. It is not indeed easy to reconcile what is said of the Levites being chosen above all other tribes, upon the account of the zeal which they shewed in punishing the worshippers of the golden calf||, with Aaron's being raised to the highest dignity in that tribe, he who had so basely consented to, and countenanced that defection. This choice may therefore more properly be ascribed to the meer pleasure of God, like that which he made before of Seth, Noah, Shem, Abraham, Jacob, and since of David, and many more.<sup>f</sup> But, however that be, Moses tells us in another place, that God took the Levites instead of the first-born of Israel, to be his own tribe, and it is remarkable, that when the sums of both were taken, and the number of the latter exceeded that of the former, he commanded that the over-plus should be redeemed at the price of five shekels per head, and the price to be given to Aaron and

<sup>a</sup> Judg. xiii. 5. <sup>b</sup> Sam. i. 11. <sup>c</sup> Num. vi. 1, & seq. <sup>d</sup> Ibid. ver. 13, & seq. <sup>e</sup> Acts xviii. 18. <sup>f</sup> Vide sup. p. 537. note (C). † Exod. xxiv. 5, & seq. ‡ Numb. xvi, & xvii, pass. § Deut. xxxiii. 8, & seq. & alib.

- a his sons <sup>7</sup>. So that it is plain, that here was an actual substitution or exchange of the Levitical tribe in lieu of the first-born which God had claimed to himself for his having spared those of Israel, when he destroyed those of Egypt; and a superiority given to the family of Aaron over all the rest of that tribe; both as to office and dignity, as we shall presently shew under each head. As for the Netbinims, they were not so much as of the seed of Jacob, and we only rank them here, as being appointed to serve in the lowest offices of the tabernacle and temple.

I. Of the priests.

- b WE have heretofore taken notice, that the tribe of Levi consisted of three main branches, distinguished by their principal heads, namely, Gershon, Kohath, and Merari. But the priesthood was given solely to the family of Aaron, which was no more than a small branch of that of Kohath, whilst all the rest of it, even the sons of Moses himself, as well as the other two branches, remained in the common rank of Levites, and were only admitted to the inferior functions of the ministry, whether of the tabernacle, or afterwards of the temple. So that these were always subject to, and dependent on the priests, as will appear in its proper place.

- c AT the head of the priesthood was the high-priest, who was also the head of the Jewish church, and the final judge of all controversies, whether concerning religion, or even about the administration of common justice. This last at least seems plainly implied in the directions which Moses gives the people, to have recourse to the priests in all difficulties of that nature, and to abide by their determination under pain of death <sup>a</sup> (Q): and in this sense Josephus, Philo, and almost, if not all the Jewish rabbies understand them <sup>a</sup>. However in this respect he acted rather as a civil judge, than as high-priest. The same may be said of the subaltern priests and Levites, which were commonly admitted to sit in their inferior courts of judicature; for it is plain, that the main end, for which they were set apart, was to bless the people in God's name, and to offer up incense and those sacrifices to him that were prescribed by the law, exclusive of all other tribes <sup>b</sup>; under the severe penalties above-mentioned (R).

<sup>7</sup> Vide Numb. iii. 12, 13, 45, & seq. <sup>a</sup> Deut. xvii. 8, & seq. xix. 17. xxi. 5. xxii. 10. xxxiii. 20. vide & Ezek. xlv. 24. <sup>a</sup> Cont. Apion. & alib. PHIL. MAIMON. Vide SELDEN. de Synedr. ver. Hæbr. & al. <sup>b</sup> Numb. xvi. & alib.

(Q) The words of Moses run thus (30). "And if there arise a matter too hard for thee in judgment, between blood and blood, between plea and plea, or stroke and stroke, being a matter of controversy within thy gates" (the sense of which from the last words is plainly, that if the matter is too hard for the judges of that city to which the contending parties belong (31), in such a case) "thou shalt arise and get thee up unto the place which the Lord thy God shall choose, and thou shalt come unto the priests and Levites, and unto the judge that shall be in those days, — and thou shalt exactly observe and do according to their sentence, — without swerving from it to the right hand or to the left; — and the man that shall presumptuously refuse to abide by the determination of the priest that standeth to minister there before the Lord thy God, or to that of the judge, that man shall be put to death." — Now, by the priest there mentioned, the generality of commentators understand the high-priest.

(R) This ought not however to be understood too strictly, because it is certain that several kings, judges, and prophets have taken this office upon them, that were not of that tribe. Thus we read in one place, that Samuel, who was of that of Ephraim, was waited for to bless the sacrifice (32); and in another, that he offered up a lamb for a burnt-offering (33), tho' these two functions did properly belong to the priests. Thus again Saul, Elijah, and David are said to have offered up burnt-offerings to God (34), and both he and his son Solomon to have blessed the people in the name of the Lord (35).

It is indeed commonly answered, that they only caused the priests to perform that office for them; but this exposition is forced, and incompatible with the plain meaning of the original. We think it therefore more probable, that these persons above-named, not so much as being heads of the people, but as being prophets, and being directed by the spirit, might perform these functions upon particular occasions, such as these we have quoted, for the greater solemnity of the ceremony. For even Saul was for some time endowed with the spirit, and Samuel told him that he might follow the directions of it upon all emergencies (36); when therefore that prophet reproved him for his indiscretion (37), it is not so much for having offered up a burnt-offering, as for doing it contrary to his judgment, and out of an untimely

(30) Deut. xvii. 8. & seq. (31) Vide sup. p. 432. note (F) (32) 1 Sam. ix. 13. (33) Ibid. vii. 9. (34) Ibid. xiii. 9. & seq. 1 Kings xviii. 30. & seq. (35) 2 Sam. vi. 17, 18. 1 Kings viii. 55. & seq. (36) Vide 1 Sam. x. 7. & seq. (37) Ibid. xiii. 13.

THE laws relating to the high-priest are reducible to these three heads; 1. Such as related to his office. 2. To his consecration. And 3. To his dress.

The high-priest's office.

As to his office, besides his having it in his power, whenever he pleased, to perform any of the functions of the inferior priests, his being alone possessed of the divine oracle of Urim and Tbummim, spoken of more particularly in a former section *, and his being alone authorized to enter into the holy of holies, and to pronounce that solemn blessing on the day of expiation, mentioned under that head; all these great privileges were confined to him, and intailed on his son and successor, either of his own body or family. Accordingly we find the two branches of it, that of Elezar and that of Ithamar, the sons of Aaron, in the high-priesthood at different times, till the captivity, whilst the other occupied the next in rank, and this is the most probable reason why the prophet mentions a high-priest, and a second priest ‖. How Phineas's line came to be set aside from the first rank, the text doth not tell us; but the legal imperfections, which disqualified a man from that high dignity, were so many and so frequent, that it is probable that some of them might be the reason of its passing to Heli, who was of the younger branch, in whose house it continued till Saul's time. After this it shifted once or twice more in David's time, till Solomon, dissatisfied with Abiathar, restored Zadock of the Phinean family to the first rank again, where it continued to the end. So that Abiathar cannot so properly be said to have been deposed by that prince, as to have been reduced to the pristine rank of his branch (S). Accordingly we find him named in the very next chapter but one, after his supposed deposition, as second to Zadock. And Zadock and Abiathar were priests **. But to return to the high-priest, there was such a particular sacredness inherent in his dignity, as obliged him to several strict laws, from which the rest of the priests were exempt. It was not lawful for him to marry a widow, a repudiated woman, or a harlot; the person whom he took to his bed was to be a pure virgin, and one of his own tribe. He was forbid to put himself into mourning for the nearest relation, or to go into any house where a corps was †; he was further obliged to abstain not only from matrimonial commerce during those festivals in which he was to officiate, but also from all food and other things which might occasion any defilement. Besides all these he was in common with other priests to be free from all natural defects mentioned by Moses ‡; that is to say, that he was to be neither blind, lame, maimed, crooked, or a dwarf; he was to have neither scurvy, itch, nor any disease in his skin, or defect in any of his limbs, timely fear, lest Samuel should disappoint him, and his enemies surprize him unprepared, for Saul adds, and I forced, or did violence to, myself, that is, my fear drove me to this action, contrary to my own judgment.

* See before, p. 537. note (C) ‖ Jerem. c. ult. ver. 24. vide 1 Chron. xxiv. 2. ** Comp. 1 Kings i. 26, 27. and iii. 4. † Levit. xxi. 10, & seq. ‡ Ibid. xiii. & seq.

(S) This right was then only so far hereditary, that the high-priesthood always descended to one of the two branches, as long as it was capable of succeeding, if not, one of the next was chosen that was duly qualified. 'Tis true Moses has not left any written direction about it, but we find that Eli, who was both high-priest and judge in Israel, was not of the family of Elezar, but of that of Ithamar, for his name is not to be found in the genealogy of the former (38), and, Josephus tells us, that he was of the family of the latter (39), and the first of that line that was raised to that high function, and in whose family it continued uninterrupted till Saul's reign.

It were needless to trouble our readers with the various conjectures that have been made about the reason of this translation of the high-priesthood from the eldest to the youngest branch; it is enough for us, that it was not done without divine approbation, as appears by what a prophet sent from God said unto Eli (40), to this effect — I chose the house of thy father Aaron to offer up incense and sacrifices upon my altar — Why then do ye kick at my sacrifices — Wherefore, tho' I said that thine house — should stand before me for ever — Now far be it from me to honour those that dishonour me — Lo, the time cometh that thy sons Hophni and Phineas shall be cut off in one day — And then shalt behold an enemy in thy habitation — and I will raise me up a faithful priest — Whilst those that are left of thine house shall fall into the utmost poverty and contempt. How and when this prophecy was fulfilled will be seen in its proper place. It is sufficient at present to have given the best light we can get to the manner of his sacred succession. We beg leave only to add, that where the prophet tells Eli, thou shalt see an enemy in my habitation, the word signifies more properly a rival, and seems to point directly at the eldest branch, which, tho' set aside for a time, would again be reinstated to that supreme dignity, as it actually was, when Saul caused Abimelech to be slain, and Zadock to be put in his place.

(38) Vide 1 Chron. vi. 3, et seq.

(39) Ant. lib. v. c. ult.

(40) 1 Sam. ii. 27, et seq.

- a especially in his testicles. As many, as had any one of these blemishes, were absolutely rescinded from all priestly functions, from entering into the sanctuary, and offering the shew-bread, only they were allowed to live upon a portion of the offerings that were made there *.

- 2 His consecration. This ceremony was prescribed by God himself on the mount †, and was performed by Moses upon his brother Aaron, with a solemnity answerable to the sacredness of his office. It consisted chiefly in the six following particulars. 1. And before all things, he was presented to the Lord at the door of the tabernacle, in the presence of all the people. 2. He was to wash himself all over in pure water, which was drawn out of a large capacious vessel, that stood near the altar, and was set up there for all such purposes. 3. He was then immediately invested with all the pontifical vestments, of which we shall speak under the next head; and with the breast-plate and Urim. 4. His next business was offering the sacrifices appointed for this purpose; namely, a bullock for a sin-offering, and a ram for a burnt offering, and another for his consecration, with the blood of which, Moses, 5. Anointed the tip of his right ear, thumb, and great toe, besides the usual aspersions on the altar, and other wave, meat, and drink-offerings. The last ceremony was the anointing him with the sacred oil, whose composition was likewise prescribed by God ‡, and was not to be used for any other purpose. These ceremonies were repeated seven days successively, at least as far as relates to the washing, the sacrifices, and the unction, for it doth not appear, that the ceremony was repeated relating to their putting on the priestly garments §. During all this time, Aaron and his sons were not permitted to go out of the tabernacle, but continued there, and feasted themselves with the daily sacrifices, which they offered for their consecration, of which no fragment was to be left till the next morning, but was to be burned that very night. On the eighth day Aaron entered into his office by a double sacrifice, one which he offered for himself; and the other for the people, whom he blessed for the first time, and this his inauguration was signalized by the glory of God appearing unto all the people, and by the descent of the holy fire from heaven †, which was thence forwards preserved till the destruction of the first temple, and the use of any other in the sacred ministry, expressly forbid under pain of death ‡.

- There is one thing to be observed in this first consecration, that not only Aaron, but his sons, were consecrated at the same time, and with the same ceremonies, tho' these were to continue still in the rank of common priests. This may be the reason why Eleazar is afterwards said to have been installed into the high-priesthood, by the sole investiture of his father's garments without any other ceremony, from which several commentators have concluded, that the rest were not to be used at the installation of any new high-priest. It is true, we can offer nothing conclusive out of the Mosaic text to confute that notion, yet, if we believe the ancient Jews, who may be properly enough look'd upon as the best judges, they will tell us, that the unction did always accompany the investiture till the destruction of the first temple, when Josiah did deposit the sacred oil in so secret a place, that it could never be found out after their return from the Babylonish captivity. From which time, and not till then, they began to content themselves with the bare investiture, without the unction.

(T). However that be, it seems reasonable to think, that Moses was commanded * Ibid. xxi. & seq. † Exod. xl. 12, & seq. ‡ Ibid. xxx. 22, & seq. § Levit. viii. 1, & seq.

 † Ibid. ix. pass. vide ver. 23. & 24. ‡ Vide sup. p. 524 a. * Vide SELD. de Successione ad Pontificat. lib. ii. c. 9. BASNAG. Rep. Heb. tom. i. lib. 2. c. 7.

(T) The rabbies add, that those that were consecrated by unction were called anointed, and the others, only, invested, and that they did never venture to make a new composition of the sacred ointment after that of Moses was gone (41). But we can see no reason for joining with them, because Moses was so far from forbidding any such thing, that he has left a plain receipt how to make it.

It is certain, that many ancient fathers believed that it continued till the time of Christ (42); and Zechariah speaking of his vision of the two high-priests, Jehoshua and Zerubbabel, calls them בני הִשָּׁחֵר, Bene Hishchar, the sons of oil or unction (43), which Kimchi renders, rightly enough, anointed, because, says he, Jehoshua was anointed high-priest, and Zerubbabel king (44).
 We

(41) Vide SELD. de Succes. ubi sup. (42) EUSEB. Demonst. Ev. lib. iv. c. 4. CHRYSOST. Orat. 2. cont. Judæos. CYRIL. Jeros. Mystag. cont. Jud. ANAST. de incarnat. verb. vide & CALM. sub voc. unction. (43) Ch. iv. ver. ult. vide MUNST. in loc. (44) Vide ABARB. & MUNST. in Zechar. ubi sup.

manded to consecrate Aaron's two sons, Eleazar and Itamar, at that grand ceremony, as being the two branches unto which the high-priesthood was confined, as he did at the same time all the priestly garments, the tabernacle and all the sacred utensils of it, which were to be entirely consecrated to the service of God for ever after<sup>1</sup>.

His dress.

3. His priestly vestments. And all that we can with any certainty advance concerning these is, that they were likewise prescribed by God himself, and that they consisted of every thing that could make them truly rich, sumptuous, and venerable, such as a great variety of precious stones, gold, silver, purple, scarlet, the finest of silk, linnen, and the like: but as to the fashion of them, all that has been advanced about it, tho' with never so positive an air, is all meer conjecture, because Moses has contented himself with giving us the names of them, without any further description, as being altogether needless. Josephus has indeed been more particular in this respect<sup>2</sup>, but all we can depend upon him for is, that he has described them as they were worn in his time, and how far the fashion of them might have altered during so long a space, and such a variety of circumstances which the Jewish commonwealth went through, is not easy to guess. The rabbies have described them vastly different from him, and St. Jerom describes some of them differently from those two<sup>3</sup>. So that we may truly say, that those moderns who have lately given us such lively descriptions of them, both in writing and in various prints, have rather furnished the world with new models for masquerading habits, than informed us with any thing either certain or indeed material. This caution being premised, we shall now endeavour to give our readers the best account we can of them, with any tolerable certainty, and refer the reader to Josephus, and those modern authors who have treated more fully of them<sup>4</sup>.

THEY were of two sorts, the one made of linnen, and common to him and all the other priests; and if there was any difference between them, it was in the former being made of finer linnen and woven in a richer manner. We have already mentioned them under the head of expiation, they being the only ones that he is supposed to have worn when he went into the holy of holies. Only one would be apt to think, that these were made of a finer linnen, because they are called by another name; namely, Seshb, which is thought a fine Egyptian sort, whereas that which is called Bad is a more common one. These were the mitre, or turban, long robe, or vest, his drawers, and his girdle. The others, which were peculiar to him, and which he was to wear upon all solemn days and occasions, were so rich and magnificent, that the Jews called them Bagde Zahab, vestures of gold, to express the richness of them; and Moses, the glory and ornament of Aaron<sup>5</sup>. The first was a blue or purple robe, which he put over his linnen vest (V). This garment had no sleeves, or any seam, according to Josephus, being woven, like that of our Saviour's from top

<sup>1</sup> Vide Levit. viii. 10, & seq. ad 30. ix. pass. vide & vers. 23, & 24. <sup>2</sup> Ant. lib. iii. c. 7. <sup>3</sup> Hieron. ad Fabiol. <sup>4</sup> Ant. lib. iii. c. 7. CUNÆUS, BASNAG. LAMY, CALMET. & al. <sup>5</sup> Exod. xxviii. 2.

We may add an adage of the Gemarrists concerning the דין ירושה, Din Yerushah, or, hereditary right, about which they make this distinction, that an high-priest, the son of an high-priest, must be anointed, because that right is not absolutely in him, but the son of an anointed king needs not be anointed, because it is in him. Abarbanel adds, in his comment upon the place, that it was the judgment of their wise-men to chuse him for high-priest מאדוי, from among his brethren, that was נדיב בנדיב בעושר נדיב בכוח the most beautiful, the richest, and strongest; who was therefore to be anointed, that the rest might thereby know that he was duly chosen from the midst of his brethren (45).

How this anointing was performed is not very clear, but by the expression of the psalmist (46), as well as that which Zechariab makes use of here, it seems to have been performed by pouring the oil upon the head so plentifully, that it ran down to his beard and thence upon the skirts of the garment (47). The rabbies are of that opinion, only some say that it was poured in form of an X, others in that of a צ Caph; but these are not worth dwelling upon (48).

(V) We have no great certainty about these colours, especially the blue. The Greek and old versions render the word תכלת, Tekelath, by Hyacinth, but as there is a stone of that name, which is of a yellow, and a flower of a light blue, or purplish colour, it is not easy to know to which of these the interpreters alluded. The old Flemish version, among some others, renders it yellow silk, but as that colour, when mixed with scarlet and purple, is too glaring, especially when there is so great a mixture of gold, the generality of interpreters a top to bottom, with a slit to put his head through. The border of it; which reached almost to his ancles, was trimmed with a rich fringe, to which were interchangeably hung little bells and pomgranates curiously wrought in pure gold, at equal distance one from another, that by their tinkling his approach might be the more easily distinguished. This vest was tied round with a rich girdle, which went twice round his body, and hung down a convenient length before him.

(45) ABARBAN. Com. in gemar in loc. (46) Vide GOODWIN's Moses & Aaron, lib. i. c. 5. note 1. (47) Pf. cxxxiii. 2. (48) Vide TOSTAT, JANGEN. MANOCH.

OVER this vest was a third, called the ephod, curiously wrought with gold and other variegated embroidery, not unlike a short coat, about two foot in length. On the top of it, on each side, were two shoulder-pieces, to which were b fastened two precious stones (W) set in gold, on which were engraven the names of the twelve tribes, six upon each stone, that he might always have before his eyes those that were committed to his pastoral care. Upon the breast of it was a vacancy of about half a cubit in length, and a proportionable breadth, on which the breast-plate was to be fastened. This was a folded piece of the same rich embroidered tissue, on which were fastened twelve precious stones, set in gold, on each of which were engraven the name of one of the tribes. These were set in four rows, three in each row (X), and the whole was fastened at the four corners; those on the top to each shoulder-piece by a golden hook or ring, at the end of a wreathen chain; and those below to the girdle of the c ephod, by two blue strings or ribbons, which had likewise two rings and hooks; so that the whole might be tied fast to the garment, beyond the danger of falling off. For these were never to be severed, and the Jews tell us, that if the high-priest did at any time, either through inadvertency or wilfully, put on the one without the other, he was to be punished for it. This ornament is therefore called the memorial, to put him in mind how dear those tribes ought to be to him, whose names he wore over his breast. It is also called the breast-plate of judgment, because it had the divine oracle fastened to it. At least the far greatest part of interpreters have understood the command of ters think it to be the colour of the flower so called. As for the ארגמן, Argeman, which we translate purple, it is most likely to have been a dye made of the blood of a shell-fish of that name, which was caught upon the coasts of Palestine, and for which the Tyrians became so famous. Some Jewish etymologists make Argeman to be a kind of adjective of the word רֶגֶם, Regem, which, according to them signifies a prince or royal person; for which reason they chuse to translate it a princely colour, such as the kings wore themselves, and clothed their greatest favourites with. Thus Daniel was clothed in purple by Belshazzar (49); and Christ with a robe of mockery of the same colour (50).

Neither are we much more certain concerning the Hebrew words בד, bad, שש, sheesh, פשתה, pishtah, and בזז, buzz; whence the byssus; that is, whether they all signify linnen made of flax or hemp, differing only in degrees of fineness, or weaving; or whether the sheesh was not either a kind of cotton or silk. There is no reason to doubt but these were both used and esteemed at that time; and as the priestly robes were to be made of the most costly things, it is not improbable but these went into the composition under one of the three first names. As to the buzz, by which interpreters commonly understand, the finest of Egyptian linnen, it is most likely to have been a silk, made of the tail of a fish †. But this last is not to be met with in the Mosaic writings. The last quoted author has at least made it probable, that the sheesh was a kind of fine cotton ‡, and as for what the Jews say, that there could be no linnen thread mixed in these garbs, because it was contrary to the law, which forbids the mixture of linsy woolsey *, it is probable, as Cunæus observes, that it related only to stuffs made for common wear or use, and to distinguish them from those that were for sacred purposes, such as the curtains, &c. of the tabernacle, and the robes of the high-priest, which were made of and intermixed with every thing that was splendid and costly.

(W) The word in the original is שֹׁהַם, shohem, which our version, after several others ancient and modern, translate onyx-stone, tho' the Septuagint and some others think it signifies the emerald. The truth is; that all the light we can get from commentators, whether Jewish or Christians, ancient or modern, is too dim to lead us to the certain knowledge either of this or any other of the twelve stones of the breast-plate, because it is hardly possible for any of them to have been sufficiently acquainted with their true signification. And this is the reason, why we find so little agreement among them. However, as the thing is of no great consequence, we chuse to follow our English version, which, for aught appears to the contrary, may have guessed as right as any other. Those who are curious in such things may, if they please, consult those authors quoted in the margin (51), who have wrote about them ex professo.

(X) These were divided one from another by the little golden partitions into which they were set, and were disposed in the following order, to which

we

(49) Dan. vi. 29. (50) John xix. 5. † BASIL. in Hexamer. PROCOPI. de Fabric. ap. CALMET. Comm. in Exod. & Paralipom. ‡ Idem Comm. in Exod. & Diff. sub. voc. Cotton. * Levit. xix. 19. Deut. xxii. 11. (51) Vide Commentat. in Gen. ii. 12. LUD. DE DIEU, in Exod. xxviii. 17, & seq. BRANNIUS de Vest. S. Sacerd. Heb. FRA. DELL. STRAD. de Gemmis, & al.

God to Moses, of putting the Urim and Thummim to the breast-place<sup>a</sup>; as if it implied them to be a distinct thing from it; and this has made them run into various notions, as we shall shew presently.

What this oracle consisted in, and how it was consulted, we have seen in a former section†; and have now nothing left to enquire about, but its form and make. But here we are also left so much in the dark, that it would require a new Urim and Thummim to acquaint us with it, because no inspired writer has given us any hint, and those who have since wrote their conjectures about it seem to have given so great a scope to their fancy, that one shall scarce find two or three of them agreeing in the same notion. Some ancients thought that there was a thirteenth stone in the breast-plate, whose extraordinary lustre and beauty above the rest did signify to the high-priest God's approbation or dislike of the thing enquired about<sup>1</sup>. And though St. Austin has plainly proved, that there was not the least foundation for such a supernumerary stone<sup>2</sup>; some moderns have not scrupled to add another, in order to answer the two names of Urim and Thummim<sup>3</sup>. An ancient father, who is followed by a great many moderns, thinks that those two words were either engraven on a plate of gold and fixed to the breast-plate, or embroidered in raised work upon it<sup>4</sup>. Most of the Jews believe, that it was the Tetrogrammaton written upon a plate of gold, or some other way fixed to the breast-plate<sup>5</sup>; and Le Clerc, that Urim and Thummim were the names of two kinds of precious stones, set in a gold chain or collar, which were hung about the high-priest's neck, and came down to his breast; probably, as he thinks, in imitation of the Egyptians, whose chief magistrate wore a gold chain, at the end of which hung the figures of justice and truth engraven on some precious stone<sup>6</sup>. A modern traveller, in a letter dated from Cairo, tells us, that he saw a very ancient mummy in Egypt, which had a large collar hanging down to its breast, with a bird engraven in gold fastened to the end of it<sup>7</sup>. Spencer, after De Castro, believed that the breast-plate had two little golden figures, enclosed in a kind of purse, which did give answers, viva voce, to the questions of the high-priest<sup>8</sup>; and for this he quotes

<sup>a</sup> Exod. xxviii. 30. † Vide sup. p. 537. (C). <sup>1</sup> EPIPHAN. Traët. de XII. Gemmis. SUIDAS, in Εξοδ., <sup>2</sup> Quest. in Exod. 117. <sup>3</sup> ARK. MONT. & al. <sup>4</sup> CYRIL. Exposit. Symbol. <sup>5</sup> Ita Rabbin. vide R. SALOM. vide EGUB. & MONT. in loc. <sup>6</sup> Comm. in loc. vide DIOD. SICUL. Biblioth. lib. ii. c. 3. <sup>7</sup> ELIAN. Var. Hist. & al. <sup>8</sup> PET. VALLA, Epist. xi. Dissert. de Ur. & Thum.

we have added their Hebrew names, together with the tribe that was engraven upon each of them (52):

1. אדם Odem	Sardius REUBEN	2. פטרה Phiterah	Topas SIMEON	3. ברקת Barketh	Carbuncle LEVI
4. נפק Nophek	Emerald JUDAH	5. ספיר Saphir	Sapphire DAN	6. יהלום Jahalom	Diamond NAPHTHALI
7. לשם Leshem	Ligure GAD	8. שבו Shebo	Agate ASHER	9. אחלמה Achlamah	Amethyst ISSACHAR
10. תרשיש Tarshish	Berit ZERULON	11. שוהם Shohem	Onyx JOSEPH	12. ישפה Yashphe	Jasper BENJAMIN

Some of these stones, it must be owned, are of so hard a nature, especially the diamond, that one may justly question how they came so soon by the art of engraving on them. But here the Talmudists wonderfully help us out, by assuring us, that they were not engraven by any tool, which would have wasted some part of the stone, but by a miraculous worm, not now in being, which, being set upon each of these stones, did sink itself all along those places which Moses had chalked to it, and so impressed the letters into the stones, in the same manner as we might do into some things of a soft and yielding substance, without taking off any part of it. They relate likewise several other wonders about this worm and these precious stones, which we shall not trouble our readers with, after what we have owned in the last note, concerning the little certainty we can have, from any good authority, of even the true signification of their names. The Jews, among other things, tells us, that the names of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob were engraven also over the name of Reuben, in the first stone, and in the last, under that of Benjamin the words, שבטי יה, Shibte-jah, the tribes of the Lord: in order to make up the whole alphabet, some letters of which were wanting in the names of the twelve patriarchs (53). But this is only to confirm an hypothesis of theirs, that the divine oracle was known by the protuberance or superior lustre of such letters as composed the answer. But of this we have already spoken in another place†.

(52) Vid. Exod. xxviii. 17, & seq. (53) MAIMON, Kele hammikdash. c. 9. † Vide sup. p. 537. (C)

- a St. Jerom and Cedrenus among the ancients; Cornelius a Lapide and Ludovicus de Dieu among the moderns, with some Jewish writers: but this notion has been so severely answered by the learned Pocock *, as absurd and impious, that we know not of its having been embraced by any author since. Philo indeed seems to hint something like it †, only with this difference, that he says those two figures, or virtues, namely, manifestation and truth, were only embroidered upon it: and it must be owned, that, if there were any such figures or symbols, it is more reasonable to suppose them, with him, to have been only embroidered, than, with Spencer, that they were real figures, whether cast or carved by any other way; because this latter seems too contrary to the prohibition in the
- b second commandment (Y). But we see no need of supposing any such figures, upon the authority of either, because Josepbus, who was also a priest, and may be reasonably supposed to have been as well acquainted with it as Philo, doth not so much as hint any thing like such figures, but makes the oracle to consist in the supernatural brightness of the twelve stones at the time of enquiring, as we have seen already; and as for Spencer, it is plain, that he is too fond of fetching the origin of every thing from Egypt. Sure it is, that whoever compares the places where Moses mentions the Urim and Thummim ‡, will have reason to wonder, that God, who took such particular care to give him the most exact directions for all the other garments, utensils, &c. should not give him the
- c least hint about these; unless we do suppose them to have been things sufficiently known both to him and to all the people. If therefore we might be permitted to prefer one opinion to all the rest, it would be that of the judicious Hottinger, who thinks, that when Moses is commanded to put into the breast-plate the Urim and Thummim, which words, as has been shewn already, do signify light and perfection in the plural, it means only that he should make choice of the most perfect set of stones, and have them polished, so as to give the most consummate lustre § (Z). And this seems most agreeable to what Josepbus and Maimon said of it, except the miraculous lustre which the former attributes to them, in order to account for the oracle, concerning which we have elsewhere
- d offered a more probable conjecture ¶. However we are far from disapproving of that more spiritual notion of the learned Prideaux; who believes that those two words were chosen to express the clearness and certainty of the oracle, by a particular divine virtue communicated to the breast-plate at its consecration, only we are more inclined to suppose, that this latter sense was emblematically signified by the genuineness and brightness of the stones. At least we find that the Jews, immediately after their return from the captivity, thought it necessary to imitate this breast-plate in all its parts, and to call it by the * Comm. in Hof. iii. 4.    † In. vit. Mos. lib. iii. de Monarc. l. ii.    ‡ Exod. xxviii. 30. xxxix. 8. & Levit. viii. 8.    § In Mos. & Aar. lib. i. c. 5. note 11.    ¶ Sup. 537. note (C).

(Y) If it should be objected here, that the cherubims in the sanctuary were as contrary to that prohibition, as these supposed figures, we beg leave to observe, that there was not the least danger of the former being mistaken for a symbol of the deity, even by the most stupid, because God is expressly said in several places to dwell between the cherubims; so that they could only look upon them as ornaments to the mercy-seat, or at most, as symbols of those heavenly beings, who continually adore and praise him, and fly with the utmost speed to perform his commands. And this seems to be the reason of the humble posture in which they were represented, and of their having so many wings. We cannot say the same of the latter, because their delivering the divine oracles in any way, but more especially if they had done it in voce, as our author pretends, could hardly have failed of inspiring the people with the same idolatrous notions that the rest of the Heathens entertained concerning their false deities.

(Z) This conjecture is so far from jarring with the literal sense of the original, that the very expression, which Moses makes use of in the places above quoted (§4), seems to lead one to it. For after God had given him all the particular directions for making the breast-plate, such as the length and breadth, the materials, the precious stones, &c. even to the hooks, rings, chains, and strings, by which it was to be made fast to the ephod; he adds, ונתת אל חושן המשפט את האורים, ואת התומים which literally runs thus; and thou shalt give to the breast-plate of judgment these lights, or lustres and perfections; namely, of the twelve stones before described. We need not to add, that according to the Hebrew idiom the word אור, or light, doth often imply the brightness, and תום, thom, the goodness of a thing in its kind, and that the plural number, as here, is often used to express the highest degree of it. However we leave it to the reader to adopt which of all these seems most probable to him, and, if he is desirous to know more about this point, he may consult the learned Buxtorf the younger, who has almost exhausted the subject (§5).

(54) Exod. xxviii. 30.

(55) Exercit. iii. de Ur. & Thum.

same name, tho' they own that it had not the oracular virtue of the former<sup>a</sup>. Now it is plain, that such an imitation would have been ridiculous, if not impious, upon any other supposition than that they understood the words Urim and Thummim, to have been designed by God, not as absolutely expressive, but as symbolical, of the light and clearness of this oracle.

THE last garment peculiar to the high-priest was his mitre or bonnet. Whether, and how far it differed in fashion from that of the common priests, Moses doth not tell us, neither is it easy to guess, tho' their being called by different names, and made at least of different kinds of linnen (A), inclines one to think, that there was some considerable difference between them; if not in shape, yet in beauty and richness. The reader may see in the next note<sup>b</sup> all that can be conjectured concerning it (B), from Jewish and Christian authors; however the pontifical one was remarkably distinguished from the common, by the golden plate on which were engraven in Hebrew the words, HOLINESS TO THE LORD<sup>c</sup>. This plate is also called in some other places a crown<sup>d</sup>, and was fastened to the fore part of the mitre, by two blue ribbons or strings.

THESE words, the Jews tell us, were raised by a kind of enamel above the gold<sup>e</sup>: but this seems contrary to the meaning of Moses's words, who expressly says, that they were to be written, like the engraving of a signet. However, there is no doubt but it was designed to express the holiness of the character of the person that wore it, which was to be such, that the least defilement, tho' never so involuntary, disqualified him from performing his office, till he had been legally purified from it. Concerning this point, the Jews acquaint us with a particularity which, tho' not mentioned by Moses, is well worth inserting here, as having no small probability. They tell us out of their Talmud<sup>f</sup>, that on expiation-day, the high-priest being to perform the service of that solemn fast, and it being far from impossible, that he might contract some impurity, which might unfit him for his office, notwithstanding all his care and caution, they used, on the eve of it, to appoint him a vicar to officiate for him, in case of such a defilement. This vicar was neither anointed nor consecrated for the place, tho' his new office did oblige him to go into<sup>d</sup> the most holy place instead of the pontif. They add, that as soon as this last was

<sup>a</sup> Vide MAIM. Kele hammikdash, cap. x. § 10. <sup>b</sup> Exod. xxviii. 36. <sup>c</sup> Exod. xxix. 6. xxxix. 30. Levit. viii. 9. <sup>d</sup> MAIM. ubi sup. c. ix. § 1. <sup>e</sup> Idem in Massek. in Yoma.

(A) As to the names, that of the high-priest is called מצנפת, Miznepheth, from which the boldest etymologists, that we know of, have not ventured to draw any hint about its make. It is not so with those of the common priests, which being called מנבעות, Migghagboth, they conclude, were higher than the former, because גבעה, signifies a hill (56). Tho' the word, being in the plural, would rather incline one to believe, that there were some partitions in those prominences, like unto the mitres worn in the church of Rome; but the learned Abraham Ben David has rejected that notion in his observations on Maimon, and maintains, that the high-priest's mitre was higher than all the rest. We shall not take upon us to say which of these is most in the right.

Another difference marked by Moses is, that that of the high-priest was made of שש, shesh, and that of the priests of כנ, bad. We have already taken notice, that the former was, if not a silk or fine cotton, yet at least a finer sort of linnen than the latter (57).

(B) All that we can gather from Josephus, St. Jerom, Maimon (58), and others concerning this ornament is, that it was a kind of cap not unlike a hemisphere, which consequently did not come down lower than the ears, and was wrapped several times about with a piece of fine cotton or linnen, of a considerable length, and tied behind the head with a blue ribbon or string, to prevent its falling off. Josephus adds, that the mitre was covered with another of fine blue or purple, having a triple crown of gold about it, and that on the top, just in the middle, it had a kind of golden cup turned upwards, resembling the bud of a plant which he is there very particular in describing. But we shall refer the reader to the author. The Jews further add, that, as the crown or plate of gold did go but half way round the head, the other, that is, the hinder part, was filled up with artificial flowers or festoons to the place where it was tied. Both the high-priest and the inferior ones were very careful to tie their bonnets fast when they officiated, because it was thought a mark of reverence to appear with the head covered, and of irreverence and boldness to be seen bare-headed: According to which notion the Chaldees paraphrast renders those places, where the Israelites are said to have marched out of Egypt, with a high band (59), by the words bare-headed, that is, with boldness and intrepidity. On the contrary, the greatest token of respect with them was to be bare-foot; and this is the reason why we find no mention of shoes or sandals among the priestly robes, they being all obliged to perform their office bare-foot; and in this they became so scrupulous, that if they perceived any thing, tho' but a straw, between their feet and the ground, they were obliged to remove it, or else their ministry was esteemed null.

(56) MAIMON. ubi sup. c. viii. § 19. (57) See pag. 637 sub not. (U) (58) Jos. Ant. lib. iii. c. 7. HIERON. ad Fabiol. MAIM. Kele hammikdash, c. ix. 10. (59) Exod. xiv. 8, & alib.

- a cleansed, he re-entered into his office, and the other relinquished it, and returned into the rank of common priests, only with this difference, that he had some kind of superiority and rule over the rest; and if the high-priest died before him, he succeeded him in that dignity of course. Josephus confirms this by the instance of the high-priest Matthias, who having defiled himself by a dream, on the night preceding the expiation, Joseph, the son of Eli, a near relation of his, officiated for him<sup>a</sup>. Maimon calls this vicar Sagan, and adds, that he had two priests to wait upon him, as he himself waited on the high-priest; with some other particulars which we shall not dwell upon, because they appear of later institution<sup>1</sup> (C). However, with respect to the high-priest, it is plain,
- b that he might be sullied so many unforeseen ways, and ran such risk if he entered the most holy place with any such pollution, that it is more than probable, there was some person appointed by way of precaution to perform his office in all such cases. But who this substitute was, how, and by whom he was appointed, we dare not affirm; tho' it is not improbable that he might be the head of the other branch, which, as we observed at first, did hold the next rank to him, and is therefore most likely to be the person meant in the last chapter of Jeremiah, where it is said, that the captain of the guard took Seraiah the high, and Zephaniah the second priest *. In this sense likewise it is thought by many of the learned, that Annas and Cajaphas are said, by St.
- c Luke †, to be high-priests in the same year; but, concerning the person that named him, or the ceremony by which he was qualified for it, Moses has left no written direction, any more than about the choice of a successor to the pontifical dignity, when the next immediate heir was unfit for it.

Laws concerning the priests.

- WE have already taken notice, that these were descended from Aaron the first high-priest, by his two sons Eleazar and Ithamar. Moses indeed mentions only these two, as being the heads of the two main branches of the priesthood, but it were absurd to suppose from thence that they were the only two that officiated under their father; for we find that Phineas was already come to years of manhood, by that zeal which he shewed against the Midianitish defection<sup>k</sup>; and probably there were more of age sufficient to perform the priestly functions. These being subordinate to the high-priest, and of a rank and office superior to the Levites, may be considered in a threefold view, namely, with regard to their consecration, office, and dress. But of these we shall not need say much, because there was nothing of pomp or solemnity used in any of them.

- THEIR consecration, if we except that of the sons of Aaron, which we mentioned in a former article, was performed with little or no ceremony. They were first carefully examined, whether they were free from all natural defects and impurities (D), and if so, they were introduced into the court of the taberna-

<sup>a</sup> Ant. lib. xvii. c. 8. <sup>1</sup> Vide MAIM. Kele hammikdash. * Verse 24. † Luke iii. 2. vide CAUSAB. adverb. Baron. JOS. SCALIGER, Prolog. in EUSEB. HOTTING. in GOODWIN's Mos. & Aar. lib. i. c. 5. sub note 19. & al. <sup>k</sup> Numb. xxv. 7. et seq.

(C) The truth is, that after the Babylonish captivity, when they became more scrupulous observers of the law, their priests and wise-men made abundance of ordinances for keeping a stricter discipline, even to the administering a solemn oath to the high-priest on the eve of expiation, that he would exactly conform to the Mosaic injunctions, according to the traditions then received. This caution became highly necessary, not only after the high priesthood became venerable, and the purchasers less scrupulous about the functions of it, but also by reason of some difference in opinions about the burning of incense in the holy of holies, the scape-goat, and some other things concerning which the reader may consult Ben Maimon (60).

(D) These were the same as unqualified the high-priest, and are mentioned under that head out of Leviticus (61); but the Jews tell us that these are but a sketch of those that exclude from the priestly functions, which they have enlarged at a very strange rate. We shall just mention the heads of them. They reckoned eight of them belonging to the head, nineteen to the eyes, five to the eye-lids, seven to the eye-brows, nine to the ears, as many to the nose, six to the mouth, three to the lips, two to the neck, three to the belly, three to the back, sixteen to the genitals, twelve to the joints of the hands and feet, eight to the skin and flesh, and at least eleven to the upper skin (62).

Besides

(60) Halaka haevodath yom bakiphurim, c. 1. Vide BASHAG. in CUN. lib. ii. c. 6. (61) ch. xxi. 18, & seq. (62) Vide MAIM. in Batb hammikd. ch. 8. BASHAG. ubi sup. tom. iii. lib. 2. c. 4.

cle or temple, where they washed themselves with pure water preserved there for a that purpose; after which, being clothed in their priestly habit, they were brought to the high-priest, who presented them to the Lord; and after the usual sacrifices prescribed by Moses, that pontif, or the priest in waiting, sanctified them, or, as the original imports, filled their hands, by which is understood their being immediately set about some branch of the priestly office. At least these ceremonies are inferred from those of the consecration of the Levites<sup>1</sup>; for as these were of an inferior rank, it is reasonable to suppose that the priests could not be consecrated with less ceremony; but even here it is very much questioned, whether any of these, except only the two or three first, were ever used, unless in cases of some signal defection, or long disuse of their office and the like, such b as frequently happened during the reigns of some of their wicked kings<sup>2</sup>.

Office.

THEIR office, which was severally determined by lot, and which they did cast at their first coming into waiting, was either to burn incense morning and evening in the holy place, or to offer up the daily sacrifice, to kill, dress, and offer up the victims proper for the day, to pour the blood at the foot of the altar, to keep up a continual fire upon the altar of burnt-offerings, to light the lamps, and to make and offer the shew-bread upon the golden table, with some others of the like nature, the most material of which we have had occasion to mention under the articles of sacrifices, first-fruits, purifications, and the like. Their waiting was weekly from sabbath to sabbath, and quarterly according to their c classes; the age, in which they were to begin to minister, was fixed by Moses at about twenty-five or thirty years of age, and ended about fifty<sup>3</sup>; but in David's time they were made to serve from the age of twenty<sup>4</sup>. Those, who either by age or infirmity were disabled from ministering, were maintained by the offerings of the altar, and other perquisites of the priesthood; and any Levite, that willingly offered himself to serve in the temple all his days, was admitted to the like maintenance<sup>5</sup>, as we shall see in its place. Some other important parts of the priestly office were the instruction of the people<sup>6</sup>, judging of controversies<sup>7</sup>, of leprosy and other pollutions<sup>8</sup>, causes of divorce, and the use of the waters of jealousy<sup>9</sup>; of vows, and of the fitness or unfitness of victims; d blowing the trumpets, in order to proclaim the sabbath and solemn feasts, the calling of assemblies; sounding to war; encouraging the combatants, and others of the like nature, which have been occasionally spoken of already. But the most sacred part of their function was the bearing of the ark, preserving the volumes of the law, and blessing the people in God's name<sup>10</sup>. There were likewise some severe inhibitions relating to their office, some of which were explicit, and some implicit. Of the first sort were those which forbade them to make use of any strange fire<sup>11</sup>, of drinking either wine or any intoxicating liquors, when they came to minister<sup>12</sup> (E). They were likewise forbid to begin any sacerdotal function, till they

<sup>1</sup> Numb. viii. 5, & seq.    <sup>2</sup> Vide 2 Kings ii. 5, 7.    <sup>3</sup> Numb. iv. 3. viii. 24.    <sup>4</sup> 1 Chron. xxiii. 24. 2 Chron. xxxi. 17.    <sup>5</sup> Deut. xviii. 6.    <sup>6</sup> Lev. x. 11. Malach. ii. 7.    <sup>7</sup> Deut. xvii. 8, & seq. xix. 17, & alib.    <sup>8</sup> Lev. xiii. xiv. & xv. pass. & alib.    <sup>9</sup> Numb. v. 12, & seq.    <sup>10</sup> Numb. vi. 23, & seq.    <sup>11</sup> Lev. x. 1, & seq.    <sup>12</sup> Ibid. ver. 9.

"Besides these, which unqualified a man, either from being admitted to the priestly office, or from being continued in it, if he contracted them after his admittance, there were several other voluntary ones for which he was set aside from the ministry, either for a time, or for his life. Of the first kind were several legal pollutions, the greatest of which was that of a dead body. For this reason they were not allowed to assist at the funeral of any but the nearest relations, that is, a father or mother, and a brother or sister that died virgins. In all such pollutions they were forbid not only to perform any sacerdotal office, but even to eat of holy things, till they had thoroughly purified themselves, according to the law (63). Those that excluded them wholly from the priesthood, besides the natural and accidental ones above-mentioned, were, for instance, unlawful marriages, that is, the marrying a harlot, or a Canaanitish, or any strange woman, and refusing to put her away. Something like this we find practised in the time of Ezra (64), after the captivity, to which we may add, that of the prophet (65), that they were even forbid to marry the widow of any but a priest. Idolatry likewise, and many other crimes of that high nature, did wholly exclude a person from the priesthood (66.)

(E) The reason of this prohibition we have hinted

(63) Lev. xxii. 6, & seq. (64) Ezr. x. 10, & seq. (65) Conf. Ezek. xliii. 22. & Levit. xxi. 13. (66) Vide MATTH. Biath Hammikdash. c. 1.

- a they had first washed their hands and feet<sup>7</sup>. The implicit ones were such as these, not to appear in the ministry without their priestly garments, or with any rent in their cloaths, because they were tokens of mourning; or with their hair grown to too great a length, or their heads uncovered. To these the Talmudists have added some others, such as sitting down whilst they performed any part of their office (F); making use of the left hand instead of the right (because Aaron and his sons had their right ears; thumbs, and great toes sanctified by the blood of the victims); and others of less consequence<sup>8</sup>.

- In David's time the two families of Eleazar and Ithamar were, for better order's sake, divided into twenty-four classes, according to the number of each family; so that the former, being the more numerous; was divided into sixteen; and the latter into eight classes. These took their turns in the ministry, according as it was assigned to them by lot, which was commonly cast before the king, high-priest, and other persons of distinction, to avoid fraud and confusion: an account of which the reader will find in the twenty-fourth chapter of the first book of the Chronicles. All that we shall add is, that these classes took their names from their heads or chiefs, and continued to be called by them to the end of that commonwealth, and from this the heads of each class came afterwards to be called chief-priests. This is the reason why we meet in two of the evangelists <sup>a</sup>†, with an assembly of them, which ought therefore to be distinguished both from the high-priest and from his suffragan.

- We have already said something of their dress when we spoke of that of the Dress. high-priest going into the holy of holies. It consisted of a vest, a pair of drawers, a girdle, and a mitre or cap, all of linnen. The cap resembled, according to Josephus, and those who follow him, a helmet or pointed turban. Their girdle was variegated with the finest colours about three finger's-breadth, and woven round like an eel-skin. Their vest or long coat; it is pretended, was without seam, woven from top to bottom, and with the sleeves to it. Some of those authors have ventured to give us the print of a loom or frame for making such kind of garments<sup>9</sup>. No priest was to wear his hair to its full length, but was obliged to clip it with a pair of scissors, at least when he went into waiting<sup>b</sup>. As to their dress, they were only bound to wear it at the time of their ministering, at other times they were left at their liberty. What relates to their maintenance, revenue, and perquisites, will be best seen when we come to speak of the Levites: In the mean time, we cannot forbear making one observation upon the garb both of the high and lower priests (in describing of which we have followed Josephus and the current of interpreters) namely, that if their vests had been of the length which they tell us of, and had really had what all versions render breeches or drawers under them, there would scarce have been any room for that precaution of building the altar without steps, for fear of their discovering that which modesty requires to be hid<sup>c</sup>. We hope this will be a sufficient excuse for our enlarging no further on that subject.

<sup>7</sup> Exod. xxx. 21.    <sup>8</sup> Vide MAIM. Biath Hammikdash, c. i, & seq. BASNAG. R. H. tom. iii. lib. ii. c. 4.    <sup>a</sup>†. Math. xxvi. 3. Mark xv. 1.    <sup>9</sup> See the version of JOSEPHUS, LAMY, CALMET, and others.    <sup>b</sup> Comp. Levit. xxi. 5. & Ezek. xlv. 20    <sup>c</sup> Exod. xx. ver. ult.

hinted at heretofore †, but as express and plain as it is, the Jewish doctors have subtilised a considerable part of it away, and thereby frustrated its main design, by distinguishing between wine under or above forty days old; between the latter and other strong drink; between drinking the quantity of a quarter of a pint, at one or at several draughts, and the like (67). It is plain, that this prohibition was intended to prevent all kind of blunders and indecencies in God's service, whereas, by these futile distinctions, a priest might drink enough to endanger his being guilty of them, and yet be deemed guiltless, or at the worst come off with a bastinado.

(F) Some of their rabbies have indeed been more remiss, and allowed them to sit down when they were not in the actual performance of their office; but the Talmudists are so far from such an indulgence, that they would not permit them to sit, or to be in any other than a standing posture, even whilst they washed their feet. And this they inferred from the words of Moses, The Lord has chosen them to stand to minister, &c. (68).

† Vide sup. p. 524. 2.    (67) MAIM. ubi sup. (68) Dent. xviii. 5, 7, et alib. Vide CHRYSTOST. ad Hebr. x. 11. MAIM. ubi sup. c. 5. R. SAL. JARCHI in Dent. xviii. 5, et al.

Laws concerning the Levites.

Levites.

Their consecration and dress.

THESE related either to their office, or to their privileges and incomes, for as to their descent, the choice of their tribe, and their consecration, we have had already occasion to mention all that is material concerning them; only with respect to the last of these, it is observable, that this ceremony was began with sprinkling them with the water of separation, which was that with which they used to purify those who had contracted any legal impurity, with shaving their whole body, and washing all their cloaths before they were presented by the people to the high-priest<sup>a</sup>. As to their dress it was the same with that of the rest of the Israelites, Moses not having appointed them any particular one. We have likewise heretofore given an account of their number, classes, incampments, marches, carrying, setting up and taking down the tabernacle and all its moveables<sup>c</sup>; of their being subject to their brethren of the family of Aaron, and officiating under them in the lower and more laborious branches of the ministry, during all the time that the ark, and the tabernacle, &c. were removing from place to place. But after these were once fixed, they were freed from that labour, and their service became easier and more delightful<sup>f</sup>. This seems to be the reason why Moses ordered at first, that they should not be admitted into their office, till they had attained to the age of between five and twenty and thirty, and that they should be discharged from it at fifty<sup>b</sup>; their office being then such as required more strength and vigour; but in David's time, when they were eased of it, they were then thought fit for it at the age of twenty<sup>h</sup>. And it is more than probable, that they continued in it much longer than to the fiftieth year, as we shall shew presently.

BEFORE David did divide them into classes, their ministry was in common; they took it by turns, from week to week, as the priests did, and their business was, some to bring the water, wood, and other things, that were used by the priests; others to keep the court of the sanctuary, and all the utensils that stood out of the tabernacle, clean and decent, and others to keep guard at night before the tabernacle. Some were likewise appointed to sing and play upon instruments, others to study and expound the law to the people, and to assist at the inferior courts of judicature; and these provinces were, in all probability, assigned to them according to their several capacities. But after David had once fixed the ark at Jerusalem, by which time they were become very numerous, and yet not more so, than the vast project he had premeditated of building the temple would most likely require; that wise monarch made several necessary regulations concerning their different employments, which continued till the dissolution of the Jewish polity. We have seen above, that they were distinguished into three families; namely, Gershon, Kobath, and Merari. To each of these, which he also subdivided into twenty-four classes, which were to succeed one another weekly in their turns, he appointed their several functions, as follows: To the one he assigned the assisting the priests at the tabernacle, preparing of flour, cakes, wine and oil for the sacrifices, and all other services of that kind. The second was appointed to sing, and play on musical instruments, at proper periods of the divine service; and the third, to keep a constant guard about the tabernacle, and afterwards about the temple. Over these classes he appointed from among them proper officers and overseers of several ranks, according to their merit or capacities. He chose likewise from among them men of learning and piety, to teach and breed up the younger Levites, either to their ministry, or to expound the law unto the people (G); besides those whom he appointed to assist at the courts of judicature of every city. Now it is plain, that in all

<sup>a</sup> Numb. viii. 7, & seq. <sup>c</sup> Vide sup. p. 549. c. Numb. iv. 3, & viii. 24. <sup>b</sup> 1 Chron. xxiii. 27.

<sup>f</sup> Vide Maim. & BARNAG. ubi sup. <sup>e</sup> Comp.

(G) The Jews tell us, that the Levites pass through four different degrees. From one month old to the twentieth year, they were instructed in the law of God. From twenty to twenty-five they were taught the functions of their ministry: From thence to thirty they served as it were

- a all these functions there was nothing that could incapacitate a man from performing them after the age of fifty, if we except, as the Jews do, that of singing, for which it is possible enough for old age to render one incapable, by reason of the disagreeable tremor which that brings to the voice<sup>1</sup>.

THESE singers king Solomon distinguished from their brethren, by their being allowed to wear a linnen kind of robe, or surplice, when they were upon duty*; but the rest did not obtain that privilege till the reign of king Agrippa, about the year of Christ 62, and about six years before the destruction of the last temple. Josephus adds<sup>1</sup>, that the priests did highly resent it, and observes, that such innovations seldom went unpunished. It is true that he calls them singers; but it is

- b plain he must have been either mistaken or miscopied; unless we suppose, that he there speaks of a particular garment to be worn by them at all times, as well as at the divine service.

2. Their revenues. We have chosen to speak jointly of those of the priests Their revenues. and Levites, because they were intermixed together by God's own appointment, at least in their main branches, those of the tithes, cities, and some other perquisites. As for what either of them had in particular it is scarce worth mentioning. The reader may recollect, that, according to Jacob's prophecy, the tribe of Levi was to be interspersed among the other tribes<sup>*.*</sup>, and that they were excluded by an express law of Deuteronomy<sup>m</sup>, from having any share in the division of the

- c land, and had their portion assigned to them out of the tithes, offerings of the altar, and the redemption of the first-born of the Israelites, in whose stead they were substituted. We have already spoken of all these, but as it was necessary that they should have some certain places of abode appointed for them, as soon as they were come to the plain of Moab, over-against Jericho, God was pleased to assign them forty-eight cities, with their suburbs, thirteen of which were to belong to the priests, and the other thirty-five to the rest of the tribe of Levi<sup>n</sup> (H). The only difference between them was, that the cities of the priests were for the most part of the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, and consequently nearer to Jerusalem; whereas those of the Levites were divided unto them by lot, out of all the other tribes on either side Jordan. Thus did God turn Jacob's curse into a blessing, and the priests and Levites, whose office it was to preserve knowledge, became so dispersed accordingly, that the people might be every where supplied with it. What those cities were is not worth enquiring, seeing we know little more of

<sup>1</sup> Vide OSAD. BARTENOR, Tract. Cholin. c. i. § 6. <sup>*.*</sup> Vide sup. p. 462. a, and note (F), & alib. pass. <sup>m</sup> Ch. xviii. pass. <sup>n</sup> Numb. xxxv. 1, & seq. Josh. xxi. 10, & seq.

* 2 Chron. v. 12.

<sup>1</sup> Ant. lib. xx. c. 8.

<sup>m</sup> Ch. xviii. pass.

<sup>n</sup> Numb. xxxv. 1, & seq.

were, an apprenticeship to them, and began to exercise themselves in some of the lower branches of it, such as cleaning the courts and vessels, guarding the gates, singing and playing upon instruments: lastly, when they attained the thirtieth year, they were peremptorily installed into their office. Some such degrees we find observed among the vestal virgins, who were bound to the strictest chastity during thirty years; the first ten of which they spent in learning the mysteries of their profession, the second ten they administered in holy things, and the last ten they bestowed in bringing up of young novices (69). And it is probable that the apostle alluded to this, when he tells Timothy, that they, who have performed the office of a deacon well, do purchase to themselves καλὸν βιβλίον, a good degree (70). Moses indeed ordered (71), that they should be discharged at the age of fifty from serving any more; but he adds in the next verse, that they should minister to their brethren in the tabernacle, and keep the charge, but do no service: by which it is plain, that they were only exempted from the harder sort of service, but continued still in some others, such as they were fittest for, in which number the breeding up the young Levites, teaching, judging, and the like, may be reasonably reckoned (72).

(H) The right of the Levitical tribe to these cities and lands adjacent is not without some difficulties, which have made some authors doubt whether they had any more than the bare use and income of, without the power of alienating them (73). Thus it is objected, that Hebron was given to the priests as a city of refuge; and yet Caleb, who was of the tribe of Judah, had the fields and villages belonging to it assigned to him (74). This difficulty may be easily removed, by supposing with our author, that Caleb did yield the city unto them, because the Lord had determined it for a city of refuge; but that he reserved the territories to himself, as being out of the case. However, as to the priests and Levites having power to alienate their houses and lands, or even to purchase new ones, exclusive of those allotted to them, we have sufficient proof of, as the reader will see by what follows above.

(69) Vide DION. HALICARN. lib. ii. Vide MAIM. ubi sup. ABARBAN. in loc. BASHAG. R. H. tom. iii. lib. ii. c. 2. (70) 1 Tim. iii. 13. (71) Numb. viii. 25. (72) Vide BASHAG. ubi sup. c. 7. (74) Josh. xxi. 11, & seq.

them than their names, and the tribes they were in. All that we shall examine a at present is, what their rights, privileges, immunities, and revenues consisted in, and how far they did extend. (As for the six cities of refuge which were chosen out of that number, we shall speak of them in a separate article.) With respect then to the privilege of the former, which some authors have questioned the extent of, further than the bare enjoyment of their revenues, we may observe on the contrary, that their owners had power to sell or mortgage them, as well as the other tribes, only with this advantageous difference on their side, that they might redeem them at any time, if they were able, and if not, they devolved to them on the year of Jubilee: whereas, as we observed before, those alienated houses of the laity, which stood in walled cities, if not redeemed within the year, were irrecoverably b lost to the first owner*. Hence it is plain, that their right to their houses was even stronger than that of the people, for which reason it is called their inheritance†. The case was indeed different with respect to the grounds that were annexed to those cities, which could not be alienated upon any account‡; but the reason of it was, that they were in the nature of a common to them, to which therefore every one had an equal right, they being the only pasture ground they had for their cattle; and if they agreed by consent to inclose or appropriate any part for fields, orchards, gardens, and the like, the division was made in proportion to the largeness of their families, which could not have subsisted, had such an alienation been permitted. o

It is likewise manifest, that their being excluded from any portion, in the distribution of the land, was so far from depriving them of the right of possession, or even of purchase, that we have several instances to the contrary in both cases, and they authorized by God. With respect to the first, we find, among other regulations concerning vows, that if a man had vowed his house or land unto the Lord, and had not wherewith, or was unwilling to redeem them, they were then to continue sacred unto God, that is, the priests became the right owners of them; accordingly we find that the high-priest Abiathar had some estate of his own, into which he was relegated by Solomon§; and, even in the apostles time, Barnabas, who was a Levite of Cyprus, had some land which he sold for the use of the church¶. d To this we may add, if what Maimon tells us be right, that the tribe of Levi had their twelfth share of all the lands which were got by the sword*. As for their having it in their power to purchase estates, we need but read the 32d chapter of Jeremiab, who was a priest, where we shall find a curious account of his purchasing a piece of land, and with it all the formalities that were then used in such cases**. e

EVERY one of these cities had suburbs, the limits whereof were also appointed by God himself‡; but Moses has expressed them in such terms, that it has given more pains to interpreters to reconcile the two numbers mentioned by him, than our readers would care to be troubled with (I), in which e * Levit. xxv. 29, & seq. † Ibid. ver. 33. ‡ Ibid. ver. 34. § Levit. xxvii. 14, & seq. ¶ 1 Kings ii. 26. ** Acts iv. 36, 37. * Halak. Shemit veyobel. Vide BASNAG. ubi sup. † Ver. 7, & seq. ‡ Halak. Havoda. Hacokabin Umazaloth, ap. BASNAG. R. H. tom. i. lib. i. c. 7.

(I) Moses expresses himself in one verse thus, and the suburbs of the cities of the Levites, from the wall of the city outwards, shall be one thousand cubits round about; and in the next verse it is said, thou shalt measure from without the city, on the east—west—north—and south sides of it, two thousand cubits, and the city shall be in the middle, &c. (75). To reconcile these two numbers, Jeanius (76) has supposed the latter to be mentioned kat'exegesein, of the diameter of the suburb, the city abstracted, so that, which way soever one measured it, it had two thousand cubits; but this construction seems to us somewhat too forced and unnatural; we therefore think with the Jews, that the two numbers may be more properly joined together, namely, the last as a further addition to the first.

The original word מִגְרָשׁ, Migraß, which we translate, Suburbs, doth properly signify expulsion, or thrusting out, from מִגְרָשׁ, to expel (77); and consequently, in a figurative sense, may signify extension. Accordingly the Chaldee renders it a space. The sense might therefore, we think, run naturally thus: the first extent of the Levitical cities shall be one thousand cubits from the out wall; after which thou shalt measure again from without the city another space of two thousand cubits, and this shall be the extent of their outward space or territories. We own however, that this latter sense is not altogether literal, but we hope it will be found less forced than the former, and to remove the seeming contradiction to the full as well.

(75) Num. xxxv. ver. 4, & 5. (76) In loc. (77) Vide KINCH. BUXTORF. PAGN. in Rad.

- a uncertainty we are unwilling to rely on the Jews, who tell us, that those two numbers were to be taken jointly; so that the extent of those suburbs, or rather territories, should extend to the distance of three thousand cubits from the out walls<sup>7</sup>. They add, that the first thousand were assigned for pasture ground, on which therefore it was not lawful to build, sow or plant, but, within the limits of the other two thousand cubits, they might do any of them. One thing further is remarkable, namely, that they were not permitted to bury their dead either within those cities or their suburbs, but that they had, according to the Jews, a piece of ground allotted to them by the people for a burying-place, which was quite out of the verge of those limits. We shall
- b venture no further on the rights and privileges of these cities, concerning which the Jews tell us wonders, but without any probability; those, that are fond of such fables, may find more than they can give credit to in Maimon<sup>8</sup>, and other Jewish commentators, on these places of the pentateuch where mention is made of them<sup>9</sup>. This however we may safely add concerning the cities themselves, namely, that they were not taken by equal numbers out of every tribe, but according as they were found more or less abounding in each of them. Thus, for instance, the tribe of Judah, whose lot was full of them, did allot nine, whereas that of Benjamin, which had but a few, was obliged to part with four only<sup>10</sup>; as to the nomination and distribution of them
- c among the Levites, it was done in the same manner as they had done the land itself, namely, by lot; which was the most effectual way to prevent all difference; for even this tribe doth not seem to have been so disinterested, that any other method could have satisfied them but this (K).

Laws concerning the six cities of refuge.

- THESE were chosen out of those forty two which had been assigned Cities of re- to the tribe of Levi<sup>a</sup>. They differed from the Asyla of the Greeks and Romans, in that they were designed to protect innocent persons only, from the rigor of the law; in cases of involuntary homicide, whereas theirs did equally shelter the guilty and innocent from it. There is an express command in Exodus with relation to wilful murder, that the guilty person shall be torn even from God's altar to be put to death<sup>b</sup>; from which one may naturally infer, that the tabernacle was a sanctuary to the innocent, not only during their wandering in the wilderness, but all the time of their abode in the land of Canaan; at least, the instance of Joab's taking refuge there seems to imply as much, though his crime excluded him from the benefit of it<sup>c</sup>. And indeed so severe were God's laws against murder, that if it was even committed in a fray, in correcting of a servant, or in some other cases, which our milder laws call chance-medley, the guilty person could not go unpunished<sup>d</sup>. And where the fact was accidental and involuntary, tho' his concern for the life of the innocent person was such, that he not only appointed these cities for his protection, but seemed, as it were, to take the fault upon himself (L), yet he condemned him to

<sup>7</sup> Vide Commentat. in Ex. xxi. 13. Num. xxxv. 6. Dent. iv. 21. & xix. 2.

<sup>a</sup> Numb. xxxv. 45.

<sup>b</sup> Rab. SALOM. in loc. vide & MOS. DE COTZI, MUNST. JUN. & al. in loc. <sup>c</sup> Josh. xxi. pass.

<sup>d</sup> Numb. xxxv. 6. <sup>e</sup> Exod. xxi. 14. <sup>f</sup> 1 Kings ii. 28. <sup>g</sup> Exod. xxi. 12, 20.

(K) According to those lots, the tribes of Judah, Simeon, and Benjamin furnished the thirteen cities, which were allotted to the priests: Those of Ephraim, Dan, and half of Manasseh on the other side Jordan, yielded ten to the Kohathites: The Gershonites received thirteen, namely, two from the other half of Manasseh, three from Naphtali, and eight from Issachar and Asher; and lastly, Reuben, Zebulun, and Gad gave four each, to the Merarites (78).

(L) The words are, if a man lie not in wait, but God deliver him into his hand. This we purposely take notice of, because these, and such like expressions, which occur in scripture, whatever sinister sense some may put upon them, import no more, according to the genius of the Hebrew idiom, than that, though a man may die contrary to the seeming course of nature, yet he cannot be taken off without the permission of heaven, whose providence directs all such events, either for the punishment of the person, or for some other wise purposes beyond our reach. However, it is plain, that it is only used in this place, to shew the injustice there would be in punishing a man for an act which had been so directed by providence, that one person lost his life without the least design in the other of hurting him.

(78) Vide Josh. xxi. pass.

a kind of banishment, till the death of the high-priest then in being<sup>c</sup> (M):<sup>a</sup> infomuch that if he ventured out of the limits, Josephus says out of the walls, of the city<sup>b</sup>, it was lawful for any relations of the deceased either to kill him, or to have him put to death by the hand of justice.

THESE cities were not only for the Israelites, but for all strangers that either lived among them, or came thither occasionally. The Jews do indeed confine the benefit of them to their proselytes, but this sense seems to flow more from their narrowness of soul, than from the words of the text<sup>c</sup>. We may remember, that Moses ordered three of them to be assigned on either side Jordan<sup>d</sup>. This partition seems indeed somewhat unequal, because one side had but two tribes and half, and the other nine and half; the reason of which<sup>e</sup> some Jews tell us was, because there were a great many more homicides committed in the former by way of self-defence, than in the latter: But this is ridiculous, and that of R. Nachman is by far more probable and judicious, namely, that the extent of the country of the former was at least as large as that of the latter, tho' less inhabited; which made it necessary for them to have so many of those cities. However, as to those tribes on the other side, God permitted them to add three more to their number, whenever the largeness of their conquests should make it necessary<sup>f</sup>; but as this depended upon their constant obedience, and they, on the contrary, proved continually stubborn and disobedient, they never found occasion for this addition, for which reason they think it will be made in the days of the Messiah.

How, where, and by whom, the examination of the manslayer was made, in order to his being admitted to, or excluded the benefit of the city of refuge; that is, whether by the next judges of the place where the fact was committed, or by those of the city, where the man fled for sanctuary, is neither clear from the text, nor agreed by interpreters. However, as a late author justly observes<sup>g</sup>, from an expression in Deuteronomy and Joshua<sup>h</sup>, there seems to have been a double trial, one before the judges of the city of refuge, and one before what the text calls there the congregation; by which is understood either those of the place where the fact was committed, or perhaps the great council; and<sup>i</sup> this seems to us to have been necessary only when the avenger of blood appealed from those of the place of refuge. As soon therefore as a man had been unfortunately guilty of accidental homicide, his first business was to flee with all convenient haste to the next city of that kind. The ways leading to it were, by God's own appointment, to be kept in good repair (N), that nothing might

<sup>a</sup> Numb. xxxv. 25. & seq. <sup>b</sup> Ant. lib. iv. c. 7. <sup>c</sup> Vide Numb. xxxv. 15. <sup>d</sup> Ibid. ver. 14. Deut. xix. pass. <sup>e</sup> Ibid. ver. 9. <sup>f</sup> CALM. sub. voc. Refuge. <sup>g</sup> Deut. xix. 11, 12. comp. with Josh x x. 6, 9.

(M) We shall not trouble the reader with the various reasons which interpreters have conjectured, concerning the time of a man's return being fixed to the death of the high-priest. Some of the Jews, who affirm, that the death of so great a person, which was universally lamented, was the most proper motive to make all resentment on the part of the prosecutor to cease, seem rather to trifle than to be in earnest (79), and one would wonder, that they should have been followed by any Christians. But the far greater part of these look upon this circumstance to have been typical of the reconciliation which Christ, our eternal high-priest, made of sinners to God by his death (80). This is what the apostle to the Hebrews seems to intimate (81): However, it must be owned, that some men have given too great a scope to this way of allegorizing; and that, where so little light is to be had from the sacred writings, it would be more advisable to say nothing, than to say all that a pious fancy suggests.

(N) The text (82) says only, thou shalt prepare thee a way, and divide the coast of the land into three parts, that every slayer may flee thither. But the Talmudists and Rabbies add a great number of circumstances for keeping those roads in continual repair, that the person might meet with no obstruction in his flight. These roads, according to them, were to be 32 cubits in breadth, smooth, plain, and without ascent, descent, or ditches. At every place where the road parted, a post was to be set up to direct them, which had the word מִלְּטָה, milkat, refuge, engraven upon it. Every brook or river was to have a good bridge; all watery places were to be drained, and the surface kept smooth and hard. To these precepts the words of the Baptist, prepare the ways of the Lord, make his paths straight, every valley shall be filled, and every mountain levelled, &c. are thought to allude. Once a year at least, in the month Adar, which answers in part to our February, the magistrates of every city were obliged to visit them, and see that they were kept in good order; otherwise, in case the avenger chanced to overtake and kill the slayer, the magistracy of the place were judged guilty of his death. As for the cities of refuge, they were to be of a moderate (79) Vide MAIM. More Nevoch. c. 40. (80) Hieron. August. & al. vide & Grot. Jun. Corn. a Lap. & al. mult. in loc. (81) Heb. ix. 15. (82) Deut. xix. 3.

- a might retard his speed. As soon as he came to the place, he presented himself to the judges of it, and declared the occasion of his coming, and the manner of his killing the person, and according as his account appeared true or false, he was admitted or excluded their protection. If the avenger of blood, who was always the nearest relation to the deceased, came to demand justice, he and his evidence were heard, and the judges did either confirm their former sentence in favour of the manslayer, or delivered him up to be punished, if the fact was proved to be wilfully done; but if the former, he was to be conducted to the place where the fact was committed, and there tried a second time, and if he was found innocent, he was reconducted to the place of refuge, with a sufficient guard, and remained there free from all further prosecutions, and, at the death of the high-priest, he was at liberty to return to his own home. This, at least, is what the generality of interpreters conclude to have been their proceeding in such cases. However, as the account we have of it from Moses is far from being clear in this point, and the cities of refuge were sometimes at such a distance from the place where the fact was committed, that the manslayer might be easily overtaken by the prosecutor, before he could reach it: we think it, at least, as reasonable to suppose, that he went and surrendered himself to the judges of the nearest place, and, having cleared himself before them from the guilt of wilful murder, was, by their order, conducted safely to the next city of refuge, where the magistrates had a further hearing of the cause, and either confirmed or revoked the sentence of the former, according to the evidence of it. It is true, that what we quoted out of the rabbies in the last note, about the conveniences of the roads leading to such places, would be needless in this case; but we look upon their testimony to be very dubious, and in some cases plainly wrong. Thus the Talmud tells us*, that those cities were to be situated by some rivers, in order to be well supplied with water, and all kind of provision, that access to them was to be easy and without ascent; and yet it rather appears, that the far greater part were built upon rocks. There are many other particulars which they tell us there, which we purposely omit, because they are still more incredible. But the reader is at liberty to chuse which supposition he likes best.

BESIDES these cities of refuge, the tabernacle, as we have partly observed above, and afterwards the temple, had likewise the privilege of sanctuariship, especially the altar of burnt-offering†. The rabbies do indeed tell us, the latter was only for the priests; but we have seen the contrary, in the instance * Gemar. Traët. Makloth.

† Vide PHILO, Legat ad Cai.

moderate bigness, well furnished with water, provisions, artists, and all manner of conveniences, weapons excepted. The reason they give for excluding this last was, lest the avenger should, in a fit of anger, make use of them against the slayer (83). Thus far they agree, in some other points they are divided. Some pretend, that the refuted was to be kept at the charge of the city; and others affirm, that he was obliged to follow some trade, if he could not maintain himself without it. Some say, that the houses in the suburbs were to obstruct the entrance of the prosecutor, till they had taken all proper means to pacify him; and others, that they only sent some grave and reverend deputies to meet him without the gates, to persuade him to clemency and moderation. Some add, that the tribe of Levi was excluded the benefit of these sanctuaries; so that if any of them happened to kill a man, how accidentally soever, they were forced to wander from place to place (84). The modern Jews do so far keep up this custom, that a manslayer is banished for three years into some city, in which they have a synagogue, where, by way of penance, he is forced to say aloud, I am a man-slayer, both at his entering into the synagogue, and at every courteous civility that is shewed to him (85).

Maimon and some other rabbies tell us, from ancient tradition, that all the forty-two cities of the Levites were places of refuge, with this difference, however, from the six properly so called, that the former might refuse their protection to any man, how innocent soever, but the latter were obliged to receive him; and that in the former he lived at his own, and in the latter at the publick charge (86). The Mishna, on the contrary, tells, upon the authority of R. Eleazar, that the death either of the high-priest, or of him that is anointed for the war, restored the slayer to his freedom, and that the mothers of these two prelates did find the refugees in food and raiment, that they might not by their prayers accelerate the death of their sons, in order to their speedy release from their banishment (87).

(83) Vide Gemar. Traët. שְׁלֵחִין, præcept. aff. 75, & seq. Rab. SALOM, MUNSTER, & al. in Num. xxxv.

(84) Targ. ONKEL. Fag. in Num. xxxv. (85) Vide BASNAG. lib. ii. c. 7. (86) Item ibid. vide & CALM. sub voc. Refuge. (87) Ap. HOTTING. in GOODWIN, lib. ii. c. 5. sub note 9.

of Joab mentioned above. Those indeed, who were guilty of wilful murder, sheltered themselves there in vain; and were, by God's express command, to be taken away from the very altar, to condign punishment. To this end there were proper judges appointed there also, whose business it was to make a strict examination of the case, and either to deliver up the criminal into the hands of justice, or send the innocent under a proper escort to one of the cities of refuge<sup>a</sup>. There are several other material circumstances relating to those kind of cases, which, Moses having left no particular directions about, may be reasonably supposed to have been left to the discretion of the judges. Such as, for instance, when the fact was committed just before, and the sentence of the judges not obtained in favour of the homicide, till after the death of the high-priest; or when it was done in the time of an interregnum; or in case the high-priest was killed by some friends of the exiled person; or lastly, when the high-priest himself became a man-slayer, which was far from impossible: concerning which, and several others of the like nature, the Talmudists have made very judicious and equitable regulations; but which we shall not trouble our readers with.

Netbinims. THE Netbinims are the last sort of persons dedicated to the worship of God (O). These were not of the children of Israel, but of the Gibeonites, who obtained a treaty of peace with the former by a stratagem, which we have taken notice of before†, and whom Joshua condemned to the lowest and most laborious offices in the tabernacle under the Levites, such as drawing of water, fetching and hewing of wood for the altar, and the like‡. We do not find that this name of Netbinims was given to them till after the captivity, when a small number returned with Ezra and the rest of Israel from Babylon. That name imports as much as given, and Ezra says§, they were given or appointed by David and other kings, to serve in the temple under the Levites; and in another place, that they were the children of Solomon's servants¶. So that by this time the name was not confined to the Gibeonites alone, but was given also to Canaanites, whom these princes had conquered and converted<sup>**</sup>. We read of some such abject persons also in the time of Moses, who mentions them in his last pathetick speech, in these words: You all stand this day before the Lord—your little ones and your wives, and the stranger that is in your camp, from the bearer of thy wood, to the drawer of thy water<sup>***</sup>. And probably the lowness of their condition, might be one main reason why so few cared to return from the captivity, where they did perhaps fare better. For we do not read of above two hundred and twenty that came with Ezra††, and three hundred and ninety two with Zerobabel‡‡; which number was so insufficient for the exigences of the temple, that, Josephus tells us, they did institute a festival, which he calls Xylophoria, on which the people were obliged to carry a certain quantity of wood to the temple, to supply the altar of burnt-offering§§: and not unlikely,

<sup>a</sup> Vid. MAIMONID. apud HOTTING. lib. ii. c. 5. note 2, & Commentatori, in Numb. xxxv. † Vide sup. p. 331. c. ‡ Josh. ix. 23, 27. § Ezr. viii. 20. ¶ Ibid. ii. 58. <sup>**</sup> Kings ix. 20, 21, & alib. <sup>***</sup> Deut. xxix. 11. †† Ezr. viii. 20. ‡‡ Ibid. ii. 58. §§ Wars of the Jews, lib. ii. c. 17.

(O) We may, however, add another sort, who were called מַשְׁכֵּנִי מַמְדָּא, Anshe Mahmad, Station-men, which were a pious, grave sort of persons, chosen, not out of the tribe of Levi alone, but out of all the twelve indifferently, to assist at the sacrifices, as representatives of a certain number of people. They were called by that name, because, as we observed before, no man was allowed to be in any but a standing posture during the time of divine service. The law required, that every man should come and make his offerings, of what kind soever, in person, and to stay there till the ceremony was ended; but because this was not practicable in many cases, as when an offering was made for the whole nation, or in times of great resort, because the place could not contain them; they chose these representatives to perform that duty for them. These were divided, as the priests and Levites, into twenty-four classes, who took their turns weekly as they did; each class having a head or captain, who was called רֹאשׁ מַשְׁכֵּנִי, Rosh Mahmad, or head of the station (88). We do not indeed read of any such order of men in the sacred writings, and consequently do not think it of divine institution; but the Jews do fetch it from the oral law, and believe that it began long before the captivity; but most Christians are rather of opinion, that it began soon after their return from it (89), for which reason we shall say no more of it.

(88) Vide MOS. KOTZ. מִצְוֹת גִּרְל. (89) GOODWIN'S Mos. & Aar. lib. i. cap. 5. HOTTING. Dissert. de Viris Stationar.

- a that also of bringing water thither from the pool of Siloab, on the last day of the feast of tabernacles, the institution of which is attributed to the prophet Zachariah; of which we have made some mention before.

II. Of things consecrated to the service of God.

- THESE were, 1. The tabernacle. 2. The ark. 3. The two altars. 4. The candlestick, and other utensils belonging to it. 5. The table of shew-bread. And 6. The court, with all the utensils which were repositied in it. Concerning all which, whatever can be said, with any tolerable certainty, is so well known to the curious in this kind of learning, and so disregarded by the rest of the world, that we should gladly content ourselves with the bare mention of them, did we think that our readers would be satisfied with it, without a further description of them. It may indeed appear somewhat surprising, that Moses should have bestowed almost as many pages in describing the structure of the tabernacle and its sumptuous furniture, as he has lines in his account of the creation, and yet that we should be so much in the dark about it, and that there should be so much room left for conjecture, for want of knowing the proper signification of a great number of its parts and materials. But as this is plainly the case, we shall not expatiate upon them, unless we can do it upon some sure grounds, or where they have an apparent relation to the gospel.

1. THE tabernacle was built by the command and directions of God himself, <sup>The tabernacle.</sup> that he might dwell in the midst of his people *. Their rebellions and murmurings having provoked him to prolong the term of their wandering in the wilderness, and thereby delayed the time of their entering into the possession of the promised land; it was necessary that this sacred place, where the most solemn parts of the divine worship were to be performed, should be fitted to their frequent marches, and be easily set up and taken down, as occasion required. For which reason, among other names it has in the Mosaic writings (P), it is most commonly called by that of Obel, which doth properly signify a tent; but such a magnificent one, both in its structure, materials, and utensils, as might inspire both the Israelites, and all other nations, with an awful respect and regard for the service of God. To this end, the most costly and precious things, which they had brought with them from Egypt, and from those other kingdoms which they had conquered, were liberally bestowed by the people, and put into the hands of the ablest artificers, to be wrought in a manner suitable to the design of it, and to the richness of the materials †.

- OUR learned Spencer has here again been at the pains to fetch this tabernacle, the ark, altars, and all their appurtenances from Egypt ‡. He quotes the sacred and profane writings, to prove that the Heathens had such portable temples, in which they deposited the most valuable utensils that belonged to their religion. It is, indeed, easy enough to prove, that they had both these, and many other things, very like those of the Jews; but to infer from thence, that they had them before them, and that God condescended so far to the genius of the Israelites, as to introduce them into his own worship, to be a kind of fence against their proneness to their idolatrous superstitions, is not only * Vide Exod. xxv. 8, & alib. pass.    † Vide sup. 523. 2.    ‡ De Leg. Rit. Hæbr. Dissert. i.

(P) The tabernacle is called by several names in scripture, the most common of which is that of אהל מועד, Ahel Moad, the tent or tabernacle of the congregation or assembly, because it was made in the fashion of a magnificent tent or pavilion (90). For this reason Josephus calls it μικροῦ ναοῦ, naos, a portable temple (91); we find it elsewhere called מקדש, Mikdash, the holy place (92), and by the Septuagint αγίασμα, because it was made holy by God's presence; it is therefore elsewhere called by way of excellency המשכן, Hamishkan; the habitation, which the Greek renders σκηνη, accordingly (93). Sometimes this last is joined with the word העדות, Habeduth, testimony (94), the habitation or tabernacle of testimony, because God delivered his oracles from thence; lastly, it is in other parts of scripture called היכל, Hecal, palace, and the palace of the Lord (95), which name was afterwards given to the temple.

(90) Exod. xxviii. 43, & alib. pass.
(93) Ibid. ver. 9. & alib. pass.

(94) Ibid. xxxviii. 21.

(91) Ant. lib. iii. c. 5.

(92) Exod. xxv. 8.

(95) 1 Sam. i. 9. iii. 3. 1 Kings xxi. 1, very presumptuous and unlikely, but doth too evidently thwart the known design of them, and the typical application which the apostle to the Hebrews makes of them<sup>d</sup>. And yet this sophistical way of reasoning is justly enough observed by a later author *.* to run through all his writings on this subject; for which reason we shall forbear saying more about it, having so often given our reasons for dissenting from him. The reader, however, may see this last supposition sufficiently exploded by the author last quoted, and but weakly defended since by Le Clerc *+*.

THE tabernacle was of an oblong square figure, thirty cubits long, ten cubits broad, and ten in height. It had two apartments within, divided by a row of four columns of shittim-wood (Q), covered over with massive gold, fixed in the same number of pedestals or sockets of silver; from which probably might come that ancient method of setting porphyry columns on bases of white marble. Moses doth not tell us whether they were round or square, but it seems more likely to have been the latter, not only because they became much in vogue in the inside of great buildings, under the name of pilasters, but also because they were more proper for the design for which they were intended, and more easy of carriage, with the boards and other flat pieces, than round ones. To the tops, or rather chapiters of these, was fastened by golden hooks a rich embroidered curtain, which divided the whole breadth of the place, and distinguished the outward, called the holy, from the inward apartment, called the most holy, or the holy of holies. This latter was but ten cubits deep (R), and con-

<sup>d</sup> Heb. ix. pass. & ver. 8. *.* Vide SAURIN'S Discourse on the Pentateuch, Disc. liv. pass. & alib. pass. *+* Bibliot. A. M. tom. xii. part 2. § 1. pass.

(Q) This wood, tho' so famous in scripture, is yet so unknown, that interpreters have not ventured to translate its name. St. Jerom has retained its Hebrew one, and the Septuagint only calls it imputrable wood; and indeed, it is more than probable, that it was called Shittim, from the place where it grew, often mentioned in scripture †. Our readers, therefore, may be perhaps willing enough to be let into that little light that can be got about it. The most probable account we can meet with is, that of St. Jerom, who says, that it is a hard, smooth wood, free from knots, and of exquisite beauty and lightness; in-somuch that the rich used to make skews of it for their presses: that its leaves and colour were not unlike the white thorn, but that it grew to such a height, that one might saw it into boards of a considerable length, and that it grew no where in the Roman empire, but only in the uncultivated parts of Arabia (96). Hence some authors have concluded, that he meant the black Acacia, not only because it has all the smoothness, hardness, length, and beauty, which he speaks of, but because this latter is the only one that is to be found in those parts of Arabia (97). But whoever reads the description, which other authors give us of the Acacia (98), will find that it cannot be the Shittim of St. Jerom, tho' we are told by very many travellers, that it is the only tree that grows in those deserts (99); but be it which of the two it will, 'tis plain, they were both very fit for Moses's purpose.

It is certain at least, that it could not be a kind of cedar, as some have imagined; not only because the Hebrew has another name for that tree, but because there grew none nearer than the Libanus, which was at too great a distance from Sinai; and yet the Jews are not ashamed of entertaining a more ridiculous notion, that Moses caused it to be brought from Egypt, whither Jacob had carried and sown the first seeds of it, foreseeing what use his posterity would have for it (100). But, had Moses known any thing of a tabernacle being to be reared in the wilderness before he came thither, 'tis certain, the Jews had something more valuable to load themselves with than timber, how rare and useful soever.

(R) This proportion is not mentioned by Moses, so that the reader is at his liberty to fix the partition in any other place, or, according to the rules of architecture, in the middle, and so make both apartments of equal length. What has determined the generality of interpreters to fix it where we do is, that, in the temple of Solomon, the most holy place was but half the length of the holy one (1), and is reasonably supposed to have been made according to the dimensions of the tabernacle; the only difference between them being, that the one was a fixed, and the other a moveable temple. To this may be added, that the most holy having nothing but the mercy-seat in it, and none but the high-priest being permitted to enter it, less room sufficed than for the outer one, which had the table of shew-bread, the altar of incense, candlestick, &c. and was more frequented. Josaphus (2), tho' he agrees with Moses in the length of the tabernacle, adds two cubits both to its height and breadth, with some other particularities, some not mentioned by Moses, and others differing from him. See the next note. However, it is not improper here to take notice, once for all, that the cubits were something longer than ours, though how much is not agreed. The most received opinion is, that from twenty to twenty-two inches. The Jews add a strange distinction between the cubits within and without the tabernacle, making the former longer by one hand, or three inches, than the latter, but we find no warrant for it but their bare word.

† Num. xxv. 1. xxxiii. 49. Micah. vi. 5. (96) Hieron. Comm. in Joel iii. ad fin. in Mich. vi. 5. & alib. (97) Bellon's Observ. lib. ii. c. 56, & 80. Aëtius, lib. iv. c. 11. (98) Vide Prosop. ALPIN. ap. Autor. Notar. in lib. iv. THEOPHRAST. THEVENOT, LA ROCQUE, & al. (99) Vide LE CLERC, CALMET, & al. Comm. in Exod. xxv. 5. THEVEN. LA ROCQUE, KADZIVIL, LUDOLPH, & al. (100) Vide BARNAG. ex Canaan, tom. ii. lib. ii. ch. 3. (1) Vide 1 Kings vi. 2. 2 Chron. iii. 3. (2) Ant. lib. iii. c. 6.

- a frequently square. The other was twenty cubits, and at the entrance of it, at the west end, hung a second curtain to another row of five columns of the same fabrication with the former, only the bases of these were of brass, and this covered the inside of the holy place from common sight. The curtain, or, as it is called, the veil, that parted the holy from the most holy place, was made of the richest stuff, both for matter and workmanship; and adorned with cherubims, festoons, and other ornaments, curiously embroidered upon it. The whole was inclosed on the north, west, and south side, with a slight of boards of the same wood, covered also with plates of gold, and fixed below and above into sockets or mortises like the columns. These boards were ten cubits in length, and one and half in breadth; so that there were twenty on each side, and eight at the west end. They were moreover fastened to one another by a five-fold row of golden rings, at equal distance one over the other, five to each board, and through these were run five bars of gilt shittim-wood, which locked or unlocked them on those three sides. As for the east end, it had no boards, but was sheltered by a veil, like that which divided the two apartments, except that this outward one had no cherubims imbroidered upon it, as the innermost had, for these were never exposed to publick sight, but it was only adorned with flowers, leaves, and such like embellishments of needle-work*. How low this curtain did hang is neither expressed in the text, nor agreed about; some thinking that it came no lower than five cubits, and afforded the people a view of what was done in the holy place†; others believing that it touched the ground, and concealed it all‡; which last is the more probable of the two (S). The whole had four different coverings, the two innermost of which were by far the richest, being of a beautiful light blue mohair, striped with scarlet and purple, or crimson, and adorned with cherubims§. The other two were made, the under one of rams-skins, with the wool on, of scarlet dye, and the uppermost of all, of badgers-skins, of a light blue. These two last were intended to preserve the other two from wind and rain; for which reason they were made to hang down to the ground on the three sides that were boarded, whilst they left the outward veil open to publick view on the west end, which was the entrance into that sacred place. The inside of both these apartments was still made more awful by the darkness that reigned in them: For we do not find that there was any overtures made for the light; so that the most holy had none but what the censor gave it, when the high-priest went into it on expiation-day: As for the holy place, it had the golden candlestick, with a sufficient number of branches to enlighten it in the night. We shall follow the Jewish law-giver no further in his succinct account of every minute part that composed this portable edifice, much

* Exod xxvi. 36.

† JOSEPH. Ant. lib. iii. c. 6.

‡ PHILO ap. BASNAG. tom. ii. lib. i. c. 5.

§ Exod. xxvi. 1.

(S) Josephus adds further, that there was another curtain over that which came down to the ground, and was to preserve it from the weather, being made of stuff that was proof against rain, but that it was drawn aside on the sabbath and other festivals, to give the people a view of the inner one, and of its ornaments; if so, it must at the same time expose the altar of incense, candlestick, &c. to publick sight. Philo, on the contrary, pretends (3), that no layman was suffered to see the fumigations which were performed within that place, the priests being the only persons who had that privilege. This seems at least more likely, by what we read of Zechariah's tarrying longer than usual in the holy place, and of the people's waiting without, not knowing what had happened to him (4). However that be, Moses calls these two curtains or veils by different names, namely, this outward one by the name of מוסך Mussak, which only signifies a covering; whereas the inward, which divided the holy from the most holy place, he calls פרוכת Paroketh from Parak, which signifies to take, or snatch away, and figuratively, to free, because it covered the mercy-seat, and kept it from publick sight.

The Talmud adds another particular concerning this last veil, namely, that it consisted of two curtains, which hung parallel a-cross the tabernacle, at the distance of two cubits from each other; and that, when the high-priest went into the most holy place, he lifted up the first curtain at one end of it, and so walked between them quite to the other end, and then entered within the second curtain, and marched forwards towards the ark (5); if so, it was the most effectual way to keep that sacred place from sight; but we dare not warrant the truth of it. The apostle to the Hebrews mentions indeed a second veil*, but whether in allusion to this double curtain, or, what seems more probable, in opposition to the Mussak or outward veil, we shall not determine.

(3) Ap. BASNAG. ubi sup.

(4) Luke i. 21.

(5) Vide MAIM. Kele Hammickdash. * Hebr. ix. 3.

less those who have commented upon him, the greatest part of whom have given a such a scope to their luxuriant fancies, that they seem rather to have viewed it with the utmost nicety, than to have taken their description from him: We think it sufficient for us to say, that there was nothing wanting in it that could make it rich, sumptuous, and venerable, firm, lasting, and easily moved <sup>1</sup>.

Of the mercy-seat and ark of the testimony.

The ark and mercy-seat.

THESE were the two chief things that were deposited in the most holy place, and the former was as a lid or covert to the latter; for which reason some interpreters have fancied, that this was all that was meant by the word Kaphoreth, by which Moses calls it. But most versions do more properly render it the Propitiatory <sup>2</sup>, others the Oracle <sup>3</sup>, and ours the mercy-seat (T); because God is said to have heard their prayers, to have delivered his oracles from thence, and to dwell between the cherubims, which cover it. Besides, it is plain, that it had a more than ordinary sanctity attributed to it, and that it was looked upon as the place of God's immediate presence; for which reason, there were such severe judgments inflicted on those who presumed to approach it <sup>4</sup>. Moses was commanded to make it of pure gold <sup>5</sup>; from which one may conclude, that it was not made of shittim-wood overlaid with gold, like the ark, the golden-table, and other sacred utensils. The length of it was two cubits and half, and the breadth of it one cubit and half; so that it exactly fitted the dimensions of the ark. It was fixed with the cherubims that overshadowed it in a frame, or, as Moses calls it, a crown <sup>6</sup>, not of a round, but oblong square figure, which closed the upper part of the ark, like a rim or ogee. As to the cherubims, it is certain, that they were made of gold, but whether solid, and cast of the same piece, and in the same mould with the mercy-seat, as some Jews and Christians render it <sup>7</sup>; or only chased and hammered, as the original, which only expresses it by hardened gold, seems rather to intimate; is not worth disputing. It would indeed be more material to know something concerning their form, posture, and attitude; but Moses has here also left us in the dark, except where he says, that they stretched out their wings on high, and covered the mercy-seat with them from each end of it, and faced one another, with their faces turned down towards the mercy-seat <sup>8</sup> (V); from which we may reasonably conclude, that they were at least in a kind of bowing posture. This attitude, tho' not so clearly expressed by Moses, may be further evinced,

<sup>1</sup> Ibid. p. tot. <sup>2</sup> LXX. <sup>3</sup> Hieron. Vulgat. & al. <sup>4</sup> Vide 1 Sam. vi. 19. 2 Sam. vi. 6, & seq. <sup>5</sup> Exod. xxv. 17. <sup>6</sup> Ibid. ver. 18. <sup>7</sup> Chald. Paraph. R. Sal. Arr. Montan. Tremel. & al. in loc. ver. 18. <sup>8</sup> Ibid. ver. 20.

(T) The word כַּפֹּרֶת, Kaphoreth, indeed comes from the verb Caphar, which doth signify to expiate, to forgive, in a figurative sense, and in the primitive one, to cover, according to that of the psalmist—whose unrighteousness is forgiven, and whose sin is covered (6). But it would be absurd to infer from hence, that the word here signifies only a bare covering; especially when the apostle to the Hebrews, who in other cases has followed the version of the Septuagint, departs from it here, and calls it simply ἡλασμός, the propitiatory, or mercy-seat (7), where they had rendered it ἡλασμός καὶ σκεπτήριον, the propitiatory lid or covering.

(V) We have had occasion in another place to hint something concerning the form of these cherubims; not that either these which Moses speaks of here, or those which were embroidered on the veils and curtains, can help us to form any idea of them, except we have recourse to other places of scripture, where they are somewhat more particularly described. The generality of interpreters, both ancient and modern, have supposed them to have human shapes, because Moses says here, that they had their faces turned towards the mercy-seat; and elsewhere (8) that God set them with flaming swords, in their hands it is supposed, to guard the entrance of paradise. But this concludes nothing, because face and hands, if any had here been mentioned, are attributed to beasts as well as men, in the Hebrews. The greatest part of the Jews derive the word from another, which signifies, to be like a child, from which they conclude that they were like young men naked, and covered only for decency with some of their wings (9). But it is certain, on the contrary, that the prophet Ezekiel represents them quite otherwise, and speaks of the face of a cherubim as synonymous with that of an ox or calf (10); according to which, the Apocalypse calls them ζῴα, beasts (11), and it is not improbable, that the different descriptions we meet with of them, in several places of scripture, made Josephus say, that they were a kind of winged creature

(6) Ps. xxxii. 1. (7) Hebr. ix. 5. (8) Gen. iii. ver. ult. (9) Vide Kimc. & Buxtorf. sub voc. Cherub. BASNAG. R. H. tom. ii. lib. i. c. 5, 6, & 7. pass. (10) Conf. Ezek. i. 10. & x. 14. (11) Apoc. iv. 6.

- a evinced, not only as it was the most decent and respectful, but as it seems to be alluded to by the psalmist, who having declared that God was seated between the cherubims; and expressed his majesty, justice, and power, in the two or three verses following adds, prostrate your selves before his foot-stool *. Neither is it improbable, that what is said of their looking down upon the mercy-seat, in a kind of admiring posture, might give occasion to that beautiful allusion of St. Peter, when, speaking of the mysteries of our redemption, he says, which the very angels desire to look into *. We might likewise give a very probable conjecture of their height, if it be allowed that their wings, which met about the middle of the mercy-seat, did bear the usual proportion to the rest of their bodies: But these enquiries are more curious than useful.

b THE ark was a small chest made of shittim-wood, and covered over with beaten gold. We have seen the dimensions of its length and breadth, by those of the mercy-seat; its height was equal to its breadth, that is, one cubit and half. It is called the ark of the covenant, and the ark of the testimony; the first, because it was a symbol of the covenant made between God and his people, and contained the two tables of it, the pot of manna, and Aaron's miraculous rod which were deposited in it, to be as so many witnesses against every deviation of theirs. It had on each side two gold rings, through which were fastened the two bars, by which it used to be carried on the priests shoulders. These bars were made of the same wood with the ark, and like it overlaid with gold; and these were never to be taken off. The ark with its covering stood length-wise, and not cross-wise, as some have imagined, in the midst of the most holy place. Moses doth not tell us, whether or no it had either feet or some pedestal to stand upon; and yet it is hardly to be supposed that it stood upon the bare ground.

- c SEVERAL learned rabbies have a notion that there were two arks, the one made by Moses, and the other by Bezaleel; because Moses is said in one place to have made an ark of shittim-wood, into which he put the two tables of stone; and in another place, that Bezaleel made an ark, and covered it with gold. But they might as well conclude, that Solomon built one temple, and his workmen another; however they add, that Moses did always carry his own, and the priests the other; and that this latter, which had in it the book of the law, was always carried with them when they went to engage their enemies *. Abenezra endeavours to confirm this opinion, by what is said in Joshua of the distance that was to be kept between the people and it, (the ark) *. He pretends that the participle it is in the plural in the original, and that the words should be translated between you and them, that is, the two arks *. But besides that, his criticism has no foundation, but on the different reading of the Mazorites, and that grounded on the disputed authority of the points; we have elsewhere seen, that the plural is sometimes used to express the excellency of a thing; so that we see no reason to suppose two arks from either of these arguments; and yet some Christians have given into that opinion * (W).

BESIDES

* P. s. xcix. 1, & seq. * 1 Pet. i. 12. * Deut. x. 3. * Exod. xxvii. 1. * NACHMAN, KIMCHI, ZACHUT, & al. Vide BASNAG. ubi sup. * Josh. iii. 4. * ABENEZ. in Deut. x. * GOODW. & HOTTING. ubi sup. Differt. de Tabernacul. § 13.

creature, answering to the description of that which Moses saw about the throne of God, but to which no man had ever seen the like before (12).

However, we think with many learned moderns (13), that the word is derived from Charab, which, in the Syriac, Chaldee, and Arabic, signifies to plow; according to which, Charub, or Cherub, doth often imply a strong man, or beast; and as the ox is known to be very proper for agriculture, both on account of his strength and docility, the authors above quoted have made no difficulty to believe, that the cherubims here spoken of resembled them, if not in the whole, at least in face, and some other parts of the body. To these we may add the authority of an ancient father, who believed, that the Egyptian Sphinx, and other hieroglyphical beasts, were borrowed from those of Moses and Ezekiel (14). And indeed Moses seems to hint at least, that the cherub-work, which was embroidered on the veil and curtains within the holy of holies (15), was full of such symbolical figures, after the manner of the famous Phrygian tapestry. Whether therefore, these took the hint from Moses, or he from them, is not very material; either supposition may be allowed without any harm. If the first, Moses might thereby design to intimate the existence and office of those spiritual beings; and if the latter, it might serve to expose the folly of their Gentile worshippers, seeing they were here represented as meer servants to the God of Israel.

(W) R. Kimchi adds, speaking of these two arks

(12) Ant. lib. iii. c. 6. (13) GROT. BOCHART, SPENCER, LE CLERC, MEDE, & al. (14) CLEM. ALEX. Strom. lib. v. (15) Exod. xxvi. 1.

BESIDES the ark and mercy-seat, there was still in this most holy place the volume of the law, which Moses gave the Levites to deposit by the side of the ark<sup>a</sup>; whether on the in or out-side is not agreed, but most probably without†. St. Paul omits this in the mention he makes of the things that were preserved there<sup>b</sup>; for which no other reason can be given, than that it was sufficiently known, for it is said elsewhere, that there was nothing in the ark but the two tables of stone, which Moses put into it at Horeb<sup>c</sup>; tho' it is plain, that the pot of manna and Aaron's miraculous rod were likewise preserved in it. But we do not think that either of these seeming inconsistencies, or the disposition of the sacred volume, and the other holy utensils, are matters of such weight, as to deserve all the pains which some learned authors have given themselves to little purpose<sup>d</sup>. However, as to the book itself, we must not suppose that it was the only copy, seeing it would not have been lawful for the high-priest to have fetched it out and in but on expiation-day; whereas the publick reading of it was to be on the feast of tabernacles. We may therefore suppose, with the Jews (X), that there were several copies of it, and that this prototype was thus carefully preserved to prevent the rest from being corrupted. Lastly, after the ark was brought back from the Philistines, they deposited the little chest with the golden mice and emrods, not in it, but by the side of it<sup>e</sup>.

THE utensils in the holy place were, 1. The altar of incense. 2. The golden candlestick, And 3. The table of shew-bread.

1. THE altar of perfume is sometimes called the golden altar, because, tho' it was made all of shittim-wood, yet it was so well covered over with gold, that it looked like a solid piece of it. It is also called the inner altar, to distinguish it from that of burnt-offerings, which stood without the tabernacle. Its use was twofold, namely, to burn incense morning and night, as we hinted elsewhere, and to be sprinkled with the blood of the sacrifices, which were offered for sins of ignorance committed either by particular priests, or by all the people in general<sup>f</sup>. It was one cubit square, and two cubits high, so that the smoke had still eight cubits to ascend. Two bars of the same wood covered with gold, and put through four gold rings, served to carry it about, like the ark; only these might be taken off. There was a golden crown or ornament like an ogee round the top of it, and four horns on the four corners (Y), likewise covered with gold. The main difficulty is how to understand what arks, that the one had the pieces of the two tables which Moses had broke, and the other, those which he made afterwards. And even the Talmudists, who do not seem to have dreamed of a double ark, are yet of opinion, that those precious reliques were preserved in that one in which the new were repositied. It is indeed scarce credible, that he left them scattered on the ground; but, as he has not told us what he did with them, it is more reasonable to suppose, that he took them up into the mount, and there buried them out of sight, than that he deposited them in the ark, where they could be of no use, unless it were indeed to put them in mind of their abominable idolatry, which had occasioned the breaking of them.

<sup>a</sup> Deut. iii. 26. † Vide PRID. Connect. part i. lib. iii. <sup>b</sup> Comp. 1 Kings viii. 9. with Heb. ix. c. 1 Kings viii. 9. <sup>d</sup> GOODW. ubi sup. § 18, ad 24. 1 Sam. vi. & alib. vide PRID. ubi sup. <sup>e</sup> 1 Sam. vi. & alib. <sup>f</sup> Vide Levit. iv. 3, & 7, 13, & 18.

(X) They tell us, that there were thirteen copies of it, one for each tribe, and one to be preserved in the ark. There is nothing improbable in all this; but there is one particularity they add, which is not quite so clear, namely, that, after the building of the temple, this last was taken out of the sanctuary, and deposited in the treasury of the temple; and that it was this volume which was found there by the high-priest Hilkiah, in the reign of Josiah (16). But if the latter be true, it is more likely that it was taken out of the sanctuary, and repositied in some such private place, to prevent its undergoing the same fate that all other copies had done, during the wicked reigns of Amon and Manasse, than that it was removed thence in Solomon's time, without any necessity, or command from God.

(Y) It is scarce worth the while to enquire into the various notions which interpreters are run into about the shape of these horns; some making them to be round, and others square knobs (17), others little plain, and others like twisted pyramids (18). What is worth observing to our English readers is, that the word קרן, keren, signifies either a horn, or a ray of light, from which, perhaps, as Cumeus observes, those rays which shone about Moses's face may easily have been transformed into horns; so that these on the corners of the altars might, for aught appears to the contrary, be nothing else but ornaments resembling in some measure the rays of the sun. However, those who think them to have been in shape like the horns

(16) 2 Kings xxii. 8, & seq. 2 Chron. xxxiv. 14, & seq. Vide KIMCH. in loc. & BASNAG. ubi sup. c. 8. (17) N. DE LYRA, post Rabbin. alig. (18) VILLALPAND, ARR. MONTAN. & al.

A MAP of the Kingdoms of JUDAH and ISRAEL, according to this History

BESIDES the ark and mercy-seat, there was still in this most holy place the volume of the law, which Moses gave the Levites to deposite by the side of the ark<sup>a</sup>; whether on the in or out-side is not agreed, but most probably without†. St. Paul omits this in the mention he makes of the things that were preserved there<sup>b</sup>; for which no other reason can be given, than that it was sufficiently known, for it is said elsewhere, that there was nothing in the ark but the two tables of stone, which Moses put into it at Horeb<sup>c</sup>; tho' it is plain, that the pot of manna and Aaron's miraculous rod were likewise preserved in it. But we do not think that either of these seeming inconsistencies, or the disposition of the sacred volume, and the other holy utensils, are matters of such weight, as to deserve all the pains which some learned authors have given themselves to little purpose<sup>d</sup>. However, as to the book itself, we must not suppose that it was the only copy, seeing it would not have been lawful for the high-priest to have fetched it out and in but on expiation-day; whereas the publick reading of it was to be on the feast of tabernacles. We may therefore suppose, with the Jews (X), that there were several copies of it, and that this prototype was thus carefully preserved to prevent the rest from being corrupted. Lastly, after the ark was brought back from the Philistines, they deposited the little chest with the golden mice and emrods, not in it, but by the side of it<sup>e</sup>.

THE utensils in the holy place were, 1. The altar of incense. 2. The golden candlestick, And 3. The table of shew-bread.

1. THE altar of perfume is sometimes called the golden altar, because, tho' it was made all of shittim-wood, yet it was so well covered over with gold, that it looked like a solid piece of it. It is also called the inner altar, to distinguish it from that of burnt-offerings, which stood without the tabernacle. Its use was twofold, namely, to burn incense morning and night, as we hinted elsewhere, and to be sprinkled with the blood of the sacrifices, which were offered for sins of ignorance committed either by particular priests, or by all the people in general<sup>f</sup>. It was one cubit square, and two cubits high, so that the smoke had still eight cubits to ascend. Two bars of the same wood covered with gold, and put through four gold rings, served to carry it about, like the ark; only these might be taken off. There was a golden crown or ornament like an ogce round the top of it, and four horns on the four corners (Y), likewise covered with gold. The main difficulty is how to understand what arks, that the one had the pieces of the two tables which Moses had broke, and the other, those which he made afterwards. And even the Talmudists, who do not seem to have dreamed of a double ark, are yet of opinion, that those precious relicks were preserved in that one in which the new were reposit. It is indeed scarce credible, that he left them scattered on the ground; but, as he has not told us what he did with them, it is more reasonable to suppose, that he took them up into the mount, and there buried them out of sight, than that he deposited them in the ark, where they could be of no use, unless it were indeed to put them in mind of their abominable idolatry, which had occasioned the breaking of them.

<sup>a</sup> Deut. iii. 26. † Vide PAR. Connect. part r. lib. iii. <sup>b</sup> Comp. 1 Kings viii. 9. with Heb. ix. <sup>c</sup> 1 Kings viii. 9. <sup>d</sup> Goodw. ubi sup. § 18, ad 24. 1 Sam. vi. & alib. vide PAR. ubi sup. <sup>e</sup> 1 Sam. vi. & alib. <sup>f</sup> Vide Levit. iv. 3, & 7, 13, & 18.

(X) They tell us, that there were thirteen copies of it, one for each tribe, and one to be preserved in the ark. There is nothing improbable in all this; but there is one particularity they add, which is not quite so clear, namely, that, after the building of the temple, this last was taken out of the sanctuary, and deposited in the treasury of the temple; and that it was this volume which was found there by the high-priest Hilkiah, in the reign of Josiah (16). But if the latter be true, it is more likely that it was taken out of the sanctuary, and reposit in some such private place, to prevent its undergoing the same fate that all other copies had done, during the wicked reigns of Ammon and Manasses, than that it was removed thence in Solomon's time, without any necessity, or command from God.

(Y) It is scarce worth the while to enquire into the various notions which interpreters are run into about the shape of these horns; some making them to be round, and others square knobs (17), others little plain, and others like twisted pyramids (18). What is worth observing to our English readers is, that the word קֶרֶן, keren, signifies either a horn, or a ray of light, from which, perhaps, as Cunaeus observes, those rays which shone about Moses's face may easily have been transformed into horns; so that these on the corners of the altars might, for aught appears to the contrary, be nothing else but ornaments resembling in some measure the rays of the sun. However, those who think them to have been in shape like the horns

(16) 2 Kings xxii. 8, & seq. 2 Chron. xxxiv. 14, & seq. Vide KIMCH. in loc. & BASNAG. ubi sup. c. 8. (17) N. DE LYRA, post Rabbin. aliq. (18) VILLALPAND. ARR. MONTAN. & al.

A MAP of the Kingdoms of JUDAH and ISRAEL, according to this History

- a what is meant by the top or roof of it<sup>a</sup>, and how it could be ordered so as to bear the heat of the burning coals, without burning the wood through the gold that overlaid it. This has induced St. Jerom, and others, to translate it a grate, through which the small coals and ashes fell to the bottom<sup>b</sup>, but the construction of the altar is incompatible with it. Josephus calls it a golden fire-hearth, which is equally liable to the same inconvenience, unless we suppose it to have been of more than common thickness. The difficulty is still greater with respect to the altar of burnt-offerings, which, tho' made of the same wood, and only covered with copper, did yet bear a much more intense heat, by reason of the great number of victims, which were burnt constantly upon it. Le Clerc hath offered two ways of solving this difficulty, either by supposing the metal that covered it to be very thick, or that the Shittim was the same with the Larix of Vitruvius, which was an incombustible wood<sup>c</sup>; and, because he found the first solution to be insufficient, he published a short dissertation to prove the probability of the latter<sup>d</sup>: But the misfortune is, that we have no sufficient testimony, that any such wood did grow in the neighbourhood of Sinai, or indeed, in Arabia. We shall speak of the latter altar by and by; as for this of incense, Cuneus seems to have found out the best expedient out of the Jewish rabbies, by supposing that the burning coals were not set upon the altar itself, but upon a censer like a chafing-dish; which conjecture he backs by a text or two, where such censers are commanded to be filled with coals, and set upon the altar<sup>e</sup>. However, if the readers should scruple to admit of these, it is but supposing, that this golden top or roof, with its crown or frame, was so fixed, as to be at some small distance above the altar itself, and the wood will be out of danger of being burnt, though it had not been overlaid with gold, because the heat naturally ascends. The situation of it is not clear in the text, which says, that it was to stand before the veil<sup>f</sup>. Josephus, who is universally followed, places it between the candlestick and the table of shew-bread<sup>g</sup>. We cannot contradict it, and yet we think, that if the candlestick were placed in the midst, which is the properest place for it, and the other two, which were near of the same form, height, and bigness, put on each side, and at a little distance between it and the sides of the tabernacle, it would be more agreeable to the rules of symmetry. The author of the second book of Maccabees tells us, that Jeremiah, seeing the captivity approaching, took this altar and the ark of God to mount Neb, and hid them in a cave there, and stopped the door so close, that it could not afterwards be found<sup>h</sup>. The Talmudists give a different account of it, namely, that Josiah having been admonished by some prophets, that all the precious vessels of the sanctuary would be carried away to Babylon, deposited the holy fire, the ark, the pot of manna, Aaron's rod, and the breast-plate of Urim, and this altar of incense, into a subterranean place, which Solomon, from the same forecast, had caused to be built with such extreme care and privacy, that, at the return from the captivity, they could never be found, nor ever will be, if we believe the Jews, till the coming of the Messiah. One thing, indeed, seems reasonable to suppose, that if they had been carried into Babylon, with the rest of the sacred utensils of the temple, they would have been also restored to them; but we find on the contrary, that they were forced to make them new ones at their return, whatever became of the old<sup>i</sup>.

2. THE candlestick was by far the richest piece in the whole sanctuary, seeing it weighed a talent, not the common, but that of the sanctuary; and was made from top to bottom of pure beaten gold, all of a piece, without joint or sauder<sup>a</sup>. Its base or foot, or, as the original words it, its thigh, be-horns of an ox or ram, may as probably guess right, since any of these forms might answer the purposes for which they seem intended, namely, in this small one for the greater ease and steadiness in moving and carrying it about; and in the great one for tying the victims to them, according to the allusion of the psalmist (19), and perhaps, likewise, to hang the flagons of wine on, which usually accompanied those sacrifices †.

<sup>a</sup> Exod. xxx. 3. <sup>b</sup> Chald. Paraphr. FAGIUS in loc. <sup>c</sup> Comm. in Exod. in loc. <sup>d</sup> Bibliot. Anc. & Mod. tom. xii. p. 57. & seq. <sup>e</sup> Comp. Levit. x. 1. xvi. 12. Num. xvi. 6, 7. <sup>f</sup> Exod. xxx. 6. <sup>g</sup> Ant. lib. iii. c. 6. ad fin. <sup>h</sup> Ch. ii. 1, & seq. <sup>i</sup> Vide Buxtorf de Arc. c. 21, 22. R. JACKUT. PRID. CONN. part. 1. lib. iii. CUNÆ. BASNAG. & al. <sup>j</sup> Exod. xxv. 31, & seq.

(19) Pf. cxviii. 27.

† Vide Zechar. ix. 15.

cause it probably resembled an inverted one, had a trunk over it, out of which <sup>a</sup> proceeded six branches, three on each side, and this last made the seventh in the middle. These branches were adorned with cups, knops, and flowers, alternate and equidistant, and on the top of each was fixed a lamp, shaped like an almond, which might be taken on or off, as occasion served; and in them were put the oil and the wick or cotton. These had their tongs or snuffers to draw the cotton in or out, and snuff-dishes to receive the sparks and filth that fell from the lamps. All these were of pure gold also. It was the priest's business in waiting every evening, at the time of incense, to go in and light them, and about the same time in the morning to put them out, to clean and replenish them * (Z). As to the height of it, Moses has not mentioned any thing about it; so that whilst some have <sup>b</sup> lowered it to the level of the altar of incense, which would have cast but an imperfect light, especially on the table of shew-bread, where the loaves stood one upon another, others have carried it up to the height of five cubits, which is a worse extremity, since it must not only have required a ladder or steps to have reached it, but, it being the half of the height of the place, the smoke of it would soon have sullied and spoiled the rich curtains over head: It is therefore more reasonable to suppose it of such a height, that a man might easily reach the top of it, that is, about six foot high. We are likewise left to guess at its shape, breadth, situation, and several other particulars, in which every commentator thinks he has hit better than any of his brethren; for which reason we shall follow them no <sup>c</sup> further in the dark (A); but only add, that, after the building of the temple, Solomon, instead of one, placed ten candlesticks in the holy place, all of the same metal, with their other appurtenances; but whether that of Moses was one of the number, or made the eleventh, is not certain; the latter seems the more probable of the two, because the holy place here being considerably larger than that of the tabernacle; and all the vessels being made so accordingly; it is likely that the candlesticks did bear the same proportion; in which case the old one would not have been uniform with the rest. But whether it was new cast, or reposit in the treasury of the temple, or what became of it, is uncertain.

Table of shew-bread.

3. THE table of shew-bread. We have spoken of the bread elsewhere; <sup>d</sup> as for the table on which it was set, it was made of the same wood, and covered with gold like the ark: It was two cubits long, one cubit broad, and one and half high: it had a golden border or crown, which may be supposed

* Comp. Exod. xxv. 37, with Num. iv. 9.    * Comp. ver. 37, with Exod. xxx. 8. Levit. xxiv. 2. 1 Sam. iii. 3.    † Vide int. al. JOSEPH. ubi sup. Hieron. Ann. Mont. Villalp. Cun. Basnag. Vilet, & al.    * 1 Kings vii. 49. 2 Chron. iv. 7.

(Z) Notwithstanding those texts we have quoted above, to prove that the lamps burned only in the night, some have stuck so close to the letter, where it is said elsewhere, that they shall burn continually (20), that they have affirmed them to burn all the day also. Josephus, as if he had been minded to split the difference, tells us, that three of them burned all day, and the other four were lighted against night *. But if we must suppose, without any occasion, that any burned in the day, it were more reasonable to think, it was the middle one, which, being more capacious than the rest, may have been left burning all day, and served to light the others by at night. For as the sanctuary opened to the sun rising, we can see no occasion for supposing a greater number of lights, against so many plain texts. But Josephus has added some other particulars, which it would be hard to guess where he had them, such as that the knops, cups, flowers, &c. in the candlestick amounted to 70 in all (21). Whereas those, who will be at the pains to tell them after Moses, will find but about 58; that is, 18 cups, 18 flowers, and 18 knops, to the 6 side-branches, and 4 to the middle one. Of the same kind is what he tells us there, that the 7 branches answered to the 7 planets; that the candlestick stood stooping, and such like, not worth a further enquiry.

(A) It may not, however, be amiss here, to say something of the oil that entertained these lamps; and this, the text tells us, was to be the purest virgin oil of olives, with which the land of Canaan abounded very much, as we have seen heretofore †; and indeed none but such would have been fit to burn in that place, where the furniture was so exquisitely rich. We may remember, that when Moses exacted a freewill-offering from the people, of all their costly spoils, oil was one of the things of that number; since then, there being always a certain quantity required with their other sacrifices, besides the tythes and free-offerings of the devouter sort, there could not be wanting a constant supply of it for this purpose. The Babylonish Talmud assures us, that, after the extruction of Solomon's temple, there was a place, by the women's apartment, appropriated for the keeping of it (22).

(20) Exod. xxvii. 20, & alib.    * Ant. lib. iii. c. 8.    (21) Ibid. c. 7. ad fin.    † Vide sup. p. 464. note (N).    (22) Traët. Middoth.

a to be a kind of rim round it, like that of our tea-tables *. It was also of pure gold, and might have an ogee or some such ornament about it. It stood upon four feet, which Josephus said resembled, in part, those that were used in the Dorian's beds †; but what he meant by it is not worth our enquiry. Moses seems to intimate, in another verse ‡, something like a second crown or rim, though some take it to be the same with the former; but it is more likely, that it was a lower one, which went round the four feet near the bottom, and kept them steady. To the upper rim were fastened four gold rings, two on each side, through which the bars were put that served for its carriage. On the top there were, besides the two rows of shew-loaves, some pans, or chafing-dishes of gold, in which the incense used to be burnt, with several other smaller utensils, which served for inferior uses in this holy place §, which we shall not dwell longer upon, because there are almost as many different opinions about the significations of their names, their form and uses, as there are interpreters. This table was afterwards changed for another by Solomon *. Josephus tells us †, that it was larger than the old one, probably to answer the largeness of the place. The author of the book of Chronicles adds, that he made ten more, five on the north, and five on the south side of the holy place, which served to set all the other utensils upon ‡; and Josephus says, that there were as many more of different makes and sizes, as served to hold twenty-thousand cups, and other vessels of gold, and twice that number of silver ones §.

c 4. THE court of the tabernacle, with its utensils, is the last thing we have to speak of. The court was an oblong square, an hundred cubits long, and fifty broad (B), inclosed on all but the east side, which had an opening of twenty cubits for the priests and Levites, and people to go in and out with their offerings. This inclosure was not designed to conceal what was done in the court, since the curtains, that surrounded it, were made of a kind of a net or point-work, through which even the heathens might have a view of it. These curtains, which Moses therefore calls by a particular name (C), to distinguish them from those of the tabernacle, whose use was of a different nature, were supported by four flights of pillars, probably of shittim-wood (D), with brass

Court of the tabernacle.

* Exod. xxv. 23, & seq. † Ibid. ver. 25. ‡ Ant. lib. iii. c. 6. § Exod. xxv. 29, & alib. pass. † 1 Kings vii. 48, & seq. ‡ Ant. lib. viii. ch. 2. § 1 Chron. iv. 8. † Ubi sup.

(B) This חצר Chatzer, or court, being mentioned in some places, especially by the psalmist (23), in the plural number, has induced some interpreters to suppose, without any reason, that there were at least two of them (24), one for the Levites, and the other for the people: But as Moses doth hint nothing like it, and we have observed already, that the plural is often used to denote the excellency of a thing; we see no ground for such a supposition, nor indeed for looking upon these expressions as prophetic of the three courts which Solomon made to the temple, viz. one for the Levites, one for the Israelites, and the last for the Gentiles, as some authors have done (25).

(C) The word here used is קלף, Kelaf, which signifies either a sling, or a net, or open work (26), probably because those slings, with which they slung their stones, had the bottom made of some such kind of open work. For this reason the Chaldees paraphrast translates it grate or crib-work, in which he is followed by the generality of Christian interpreters (27). Some rabbies add to it a flourishing of all sorts of leaf and flower-work (28); but they all agree, that the ground was open and transparent, so that these hangings might, in some measure, resemble a piece of point or lace.

The Jews tell us, however, that, after the tabernacle was fixed in Shiloh, they surrounded it with a good strong wall of the same dimension; but whether this had any apertures, or not, doth not appear. Sure it is, that these courts were in use, and esteemed as a piece of grandeur, in the earliest times, both among the Egyptians and other nations, and that not only their temples, but their palaces, were surrounded with one or more of them, either to obstruct the sight, or the approach of the people.

(D) As Moses makes no mention of any wood, but only of silver and brass, Josephus (29), and the old Latin version have supposed those pillars to have been made of this last metal. But besides that there is no likelihood that they should have added such a monstrous weight, as fifty-six such columns must have been, to all their other carriage, it is plain, Moses mentions nothing like it, where he speaks of all the other utensils made of brass (30), which he would hardly have omitted. However, lest this should not prove sufficient to confute that notion, a late author has been at the pains of computing all the brass that was used in the tabernacle, to prove, that there would not have been a sufficient quantity for other utensils, had these pillars been made of it (31). There is, however, some brass pedestals or sockets ; and adorned with silver fillets, or rather chapiters, for <sup>a</sup> such they were *. As for their height, as Moses has said nothing of it, authors have conjectured it variously, from ten to five cubits ; but as the design of them was only to support the curtains, and to hinder the approach, and not the view of the tabernacle ; the last seems the most rational, it being the height that Josephus assigns them, as well as that of the curtains ; only we may reasonably suppose, that the silver chapiters did rise above the curtain. We are likewise left to guess at their figure, only a square one may reasonably be supposed fitter both for carriage, and for holding the hangings tight, than a round one. They were fifty-six in number, twenty on each side, ten at the west, and six at the east end, besides those which supported the blue curtain which covered the entrance of the court, which was <sup>b</sup> of a fine sky blue flourished, and was made either to draw on either side, or to lift up ; the text doth not say which, but the Jews believe the latter †.

(23) Vide Ps. lxxv. 4. lxxxiv. 2. c. 4. & alib. (24) Vide CALVIN in loc. (25) Vide CUN. & BASNAG. ubi sup. tom. ii. lib. i. c. 6. (26) Vide BUXTORF. THESAUR. & ARR. MONTAN. sub voc. קלף. (27) R. SAL. JARCH. Vide MUNST. JUN. OLEAST. & al. (28) KIMCH. in Rad. & al. (29) Ant. lib. iii. c. 6. vide & RASCIUS in loc. (30) Exod. xxxviii. 29, & seq. (31) Vide BASNAG. ubi sup.

<sup>c</sup> THU S the whole court had a circuit of three hundred cubits. Those therefore, who suppose, that the curtain, which surrounded it, was one entire piece, seem not to consider what a laborious task it would have been to the Gershonites to have folded or rolled it up ; besides that, the text, speaking all along of them in the plural number, shews that there were more than one or two ‡. However, though this court bore the same proportion with the tabernacle, and the four sides ran parallel to it, yet is not the tabernacle to be supposed to have stood in the center of it. There was no necessity for the Area on the west end to be of the same extent with that on the east, because we do not read of any considerable utensils placed in that ; whereas this latter had the altar of burnt-offerings, the laver, and several other things, of which we are going now to speak ; so that though Moses has not left us the dimensions of either, this last is supposed to have been of equal length with its breadth, that is, fifty foot square ; and, indeed, less than that space could hardly suffice for all the work that was done there, and the multitude of utensils that were used in it, since it was the only place in which all the victims were slain, and both they, and all other kind of offerings, were brought and offered up. For this reason it is disputed, both among the Jews and Christians, <sup>d</sup> whether the people, who came thither with the victims, were suffered to enter into it, in order to lay their hands on their heads, and to stay the whole time of the ceremony, as the letter of the law seems to require ? Or, whether they were not met by the priests or Levites, at the entrance into the court, and, having performed the ceremony of imposition of hands and confession of sins there, did go to behold the remainder of it, from the openings of the inclosure. If the former be admitted, it must be owned, that they must have been very much crowded at some particular times, or been forced to admit no more at one time, than the place would conveniently hold. We need not to add, that the brass stakes and cordages which reigned all round, within as well as without, in order to secure both the court and the tabernacle from storms and winds, did still streighten the place <sup>e</sup> considerably. There have been also various conjectures concerning the reason of its situation, and facing of the west, which we shall not dwell upon : The best we meet with from the Jews is, that it was done in opposition to the Heatben, who worshipped towards the rising sun. As for the mystical interpretation of some Christian divines, they are out of our province.

<sup>f</sup> TH E altar of burnt-offerings was placed, as we have observed before, at the east end of the court, and one may suppose it to have stood at such a convenient distance from the tabernacle, that neither the smoak of its constant fire, nor that of the victims which were burned upon it might fall upon, or damage its outward veil. This altar is also called the outward, to distinguish it from that * Vide Exod. xxxviii. 28.

† Ibid. xxvii. 9. ad fin.

‡ Ibid. ver. 9, 10, 12, & seq.

some difficulty in adjusting the equidistance of these pillars, so as to bring the whole to the length and breadth assigned by Moses ; and which cannot be otherwise removed, than by supposing that those, that were at the end of the four sides, did come almost close to one another at each angle (32).

(32) BASNAG. ex CURIO, tom. ii. lib. i. c. 6. Vide MURST. JUN. CALM. & al. in loc.

- a of incense, which was within the sanctuary. We have already taken notice that it was made of shittim-wood, and covered over with brass. It was five cubits square, and three cubits high, and because it was portable, like the other, it had four brass rings, through which the two bars were put, by which it was carried upon the priests shoulders. It had four horns at the four corners, of the same wood, and covered with the same metal, but whose shape is equally uncertain with those of the other altar. In the cavity of it, which probably went through, and may be supposed as capacious as the bigness of the altar will admit; was hung by four brass rings a cross bar grate, which reached down to the middle of the cavity, and through which the ashes fell. This was to be placed under that part which is generally rendered the compass (E.) of the altar<sup>b</sup>, but is variously understood, or rather fancied, in order to save the wood from being consumed within the copper-work. We shall content ourselves with giving our readers the most probable and approved conjecture, which is that of the author of the Dissertations upon the Pentateuch<sup>c</sup>. He supposes the cavity of the altar to have been about seven feet and half wide, from side to side, and the shittim-wood to have been covered with brass, within as well as without. The cross bar grate he supposes to have been a vessel, made in the most convenient form to receive and keep up the fire, which was constantly supplied with fresh wood; and to have been hung about a foot deep within the cavity. As for the Carcob, which we render the compass or circuit, he thinks that it was another copper vessel, whose form he leaves to the discretion of the reader, capacious enough to contain the flesh of the victims, which were to be consumed upon, or in it. This vessel being likewise suspended by four brass rings over the grate, at a convenient distance, was consequently surrounded by the continual flames from below, and might consume all that was in it in a very little time, without endangering the wood of which the altar was made; and both the Carcob and the grate, being thus suspended, might be easily taken on and off, whenever the altar was to be cleared or transported. Thus far our author; the reader may see his reasons for these suppositions in the original. The only thing that can be objected against this supposition is, that there are some express texts which enjoin the victims, with the head and the fat, to be laid, not over, but upon the wood, or upon the fire, which is upon, not within, the altar<sup>d</sup>. This seems also to have been the practice of the ancient patriarchs, before the Mosaic institution. So that this Carcob seems rather to have contained the fire; if it was really a distinct thing from the grate. As for what is said of this latter hanging in the middle, it may more easily be understood of the middle with respect to its sides, than its height. Since therefore invention must supply the obscurity of the text, as our author observes, may we not as well suppose this Carcob to have been a kind of cincture to the grate, capacious enough to contain both the wood and the victims, and to have been suspended so near the level of the altar, and at so convenient a distance from the insides of it, as not to heat the brass of it to a degree sufficient to burn the wood inclosed in it; whilst the crib might be a kind of bottom to it, serving to give it air from beneath, and to let out the ashes and other small rubbish, which might otherwise clog the fire. We may even venture to add, that the whole might be so artificially contrived, that the flesh being thus embraced on all sides, by a fierce and constant fire, and this by the circumambient air, might center the heat to such a degree as to consume every particle, and yet be entirely free from that offensive smell,
- c

<sup>b</sup> Exod. xxvii. 1, & seq. <sup>c</sup> SAURIN'S Discours. sur le Pentat. Disc. liv. <sup>d</sup> Levit. i. 8.

(E) The word כַּרְסוֹב, Carcob, is one of those that occur but once in the scriptures, and whose meaning must remain uncertain for want of parallels to fix it. The Jews, instead of helping us in such doubtful cases, do rather embroil them the more. R. Solomon, and after him, the learned De Lyra believed it to have been only a kind of ornament, that surrounded the altar; and other rabbies, who affirm, contrary to the text, that the altar was ten cubits high, and large in proportion, tell us, that it was a kind of gallery, upon which priests were forced to mount, in order to lay the wood and victims in due order, and that the three cubits, which Moses assigns to the height of the altar, must be reckoned from that gallery, and upwards. But what quite confutes this wild notion is, that Moses says, this Carcob was to reach to the middle of the altar. If therefore the altar was ten cubits high, there must have been five cubits above, as well as five below this imaginary gallery, as Cunæus justly observes. Our commentators have therefore justly rejected them, and endeavoured to remove the main difficulty, without departing from the original, or giving into fabulous traditions.

which such quantities of flesh and fat must have necessarily caused (F). But this we submit to our readers. The truth is, that a man ought to have seen and examined the whole structure of the tabernacle and its apparatus, to be able to remove every difficulty that may be raised by the curious. But do we not find the same with respect to Greek and Roman antiquities, though we are better acquainted with those languages, and have such multitudes of ancient authors to consult, in comparison of those few that relate to the Jewish. It was on this altar, that the sacred fire, which descended from heaven at the consecration of the tabernacle, was to be continually kept. If it be asked how this could be done in their marches, when this and all other utensils were wrapped up in several coverings, the uppermost of which was of badgers-skins, without either burning those coverings, or extinguishing the fire, we need not to have recourse to miracles, as the rabbies do here and every where else (G). We may reasonably suppose that the Carcob, or vessel which held the fire, and was to be taken off when they removed, was carried in such a manner, as to preserve fire enough to kindle a greater one, when occasion required, as on the morning and evening sacrifice. The reader however must be reminded here, not to confound this Mosaic altar, with that spacious one which was afterwards reared by Solomon, of which this is not a proper place to speak. One common caution however belonged to these and all other altars (H), that the ascent to them was to be gradual, and not by steps, to prevent all indecency in God's worship<sup>1</sup>.

The great laver.

THE brazen laver is the last considerable utensil that was in the court of the tabernacle. It was conveniently situate between the east end of it and the altar of burnt-offerings. Its shape and capaciousness not being mentioned by Moses, we can affirm nothing certain about them. Its use was twofold. First it served for the priests to wash their hands and feet, who were expressly forbid, under severe penalties, to presume upon any part of their function till they had performed that ceremony<sup>2</sup>. Secondly, to wash the entrails and legs of the victims<sup>3</sup>. Some Jews do fancy, that there was another reservoir of water for this last use<sup>4</sup>, which is not improbable, not

<sup>1</sup> Exod. xx. ult.

<sup>2</sup> Exod. xxx. 20.

<sup>3</sup> Vide Levit. xix.

<sup>4</sup> Vide Кімш. in loc.

(F) As a confirmation of what we have advanced, we beg leave to assure our readers, that we have seen in France a kind of portable hearth not unlike a chafing-dish, so artfully contrived, that the fire within it, tho' not very fierce to outward appearance, did consume feathers, brimstone, and other like foetid materials, without casting the least smell, or indeed any heat beyond the narrow boundaries of its focus. This curious piece was exposed to publick view by the owner, for a small piece of money at Paris and several other parts of France, and an account of it sent to the curious both in England and other parts of Europe, enough to assure our readers of the fact. However, if the reader thinks much of admitting the parallel, we beg leave to add, with respect to these two altars, that as that of incense was over-laid with gold, in order to answer the rest of the rich utensils of the sanctuary, so this of burnt-offerings was covered with brass, because all the other materials of the court were made of that metal; rather than barely to preserve the wood under it from the fire. The shittim therefore might be designed only as the mould or model of the altars, and to avoid either the excessive cost, or weight of massive ones: So that whether we suppose it to have been incom-bustible or not, the end was still answered, since, even upon the latter supposition, that of gold was out of danger, because the fire was set upon it in a separate golden vessel or censer, and this of copper might either be so contrived as to save the wood, or, if that should be burnt to a coal, the metal may be supposed strong enough to stand without it.

(G) It is by the same miraculous power that they pretend it was preserved against violent winds and rains, to which the altar was exposed, by standing in such an open place; but we may more reasonably suppose, that they took proper means to shelter it from both, such as Moses might leave to their discretion. As for the wood that entertained this fire, they tell us that it was not to be such as had served to any other purpose; that it was not to be canker or worm-eaten, and the like; and that, after the Nethinims had made it ready for use, it was the business of those priests, who were disabled from officiating at the altar, to examine it after them, and to throw aside all that they found any such defects in. As for this sacred fire, we need not to tell our readers how early it was in use among the Chaldeans and Persians, from whom it passed to the Greeks, Romans, and other nations. It was called in the old Persic, Orismada, which some critics pretend to be derived from the Hebrew words, urim esh yab, light and fire of God, or from esh men yab, light and fire from God; and from thence infer, that they had this custom from the Jews†, but that is what we dare not venture to warrant. As for the Jewish one, we read in the Maccabees (33), that, at the approach of Nebuchadnezzar towards Jerusalem, the prophet Jeremiah, with some other priests, took it from the altar, and went and hid it in the bottom of a dry well, and that, at the return from the captivity, Nehemiah sent some of their grand-children to the well, who brought him some dirty water instead of fire, but, upon his pouring it upon the altar, it immediately blazed into a clear flame, which was kept afterwards till the destruction of the second temple. This story is likewise apocryphal, but the Jews believe it, only they compare this second fire to a dog, whereas the first, they say, was like a lion (34).

(H) As we are upon the subject of the divine laws, by

† BASNAO. ex Cuneo, tom. ii. lib. i. c. 14. ZACCUTII, ubi sup.

(33) 2 Macc. i. 19. & seq. ii. 1, & seq.

(34) R.

- a not only as it was more decent, but because we find it so ordered in Solomon's temple, where the brazen sea was for the sole washing of the priests, whilst there were ten other lavers besides for the washing of the victims<sup>1</sup>. If this was not the case here, we must suppose that they only took the water out of the laver into some other vessels to wash those entrails in, for it was not even lawful for a priest to wash his hands and feet in the same water. For this reason they suppose, that this laver had a quantity of cocks, at which the water was set to run upon their feet first, and then upon their hands, and was received into a basin underneath<sup>2</sup>. This fountain was to be kept continually replenished with water, and this office belonged to the Levites<sup>3</sup>, unless they made perhaps the Nethinims bring it to them
- b to the entrance of the court. Moses tells us in another chapter, that this brass laver and its foot was made of the looking-glasses of the women that came in crowds to the door of the tabernacle<sup>4</sup>, which has given ground for various speculations; and some interpreters have even ventured to turn the brass there mentioned into steel<sup>5</sup>, as if those ancient mirrors had been made of no other metal. For our part, we take it for granted, that they were made of other metals also; such as brass, tin, silver, and the like, and some with brass mixed with tin or silver; the last of which, Pliny tells us<sup>6</sup>, were the most esteemed; but we are apt to think, that there is an error crept into the text, or an exchange of one letter for another like it, and that it should be rendered, he made the laver and
- c its foot of a brass, like unto the looking-glasses of the women that crowd about the door of the tabernacle, by which is meant, that he made them either of the same metal, or that he gave them the same degree of brightness and smoothness (1). And if what an ancient father tells us be true of the Egyptian women<sup>7</sup>, that they used to go to the temple with a looking-glass in one hand, and a timbrel in the other, it will still give us a greater light into the meaning of the Hebrew women wearing such an ornament when they came to the tabernacle. As for what is said of their repairing thither in crowds, it was no more than what they usually did, as appears from other places of scripture<sup>8</sup>.

To

<sup>1</sup> 2 Chron. iv. 6. <sup>2</sup> Mishn. ap. ARR. MONTAN. in loc. <sup>3</sup> Vide N. DE LYRA in loc. <sup>4</sup> Exod. xxxviii. 8. <sup>5</sup> Vide TREMEL. in loc. <sup>6</sup> Lib. xxxiii. c. 9. <sup>7</sup> CYRIL. ALEXAND. de Adorat. in spirit. lib. ii. ap. CALM. sub voc. Miroir. <sup>8</sup> Vide 1 Sam. ii. 22, & alib.

by whose directions all these things were made, we must by no means forget that altar which God enjoined to be made to him, either of earth, or of rough stones, in all places where he should record his name (35). Whoever compares these words with the command of building the brazen altar, might be apt to think, that the Israelites were left at their liberty to offer up their sacrifices either upon the one or the other, as they liked best; and yet we find a severe prohibition against sacrificing any where but at this latter, and in the court of the tabernacle (36). To reconcile this seeming contravention, some have conjectured, that this brazen altar was filled with earth and rough stones, but what we have said above doth sufficiently confute such a supposition. We pass by several others equally crude to come at the most rational. There seems indeed a manifest difference between the laws relating to those two altars; that of the one, viz. the brazen one, confined it to the ceremonial part, in which the priests alone were allowed to officiate; whereas the other related properly to extraordinary cases, when some holy persons were commanded by God to offer some kind of sacrifices, without any regard to the tribes they were of; upon all which occasions they were obliged to rear such a plain altar as is above described.

The only thing, that can be objected against this solution, is that the words, thou shalt build me an altar of earth — in every place where I record my name, &c. seem rather to imply a fixed, than such an occasional altar. But the Chaldee paraphrast has given us a truer sense of these words, as all who understand the original will easily own; which is this, In every place where I cause, or command my name to be recorded or celebrated, &c. The meaning of which is plainly this by comparing both places together: It shall not be lawful for you to offer your sacrifices wheresoever your fancy leads you, but only at the court of my tabernacle; Nevertheless, whenever I cause my name to be celebrated upon any particular occasion, in what place soever I command my servants to sacrifice unto me, there shall they rear me an altar of earth, &c. and there I will meet and bless them; but this shall not be done without an express command from me. This natural interpretation was not only verified by the sequel, as appears from all the instances we have of these extraordinary sacrifices, but doth likewise account for the reason of God's chusing a plain and artless altar upon all such occasions; about which, both Jews and Christians have racked their brains to little purpose. For, had they been more elaborate and lasting, the Israelites, too prone to superstition, would have been in all probability induced to fancy a more than ordinary sanctity in them, and so have gone a whoring after them, contrary to God's express prohibition; whereas their being reared up just to serve the present exigence, and then being immediately pulled, or falling down in course, could not administer any such temptation.

(1) Those who understand the original know, that it is far from improbable, that the 2 beth may have slipped in here instead of the 2 caph, by reason of their likeness; especially if they remember, that the former is never used that we can recollect, to express the metal or stuff of which a thing is made; so that this letter is here altogether irregular; whereas

(35) Exod. xx. 24. (36) Levit. xvii. 3, 4. Vide BASNAG. ubi sup. c. 14.

To these we might add a multitude of other furniture subservient to other uses, <sup>a</sup> such as kettles, pans, frying-pans, ovens, shovels, tongs, pickaxes, hatchets, cleavers, knives, forks, tables, tubs, trays, dishes, and many more; all of which were either made of brass, or of wood covered with it; but it is sufficient to have named the most considerable of them. We shall only add, that the charge of all these was committed, the most sacred ones to the priests, and the rest to the Levites, whose business it was to pack and cover them up with proper cloths and skins, made for that purpose, whenever they removed. It is observable however, that in all this account we find no mention made of any pavement or flooring, so much as for the tabernacle, and yet it is hardly credible, as was observed before, that its rich and sacred utensils should stand on the bare ground. We may therefore <sup>b</sup> suppose, that Moses has barely mentioned all that was done before the setting up of the tabernacle. And if we consider their vast number and variety, the richness and curious workmanship of a great part of them, and the little time the whole was finished in, not much above five months<sup>c</sup>, we shall have cause to wonder at their dispatch, unless we suppose a vast number of hands to have been employed in it; but this need not hinder us from supposing, that Moses might add many others, as he saw needful in process of time, among which this flooring might be one.

THESE are the principal laws relating to the worship of God, or, as they are commonly called, of the first table; but, before we pass on to those of the second, it will be necessary to say something of those which related to the proselytes (K). <sup>c</sup> There was an express command of God, that, if any stranger was desirous to be admitted to eat of the passover, he was first to be circumcised, after which he was to be admitted, not only to that grand solemnity, but to all the other religious privileges, in common with the Israelites<sup>d</sup>. Of this number was a great part of the mixed multitude which came with them out of Egypt, and of the conquered inhabitants of Canaan. And indeed the condition of those who became circumcised was so preferable to that of those who continued in their old religion, that the number of them increased very much; and this is supposed to have put the selfish Jews upon the distinction between proselytes of the gate, and proselytes of righteousness, the former of which continuing uncircumcised, and being bound to observe only the precepts of Noah, were kept in a state not many degrees better than slavery. We find no less than an hundred and fifty three thousand, and upwards, of this kind in Solomon's time, who were all employed in the most servile and laborious works<sup>e</sup>. But because this would have proved a most effectual way to have made them embrace the Jewish religion, in hopes of bettering their condition, the Jews tells us, that they admitted few, if any, into it, especially in the happy reigns of David and Solomon, lest they should be induced to it only from worldly ends<sup>f</sup> (L). Moses whereas the גר, which signifies as, like unto, according to, gives a good sense to the phrase. However the rabbies, taking it in the other sense, have made it a great piece of merit in those devout women, who, according to them, were filled with such a zeal for the service of God, that they came in shoals to the tabernacle, to sacrifice the most precious ornament of their toilet to holy uses, resolved for the future to neglect all outward adorning, that they might take more care of the inward. Those interpreters who have fancied them to be real glasses framed in brass, and to have been fixed round the laver that the priests might see themselves in them, seem still more out of the way, since they came thither only to wash their hands and feet, which they could do without the help of a glass.

<sup>a</sup> Ita Judæi. Vide Sedar. Olam. MUNK. CUN. USSER Ann. p. 16, & al. <sup>b</sup> Exod. xii. 48. Numb. ix. 14. <sup>c</sup> 2 Chron. ii. 17, 18. <sup>d</sup> MAIMON. Vide SELD. de Synedr. Buxr. Synagog. & alib.

(K) The text distinguishes them only by the words גר, Ger, a traveller or sojourner, and נכר, Neker, a stranger or alien. However we may make a threefold distinction of them, namely, of such as continued still in their idolatry, and religion of their fathers; such as had renounced it to worship the only true God, but remained still uncircumcised, or bound themselves, as the Jews pretend, only to the observation of the Noachid law; and lastly, those who by circumcision were bound to observe the law of Moses, and were thereby intitled to the same privileges with all the Israelites. It is true, they were not to suffer any of the first sort to live among them, but it is plain by the sequel, that they became extremely remiss and negligent in this respect, and were often reproved for it by the prophets. The second sort were called גרי השער, Gari hababar, strangers of the gate, from the expression often used in the pentateuch, the stranger that is within thy gates. But, when any of either sort became circumcised, they were then distinguished by the name of גרייהברית, Gari-haberith, strangers or proselytes of the covenant, and גרי צדק, Gari-zedek, proselytes of righteousness.

(L) The Talmud compares those proselytes to the rust in iron, or ulcers in the body, and adds, that too much caution could not be taken in the admission of them (37). For this reason they add, that they were refused three times, but, if they persisted in their desire of being admitted, they were then to be circumcised, before two or three sufficient witnesses, to be baptized, in order to wash away the filth of heathenism; and lastly, to offer up the usual sacrifices for sin, &c. after which they were received as servants of the God of Israel (38).

(37) Vide SELD. de Synedr. lib. ii. c. 2. art. 5. (38) Vide BASKAC. ex Cuneo tom. ii. lib. 1. c. 1.

- a commanded the Israelites to give the beasts which died of themselves to these strangers<sup>c</sup>, which is inconsistent with what the Jews say of their being bound to keep the precepts of Noah, one of which, and, indeed, the only one recorded by Moses, was against eating flesh with the blood thereof<sup>d</sup>, we therefore think it more probable that they were only obliged to renounce their idolatry, and to acknowledge the one true God.

- THE case was different with respect to the profelytes of righteousness, these becoming incorporated into the family of Israel, and bound to observe the Mosaic law, were to undergo a long and serious examination, wherein they set before them the difficulties of keeping Moses's laws, the danger of breaking them, the contempt and hatred, and sometimes grievous prosecutions they exposed themselves to, by becoming the servants of the God of Israel, and the like. If they continued steadfast in their purposes, notwithstanding these discouragements, they were then to be circumcised, and, as soon as the wound permitted it, they were to be baptized. And, because this last ceremony was looked upon as judiciary, it was to be performed before three judges at least, and recorded; so that it was never to be repeated afterwards, even in cases of apostacy; neither were their children, that were born after their father's baptism, to be baptized, but only circumcised, as those of the Israelites. If the profelytes had been of a nation which used circumcision, such as the Ismaelites, Edomites, and others were, they contented themselves with opening the scar of circumcision with a lancet, and drawing out some drops of blood, after which they were admitted by baptism; and as for their women, they were only to be baptized, without any other ceremony. Moses made likewise some difference between nation and nation, with respect to their admission, into what he terms the congregation of the Lord<sup>e</sup>. The Edomites were received after the second generation, because they were brethren; and so were the Egyptians, because Israel had been a stranger in Egypt. The Moabites and Ammonites, on the contrary, were not to be admitted till after the tenth generation, as some understand the text, or, according to the letter of the original, not even after the tenth generation, because, instead of receiving the Israelites with a brotherly hospitality, they hired Balaam to curse them (M). Bastards, and all illegitimate issue, were under the same exclusion with them (N). The Amalekites, as well as Eunuchs of all kinds (O), were totally ex-
- b
- c
- d

<sup>c</sup> Deut. xiv. 21.<sup>d</sup> Gen. ix. 4.<sup>e</sup> Deut. xxiii. 1, & seq.

(M) The Jews observe, that Moses expresses himself only in the masculine, Ammoni and Moabi, a man Ammonite or Moabite, to intimate that he did not mean to exclude a woman from being admitted upon some extraordinary account. For Ruth, tho' a Moabite's, was, for her extraordinary piety, married to Boaz, the great grandfather of David (39). But we shall see in the next note, that this is not the only instance of their admitting persons expressly excluded by that law-giver.

(N) The original word is ממוזר, Mamzer, by which the Jews generally understand, not only all kind of incestuous and adulterous issue, but likewise children begot in fornication, or even in wedlock, when either of the parents were Canaanites, or of any idolatrous nation, and unconverted (40). The Septuagint, Vulgate, and the Canonists take it to signify only the son of a prostitute. The truth is, the right meaning of it cannot be fixed, because it is used only in this place and in Zechariah (41), but in neither is explained by the context. What has induced the Jews to understand it of incestuous and other unlawful issue is, that the Mamzer is mentioned just before, and put upon the same foot with the Ammonites and Moabites, who were born by incest (42); but if that were the case, how came the two sons of Judah, Pharez and Zarah, whom he had by his daughter-in-law Tamar (43), not to be reputed spurious. If it be said he knew her not, yet it is plain she knew him, and the Jews, against whom we object this, pretend, that either in incest or adultery, though neither party be conscious; as when a woman, believing her husband long since dead, marries another, or vice versa, yet the issue of such a marriage is Mamzer, or spurious; so that, according to this canon of theirs, those two and their posterity ought to have been excluded.

Again, as to the children of whoredom, it is plain they have not always been rejected, since Jephtha, who was both judge and general in Israel, was the son of a concubine (44). We must therefore suppose, either that these were particular cases excepted, or, which is most probable, that Mamzer signified something different from either of these, perhaps the children begot by an Hebrew upon a Canaanitish or any idolatrous woman, in order to deter them from such unlawful mixtures, by the consideration that the issue of them must be excluded from all the privileges of the Israelitish commonwealth, both civil and religious; but whatever is meant at first, the Jewish canonists, according to their usual rigidity, have extended it not only to all illegitimate issue, but even to that whose legitimacy is anywise doubtful (45).

(O) The original implies a man who has any defect,

(39) Vide MUNST. in Deut. xxiii. 1, & seq. (40) Idem ibid. (41) G. ix. 6. (42) Gen. xix. 31, & seq. vide sup. p. 284. 2. (43) Gen. xxxviii. 13, & seq. (44) Judg. xi. 1. (45) Vide SELD. ubi sup. & de Jur. Nat. & Gent. lib. v. c. 16. & lib. de success. con. l. ii. & alib. pass. MUNST. ubi sup. & al. it. præc. nro. 117.

To these we might add a multitude of other furniture subservient to other uses, <sup>a</sup> such as kettles, pans, frying-pans, ovens, shovels, tongs, pickaxes, hatchets, cleavers, knives, forks, tables, tubs, trays, dishes, and many more; all of which were either made of brass, or of wood covered with it; but it is sufficient to have named the most considerable of them. We shall only add, that the charge of all these was committed, the most sacred ones to the priests, and the rest to the Levites, whose business it was to pack and cover them up with proper cloths and skins, made for that purpose, whenever they removed. It is observable however, that in all this account we find no mention made of any pavement or flooring, so much as for the tabernacle, and yet it is hardly credible, as was observed before, that its rich and sacred utensils should stand on the bare ground. We may therefore <sup>b</sup> suppose, that Moses has barely mentioned all that was done before the setting up of the tabernacle. And if we consider their vast number and variety, the richness and curious workmanship of a great part of them, and the little time the whole was finished in, not much above five months<sup>c</sup>, we shall have cause to wonder at their dispatch, unless we suppose a vast number of hands to have been employed in it; but this need not hinder us from supposing, that Moses might add many others, as he saw needful in process of time, among which this flooring might be one.

THESE are the principal laws relating to the worship of God, or, as they are commonly called, of the first table; but, before we pass on to those of the second, it will be necessary to say something of those which related to the proselytes (K). <sup>c</sup> There was an express command of God, that, if any stranger was desirous to be admitted to eat of the passover, he was first to be circumcised, after which he was to be admitted, not only to that grand solemnity, but to all the other religious privileges, in common with the Israelites<sup>a</sup>. Of this number was a great part of the mixed multitude which came with them out of Egypt, and of the conquered inhabitants of Canaan. And indeed the condition of those who became circumcised was so preferable to that of those who continued in their old religion, that the number of them encreased very much; and this is supposed to have put the selfish Jews upon the distinction between proselytes of the gate, and proselytes of righteousness, the former of which continuing uncircumcised, and being bound to observe <sup>d</sup> only the precepts of Noah, were kept in a state not many degrees better than slavery. We find no less than an hundred and fifty three thousand, and upwards, of this kind in Solomon's time, who were all employed in the most servile and laborious works<sup>a</sup>. But because this would have proved a most effectual way to have made them embrace the Jewish religion, in hopes of bettering their condition, the Jews tell us, that they admitted few, if any, into it, especially in the happy reigns of David and Solomon, lest they should be induced to it only from worldly ends<sup>b</sup> (L). Moses whereas the גֵּר, which signifies as, like unto, according to, gives a good sense to the phrase. However the rabbies, taking it in the other sense, have made it a great piece of merit in those devout women, who, according to them, were filled with such a zeal for the service of God, that they came in shoals to the tabernacle, to sacrifice the most precious ornament of their toilet to holy uses, resolved for the future to neglect all outward adorning, that they might take more care of the inward. Those interpreters who have fancied them to be real glasses framed in brass, and to have been fixed round the laver that the priests might see themselves in them, seem still more out of the way, since they came thither only to wash their hands and feet, which they could do without the help of a glass.

<sup>a</sup> 7 Ita Judæi. Vide Sedar. Olam. MUNT. CUN. USSER Ann. p. 16, & al. <sup>b</sup> Exod. xii. 48. Numb. ix. 14. <sup>c</sup> 2 Chron. ii. 17, 18. <sup>d</sup> MAIMON. Vide SELD. de Synedr. Buxt. Synagog. & alib.

(K) The text distinguishes them only by the words גֵּר, Ger, a traveller or sojourner, and נֶכֶר, Neker, a stranger or alien. However we may make a threefold distinction of them, namely, of such as continued still in their idolatry, and religion of their fathers; such as had renounced it to worship the only true God, but remained still uncircumcised, or bound themselves, as the Jews pretend, only to the observation of the Noahid law; and lastly, those who by circumcision were bound to observe the law of Moses, and were thereby intitled to the same privileges with all the Israelites. It is true, they were not to suffer any of the first sort to live among them, but it is plain by the sequel, that they became extremely remiss and negligent in this respect, and were often reproved for it by the prophets. The second sort were called גֵּרֵי הַשְּׁעָרִים, Gere bashabar, strangers of the gate, from the expression often used in the pentateuch, the stranger that is within thy gates. But, when any of either sort became circumcised, they were then distinguished by the name of גֵּרֵי הַבְּרִית, Gere-habrith, strangers or proselytes of the covenant, and גֵּרֵי צְדָקָה, Gere-zedek, proselytes of righteousness.

(L) The Talmud compares those proselytes to the rust in iron, or ulcers in the body, and adds, that too much caution could not be taken in the admission of them (37). For this reason they add, that they were refused three times, but, if they persisted in their desire of being admitted, they were then to be circumcised, before two or three sufficient witnesses, to be baptized, in order to wash away the filth of heathenism; and lastly, to offer up the usual sacrifices for sin, &c. after which they were received as servants of the God of Israel (38).

(37) Vide SELD. de Synedr. lib. ii. c. 2. art. 5. (38) Vide BASNAG. ex Cunnæ tom. ii. lib. 1. c. 1.

a commanded the Israelites to give the beasts which died of themselves to these strangers<sup>c</sup>, which is inconsistent with what the Jews say of their being bound to keep the precepts of Noah, one of which, and, indeed, the only one recorded by Moses, was against eating flesh with the blood thereof<sup>d</sup>, we therefore think it more probable that they were only obliged to renounce their idolatry, and to acknowledge the one true God.

The case was different with respect to the proselytes of righteousness, these becoming incorporated into the family of Israel, and bound to observe the Mosaic law, were to undergo a long and serious examination, wherein they set before them the difficulties of keeping Moses's laws, the danger of breaking them, the contempt and hatred, and sometimes grievous prosecutions they exposed themselves to, by becoming the servants of the God of Israel, and the like. If they continued steadfast in their purposes, notwithstanding these discouragements, they were then to be circumcised, and, as soon as the wound permitted it, they were to be baptized. And, because this last ceremony was looked upon as judiciary, it was to be performed before three judges at least, and recorded; so that it was never to be repeated afterwards, even in cases of apostacy; neither were their children, that were born after their father's baptism, to be baptized, but only circumcised, as those of the Israelites. If the proselytes had been of a nation which used circumcision, such as the Ismaelites, Edomites, and others were, they contented themselves with opening the scar of circumcision with a lancet, and drawing out some drops of blood, after which they were admitted by baptism; and as for their women, they were only to be baptized, without any other ceremony. Moses made likewise some difference between nation and nation, with respect to their admission, into what he terms the congregation of the Lord<sup>e</sup>. The Edomites were received after the second generation, because they were brethren; and so were the Egyptians, because Israel had been a stranger in Egypt. The Moabites and Ammonites, on the contrary, were not to be admitted till after the tenth generation, as some understand the text, or, according to the letter of the original, not even after the tenth generation, because, instead of receiving the Israelites with a brotherly hospitality, they hired Balaam to curse them (M). Bastards, and all illegitimate issue, were under the same exclusion with them (N). The Amalekites, as well as Eunuchs of all kinds (O), were totally ex-

<sup>c</sup> Deut. xiv. 21.

<sup>d</sup> Gen. ix. 4.

<sup>e</sup> Deut. xxiii. 1, & seq.

(M) The Jews observe, that Moses expresses himself only in the masculine, Ammoni and Moabi, a man Ammonite or Moabite, to intimate that he did not mean to exclude a woman from being admitted upon some extraordinary account. For Ruth, tho' a Moabite's, was, for her extraordinary piety, married to Boaz, the great grandfather of David (39). But we shall see in the next note, that this is not the only instance of their admitting persons expressly excluded by that law-giver.

(N) The original word is מִזְרִי, Mamzer, by which the Jews generally understand, not only all kind of incestuous and adulterous issue, but likewise children begot in fornication, or even in wedlock, when either of the parents were Canaanites, or of any idolatrous nation, and unconverted (40). The Septuagint, Vulgate, and the Canonists take it to signify only the son of a prostitute. The truth is, the right meaning of it cannot be fixed, because it is used only in this place and in Zechariah (41), but in neither is explained by the context. What has induced the Jews to understand it of incestuous and other unlawful issue is, that the Mamzer is mentioned just before, and put upon the same foot with the Ammonites and Moabites, who were born by incest (42); but if that were the case, how came the two sons of Judah, Pharez and Zarah, whom he had by his daughter-in-law Tamar (43), not to be reputed spurious. If it be said he knew her not, yet it is plain she knew him, and the Jews, against whom we object this, pretend, that either in incest or adultery, though neither party be conscious; as when a woman, believing her husband long since dead, marries another, or vice versa, yet the issue of such a marriage is Mamzer, or spurious; so that, according to this canon of theirs, those two and their posterity ought to have been excluded.

Again, as to the children of whoredom, it is plain they have not always been rejected, since Jephtha, who was both judge and general in Israel, was the son of a concubine (44). We must therefore suppose, either that these were particular cases excepted, or, which is most probable, that Mamzer signified something different from either of these, perhaps the children begot by an Hebrew upon a Canaanite's or any idolatrous woman, in order to deter them from such unlawful mixtures, by the consideration that the issue of them must be excluded from all the privileges of the Israelitish commonwealth, both civil and religious; but whatever is meant at first, the Jewish canonists, according to their usual rigidity, have extended it not only to all illegitimate issue, but even to that whose legitimacy is anywise doubtful (45).

(O) The original implies a man who has any defect,

(39) Vide MUNS. in Deut. xxiii. 1, & seq. (40) Idem ibid. (41) C. ix. 6. (42) Gen. xix. 31, & seq. vide sup. p. 284. a. (43) Gen. xxxviii. 13, & seq. (44) Judg. xi. 1. (45) Vide SELD. ubi sup. & de Jur. Nat. & Gent. lib. vi. c. 16. & lib. de success. oon. l. ii. & alib. pass. MUNS. ubi sup. & al. it. præc. neg. 117.

cluded ; the former, because they were under the divine Anathema<sup>a</sup> ; and the latter, because their condition was accounted a legal defect<sup>a</sup>. What is meant, by not entering into the congregation of the Lord, is not agreed ; some understanding by it, their being denied admittance into the Israelitish commonwealth by circumcision ; and others, their being only excluded from places of authority. This last is the most probable, and most received among Christian interpreters. The Jews, however, understand it of contracting affinities and intermarriages with the Israelitish women, for it was a received maxim among them, that the children did follow the quality of the mother. Every proselyte of righteousness was obliged to circumcise all the males, and baptize all the females in his family, under the age of thirteen ; but those, that were above that age, might chuse whether they would submit to it, or remain in their old religion. On the other hand, those under thirteen could not be admitted to proselytism, without the consent, either of their parents, or, in case of their refusal, that of two or three judges. In this case their admission was looked upon as a new birth, and their parents were no longer esteemed as such ; insomuch, that they believed this kind of new converts to receive a new soul after baptism<sup>b</sup>. Well might therefore our Saviour wonder that Nicodemus, who was a master in Israel, should hesitate at his discourse concerning a new birth<sup>c</sup>. We find several other regulations concerning the prerogatives of these proselytes in the Talmud, and other Jewish writings, which we shall not dwell upon ; we shall only take notice of a flagrant one, namely, that their admission did so totally cancel all former ties, either of blood or alliance, that even parents and their children might intermarry, without committing incest : And might it not be on this account that Christ condemns the scribes and pharisees for compassing sea and land to make a proselyte, and leaving him ten times more a child of hell than themselves ? † for in what other sense they could be made worse than that proud hypocritical sect, is hardly possible to guess. Thus much for the laws of the first table.

Laws of the second table : Or concerning the Jewish government, with the customs relating to it.

Laws of the second table.

THESE we shall mention in the same order as they are in the decalogue, and begin with those which relate to parents, whether in a political or natural sense. The patriarchal government being become impracticable, by reason of its being branched out into so many families, whom God nevertheless designed to live as one, under one head, one religion, and one body of civil laws ; and the precepts of Noah, or rather the laws of nature, being perhaps partly forgot, and partly corrupted, during their Egyptian thralldom ; God was pleased to prevent all murmurings and opposition, which such a change might cause in so untractable a people, by declaring, that himself would be their king, and appoint proper viceregents from time to time, under whom the heads of families should govern and administer justice to those under them, in exact conformity to his laws. Moses was declared the first viceregent, and accordingly it is said, that he gave a law, or rather a body of laws, and an inheritance unto the congregation of Jacob, and was king in, or over Jeshurun, that is, over Israel (P), when the heads of the people and the tribes of Israel were gathered together<sup>a</sup> ; that is, as we understand the original, when the divided power of the heads of tribes and families became concentrated under one head. To him succeeded Joshua and the judges, but still by God's appointment ; and nothing evinces more the reasonableness, or rather necessity, of this change of sect, either in his testicles, or his penis, by fracture, compression, or by any other way. We shall observe here with the Jews, however, that there is no proper name in any of the sacred books, either for those parts in either sex, or for several other things which modesty forbids to utter. This they bring as an argument of the holiness and chasteness of the Hebrew tongue ; but whether it be not said with more zeal than truth, we shall have occasión to speak of in another place.

<sup>a</sup> Exod. xvii. 14, & seq. <sup>b</sup> Vide Levit. xxi. 20. <sup>c</sup> Vide SELB. ubi sup. & de J. N. & G. & JAC. ALTING. Di put. de Profelyt. R. MOS. KOTZ. R. MOS. Egypt Isur biath perek SERRAR. Trih. ref. lib. ii. c. 2. DRUS. de trib. sect. FAG. in Exod. xxii. 21, & al. in Deut. xxiii. 1. vide & præ. neg. 113, & seq. LEO DE MODEN. pt. v. ch. 3. CALM. sub voc. Profelyte, & al. <sup>d</sup> John iii. 1, & seq. † Vide Math. xxiii. 15. <sup>e</sup> Deut. xxxiii. 4 & 5.

(P) The word יִשְׂרָאֵל Jeshurun is derived from יִשְׂרָאֵל Jasbar, to be righteous ; which name is given them, not so much for their righteousness, as for that of their progenitors, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob ; or more likely, perhaps, on account of those righteous laws which God himself had dictated unto them.

- a government, than their constant back-slidings into all manner of idolatry and wickedness at every interregnum, when their inferior rulers became so remiss, that as often as we read that there was no judge among them, so often we find that every one did that which was right in his own eyes, or that they did evil in the sight of God<sup>1</sup>: but as every detection brought its punishment with it, they at length grew weary of their frequent captivities. But, instead of having recourse to God by repentance, they bethought themselves of that expedient of having a king, who should be always ready at hand to defend them, and God, having condescended to their desire, appointed Saul to be their monarch; and the Jewish commonwealth took then the name of a kingdom. This may be the reason why God, whom their ingratitude could not provoke to forsake them, though he resented this their imprudent desire of being governed by a king like other nations (Q), gave them so few laws to enforce their obedience to him, whilst he made some coercive ones to restrain him from oppressing them. The universal passiveness of those nations whom they wanted to imitate, as well as their own, whenever they were kept with a rigid hand, made the former unnecessary; and on the other hand, the excessive power, which was then lodged in the regal dignity, made it extremely dangerous, unless limited by wholesome restrictions. We need not a more lively instance of this early despotism of kings, and of the people's base submission to it, than the horrid slaughter which Saul, their first king, made of eighty-five guiltless priests, and of all the innocent inhabitants of Nob, even to their very sucking children, and all their cattle†: And if this had not been likewise the case of other nations, Samuel could not have given so pathetic a list of the hardships they were to expect under an absolute monarchy. But whether this, or any other, were the reason, sure it is, that we find nothing in the whole body of the Mosaic laws, to enforce an obedience to princes, except the command, honour thy father and thy mother<sup>2</sup>; which alluded most likely to the patriarchal government; and an express prohibition against cursing the rulers of the people<sup>3</sup>; whereas there are several very express ones, to restrain them from abusing their power, and oppressing their subjects. Of this nature are those which exclude all strangers from being raised to that dignity<sup>4</sup>, that forbid a king of Israel to multiply horses, wives (R), riches, to marry strange women, and the like<sup>5</sup>; that oblige him to write a copy of God's law, to read and meditate upon, and to govern himself by it, without deviating from it to the right or left<sup>6</sup>; that enjoin him to make choice of persons of wisdom and integrity to be judges over the people, and such like<sup>7</sup>.

HOWEVER, as they were accountable only to God for the breach of these laws, so none were restrained by them, but such as feared him; as for the rest, it is plain from their history, that they made no scruple of transgressing them in instances of the highest nature; and that their power was so great, that none did dare to controul them, or even reprove them, except such prophets as were commissioned by God for so doing. Their being anointed, at least in the beginning (S), by some celebrated prophets, and appointed sovereigns of a nation, which the scrip-

<sup>1</sup> Vide Judg. ii. & seq. † 1 Sam. xxii. 18, 19. <sup>2</sup> Exod. xx. 12, & alib. <sup>3</sup> Ibid. xxii. 28. <sup>4</sup> Deut. xvii. 14, 15. <sup>5</sup> Ibid. ver. 16, 17. <sup>6</sup> Ver. 18, & seq. vide & præc. negat. 221, & seq. <sup>7</sup> Deut. xvi. 18, & seq. vide & præc. affirm. 96, & seq.

